THIS Condensation of the 'Dictionary of the Bible' has been made by Mr. WILLIAM ALDIS WRIGHT, M.A., Librarian of Trinity College, Cambridge, under my direction and superintendence. It is intended to satisfy a generally expressed wish for an account of the most recent Biblical studies in a form adapted for universal circulation. A Dictionary of the Bible, in some form or another, is indispensable for every family. The Divine, the Scholar, and all who seek to investigate thoroughly the various subjects connected with the Bible, and to master those controversies which are now exciting such deep and general interest, must still have recourse to the Larger Dictionary; but to students in the Universities, and in the Upper Forms at private families, and to that numerous class of persons who desire to arrive at results simply, this CONCISE DICTIONARY will supply all that is necessary for the elucidation and the Bible. It is the main object of the Editor to place within the reach of every Christian household a popular and accessible Work which has received the approval of those most competent to express an opinion on the subject.

AARON

A'alar. [ADDAN.]

Aaron the son of Amram and Jochebed, and the elder brother of Moses and Miriam (Num. xxvi. 59, xxxiii. 39). He was a Levite, and is first mentioned in Ex. iv. 14, as one who could "speak well." He was appointed by Jehovah to be the Interpreter and "Mouth" (Ex. iv. 16) of his brother Moses, who was "slow of speech;" and accordingly he was not only the organ of communication with the Israelites and with Pharaoh (Ex. iv. 30, vii. 2), but also the actual instrument of working most of the miracles of the Exodus. (See Ex. vii. 19, &c.) Thus on the way to Mount Sinai, during the battle with Amalek, Aaron is mentioned with Hur, as staying up the weary hands of Moses, when they were lifted up for the victory of Israel (not in prayer, as is sometimes explained, but) to bear the rod of God (see Ex. xvii. 9). Through all this period he is mentioned as dependent upon his brother, and deriving all his authority from him. The contrast between them is even more strongly marked on the arrival at Sinai. Moses at once acts as the mediator (Gal. iii. 19) for the people, to come near to God for them, and to speak His words to them. Aaron only approaches with Nadab, and Abihu, and the seventy elders of Israel, by special command, near enough to see God's glory, but not so as to enter His immediate presence. Left then, on Moses' departure, to guide the people, Aaron is tried for a moment on his own responsibility, and he fails, not from any direct unbelief on his own part, but from a weak inability to withstand the demand of the people for visible "gods to go before them." Possibly it seemed to him prudent to make an image of Jehovah, in the well-known form of Egyptian idolatry (Apis or Mnevis), rather than to risk the total alienation of the people to false gods; and his weakness was rewarded by seeing a "feast to the Lord" (Ex. xxxii. 5) degraded to the lowest form of heathenish sensuality, and knowing, from Moses' words and deeds, that the covenant with the Lord was utterly broken. There can hardly be a stronger contrast with this weakness, and the self-convicted shame of his excuse, than the burning indignation of Moses, and his stern decisive measures of vengeance; although beneath these there lay an ardent affection, which went almost to the verge of presumption in prayer for the people (Ex. xxxii. 19-34), and gained forgiveness for Aaron himself (Deut. ix. 20).—Aaron was now consecrated by Moses to the new office of the high-priesthood. The order of God for the consecration is found in Ex. xxix., and the record of its execution in Lev. viii. The form of consecration resembled other sacrificial ceremonies in containing, first, a sin-offering, the form of cleansing from sin and reconciliation [SIN-OFFERING]; a burnt-offering, the symbol of entire devotion to

God of the nature so purified [BURNT-OFFERING]; and a meat-offering, the thankful acknowledgment and sanctifying of God's natural blessings [MEAT-OFFERING]. It had, however, besides these, the solemn assumption of the sacred robes (the garb of righteousness), the anointing (the symbol of God's grace), and the offering of the ram of consecration, the blood of which was sprinkled on Aaron and his sons, as upon the altar and vessels of the ministry, in order to sanctify them for the service of God. The former ceremonies represented the blessings and duties of the man; the latter the special consecration of the priest.—The solemnity of the office, and its entire dependence for sanctity on the ordinance of God, were vindicated by the death of his sons, Nadab and Abihu, for "offering strange fire" on the altar (Lev. x. 1, 2). From this time the history of Aaron is almost entirely that of the priesthood, and its chief feature is the great rebellion of Korah and the Levites against his sacerdotal dignity, united with that of Dathan and Abiram and the Reubenites against the temporal authority of Moses [KORAH]. The true vindication of the reality of Aaron's priesthood was, not so much the death of Korah by the fire of the Lord, as the efficacy of his offering of incense to stay the plague, by which he was seen to be accepted as an Intercessor for the people. The blooming of his rod, which followed, was a miraculous sign, visible to all, and capable of preservation, of God's choice of him and his house.—The only occasion on which his individual character is seen is one of presumption, prompted as before chiefly by another, and, as before, speedily repented of. The murmuring of Aaron and Miriam against Moses clearly proceeded from their trust, the one in his priesthood, the other in her prophetic inspiration, as equal commissions from God (Num. xii. 2). It seems to have vanished at once before the declaration of Moses' exaltation above all prophecy and priesthood, except that of One who was to come. On all other occasions he is spoken of as acting with Moses in the guidance of the people. Learning as he seems to have done wholly on him, it is not strange that he should have shared his sin at Meribah, and its punishment [MOSES] (Num. xx. 10-12). Aaron's death seems to have followed very speedily. It took place on Mount Hor, after the transference of his robes and office to Eleazar, who alone with Moses was present at his death, and performed his burial (Num. xx. 28). This mount is still called the "Mountain of Aaron." [HOR].—The wife of Aaron was Elisheba (Ex. vi. 23); and the two sons who survived him, Eleazar and Ithamar. The high-priesthood descended to the former, and to his descendants, until the time of Eli, who, although of the house of Ithamar, received the high-priesthood, and transmitted it to his children; with them it continued till the accession of Solomon, who took it from Abiathar, and restored it to Zadok (of the house of Eleazar), so fulfilling the prophecy of 1 Sam. ii. 30.

Ab (father), an element in the composition of many proper names, of which Abba is a Chaldaic form, the syllable affixed giving the emphatic force of the definite article. Applied to God by Jesus Christ (Mark xiv. 36), and by St. Paul (Rom. viii. 15; Gal. iv. 6).

Ab. [MONTHS.]

Ab'acuc, 2 Esdr. i. 40. [HABAKKUK.]

Abad'don, Rev. ix. 11. [APOLLYON.]

Abadias = Obadiah, son of Jehiel (1 Esd. viii. 35).

Abag tha, one of the seven eunuchs in the Persian court of Abasuerus (Esd. i. 10).

Ab'ana, one of the "rivers of Damascus" (2 K. v. 12). The Barada and the Awaq are now the chief streams of Damascus, and there can be little doubt that the former of these represents the Abana and the latter the Pharpar of the text. The Barada rises in the Anti-Lebanus, at about 23 miles from the city, after flowing through which it runs across the plain, till it loses itself in the lake or marsh Bihret el-Khiltiyeh.

Ab'arim, a mountain or range of highlands on the east of the Jordan, in the land of Moab (Deut. xxvii. 49), facing Jericho, and forming the eastern wall of the Jordan valley at that part. Its most elevated spot was "the Mount Nebo, 'head' of 'the' Pisgah," from which Moses viewed the Promised Land before his death. There is nothing to prove that the Abarim were a range or tract of any length, unless the Ije-Abarim ("heap of A.") named in Num. xxviii. 44, and which were on the south frontier of Moab, are to be taken as belonging to them. These mountains are mentioned in Num. xxvii. 12, xxviii. 47, 48, and Deut. xxxii. 49; also probably in Jer. xii. 20, where the word is rendered in the A. V. "passages."

Ab'ba. [AB.]

Ab'da. 1. Father of Adoniram (1 K. iv. 6).—2. Son of Shammua (Neh. xi. 17), called Obadiah in 1 Chr. ix. 16.

Ab'deel, father of Shelemiah (Jer. xxxvi. 26).

Ab'di. 1. A Merarite, and ancestor of Ethan the singer (1 Chr. vi. 44).—2. The father of Kish, a Merarite, in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxix. 12).—3. One of the Bene-Elam in the time of Ezra, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 26).

Ab'dias, 2 Esdr. i. 39. [OBADIAH.]

Ab'diel, son of Guni and father of Ahi, one of the Gadites who were settled in the land of Bashan (1 Chr. v. 15) in the days of Jotham king of Judah.

Ab'don. 1. A judge of Israel (Judg. xii. 13, 15), perhaps the same person as Bedan in 1 Sam. xii. 11.—2. Son of Shashak (1 Chr. viii. 23).—3. First-born son of Jehiel, son of Gilead (1 Chr. viii. 30, ix. 35, 36).—4. Son of Micah, a contemporary of Josiah (2 Chr. xxxiv. 20), called Aqbor in 2 K. xxii. 12.—5. A city in the tribe of Asher, given to the Geshonites (Josh. xxi. 30; 1 Chr. vi. 74).

Abd'nego (i. e. servant of Nego, perhaps the same as Nebo, the Chaldaean name given to Azariah, one of the three friends of Daniel, miraculously saved from the fiery furnace (Dan. iii). [AZARIAH.]

Ab'el, in Hebr. He'bel (i. e. breath, vapour, transitoriness, probably so called from the shortness of his life), the second son of Adam, murdered by his brother Cain (Gen. iv. 1-16). Jehovah showed respect for Abel's offering, but not for that of Cain, because, according to the Epistle to the Hebrews (xi. 4), Abel "by faith offered a more excellent sacrifice than Cain." The expression "sin," i. e. sin-offering, "lieth at the door" (Gen. iv. 7), seems to imply that the need of sacrifices of blood to obtain forgiveness was already revealed. Our Lord spoke of Abel as the first martyr (Matt. xxiii. 35); so did the early church subsequently. The place of his murder and his grave are pointed out near Damascus; and the neighbouring peasants tell a curious tradition respecting his burial (Stanley, S. & P. p. 413).

Ab'el, the name of several places in Palestine, probably signifies a meadow. 1. Ab'el-BETHMA'ACHAH, a town of some importance ("a city and a mother in Israel," 2 Sam. xx. 19), in the extreme N. of Palestine; named with Dan, Chinneroth, Kedesh; and as such falling an early prey to the invading kings of Syria (1 K. xv. 20) and Assyria (2 K. xv. 29). In the parallel passage, 2 Chr. xvi. 4, the name is changed to Abel Ma'in, "Abel on the waters." Here Sela was overtaken and besieged by Joab (2 Sam. xx. 14, 15); and the city was saved by the exercise, on the part of one of its inhabitants, of that sagacity for which it was proverbial (18). In verses 14 and 18 it is simply Abel, and in 14 is apparently distinguished from Bethmaachah.—2. Ab'el-MIZRA'IM, i. e. the mourning of Egypt, the name given by the Canaanites to the floor of Atad, at which Joseph, his brothers, and the Egyptians made their mourning for Jacob (Gen. l. 11). It was beyond (on the east of) Jordan. [ATAD].—3. Ab'el-SHITTIM, "the meadow of the acacia," in the "plains" of Moab; on the low level of the Jordan valley, as contradistinguished from the cultivated "fields" on the upper level of the table-land. Here—their last resting-place before crossing the Jordan—Israel "pitched from Beth-jeshnoth unto A.-Shittim" (Num. xxxiii. 49). The place is most frequently mentioned by its shorter name of Shittim. [SHITTIM.] In the days of Josephus it was still known as Abela, the town embosomed in palms, 60 stadia from the city. The town and the palms have disappeared; but the acacia-groves, denoted by the name Shittim, still remain, "marking with a line of verdure the upper terraces of the Jordan valley" (Stanley, S. & P. 298).—4. Ab'el-ME'HOLOAH ("meadow of the dance"), named with Beth-shean and Jokneam (1 K. iv. 12), and therefore in the N. part of the Jordan valley. To "the border" (the 'lip' or 'brink') of Abel-meholah, and to Beth-shittah (the "house of the acacia"), both places being evidently down in the Jordan valley, the routed Bedouin host fled, from Gideon (Judg. vii. 22). Here Elisha was found at his plough by Elijah returning up the valley from Horeb (1 K. xix. 16-19).—5. Ab'el-CERAMIM, in the A. V. rendered "the plain of the vineyards," a place eastward of Jordan, beyond Aroer; named as the point to which Jephthah's pursuit of the Bene-Ammon extended (Judg. xi. 33). An, Abel is mentioned by Eusebius at 6 miles beyond Philadelphia (Rabbah); and another more to the N. 12 miles E. from Gadara, below the Hieromax.—6. "The GRPAT 'AREL' in the field of Joshua the Bethsheanite" (1 Sam. vi. 18). By comparison with 14 and 15, it would seem that for Abel should be read Ben = stone. Our translators, by the insertion of "stone of," take a middle course.

Abēz, a town in the possession of Issachar, named between Kishion and Remoth, in Josh. xix. 20, only.

Ab'i, mother of king Hezekiah (2 K. xviii. 2). The name is written Abijah in 2 Chr. xxix. 1. Her father's name was Zachariah. He was perhaps the Zachariah mentioned by Isaiah (viii. 2).

Ab'ia, Ab'iah, or Ab'ijah. 1. Son of Becher, the son of Benjamin (1 Chr. vii. 8).—2. Wife of Hezron (1 Chr. ii. 24).—3. Second son of Samuel, whom together with his eldest son Joel he made judge in Beersheba (1 Sam. viii. 2; 1 Chr. vii. 28). The corruptness of their administration was the reason alleged by the Israelites for their demanding a king.—4. ABIJAH, or ABIJAM, the son of Rehobam (1 Chr. iii. 10; Matt. i. 7).—5. Mother of king Hezekiah. [ABI.]—6. Descendant of Eleazar, and chief of the eighth of the 24 courses of priests (Luke i. 5); the same as ABIJAH, 4.

Abi-Al'bon. [ABIEL.]

Abi'asaph (Ex. vi. 24), otherwise written Ebi'asaph (1 Chr. vi. 23, 37, ix. 19), the head of one of the families of the Kohrites (a house of the Kohathites), but his precise genealogy is somewhat uncertain. In Ex. vi. 24, he appears at first right to be represented as one of the sons of Korah, and as the brother of Assir and Elkanah. But in 1 Chr. vi. he appears as the son of Elkanah, the son of Assir, the son of Korah. The natural inference from this would be that, in Ex. vi. 24, the expression "the sons of Korah" merely means the families into which the house of the Kohrites was subdivided. Among the remarkable descendants of Abi-asaph, according to the text of 1 Chr. vi. 33-37, were Samuel the prophet and Elkanah his father (1 Sam. i. 1), and Heman the singer; but Ebiasaph seems to be improperly inserted in ver. 37.

Abi'athar, high-priest and fourth in descent from Eli, who was of the line of Ithamar, the younger son of Aaron. Abiathar was the only one of all the sons of Ahimelech the high-priest who escaped the slaughter inflicted upon his father's house by Saul, at the instigation of Doeg the Edomite (see title to Ps. lii. and the psalm itself), in revenge for his having inquired of the Lord for David, and given him the shew-bread to eat, and the sword of Goliath the Philistine, as is related in 1 Sam. xxii. Abiathar having become high-priest fled to David, and was thus enabled to inquire of the Lord for him (1 Sam. xxii. 9, xxx. 7; 2 Sam. ii. 1, v. 19, &c.). The fact of David having been the unwilling cause of the death of all Abiathar's kindred, coupled with his gratitude to his father Ahimelech for his kindness to him, made him a firm and steadfast friend to Abiathar all his life. Abiathar on his part was firmly attached to David. He adhered to him in his wanderings while pursued by Saul; he was with him while he reigned in Hebron (2 Sam. ii. 1-3), the city of the house of Aaron (Josh. xxi. 10-13); he carried the ark before him when David brought it up to Jerusalem (1 Chr. xv. 11; 1 K. ii. 26); he continued faithful to him in Absalom's rebellion (2 Sam. xv. 24, 29, 35, 36, xvii. 15-17, xix. 11); and "was afflicted in all wherein David was afflicted." He was also one of David's chief counsellors (1 Chr. xxvii. 34). When, however, Adonijah set himself up for David's successor on the throne, in opposition to Solomon, Abiathar, perhaps in rivalry to Zadok, sided with him, and was one of his chief partisans, while Zadok was on Solomon's side. For this Abiathar was banished to his native village, Anathoth, in the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. xxi. 18), and narrowly escaped with his life, which was spared by Solomon only on the strength of his long and faithful service, to David his father. He was deprived of the high-priesthood, and we are told that "Zadok the priest did the king put in the room of Abiathar" (1 K. ii. 27, 35). There are one or two difficulties connected with Abiathar, to which a brief reference must be made. (1.) It is difficult to determine the position of Abiathar relatively to Zadok, and to account for the double high-priesthood. Zadok, who was descended from Eleazar, the elder son of Aaron, is first mentioned in 1 Chr. xii. 28, where he is described as "a young man mighty of valour," and is said to have joined David while he reigned in Hebron. From this time we read, both in the books of Samuel and Chronicles, of "Zadok and Abiathar the priests," Zadok being always named first. And yet we are told that Solomon on his accession put Zadok in the room of Abiathar. Perhaps the true state of the case was, that Abiathar was the first, and Zadok the second priest; but that from the superior strength of the house of Eleazar, which enabled it to furnish 16 out of the 24 courses (1 Chr. xiv.), Zadok acquired considerable influence with David; and that this, added to his being the heir of the elder line, and perhaps also to some of the passages being written after the line of Zadok were established in the high-priesthood, led to the precedence given him over Abiathar. We have already suggested the possibility of jealousy of Zadok being one of the motives which inclined Abiathar to join Adonijah's faction. It is most remarkable how, first, Saul's cruel slaughter of the priests at Nob, and then the political error of the wise Abiathar, led to the fulfilment of God's denunciation against the house of Eli, as the writer of 1 K. ii. 27 leads us to observe when he says that "Solomon thrust out Abiathar from being priest unto the Lord, that he might fulfil the word of the Lord which He spake concerning the house of Eli in Shiloh." (2.) In 2 Sam. viii. 17, and in the duplicate passage 1 Chr. xviii. 16, and in 1 Chr. xxiv. 3, 6, 31, we have Ahimelech substituted for Abiathar, and Ahimelech the son of Abiathar, instead of Abiathar the son of Ahimelech. Whereas in 2 Sam. xx. 23, and in every other passage in the O. T., we are uniformly told that it was Abiathar who was priest with Zadok in David's reign, and that he was the son of Ahimelech, and that Ahimelech was the son of Ahitub. The difficulty is increased by finding Abiathar spoken of as the high-priest in whose time David ate the shew-bread, in Mark ii. 26. However, the evidence in favour of David's friend being Abiathar the son of Ahimelech preponderates so strongly, and the impossibility of any rational reconciliation is so clear, that one can only suppose that the error was a clerical one originally, and was propagated from one passage to another. The mention of Abiathar by our Lord, in Mark ii. 26, might perhaps be accounted for, if Abiathar was the person who persuaded his father to allow David to have the bread, and if, as is probable, the leaves were Abiathar's (Lev. xxiv. 9), and given by him with his own hand to David.

Ab'ib. [MONETH.]

Ab'idah or Ab'ida, a son of Midian (Gen. xxv. 4; 1 Chr. i. 33).

Ab'idan, chief of the tribe of Benjamin at the time of the Exodus (Num. i. 11, ii. 22, vii. 60, vi. 24).

ABIEL

Abiel 1. The father of Kish, and consequently grandfather of Saul (1 Sam. ix. 1), as well as of Abner, Saul's commander-in-chief (1 Sam. xiv. 51). In the genealogy in 1 Chr. viii. 33, ix. 39, Ner is made the father of Kish, and the name of Abiel is omitted, but the correct genealogy according to Samuel is:—

—2. One of David's mighty men (1 Chr. xi. 32). In 2 Sam. xxii. 31 he is called ABIALBON, which Kennicott decides is the true reading, though it seems more probable that the copyist carried his eye forward to the next verse, and that "the Shaulbonite" there was the cause of his error. The Syr. of 2 Sam. has "Abi, the son of Abialmon of Gilead." Abiel was a native of the Arabah, or valley of the Jordan, as his name "Arbathite" indicates.

Abiezer 1. Eldest son of Gilead, and descendant of Manasseh, and apparently at one time the leading family of the tribe (Josh. xvii. 2; 1 Chr. vii. 18; Num. xxvi. 30, where the name is given in the contracted form of Jezer). In Chronicles, Abiezer is, in the present state of the text, said to have sprung from the sister of Gilead (1 Chr. vii. 18). He was the ancestor of the great Judge Gideon. [GIDEON.] The name also occurs in Judg. vi. 34, vii. 2; and in an adjectival form ("the Abiezrite") in Judg. vi. 11, 24, viii. 32.—2. One of David's "mighty men" (2 Sam. xxiii. 27; 1 Chr. xi. 28, xxvii. 12).

Abigail 1. The beautiful wife of Nabal, a wealthy owner of goats and sheep in Carmel. When David's messengers were slighted by Nabal, Abigail took the blame upon herself, supplied David and his followers with provisions, and succeeded in appeasing his anger. Ten days after this Nabal died, and David sent for Abigail and made her his wife (1 Sam. xxv. 14, &c.). By her he had a son, called Chileab in 2 Sam. iii. 3; but Daniel, in 1 Chr. iii. 1.—2. A sister of David, married to Jether the Ishmaelite, and mother, by him, of Amasa (1 Chr. ii. 17).—The statement in 2 Sam. xvii. 25 that the mother of Amasa was an Israelite is doubtless a transcriber's error. There could be no reason for recording this fact; but the circumstance of David's sister marrying a heathen Ishmaelite deserved mention.

Abihai 1. Father of Zuriel, chief of the Levitical family of Merari, a contemporary of Moses (Num. iii. 35).—2. Wife of Abishur (1 Chr. ii. 29).—3. Son of Huri, of the tribe of Gad (1 Chr. v. 14).—4. Wife of Rehoboam. She is called the daughter, i.e. descendant of Eliab, the elder brother of David (2 Chr. xi. 18).—5. Father of Esther and uncle of Mordecai (Esth. ii. 15, ix. 29).

Abihai, the second son (Num. iii. 2) of Aaron by Elisheba (Ex. vi. 23), who with his father and his elder brother, Nadab and seventy elders of Israel accompanied Moses to the summit of Sinai (Ex. xxiv. 1). Being together with Nadab guilty of offering strange fire (Lev. x. 1) to the Lord, i.e. not the holy fire which burnt continually upon the altar of burnt-offering (Lev. vi. 9, 12), they were both consumed by fire from heaven, and Aaron and his surviving sons were forbidden to mourn for them.

ABILENE

Abihud, son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin (1 Chr. viii. 3).

Abijah or Abijam 1. The son and successor of Rehoboam on the throne of Judah (1 K. xiv. 31; 2 Chr. xii. 16). He is called Abijah in Chronicles, Abijam in Kings; the latter name being probably an error in the MSS. He began to reign B.C. 959, and reigned three years.—From the first book of Kings we learn that Abijah endeavoured to recover the kingdom of the Ten Tribes, and made war on Jeroboam. No details are given, but we are also informed that he walked in all the sins of Rehoboam (idolatry and its attendant immoralities, 1 K. xiv. 23, 24), and that his heart "was not perfect before God, as the heart of David his father." In the second book of Chronicles his war against Jeroboam is more minutely described; he was successful in battle, and took the cities of Bethel, Jeshanah, and Ephraim, with their dependent villages. It is also said that his army consisted of 400,000 men, and Jeroboam's of 800,000, of whom 500,000 fell in the action; but our MSS. are frequently incorrect as to numbers, and these are reasons for reducing these to 40,000, 80,000, and 50,000. Nothing is said by the writer in Chronicles of the sins of Abijah, but we are told that after his victory he "waxed mighty, and married fourteen wives," whence we may well infer that he was elated with prosperity, and like his grandfather Solomon fell, during the last two years of his life, into wickedness, as described in Kings. He was succeeded by Asa.—2. The second son of Samuel, called ABIAH in our version. [ABIA, ABIAH, No. 3].—3. The son of Jeroboam I. king of Israel, in whom alone, of all the house of Jeroboam, was found "some good thing toward the Lord God of Israel," and who was therefore the only one of his family who was suffered to go down to the grave in peace. He died in his childhood, just after Jeroboam's wife had been sent in disguise to seek help for him, in his sickness, from the prophet Abijah, who gave her the above answer. (1 K. xiv.)—4. A descendant of Eleazar, who gave his name to the eighth of the twenty-four courses into which the priests were divided by David (1 Chr. xxiv. 10; 2 Chr. viii. 14; Neh. xii. 4, 17). To the course of Abijah or Abia belonged Zacharias the father of John the Baptist (Luke i. 5).—5. One of the priests who entered into a covenant with Nehemiah to walk in God's law (Neh. x. 7); unless the name is rather that of a family, and the same with the preceding.

Abila. [ABILENE.]

Abilene (Luke iii. 1), a tetrarchy of which the capital was Abila, a city situated on the eastern slope of Antilibanus, in a district fertilised by the river Barada. Its name probably arose from the green luxuriance of its situation, "Abel" perhaps denoting "a grassy meadow." [See p. 2 B.] The name, thus derived, is quite sufficient to account for the traditions of the death of Abel, which are associated with the spot, and which are localised by the tomb called Nabi Habil, on a height above the ruins of the city. The position of the city is very clearly designated by the Itineraries as 18 miles from Damascus, and 38 (or 32) miles from Heliopolis or Baalbec.—It is impossible to fix the limits of the Abilene which is mentioned by St. Luke as the tetrarchy of Lysanias. [LYSANIAS]. Like other districts of the East it doubtless underwent many changes, both of masters and of extent, before it was finally absorbed in the province of Syria. Josephus associates this neighbourhood with the name of Lycaonias both before and after the time referred to by the evangelist.—The site of the chief city of Abilene has been undoubtedly identified where the Itinerary places it; and its remains have been described of late years by many travellers. It stood in a remarkable gorge called the Sûk Wady Burada, where the river breaks down through the mountain towards the plain of Damascus.

Abim'ael, a descendant of Joktan (Gen. x. 28; 1 Chr. i. 22), and probably the progenitor of an Arab tribe.

Abim'elech (father of the king), the name of several Philistine kings, was probably a common title of these kings, like that of Pharaoh among the Egyptians, and that of Caesar and Augustus among the Romans. An argument to the same effect is drawn from the title of Ps. xxxiv., in which the name of Abimelech is given to the king, who is called Achish in 1 Sam. xxi. 11.—1. A Philistine, king of Gath (Gen. xx. xxi), who, exercising the right claimed by Eastern princes, of collecting all the beautiful women of their dominions into their harem (Gen. xii. 15; Esth. ii. 5), sent for and took Sarah. A similar account is given of Abraham's conduct on this occasion, to that of his behaviour towards Pharaoh [ABRAHAM].—2. Another king of Gath in the time of Isaac, of whom a similar narrative is recorded in relation to Rebekah (Gen. xxvi. 1, &c.).—3. Son of the judge Gideon by his Shechemite concubine (Judg. viii. 31). After his father's death he murdered all his brethren, seventy in number, with the exception of Jotham the youngest, who concealed himself; and he then persuaded the Shechemites, through the influence of his mother's brethren, to elect him king. It is evident from this narrative that Shechem now became an independent state, and threw off the yoke of the conquering Israelites. When Jotham heard that Abimelech was made king, he addressed to the Shechemites his fable of the trees choosing a king (Judg. ix. 1). After Abimelech had reigned three years, the citizens of Shechem rebelled. He was absent at the time, but he returned and quelled the insurrection. Shortly after he stormed and took Thebez, but was struck on the head by a woman with the fragment of a mill-stone (comp. 2 Sam. xi. 21); and lest he should be said to have died by a woman, he bade his armour-bearer slay him. Thus God avenged the murder of his brethren, and fulfilled the curse of Jotham.—4. Son of Abiathar, the high-priest in the time of David (1 Chr. xviii. 16), called Ahimelech in 2 Sam. viii. 16. [AHIMELECH.]

Abin'adab. 1. A Levite, a native of Kirjath-jearim, in whose house the ark remained 20 years (1 Sam. vii. 1, 2; 1 Chr. xiii. 7).—2. Second son of Jesse, who followed Saul to his war against the Philistines (1 Sam. xvi. 8, xvii. 13).—3. A son of Saul, who was slain with his brothers at the fatal battle on Mount Gilboa (1 Sam. xxxi. 2).—4. Father of one of the twelve chief officers of Solomon (1 K. iv. 11).

Abin'am, the father of Barak (Judg. iv. 6, 12; v. 1, 12).

Abiram. 1. A Reubenite, son of Eliab, who with Ithan and On, men of the same tribe, and Korah a Levite, organised a conspiracy against Moses and Aaron (Num. xvi.). [For details, see KORAH].—2. Eldest son of Hiel, the Bethelite, who died when his father laid the foundations of Jericho (1 K. xvi. 34), and thus accomplished the first part of the curse of Joshua (Josh. vi. 26).

Abiron = Abiram (Ecclus. xlv. 18).

Abise'i = Abishua, son of Phinehas (2 Esdr. i. 2); called also ABISUM (1 Esdr. vii. 2).

Abishag, a beautiful Shunammite, taken into David's harem to comfort him in his extreme old age (1 K. i. 1-4). After David's death Adonijah induced Bathsheba, the queen-mother, to ask Solomon to give him Abishag in marriage; but this imprudent petition cost Adonijah his life (1 K. ii. 13, &c.). [ADONIJAH.]

Abisha'i, the eldest of the three sons of Zeruiah, David's sister, and brother to Joab and Asahel (1 Chr. ii. 16). It may be owing to his seniority of birth that Abishai, first of the three brothers, appears as the devoted follower of David long before Joab appears on the stage. Abishai has attached himself to the fortunes of David. He was his companion in the desperate night expedition to the camp of Saul, and would at once have avenged and terminated his uncle's quarrel by stabbing the sleeping king with his own spear. But David indignantly restrained him, and the adventurous warriors left the camp as stealthily as they had come carrying with them Saul's spear and the cruse of water which stood at his head (1 Sam. xxvi. 6-9). During David's outlaw life among the Philistines Abishai was probably by his side, though nothing more is heard of him till he appears with Joab and Asahel in hot pursuit of Abner, who was beaten in the bloody fight by the pool of Gibeon. Asahel fell by Abner's hand; at sun-set the survivors returned, buried their brother by night in the sepulchre of their father at Bethlehem, and with revenge in their hearts marched on to Hebron by break of day (2 Sam. ii. 18, 24, 32). In the prosecution of their vengeance, though Joab's hand struck the deadly blow, Abishai was associated with him in the treachery, and "Joab and Abishai killed Abner" (2 Sam. iii. 30). [ABNER.] In the war against Hanun, undertaken by David as a punishment for the insult to his messengers, Abishai, as second in command, was opposed to the army of the Ammonites before the gates of Rabbah, and drove them headlong before him into the city, while Joab defeated the Syrians who attempted to raise the siege (2 Sam. x. 10, 14; 1 Chr. xix. 11, 15). The defeat of the Edomites in the valley of salt (1 Chr. xviii. 12), which brought them to a state of vassalage, was due to Abishai, acting perhaps under the immediate orders of the king (see 2 Sam. viii. 13), or of Joab (Ps. lx. title). On the outbreak of Absalom's rebellion and the consequent flight of David, Abishai remained true to the king; and the old warrior showed a gleam of his ancient spirit, as fierce and relentless as in the camp of Saul, when he offered to avenge the taunts of Shimei, and urged his subsequent execution (2 Sam. xvi. 9; xix. 21). In the battle in the wood of Ephraim Abishai commanded a third part of the army (2 Sam. xviii. 2, 5, 12), and in the absence of Amasa was summoned to assemble the troops in Jerusalem and pursue after the rebel Sheba, Joab being apparently in disgrace for the slaughter of Absalom (2 Sam. xx. 6, 10).—The last act of service which is recorded of Abishai is his timely rescue of David from the hands of a gigantic Philistine, Ishbi-benob (2 Sam. xxi. 17). His personal prowess on this, as on another occasion, when he fought single-handed against three hundred, won for him a place as captain of the second three of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii. 18, 1 Chr. xi. 20). But in all probability this act of daring was achieved while he was the companion of David's wanderings as an outlaw among the Philistines. Of the end of his chequered life we have no record.

Abishalom, father or grandfather of Maachah, who was the wife of Rehoboam, and mother of Abijah (1 K. xv. 2, 10). He is called Absalom in 2 Chr. xi. 20, 21. This person must be David's son (see LXX., 2 Sam. xiv. 27). Maachah was doubtless named after her grandmother (2 Sam. iii. 3). [MAACHAH, 3.]

Abishua. 1. Son of Bela, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chr. viii. 4).—2. Son of Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, and father of Bukki, in the genealogy of the high-priests (1 Chr. vi. 4, 5, 50, 51; Ezer. vii. 4, 5). According to Josephus (Ant. viii. 1, §3) he executed the office of high-priest after his father Phinehas, and was succeeded by Eli; his descendants, till Zadok, falling into the rank of private persons.

Abishur, son of Shammai (1 Chr. ii. 28).

Abisum = Abishua, son of Phinehas (1 Esd. viii. 2), elsewhere called AMSEI.

Abital, one of David's wives (2 Sam. iii. 4; 1 Chr. iii. 3).

Abitub, son of Shammai by Hushim (1 Chr. viii. 11).

Abiad, descendant of Zerobabel in the genealogy of Jesus Christ (Matt. i. 13). Lord A. Hervey identifies him with HODALAH (1 Chr. iii. 24) and JUDA (Luke iii. 26), and supposes him to have been the grandson of Zerobabel through his daughter Shelomith.

Ablution. [PURIFICATION.]

Abner. 1. Son of Ner, who was the brother of Kish (1 Chr. ix. 36), the father of Saul. Abner, therefore, was Saul's first cousin, and was made by him commander-in-chief of his army (1 Sam. xiv. 51). He was the person who conducted David into Saul's presence after the death of Goliath (xvii. 57); and afterwards accompanied his master when he sought David's life at Hachilah (xxvi. 3-14). From this time we hear no more of him till after the death of Saul, when he rises into importance as the main stay of his family. It would seem that, immediately after the disastrous battle of Mount Gilboa, David was proclaimed king of Judah in Hebron, the old capital of that tribe, but that the rest of the country was altogether in the hands of the Philistines, and that five years passed before any native prince ventured to oppose his claims to their power. During that time the Israelites were gradually recovering their territory, and at length Abner proclaimed the weak and unfortunate Ishbosheth, Saul's son, as king of Israel, at Mahanaim beyond Jordan. War soon broke out between the two rival kings, and a "very sore battle" was fought at Gibeon between the men of Israel under Abner and the men of Judah under Joab, son of Zeruiah, David's sister (1 Chr. ii. 16). When the army of Ishbosheth was defeated, Joab's youngest brother Asahel, who is said to have been "as light of foot as a wild roe," pursued Abner, and in spite of warning refused to leave him, so that Abner in self-defence was forced to kill him. After this the war continued, success inclining more and more to the side of David, till at last the imprudence of Ishbosheth deprived him of those counsels and general-ship of the hero, who was in truth the only support of his tottering throne. Abner had married Rizpah, Saul's concubine, and this, according to the views of Oriental courts, might be so interpreted as to imply a design upon the throne. Rightly or wrongly, Ishbosheth so understood it, and he even ventured to reproach Abner with it. Abner, incensed at his ingratitude, after an indignant reply, opened negotiations with David, by whom he was most favourably received at Hebron. He then undertook to procure his recognition throughout Israel; but after leaving his court for the purpose was enticed back by Joab, and treacherously murdered by him and his brother Abishai, at the gate of the city, partly no doubt, as Joab showed afterwards in the case of AMASA, from fear lest so distinguished a convert to their cause should gain too high a place in David's favour, but ostensibly in retaliation for the death of Asahel. This murder caused the greatest sorrow and indignation to David; but, as the assassins were too powerful to be punished, he contented himself with showing every public token of respect to Abner's memory, by following the bier and pouring forth a simple dirge over the slain (2 Sam. iii. 33, 34).—2. The father of Jansiel, chief of the Benjamites in David's reign (1 Chr. xxvii. 21): probably the same as the preceding.

Abomination of Desolation, mentioned by our Saviour as a sign of the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, with reference to Dan. ix. 27, xi. 31, xii. 11. The Jews considered the prophecy of Daniel as fulfilled in the profanation of the Temple under Antiochus Epiphanes, when the Israelites themselves erected an idolatrous altar upon the sacred altar, and offered sacrifice thereon: this altar is described as "an abomination of desolation" (1 Macc. i. 54, vi. 7). The prophecy, however, referred ultimately to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and consequently the "abomination" must describe some occurrence connected with that event. But it is not easy to find one which meets all the requirements of the case: the introduction of the Roman standards into the Temple would not be an "abomination," properly speaking, unless it could be shown that the Jews themselves participated in the worship of them; moreover, this event, as well as several others which have been proposed, such as the erection of the statue of Hadrian, fail in regard to the time of their occurrence, being subsequent to the destruction of the city. It appears most probable that the profanities of the Zealots constituted the abomination, which was the sign of impending ruin.

Abraham, or Abram, as his name appears in the earlier portion of the history, was the son of Terah, and founder of the great Hebrew nation. His family, a branch of the descendants of Shem, were settled in Ur of the Chaldees, beyond the Euphrates. The three sons of Terah, Nahor, Abram, and Haran, appear in the book of Genesis as the ancestors of those Shemitic tribes which, migrating in a south-westerly direction from their original settlements, spread through the region between the Euphrates and the Mediterranean, and in their ultimate development occupied the countries from Damascus to the extremity of the Arabian peninsula. The details of one of the most remarkable of these immigrations are traced out in the history of Abraham. The family of Nahor wandered less than the others, and remained principally in their ancestral pastures, the fertile plains of Syria, as the aristocracy of their race, from among whom, for two generations at least, the descendants of the migratory branches sought their wives, to preserve the purity of their descent. Terah was an idolater. He and his sons "served other gods" (Josh. xxiv. 2), though there is some reason for supposing that the worship which they practised was less gross in its nature than that of the surrounding tribes, and that the idea of the unity of God had not been so completely obscured among them. Abram appears as the champion of monotheism, and to him are referred the beginnings of the Mosaic polity.—On the death of his father, who accompanied the emigrants as far as Haran in Mesopotamia, Abram, then in the 75th year of his age, with Sarai his wife, and Lot his nephew, son of his deceased brother Haran, pursued his course to the land of Canaan, whither he was directed by divine command (Gen. xii. 5), when he received the general promise that he should become the founder of a great nation, and that all the families of the earth should be blessed in him. He passed through the heart of the country by the great highway to Shechem, and pitched his tent beneath the terebinth of Moreh (Gen. xii. 6). Here he received in vision from Jehovah the further revelation that this was the land which his descendants should inherit (xii. 7). An altar to Jehovah perpetuated the memory of this divine appearance. The next halting-place of the wanderer was in a strong position on a mountain east of Bethel, between Bethel and Ai, where another altar was reared (Gen. xii. 8). But the country was suffering from famine, and Abram, like his descendants two centuries later, finding neither pasture for his cattle nor food for his household, journeyed still southwards to the rich corn-lands of Egypt. As the caravan approached the entrance to the country, Abram, fearing that the great beauty of Sarai might tempt the powerful monarch of Egypt and expose his own life to peril, adopted a policy which, as on a subsequent occasion, produced the very consequences it was intended to avert. Sarai was to represent herself as his sister, which her actual relationship to him, as probably the daughter of his brother Haran, allowed her to do with some semblance of truth. But her fresh northern beauty excited the admiration of the swarth-skinned Egyptians: the princes of Pharaoh saw her and praised her to the king, and she was taken into the royal harem. Abram was loaded with munificent presents, and the foundation of his subsequent prosperity was apparently laid in Egypt. But the deception was discovered, and Pharaoh with some indignation dismissed him from the country (xii. 10-20). How long was the period of Abram's stay in Egypt is uncertain. It is supposed that he was there during the sway of the Shepherd kings in Memphis, and that from participating in their war of conquest he acquired the favour of the reigning prince. But this is mere conjecture, and the narrative in Genesis would seem to imply that his residence in Egypt was not protracted.—Abram left Egypt with great possessions, and, accompanied by Lot, returned by the south of Palestine to his former encampment between Bethel and Ai. The increased wealth of the two kinsmen was the ultimate cause of their separation. The soil was not fertile enough to support them both; their herds-men quarrelled; and, to avoid dissensions in a country where they were surrounded by enemies, for

"the Canaanite and Perizzite were then in the land," Abram proposed that each should follow his own fortune. Lot, eager to quit the nomadic life, chose the fertile plain of the Jordan, rich and well-watered as the garden of Jehovah; while Abram dwelt in tents, a pilgrim in the land of promise. It was on this occasion that the two promises he had already received were reiterated in one. From the hill-top where he stood he looked northwards and southwards and eastwards and westwards upon the country hereafter to be peopled by his numerous descendants. After parting from Lot, Abram, strong in numbers and wealth, quitted the hill-fastness between Bethel and Ai, and pitched his tent among the oak-groves of Mamre, close to Hebron, where he built a third commemorative altar to Jehovah (Gen. xiii.).—The narrative is now interrupted by a remarkable episode in Abram's life, which vividly represents him in the light in which he was regarded by the contemporary chieftains of Canaan. The chiefs of the tribes who peopled the oasis of the Jordan had been subdued in a previous irruption of northern warriors, and for twelve years had been the tributaries of Chedorlaomer, king of Elam. Their rebellion brought down upon Palestine and the neighbouring countries a fresh flood of invaders from the north-east, who swept through the regions east of the Jordan, and, returning, joined battle with the revolted chieftains in the vale of Siddim. The king of Sodom and his confederates were defeated, their cities plundered, and a host of captives accompanied the victorious army of Chedorlaomer. Among them were Lot and his family. Abram, then confederate with Mamre the Amorite and his brethren, heard the tidings from a fugitive, and, hastily arming his trusty slaves, started in pursuit. He followed the track of the conquerors along the Jordan valley, came up with them by Dan, and in a night-attack completely routed their host, and checked for a time the stream of northern immigration. The captives and plunder were all recovered, and Abram was greeted on his return by the king of Sodom, and by Melchizedek king of Salem, priest of the Most High God, who mysteriously appears upon the scene to bless the patriarch, and receive from him a tenth of the spoil. In this episode, Abram "the Hebrew" (xiv. 13), a foreign chief, appears as a powerful emir with a numerous following of retainers, living on terms of equality with others like himself, who were anxious to court the friendship of so formidable an ally, and combining with the peaceful habits of a pastoral life the same capability for warfare which is characteristic of the Arab race. With great dignity he refuses to enrich himself by the results of his victory, and claims only a share of the booty for his Amorite confederates, to whom he apparently extends his protection in return for permission to reside in their territory (Gen. xiv.).—During his residence at Hebron, and while apprehending the vengeance of the powerful king of Elam, the thice-repeated promise that his descendants should become a mighty nation and possess the land in which he was a stranger, was confirmed with all the solemnity of a religious ceremony (Gen. xv.). A deep sleep fell upon Abram, and in the horror of great darkness which shrouded him as he watched the sacrifices, the future destinies of his race were symbolized and revealed with greater distinctness than heretofore. Each revelation acquired greater definiteness than the preceding. He is now assured that, though childless, the heir of his wealth and the inheritor of his blessing, shall be no adopted stranger, but the issue of his own loins. Ten years had passed since, in obedience to the divine command, he had left his father's house, and the fulfilment of the promise was apparently more distant than at first. But his faith was counted to him for righteousness, and when the lump of fire had passed between the fragments of the sacrifice, Abram entered into a covenant with Jehovah (Gen. xv.). At the suggestion of Sarai, who despaired of having children of her own, he took as his concubine Hagar, her Egyptian maid, who bore him Ishmael in the 86th year of his age (Gen. xvi.). [HAGAR; ISHMAEL.] But this was not the accomplishment of the promise. Thirteen years elapsed, during which Abram still dwelt in Hebron, when the last step in the revelation was made, that the son of Sarai, and not Ishmael, should inherit both the temporal and spiritual blessings. The covenant was renewed, and the rite of circumcision established as its sign. This most important crisis in Abram's life is marked by the significant change of his name to Abraham, "father of a multitude;" while his wife's from Sarai became Sarah. In his 99th year Abraham was circumcised, in accordance with the divine command, together with Ishmael and all the males of his household, as well the slaves born in his house as those purchased from the foreigner (Gen. xvii.). The promise that Sarah should have a son was repeated in the remarkable scene described in ch. xviii. Three men stood before Abraham as he sat in his tent-door in the heat of the day. The patriarch, with true Eastern hospitality, welcomed the strangers, and bade them rest and refresh themselves. The meal ended, they foretold the birth of Isaac and went on their way to Sodom. Abraham accompanied them, and is represented as an interlocutor in a dialogue with Jehovah, in which he pleaded in vain to avert the vengeance threatened to the devoted cities of the plain (xviii. 17-33).—In remarkable contrast with Abraham's firm faith with regard to the magnificent fortunes of his posterity stands the incident which occurred during his temporary residence among the Philistines in Gerar, whither he had, for some cause, removed after the destruction of Sodom.¹ Sarah's beauty won the admiration of Abimelech, the king of the country; the temporizing policy of Abraham produced the same results as before; and the narrative of ch. xx. is nearly a repetition of that in ch. xii. 11-20. Abimelech's dignified rebuke taught him that he was not alone in recognising a God of justice. It is evident from Gen. xxi. 22-34, that Abraham's prosperity had at this time made him a powerful auxiliary, whom it was advisable for Abimelech to conciliate and court, and his conduct therefore evidences a singular weakness of character in one who was otherwise so noble and chivalrous.—At length Isaac, the long-looked-for child, was born. His birth was welcomed by all the rejoicings which could greet the advent of one whose future was of such rich promise. Sarah's jealousy, aroused by the mockery of Ishmael at the "great banquet" which Abraham made to celebrate the weaning of her son

(Gen. xxi. 9), demanded that, with his mother Hagar, he should be driven out (Gen. xxi. 10). The patriarch reluctantly consented, consoled by the fresh promise that Ishmael too should become a great nation. But the severest trial of his faith was yet to come. For a long period (25 years according to Josephus) the history is almost silent. The position which Abraham held among the Philistines, during his long residence among them, is indicated in the narrative of Gen. xxi. 22-34. At length he receives the strange command to take Isaac, his only son, and offer him for a burnt-offering at an appointed place. Such a bidding, in direct opposition to the promptings of nature and the divine mandate against the shedding of human blood, Abraham hesitated not to obey. His faith, hitherto unshaken, supported him in this final trial, "accounting that God was able to raise up his son, even from the dead, from whence also he received him in a figure" (Heb. xi. 19)—probably the same faith to which our Lord refers, that God promised to be the "God of Isaac" (Gen. xvii. 19), and that he was not a "God of the dead, but of the living." The sacrifice was stayed by the angel of Jehovah, the promise of spiritual blessing for the first time repeated,² and Abraham with his son returned to Beersheba, and for a time dwelt there (Gen. xxii.). But we find him after a few years in his original residence at Hebron, for there Sarah died (Gen. xxiii. 2), and was buried in the cave of Machpelah, which Abraham purchased of Ephron the Hittite, for the exorbitant price of 400 shekels of silver. The grasping character of Ephron and the generosity of Abraham are finely contrasted in the narrative of Gen. xxiii. In the presence of the elders of Beth, the field of Machpelah, with the cave and trees that were in it, were made sure to Abraham: the first instance on record of a legal conveyance of property. The mosque at Hebron is believed to stand upon the site of the sepulchral cave.—The remaining years of Abraham's life are marked by but few incidents. In his advanced age he commissioned the faithful steward of his house to seek a wife for Isaac from the family of his brother Nahor, binding him by the most solemn oath not to contract an alliance with the daughters of the degraded Canaanites among whom he dwelt (Gen. xxiv.). After Isaac's marriage with Rebecca, and his removal to Lahai-roi, Abraham took to wife Keturah, by whom he had six children, Zimran, Jokshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah, who became the ancestors of nomadic tribes inhabiting the countries south and south-east of Palestine. Keturah occupied a position inferior to that of a legitimate wife, and in 1 Chr. i. 32 is called the concubine of Abraham. Her children, like Ishmael, were dismissed with presents, and settled in the East country during Abraham's lifetime, and Isaac was left sole heir of his father's wealth.—Abraham lived to see the gradual accomplishment of the promise in the birth of his grandchildren Jacob and Esau, and witnessed their growth to manhood (Gen. xxv. 26). Of his last years we possess no record. They appear to have been passed in tranquillity, and at the goodly age of 175 he was "gathered to his people," and

² The promise, that "in his seed all nations should be blessed," would be now understood very differently, and felt to be far above the temporal promise, in which, perhaps, at first it seemed to be absorbed. It can hardly be wrong to refer pre-eminently to this epoch the declaration, that "Abraham saw the day of Christ and was glad" (John viii. 56).

laid beside Sarah in the tomb of Machpelah by his sons Isaac and Ishmael* (Gen. xxv. 7-10).—From the intimate communion which Abraham held with the Almighty, he is distinguished by the high title of "the friend of God" (2 Chr. xx. 7; Is. xli. 8; Jam. ii. 23); and El-Khalil, "the friend," is the appellation by which he is familiarly known in the traditions of the Arabs, who have given the same name to Hebron, the place of his residence.—The legends which have been recorded of him are numerous. According to Josephus he taught the worship of one God to the Chaldeans, and instructed the Egyptians and Phoenicians in astronomy and philosophy. The Greek tradition related by Nicolaus of Damascus assigns to him the conquest of that city, and names him as its fourth king. With the help of Ishmael he is said to have rebuilt, for the fourth time, the Kaaba over the sacred black stone of Mecca. The Rabbinical legends tell how Abraham destroyed the idols which his father made and worshipped, and how he was delivered from the fiery furnace into which he was cast by Nimrod (see D'Hefbelot, Bibl. Orient.; Weil, Biblical Legends; Beer, Leben Abraham's, &c.).

A'bram. [ABRAHAM.]

Ab'salom (father of peace). 1. Third son of David by Maachah, daughter of Talmai king of Geshur, a Syrian district adjoining the N.E. frontier of the Holy Land. He is scarcely mentioned till after David had committed the great crime which by its consequences embittered his old age, and then appears as the instrument by whom was fulfilled God's threat against the sinful king, that "evil should be raised up against him out of his own house, and that his neighbour should lie with his wives in the sight of the sun." In the latter part of David's reign, polygamy bore its ordinary fruits. Not only is his sin in the case of Bathsheba traceable to it, since it naturally suggests the unlimited indulgence of the passions, but it also brought about the punishment of that sin, by raising up jealousies and conflicting claims between the sons of different mothers, each apparently living with a separate house and establishment (2 Sam. xiii. 8; xiv. 24; cf. 1 K. vii. 8, &c.). Absalom had a sister, Tamar, who was violated by her half-brother Amnon, David's eldest son by Ahinoam the Jezreelitess. The natural avenger of such an outrage would be Tamar's full brother Absalom. He brooded over the wrong for two years, and then invited all the princes to a sheep-sheaving feast at his estate in Baal-hazor, on the borders of Ephraim and Benjamin. Here he ordered his servants to murder Amnon, and then fled for safety to his grandfather's court at Geshur, where he remained for three years. David was overwhelmed by this accumulation of family sorrows, thus completed by separation from his favourite son, whom he thought it impossible to pardon or recall. But he was brought back by an artifice of Joab, who sent a woman of Tekoah to entreat the king's interference in an imaginary case similar to Absalom's. Having persuaded David to prevent the avenger of blood from pursuing a young man who, she said, had slain his brother, she adroitly applied his assent to the recall of Absalom, and urged him, as he had thus yielded the general principle, to "fetch home his banished." David did so, but would not see Absalom for two more years, though he allowed him to live in Jerusalem. At last wearied with delay, and perceiving that his exclusion from court interfered with the ambitious schemes which he was forming, the impetuous young man sent his servants to burn a field of corn near his own, belonging to Joab, thus doing as Samson had done (Judg. xv. 4). Thereupon Joab, probably dreading some further outrage from his violence, brought him to his father, from whom he received the kiss of reconciliation. Absalom now began at once to prepare for rebellion, urged to it partly by his own restless wickedness, partly perhaps by the fear lest Bathsheba's child should supplant him in the succession, to which he would feel himself entitled as being now David's eldest surviving son, since we may infer that the second son Chileab was dead, from no mention being made of him after 2 Sam. iii. 3. It is harder to account for his temporary success, and the imminent danger which befel so powerful a government as his father's. As David grew older he may have become less attentive to individual complaints, and to that personal administration of justice which was one of an eastern king's chief duties. For Absalom tried to supplant his father by courting popularity, standing in the gate, conversing with every suitor, lamenting the difficulty which he would find in getting a hearing, "putting forth his hand and kissing any man who came nigh to do him obeisance." He also maintained a splendid retinue (xv. 1), and was admired for his personal beauty and the luxuriant growth of his hair, on grounds similar to those which had made Saul acceptable (1 Sam. x. 23). It is probable too that the great tribe of Judah had taken some offence at David's government, perhaps from finding themselves completely merged in one united Israel; and that they hoped secretly for pre-eminence under the less wise and liberal rule of his son. Thus Absalom selects Hebron, the old capital of Judah (now supplanted by Jerusalem), as the scene of the outbreak; Amasa his chief captain, and Ahithophel of Giloh his principal counsellor, are both of Judah, and after the rebellion was crushed we see signs of ill-feeling between Judah and the other tribes (xix. 41). But, whatever the causes may have been, Absalom raised the standard of revolt at Hebron. The revolt was at first completely successful, David fled from his capital over the Jordan to Mahanaim in Gilead. Absalom occupied Jerusalem, and by the advice of Ahithophel, who saw that for such an unnatural rebellion war to the knife was the best security, took possession of David's harem, in which he had left ten concubines. This was considered to imply a formal assumption of all his father's royal rights (comp. the conduct of Adonijah, 1 K. ii. 13 ff.), and was also a fulfilment of Nathan's prophecy (2 Sam. xii. 11.) But David had left friends who watched over his interests. The vigorous counsels of Ahithophel were afterwards rejected through the crafty advice of Hushai, who insinuated himself into Absalom's confidence to work his ruin, and Ahithophel himself, seeing his ambitious hopes frustrated, went home to Giloh, and committed suicide. At last, after being solemnly anointed king at Jerusalem (xix. 10), and lingering there far longer than was expedient, Absalom crossed the Jordan to attack his father, who by this time had rallied round him a considerable force, whereas, had Ahithophel's advice been followed, he would probably have been crushed at once. A decisive battle was fought in Gilead, in the wood of Ephraim. Here Absalom's forces were totally defeated, and as he himself was escaping, his long hair was entangled in the branches of a terebinth, where he was left hanging while the mule on which he was riding ran away from under him. He was despatched by Joab in spite of the prohibition of David, who, loving him to the last, had desired that his life might be spared, and when he heard of his death lamented over him in the pathetic words, O my son Absalom! would God I had died for thee! O Absalom, my son, my son! He was buried in a great pit in the forest, and the conquerors threw stones over his grave, an old proof of bitter hostility (Josh. vii. 26). The sacred historian contrasts this dishonoured burial with the tomb which Absalom had raised in the Kiny's dale (comp. Gen. xiv. 17) for the three sons whom he had lost (comp. 2 Sam. xviii. 18, with xiv. 27), and where he probably had intended that his own remains should be laid. Josephus (Ant. vii. 10, §3) mentions the pillar of Absalom as situate two stadia from Jerusalem. An existing monument in the valley of Jehoshaphat just outside Jerusalem bears the name of the Tomb of Absalom; but the Ionic pillars which surround its base show that it belongs to a much later period, even if it be a tomb at all.—2. The so-called Tomb of Absalom Ab'salon, an ambassador with John from the Jews to Ly-ias, chief governor of Coelo-Syria and Phoenice (2 Macc. xi. 17).

Abu'bus, father of Ptolemais, captain of the plain of Jericho, and son-in-law to Simon Maccabaeus (1 Macc. xvi. 11, 15).

A catan = Hakkatan (1 Esdr. viii. 38).

A'cad, one of the cities in the land of Shinar—the others being Babel, Erech, and Calneh—which were the beginning of Nimrod's kingdom (Gen. x. 10). Its position is quite uncertain.—The theory deduced by Rawlinson from the latest Assyrian researches is, that "Akkad" was the name of the "great primitive Hamite race who inhabited Babylonia from the earliest time." The name of the city is believed to have been discovered in the inscriptions under the form Kinzi Akkad.

A'catron. [EKRON.]

A'cho (the PTOLEMAIS of the Maccabees and N. T.), now called Acca, or more usually by Europeans, Saint Jehn d'Acre, the most important seaport town on the Syrian coast, about 30 miles S. of Tyre. It was situated on a slightly projecting headland, at the northern extremity of that spacious bay—the only inlet of any importance along the whole sea-board of Palestine—which is formed by the bold promontory of Carmel on the opposite side. Inland the hills, which from Tyre southwards press close upon the sea-shore, gradually recede, leaving in the immediate neighbourhood of Acco a plain of remarkable fertility about 6 miles broad, and watered by the small river Belus (Nahr Namân), which discharges itself into the sea close under the walls of the town: to the S.E. the still-receding heights afford access to the interior in the direction of Sepphoris. Acco, thus favourably placed in command of the approaches from the north, both by sea and land, has been justly termed the "key of Palestine."—In the division of Canaan among the tribes, Acco fell to the lot of Asher, but was never wrested from its original inhabitants (Judg. i. 31); and hence it is reckoned by the classical writers among the cities of Phoenicia. No further mention is made of it in the O. T. history, nor does it appear to have risen to much importance until after the dismemberment of the Macedonian empire, when its proximity to the frontier of Syria made it an object of frequent contention. Along with the rest of Phoenicia it fell to the lot of Egypt, and was named Ptolemais, after one of the Ptolemies, probably Soter, who could not have failed to see its importance to his dominions in a military point of view. In the wars that ensued between Syria and Egypt, it was taken by Antiochus the Great, and attached to his kingdom. It is mentioned in the wars of the Maccabees (1 Macc. v. 22, x. 39). On the decay of the Syrian power it was one of the few cities of Judaea which established its independence. Ultimately it passed into the hands of the Romans, who constructed a military road along the coast, from Berytus to Sepphoris, passing through it, and elevated it to the rank of a colony. The only notice of it in the N. T. is in connexion with St. Paul's passage from Tyre to Caesarea (Acts xxi. 7). Few remains of antiquity are to be found in the modern town: the original name has alone survived all the changes to which the place has been exposed.

A'cos, father of John and grandfather of Eupolemus the ambassador from Judas Maccabaeus to Rome (1 Macc. viii. 17).

A'cos (1 Esdr. x. 38). [KOZ.]

Acel'dama, "the field of blood;" the name given by the Jews of Jerusalem to a "field" near Jerusalem purchased by Judas with the money which he received for the betrayal of Christ, and so called from his violent death therein (Acts i. 19). This is apparently at variance with the account of St. Matthew (xxvii. 8), according to which the "field of blood" was purchased by the priests with the 30 pieces of silver, after they had been cast down by Judas, as a burial-place for strangers, the locality being well known at the time as "the field of the Potter."¹ And accordingly ecclesiastical tradition appears, from the earliest times, to have pointed out two distinct spots as referred to in the two accounts. Arculfus saw the "large fig-tree where Judas hanged himself," certainly in a different place from that of the "small field (Acladama) where the bodies of pilgrims were buried." Sir John Maundeville found the "elder-tree" of Judas "fast by" the "image of Absalom;" but the Acladama "on the other side of Mount Sion towards the south." Maundrell's account agrees with this, and so does the large map of Schultz, on which both sites are marked. The Acladama still retains its ancient position, but the tree of Judas has been transferred to the "Hill of Evil Counsel" (Stanley, S. & P. 105, 186).—The "field of blood" is now shown on the steep southern face of the valley or ravine of Hinnom, near its eastern end, on a narrow plateau, more than half way up the hillside. Its modern name is Hak ed-damm. It is separated by no enclosure; a few venerable olives occupy part of it, and the rest is covered by a ruined square edifice—half built, half excavated—which, perhaps originally a church, was in Maundrell's time in use as a charnel-house. It was believed in the middle ages that the soil of this place had the power of very rapidly consuming bodies buried in it, and, in consequence either of this or of the sanctity of the spot, great quantities of the earth were taken away; amongst others by the Pisan Crusaders in 1218 for their Campo Santo at Pisa, and by the Empress Helena for that at Rome. Besides the charnel-house above mentioned, there are several large hollows in the ground in this immediate neighbourhood which may have been caused by such excavations. The formation of the hill is cretaceous, and it is well known that chalk is always favourable to the rapid decay of animal matter.

Achaia signifies, in the N. T., a Roman province, which included the whole of the Peloponnesus and the greater part of Hellas proper with the adjacent islands. This province, with that of Macedonia, comprehended the whole of Greece: hence Achaia and Macedonia are frequently mentioned together in the N. T. to indicate all Greece (Acts xviii. 12, 27, xix. 21; Rom. xv. 26, xvi. 5; 1 Cor. xvi. 15; 2 Cor. i. 1, ix. 2, xi. 10; 1 Thess. i. 7, 8). A narrow slip of country upon the northern coast of the Peloponnesus was originally called Achaia, the cities of which were confederated in an ancient League, which was renewed in B.C. 280 for the purpose of resisting the Macedonians. This League subsequently included several of the other Grecian states, and became the most powerful political body in Greece; and hence it was natural for the Romans to apply the name of Achaia to the Peloponnesus and the south of Greece, when they took Corinth and destroyed the League in B.C. 146. In the division of the provinces by Augustus between the emperor and the senate in B.C. 27, Achaia was one of the provinces assigned to the senate, and was governed by a proconsul. Tiberius in the second year of his reign (A.D. 16) took it away from the senate, and made it an imperial province governed by a procurator; but Claudius restored it to the senate. This was its condition when Paul was brought before Gallio, who is therefore (Acts xviii. 12) correctly called the "proconsul" of Achaia, which is translated in the A. V. "deputy" of Achaia.

Achan (troubler), an Israelite of the tribe of Judah, who, when Jericho and all that it contained were accursed and devoted to destruction, secreted a portion of the spoil in his tent. For this sin Jehovah punished Israel by their defeat in their attack upon Ai. When Achan confessed his guilt, and the booty was discovered, he was stoned to death with his whole family by the people in a valley situated between Ai and Jericho, and their remains, together with his property, were burnt. From this event the valley received the name of Achor (i. e. trouble). [ACHOR.] From the similarity of the name Achan to Achor, Joshua said to Achan, "Why hast thou troubled us? the Lord shall trouble thee this day" (Josh. vii. 25).

A'char = Achan (1 Chr. ii. 7).

A'chaz = Ahaz, king of Judah (Matt. i. 9).

Ach'bor. 1. Father of Baal-hanan, king of Edom (Gen. xxvii. 38, 39; 1 Chr. i. 49).—2. Son of Michaiah, a contemporary of Josiah (2 K. xxii. 12, 14; Jer. xxvi. 22, xxxvi. 12), called ADDON in 2 Chr. xxxiv. 20.

Achiacharus, chief minister at the court of Sarchedonus, or Esarhaddon, king of Nineveh, in the apocryphal history of Tobit (Tob. i. 21, 22, ii. 10, xiv. 10). From the occurrence of the name of Aman in the last passage, it has been conjectured that Achiacharus is but the Jewish name of Mordecai, whose history suggested some points which the author of the book of Tobit worked up into his narrative; but there is no need to have recourse to such a supposition, as the discrepancies are much more strongly marked than the resemblances.

Achias, son of Phinees; high-priest and progenitor of Esdras (2 Esdr. i. 2), but omitted both in the genealogies of Ezr. and 1 Esd. He is probably confounded with Ahijah, the son of Ahitub and grandson of Eli.

Achim, son of Sadoc, and father of Eliud, in our Lord's genealogy; the fifth in succession before Joseph, the husband of Mary (Matt. i. 14). The Hebrew form of the name would be Jachin, which is a short form of Jehoiachin, the Lord will establish.

A'chior, a general of the Ammonites in the army of Holofernes, who is afterwards represented as becoming a proselyte to Judaism (Jud. v. vi. xiv.).

Achish, a Philistine king of Gath, son of Maach, who in the title to the 34th Psalm is called Abimelech. David twice found a refuge with him when he fled from Saul. On the first occasion, being recognised by the servants of Achish as one celebrated for his victories over the Philistines, he was alarmed for his safety, and feigned madness (1 Sam. xxi. 10-13). [DAVID.] From Achish he fled to the cave of Adullam. On a second occasion David fled to Achish with 600 men (1 Sam. xxvii. 2), and remained at Gath a year and four months.—Whether Achish, to whom Shimei went in disobedience to the commands of Solomon (1 K. ii. 40) be the same person is uncertain.

Achi'tob = Ahitub, the high-priest (1 Esdr. viii. 2; 2 Esdr. i. 1), in the genealogy of Esdras.

Ach'metha. [ECBATANA.]

A'chor, Valley of = "valley of trouble," according to the etymology of the text; the spot at which Achan, the "troubler of Israel," was stoned (Josh. vii. 24, 26). On the N. boundary of Judah (xv. 7; also Is. lxxv. 10; Hos. ii. 15):

Ach'sa (1 Chr. ii. 49). [ACHISAH.]

Ach'sah, daughter of Caleb, the son of Jephun-neh the Kenezite. Her father promised her in marriage to whoever should take Debir. Othniel, her father's younger brother, took that city, and accordingly received the hand of Achsah as his reward. Caleb, at his daughter's request, added to her dowry the upper and lower springs, which she had pleaded for as peculiarly suitable to her inheritance in a south country (Josh. xv. 15-19; Stanley's S. & P. p. 161). The story is repeated in Judg. i. 11-15. Achsah is mentioned again, as being the daughter of Caleb the son of Hezion, in 1 Chr. ii. 49.

Ach'shaph, a city within the territory of Asher, named between Beten and Alammelech (Josh. xix. 25); originally the seat of a Canaanite king (xi. 1, xii. 20). It is possibly the modern Kesaf, iulus bearing which name were found by Robinson (iii. 55) on the N.W. edge of the Haleh. But more probably the name has survived in Chaifa, a town which, from its situation, must always have been too important to have escaped mention in the history, as it otherwise would have done.

Ach'zib. 1. A city of Judah in the Shefelah, named with Keilah and Mareshah (Josh. xv. 44; Mic. i. 14). It is probably the same with CHEZIB and CHOZEBA, which see.—2. A town belonging to Asher (Josh. xix. 29), from which the Canaanites were not expelled (Judg. i. 31); afterwards Ecdippia. It is now es-Zib, on the sea-shore at the mouth of the Nahr Herdawl, 2 h. 20 m. N. of Acre (Robinson, iii. 628). After the return from Babylon Achzib was considered by the Jews as the northernmost limit of the Holy Land.

Acrobat'ine. [ARABATTINE.]

Acts of the Apostles, a second treatise by the author of the third Gospel, traditionally known as Luke (which see). The identity of the writer of both books is strongly shown by their great similarity in style and idiom, and the usage of particular words and compound forms. It must be confessed to be, at first sight, somewhat surprising that notices of the author are so entirely wanting, not only in the book itself, but also, generally, in the Epistles of St. Paul, whom he must have accompanied for some years on his travels. But our surprise is removed when we notice the habit of the Apostle with regard to mentioning his companions to have been very various and uncertain, and remember that no Epistles were, strictly speaking, written by him while our writer was in his company, before his Roman imprisonment; for he does not seem to have joined him at Corinth (Acts xviii.), where the two Epistles to the Thessalonians were written, nor to have been with him at Ephesus (ch. xix.), whence, perhaps, the Epistle to the Galatians was written; nor again to have wintered with him at Corinth (ch. xx. 3) at the time of his writing the Epistle to the Romans, and, perhaps, that to the Galatians.—The book commences with an inscription to one Theophilus, who was probably a man of birth and station. But its design must not be supposed to be limited to the edification of Theophilus, whose name is prefixed only, as was customary then as now, by way of dedication. The readers were evidently intended to be the members of the Christian Church, whether Jews or Gentiles; for its contents are such as are of the utmost consequence to the whole Church. They are The fulfilment of the promise of the Father by the descent of the Holy Spirit, and the results of that outpouring, by the dispersion of the Gospel among Jews and Gentiles. Under these leading heads all the personal and subordinate details may be ranged. Immediately after the Ascension, St. Peter, the first of the Twelve, designated by our Lord as the Rock on whom the Church was to be built, the holder of the keys of the kingdom, becomes the prime actor under God in the founding of the Church. He is the centre of the first great group of sayings and doings. The opening of the door to Jews (ch. ii.) and Gentiles (ch. x.) is his office, and by him, in good time, is accomplished. But none of the existing twelve Apostles were, humanly speaking, fitted to preach the Gospel to the cultivated Gentile world. To be by divine grace the spiritual conqueror of Asia and Europe, God raised up another instrument, from among the highly-educated and zealous Pharisees. The preparation of Saul of Tarsus for the work to be done, the progress, in his hand, of that work, his journeyings, preachings, and perils, his stripes and imprisonments, his testifying in Jerusalem and being brought to testify in Rome,—these are the subjects of the latter half of the book, of which the great central figure is the Apostle Paul.—As to the time when, and place at which the book was written, we are left to gather them entirely from indirect notices. It seems most probable that the place of writing was Rome, and the time about two years from the date of St. Paul's arrival there, as related in ch. xxviii. 30. Had any considerable alteration in the Apostle's circumstances taken place before the publication, there can be no reason why it should not have been noticed. And on other accounts also this time was by far the most likely for the publication of the book. The arrival in Rome was an important period in the Apostle's life: the quiet which succeeded it seemed to promise no immediate determination of his cause. A large amount of historic material had been collected in Judaea, and during the various missionary journeys. Or, taking another and not less probable view, Nero was beginning to undergo that change for the worse which disgraced the latter portion of his reign: none could tell how soon the whole outward repose of Roman society might be shaken, and the tacit toleration which the Christians enjoyed be exchanged for bitter persecution. If such terrors were imminent, there would surely be in the Roman Church prophets and teachers who might tell them of the storm which was gathering, and warn them, that the records lying ready for publication must be given to the faithful before its outbreak or event.—Such a priori considerations would, it is true, weigh but little against presumptive evidence furnished by the book itself; but arrayed, as they are, in aid of such evidence, they carry some weight, when we find that the time naturally and fairly indicated in the book itself for its publication is that one of all others at which we should conceive that publication most likely.—This would give us for the publication the year 63 A.D., according to the most probable assignment of the date of the arrival of St. Paul at Rome.—The genuineness of the Acts of the Apostles has ever been recognised in the Church. It is first directly quoted in the epistle of the churches of Lyons and Vienne to those of Asia and Phrygia (A.D. 177); then repeatedly and expressly by Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and so onwards. It was rejected by the Marcionites (cent. iii.) and Manichaems (cent. iv.) as contradicting some of their notions.—The text of the Acts of the Apostles is very full of various readings; more so than any other book of the N. T. To this several causes may have contributed. In the many backward references to Gospel history, and the many anticipations of statements and expressions occurring in the Epistles, temptations abounded for a corrector to try his hand at assimilating, and, as he thought reconciling, the various accounts. In places where ecclesiastical order or usage was in question, insertions or omissions were made to suit the habits and views of the Church in after times. Where the narrative simply related facts, any act or word apparently unworthy of the apostolic agent was modified for the sake of decorum. Where St. Paul repeats to different audiences, or the writer himself narrates, the details of his miraculous conversion the one passage was pieced from the other, so as to produce verbal accordance. There are in this book an unusual number of those remarkable interpolations of considerable length, which are found in the Codex Bezae (D) and its cognates. A critic of some eminence, Bornemann, believes that the text of the Acts originally contained them all, and has been abbreviated by correctors; and he has published an edition in which they are inserted in full. But, while some of them bear an appearance of gentleness, the greater part are unmeaning and absurd.

Acua = Akkub (1 Esdr. v. 30; cf. Ezr. ii. 45).

A cub = Bakbuk (1 Esdr. v. 31; cf. Ezr. ii. 51).

Ad'adah, one of the cities in the extreme south of Judah named with Dimonah and Kedesh (Josh. xv. 22).

Ad'ah (ornament, beauty). 1. The first of the two wives of Lamech, fifth in descent from Cain, by whom were born to him Jabal and Jubal (Gen. iv. 19).—2. A Hittite, daughter of Elon, one of the three wives of Esau, mother of his first-born son Eliphaz, and so the ancestress of six (or seven) of the tribes of the Edomites (Gen. xxxvi. 2, 10 ff. 15 ff.). In Gen. xxvi. 34 she is called BASHEMATH.

Adai'ah. 1. Maternal grandfather of king Josiah, and native of Boscath in the lowlands of Judah (2 K. xxii. 1).—2. A Levite, of the Gershonite branch, and ancestor of Asaph (1 Chr. vi. 41). In v. 21 he is called IDDO.—3. A Benjamite, son of Shumhi (1 Chr. viii. 21), who is apparently the same as Shema in v. 13.—4. A priest, son of Jehoram (1 Chr. ix. 12; Neh. xi. 12).—5. Ancestor of Maseiah, one of the captains who supported Jehoiaida (2 Chr. xxiii. 1).—6. One of the descendants of Bani who had married a foreign wife after the return from Babylon (Ezr. x. 29). He is called JEDEUS in 1 Esdr. ix. 30.—7. The descendant of another Bani, who had also taken a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 39).—8. A man of Judah, of the line of Pharez (Neh. xi. 5).

Adalia, fifth son of Haman (Esth. ix. 8).

Ad'am, the name which is given in Scripture to the first man. The term apparently has reference to the ground from which he was formed, which is called in Hebrew Adamah. The idea of redness of colour seems to be inherent in either word. The creation of man was the work of the sixth day. His formation was the ultimate object of the Creator. It was with reference to him that all things were designed. He was to be the "roof and crown" of the whole fabric of the world. In his first nine chapters of Genesis there appear to be three distinct histories relating more or less to the life of Adam. The first extends from Gen. i. 1 to ii. 3, the second from ii. 4 to iv. 26, the third from v. 1 to the end of ix. The word at the commencement of the two latter narratives, which is rendered there and elsewhere generations, may also be rendered history. The style of the second of these records differs very considerably from that of the first. In the first the Deity is designated by the word Elohim; in the second He is generally spoken of as Jehovah Elohim. The object of the first of these narratives is to record the creation; that of the second to give an account of paradise, the original sin of man, and the immediate posterity of Adam; the third contains mainly the history of Noah, referring, it would seem, to Adam and his descendants principally in relation to that patriarch.—The Mosaic accounts furnish us with very few materials from which to form any adequate conception of the first man. He is said to have been created in the image and likeness of God, which probably points to the Divine pattern and archetype after which man's intelligent nature was fashioned; reason, understanding, imagination, volition, &c. being attributes of God; and man alone of the animals of the earth being possessed of a spiritual nature which resembles God's nature. The name Adam was not confined to the father of the human race, but like homo was applicable to woman as well as man, so that we find it said in Gen. v. 1, 2, "This is the book of the 'history' of Adam in the day that God created 'Adam,' in the likeness of God made He him, male and female created he them, and called their name Adam in the day when they were created."—The man Adam was placed in a garden which the Lord God had planted "eastward in Eden," for the purpose of dressing it and keeping it. [EDEN.] Adam was permitted to eat of the fruit of every tree in the garden but one, which was called the "tree of the knowledge of good and evil." What this was, it is impossible to say. Its name would seem to indicate that it had the power of bestowing the consciousness of the difference between good and evil; in the ignorance of which man's innocence and happiness consisted. The prohibition to taste the fruit of this tree was enforced by the menace of death. There was also another tree which was called "the tree of life." Some suppose it to have acted as a kind of medicine, and that by the continual use of it our first parents, not created immortal, were preserved from death. (Abp. Whately.) While Adam was in the garden of Eden the beasts of the field and the fowls of the air were brought to him to be named, and whatsoever he called every living creature that was the name thereof. Thus the power of fitly designating objects of sense was possessed by the first man, a faculty which is generally considered as indicating mature and extensive intellectual resources. Upon the failure of a companion suitable for Adam among the creatures thus brought to him to be named, the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon him, and took one of his ribs from him, which He fashioned into a woman and brought her to the man. At this time they are both described as being naked without the consciousness of shame.—Such is the Scripture account of Adam prior to the Fall. The first man is a true man, with the powers of a man and the innocence of a child. He is moreover spoken of by St. Paul as being "the figure of Him that was to come," the second Adam, Christ Jesus (Rom. v.

14). By the subtlety of the serpent, the woman who was given to be with Adam was beguiled into a violation of the one command which had been imposed upon them. She took of the fruit of the forbidden tree and gave it to her husband. The propriety of its name was immediately shown in the results which followed: self-consciousness was the first-fruits of sin; their eyes were opened and they knew that they were naked. Though the curse of Adam's rebellion of necessity fell upon him, yet the very prohibition to eat of the tree of life after his transgression was probably a manifestation of Divine mercy, because the greatest malediction of all would have been to have the gift of indestructible life superadded to a state of wretchedness and sin.—Adam is stated to have lived 930 years: so it would seem that the death which resulted from his sin was the spiritual death of alienation from God. "In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die:" and accordingly we find that this spiritual death began to work immediately.—The sons of Adam mentioned in Scripture are Cain, Abel, and Seth: it is implied, however, that he had others.

Ad'am, a city on the Jordan "beside Zaretan," in the time of Joshua (Josh. iii. 16). It is not elsewhere mentioned.

Ad'amah, one of the "fenced cities" of Naphtali, named between Chinnereth and ha-Ramah (Josh. xix. 36). It was probably situated to the N.W. of the Sea of Galilee, but no trace of it has yet been discovered.

Adamant, the translation of the Hebrew word Shâmîr in Ez. iii. 9 and Zech. vii. 12. In Jer. xvii. 1 it is translated "diamond." In these three passages the word is the representative of some stone of excessive hardness, and is used metaphorically. Our English Adamant is derived from the Greek, and signifies "the unconquerable," in allusion perhaps to the hard nature of the substance indicated, because it was supposed to be indestructible by fire. The Greek writers generally apply the word to some very hard metal, perhaps steel, though they do also use it for a mineral. Nor does the English language attach any one definite meaning to Adamant; sometimes indeed we understand the diamond by it, but the term is often used vaguely to express any substance of impenetrable hardness. That some hard cutting stone is intended in the Bible is evident from the passage in Jeremiah (xvii. 1):—"The sin of Judah is written with a pen of iron and with the point of a diamond." Since the Hebrews appear to have been unacquainted with the true diamond, it is very probable, from the expression in Ez. iii. 9, of "adamant harder than flint," that by Shâmîr is intended some variety of Corundum, a mineral inferior only to the diamond in hardness. Of this mineral there are two principal groups—one is crystalline, the other granular; to the crystalline varieties belong the indigo-blue sapphire, the red oriental ruby, the yellow oriental topaz, the green oriental emerald, the violet oriental amethyst, the brown adamantine spar. But it is to the granular or massive variety that the Shâmîr may with most probability be assigned. This is known by the name of Emery, which is extensively used in the arts for polishing and cutting gems and other hard substances. The Greek name for the emery-stone or the emery-powder is Smyris or Smîris, and the Hebrew lexicographers derive this word from the Hebrew Shâmîr. There seems to be no doubt whatever that the Hebrew and Greek words are identical, and that by Adamant we are to understand the emery-stone, or the un-crystalline variety of the Corundum of mineralogists.

Ad'ami, a place on the border of Naphtali, mentioned after Allon Bezaanannim (Josh. xix. 33). In the post-biblical times Adami bore the name of Damin.

Ad'ar, a place on the south boundary of Palestine and of Judah (Josh. xv. 3), which in the parallel list is called HAZAR-ADDAR.

A'dar. [MONTHS.]

Ad'asa, a place in Judaea, a day's journey from Gazera, and 30 stadia from Bethhoron (Jos. Ant. xii. 10, §5). Here Judas Maccabaeus encamped before the battle in which Nicanor was killed, Nicanor having pitched at Bethhoron (1 Macc. vii. 40, 45).

Ad'beel, a son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 13; 1 Chr. i. 29), and probably the progenitor of an Arab tribe.

Ad'dan, one of the places from which some of the captivity returned with Zerubbabel to Judaea who could not show their pedigree as Israelites (Ezr. ii. 59). In the parallel lists of Nehemiah (vii. 61) and Esdras the name is ADDON and AALAR.

Ad'dar, son of Bela (1 Chr. viii. 3), called ARN in Num. xxvi. 40.

Adder. This word is used for any poisonous snake, and is applied in this general sense by the translators of the A. V. They use in a similar way the synonymous term asp. The word adder occurs five times in the text of the A. V. (see below), and three times in the margin as synonymous with cockatrice, viz. Is. xi. 8, xiv. 29, lix. 5. It represents four Hebrew words:—1. Achûb is found only in Ps. cxl. 3: "They have sharpened their tongues like a serpent, adder's poison is under their lips."

Toxica of Egypt.

The latter half of this verse is quoted by St. Paul from the LXX. in Rom. iii. 13. The poison of venomous serpents is often employed by the sacred writers, in a figurative sense, to express the evil temper of ungodly men.—The number of poisonous serpents with which the Jews were acquainted was in all probability limited to some five or six species [SERPENT]; and as there are reasonable grounds for identifying Pethen and Shephthphon with two well-known species, viz. the Egyptian Cobra and the Horned Viper, it is not improbable that the Aeshub may be represented by the Toxicoa of Egypt and North Africa. At any rate it is unlikely that the Jews should have been unacquainted with this species, which is common in Egypt and probably in Syria: the Echis argenticola, therefore, for such is this adder's scientific name, may be identical, as in name so in reality, with the animal signified by the Hebrew Aeshub.—2. Pethen. [ASP.]—3. Tsephd, or Tsiphoni, occurs five times in the Hebrew Bible. In Prov. xxii. 32 it is translated adder, and in Is. xi. 8, xiv. 29, lix. 5, Jer. viii. 17, it is rendered cockatrice. From Jeremiah we learn that it was of a hostile nature, and from the parallelism of Is. xi. 8 it appears that the Tsiphoni was considered even more dreadful than the Pethen. It is possible that the Tsiphoni may be represented by the Algerine adder (Crotto mauritanica), but it must be confessed that this is mere conjecture.—4. Shephthphon occurs only in Gen. xlix. 17, where it is used to characterise the tribe of Dan: "Dan shall be a serpent by the way, an adder in the path, that biteth the horse's heels, so that his rider shall fall backward." The habit of lurking in the sand and biting at the horse's heels, here alluded to, suits the character of a well-known species of venomous snake, and helps us to identify it with the celebrated horned viper, the asp of Cleopatra (Cerastes Hasselquistii), which is found abundantly in the dry sandy deserts of Egypt, Syria, and Arabia.—The Cerastes is extremely venomous; Bruce compelled a specimen to scratch eighteen pigeons upon the thigh as quickly as possible, and they all died nearly in the same interval of time. This species averages from 12 to 15 inches in length, but occasionally larger individuals are found.

Ad'i. 1. (Luke iii. 28) Son of Cosan, and father of Melchi, in our Lord's genealogy; the third above Salathiel.—2. The name occurs in a very corrupt verse of 1 Esd. ix. 31, and has apparently no equivalent in Ezr. x.

Ad'don. [ADDAN.]

Ad'dus. 1. The sons of Addus are enumerated among the sons of the servants of Solomon in 1 Esd. v. 34; but the name does not occur in Ezr. ii. or Neh. vii.—2. A priest, whose descendants, according to 1 Esd., were unable to establish their genealogy in the time of Ezra, and were removed from their priesthood (1 Esd. v. 38). He is there said to have married Augia, the daughter of Berzelus, or Barzillai. In Ezra and Nehemiah he is called by his adopted name Barzilai, and it is not clear whether Addus represents his original name or is a mere corruption.

A'der, a Benjamite, son of Beriah, chief of the inhabitants of Ajalon (1 Chr. viii. 15). The name is more correctly Eder.

Ad'ida, a town on an eminence overlooking the low country of Judah, fortified by Simon Macabaeus in his wars with Tryphon (1 Macc. xii. 38, xiii. 13). Probably identical with HADID and ADITHAIM (which see).

A'diel. 1. A prince of the tribe of Simeon, descended from the prosperous family of Shimei (1 Chr. iv. 36). He took part in the murderous raid made by his tribe upon the peaceable Hamite shepherds of the valley of Gedor in the reign of Hezekiah.—2. A priest, ancestor of Maasai (1 Chr. ix. 12).—3. Ancestor of Azinaveth, David's treasurer (1 Chr. xxvii. 25).

A'din, ancestor of a family who returned with Zerubbabel, to the number of 454 (Ezr. ii. 15), or 655 according to the parallel list in Neh. vii. 20. Fifty-one more accompanied Ezra in the second caravan from Babylon (Ezr. viii. 6). They joined with Nehemiah in a covenant to separate themselves from the heathen (Neh. x. 16).

Ad'ina, one of David's captains beyond the Jordan, and a chief of the Reubenites (1 Chr. xi. 42). According to the A. V. and the Syr. he had the command of thirty men; but the passage should be rendered "and over him were thirty," i. e. the thirty before enumerated were his superiors, just as Benaiah (1 Chr. xxvii.) was "above the thirty."

Ad'ino, the Eznite, 2 Sam. xxiii. 8. See JASHOBEAM.

Ad'inus=Jamin, the Levite (1 Esd. ix. 48; cf. Neh. viii. 7).

Aditha'im, a town belonging to Judah, lying in the low country (Shefelah), and named, between Sharnim and hag-Gederah, in Josh. xv. 36 only. At a later time the name appears to have been changed to Hadid (Chadid) and Adida.

Adjuration. [EXORCISM.]

Adla'i, ancestor of Shaphat, the overseer of David's herds that fed in the broad valleys (1 Chr. xxvii. 29).

Ad'mah, one of the "cities of the plain," always coupled with Zeboim (Gen. x. 19, xiv. 2, 8; Deut. xxix. 23; Hos. xi. 8). It had a king of its own.

Ad'matha, one of the seven princes of Persia (Esth. i. 14).

Ad'na. 1. One of the family of Pahath-Moab who returned with Ezra and married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 30).—2. A priest, descendant of Harim in the days of Joiakim, the son of Jeshua (Neh. xii. 15).

Ad'nah. 1. A Manassite who deserted from Saul and joined the fortunes of David on his road to Ziklag from the camp of the Philistines. He was captain of a thousand of his tribe, and fought at David's side in the pursuit of the Amalekites (1 Chr. xii. 20).—2. The captain over 300,000 men of Judah who were in Jehoshaphat's army (2 Chr. xvii. 14).

Ad'ni-Bezek (lord of Bezek), king of Bezek, city of the Canaanites. [BEZEK.] This chieftain was vanquished by the tribe of Judah.

(Judg. i. 3-7), who cut off his thumbs and great toes, and brought him prisoner to Jerusalem, where he died. He confessed that he had inflicted the same cruelty upon seventy petty kings whom he had conquered.

Adonijah (my Lord is Jehovah). 1. The fourth son of David by Haggith, born at Hebron, while his father was king of Judah (2 Sam. iii. 4). After the death of his three brothers, Amnon, Chileab, and Absalom, he became eldest son; and when his father's strength was visibly declining, put forward his pretensions to the crown. David promised Bathsheba that her son Solomon should inherit the succession (1 K. i. 30), for there was no absolute claim of primogeniture in these Eastern monarchies. Adonijah's cause was espoused by Abiathar and Joab, the famous commander of David's army. [JOAB.] His name and influence secured a large number of followers among the captains of the royal army belonging to the tribe of Judah (comp. 1 K. i. 9 and 25); and these, together with all the princes except Solomon, were entertained by Adonijah at a great sacrificial feast held "by the stone Zopheth, which is by En-rogel." [ENROGEL.] Nathan and Bathsheba, now thoroughly alarmed, apprised David of these proceedings, who immediately gave orders that Solomon should be conducted on the royal mule in a solemn procession to Gihon, a spring on the W. of Jerusalem (2 Chr. xxiii. 30). [GIHON.] Here he was anointed and proclaimed king by Zadok, and joyfully recognised by the people. This decisive measure struck terror into the opposite party, and Adonijah fled to sanctuary, but was pardoned by Solomon on condition that he should "show himself a worthy man," with the threat that "if wickedness were found in him he should die" (1. 52). The death of David quickly followed on these events; and Adonijah begged Bathsheba, who as "king's mother" would now have special dignity and influence [ASA], to procure Solomon's consent to his marriage with Abishag, who had been the wife of David in his old age (1 K. i. 3). This was regarded as equivalent to a fresh attempt on the throne [ABSALOM; ABNER]; and therefore Solomon ordered him to be put to death by Benaiah, in accordance with the terms of his previous pardon.—2. A Levite in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xvii. 8).—3. (Neh. x. 16). [ADONIKAM.]

Adonikam. The sons of Adonikam, 666 in number, were among those who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 13; Neh. vii. 18; 1 Esd. v. 14). In the last two passages the number is 667. The remainder of the family returned with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 13; 1 Esd. viii. 39). The name is given as ADONIJAH in Neh. x. 16.

Adoniram (1 K. iv. 6; by an unusual contraction ADORAM, 2 Sam. xx. 24, and 1 K. xii. 18; also HADORAM, 2 Chr. x. 18), chief receiver of the tribute during the reigns of David (2 Sam. xx. 24), Solomon (1 K. iv. 6), and Rehoboam (1 K. xii. 18). This last monarch sent him to collect the tribute from the rebellious Israelites, by whom he was stoned to death.

Adonizedeke (lord of justice), the Amorite king of Jerusalem who organised a league with four other Amorite princes against Joshua. The confederate kings having laid siege to Gibeon, Joshua marched to the relief of his new allies and put the besiegers to flight. The five kings took refuge in a cave at Makkedah, whence they were taken and slain, their bodies hung on trees, and then buried in the place of their concealment (Josh. x. 1-27) [JOSHUA.]

Adoption, an expression metaphorically used by St. Paul in reference to the present and prospective privileges of Christians (Rom. viii. 15-23; Gal. iv. 5; Eph. i. 5). He probably alludes to the Roman custom of adoption, by which a person, not having children of his own, might adopt as his son one born of other parents. The effect of it was that the adopted child was entitled to the name and sacra privata of his new father, and ranked as his heir-at-law: while the father on his part was entitled to the property of the son, and exercised towards him all the rights and privileges of a father. In short the relationship was to all intents and purposes the same as existed between a natural father and son. The selection of a person to be adopted implied a decided preference and love on the part of the adopter: and St. Paul aptly transfers the well-known feelings and customs connected with the act to illustrate the position of the Christianised Jew or Gentile. The Jews themselves were unacquainted with the process of adoption: indeed it would have been inconsistent with the regulations of the Mosaic law affecting the inheritance of property: the instances occasionally adduced as referring to the custom (Gen. xv. 3, xvi. 2, xxx. 5-9) are evidently not cases of adoption proper.

Adora or Ador. [ADORAIM.]

Adoraim, a fortified city built by Rehoboam (2 Chr. xi. 9), in Judah, apparently in or near the Shefelah, since, although omitted from the lists in Josh. xv., it is by Josephus almost uniformly coupled with Mareshah, which was certainly situated there. Adoraim is probably the same place with Adoia (1 Macc. xiii. 20), unless that be Dor, on the seacoast below Carmel. Robinson identifies it with Dára, a "large village" on a rising ground west of Hebron (ii. 215).

Adoram. [ADONIRAM; HADORAM, 3.]

Adoration. The acts and postures by which the Hebrews expressed adoration bear a great similarity to those still in use among Oriental nations. To rise up and suddenly prostrate the body was the most simple method; but, generally speaking, the prostration was conducted in a more formal manner, the person falling upon the knee and then gradually inclining the body until the forehead touched the ground. Such prostration was usual in the worship of Jehovah (Gen. xvii. 3; Ps. xcv. 6). But it was by no means exclusively used for that purpose; it was the formal mode of receiving visitors (Gen. xviii. 2), of doing obeisance to one of superior station (2 Sam. xiv. 4), and of showing respect to equals (1 K. ii. 19). Occasionally it was repeated three times (1 Sam. x. 41), and even seven times (Gen. xxiii. 8). It was accompanied by such acts as a kiss (Ex. xviii. 7), laying hold of the knees or feet of the person to whom the adoration was paid (Matt. xxviii. 9), and kissing the ground on which he stood (1's. lxvii. 9; Mic. vii. 17). Similar adoration was paid to idols (1 K. xix. 18), sometimes however prostration was omitted, and the act consisted simply in kissing the hand to the object of reverence (Job xxxi. 27), and in kissing the statue itself (Hos. xiii. 2). The same customs prevailed at the time of our Saviour's ministry, as appears not only from the numerous occasions on which they were put in practice towards Himself, but also from the parable of the unmerciful servant (Matt. xviii. 26), and from Cornelius's reverence to St. Peter (Acts x. 25), in which case it was objected to by the Apostle, as implying a higher degree of superiority than he was entitled to, especially as coming from a Roman, to whom prostration was not usual.

Adoration. Modern Egyptian. (Lanc.)

Adram melech. 1. The name of an idol introduced into Samaria by the colonists from Sepharvaim (2 K. xvii. 31). He was worshipped with rites resembling those of Molech, children being burnt in his honour. The first part of the word probably means fire. Sir H. Rawlinson regards Adrammelech as the male power of the sun, and ANAMMELECH, who is mentioned with Adrammelech as a companion-god, as the female power of the sun (Rawlinson's Herodotus, i. 611).—2. Son of the Assyrian king Sennacherib, whom, in conjunction with his brother Sharezer, he murdered in the temple of Nisroch at Nineveh, after the failure of the Assyrian attack on Jerusalem. The parricides escaped into Armenia (2 K. xix. 37; 2 Chg. xxxii. 21; Is. xxxvii. 38). The date of this event was B.C. 680.

Adramyttium, a seaport in the province of Asia [ASIA], situated in the district anciently called Aeolis, and also Mysia (see Acts xvi. 7). Adramyttium gave, and still gives, its name to a deep gulf on this coast, opposite to the opening of which is the island of Lesbos. [MITYLENE.] St. Paul was never at Adramyttium, except perhaps during his second missionary journey, on his way from Galatia to Troas (Acts xvi.), and it has no Biblical interest, except as illustrating his voyage from Caesarea in a ship belonging to this place (Acts xxvii. 2). Ships of Adramyttium must have been frequent on this coast, for it was a place of considerable traffic. It lay on the great Roman road between Assos, Troas, and the Hellespont on one side, and Pergamus, Ephesus, and Miletus on the other, and was connected by similar roads with the interior of the country. The modern Adramyti is a poor village, but it is still a place of some trade and shipbuilding.

Adria, more properly Adrias. It is important to fix the meaning of this word as used in Acts xvii. 27. The word seems to have been derived from the town of Adria, near the Po; and at first it denoted the part of the gulf of Venice which is in that neighbourhood. Afterwards the signification of the name was extended, so as to embrace the whole of that gulf. Subsequently it obtained a much wider extension, and in the apostolic age denoted that natural division of the Mediterranean which Humboldt names the Syrtic basin (see Acts xxvii. 17), and which had the coasts of Sicily, Italy, Greece, and Africa for its boundaries. This definition is explicitly given by almost a contemporary of St. Paul, the geographer Ptolemy, who also says that Crete is bounded on the west by Adrias. Later writers state that Malta divides the Adriatic sea from the Tyrrhenian sea, and the isthmus of Corinth the Aegean from the Adriatic. Thus the ship in which Josephus started for Italy about the time of St. Paul's voyage foundered in Adrias (Life, 3), and there he was picked up by a ship from Cyrene and taken to Puteoli (see Acts xxviii. 13). It is through ignorance of these facts, or through the want of attending to them, that writers have drawn an argument from this geographical term in favour of the false view which places the apostle's shipwreck in the Gulf of Venice. [MELITA.]

Adriel, a son of Barzillai the Melolathite, to whom Saul gave his daughter Merab, although he had previously promised her to David (1 Sam. xviii. 19). His five sons were amongst the seven descendants of Saul whom David surrendered to the Gibeonites (2 Sam. xxi. 6) in satisfaction for the endeavours of Saul to extirpate them, although the Israelites had originally made a league with them (Josh. ix. 15). In 2 Sam. xxi. they are called the sons of Michal; but as Michal had no children (2 Sam. vi. 23), the A. V., in order to surmount the difficulty, erroneously translates the Hebrew word "brought up" instead of "bare." The margin also gives "the sister of Michal" for "Michal." Probably the error is due to some early transcriber.

Aduel, a Naphthalite, ancestor of Tobit (Tob. i. 1).

Adullam, Apocr. ODOLLAM, a city of Judah in the lowland of the Shefelah, Josh. xv. 35 (comp. Gen. xxxviii. 1, "Judah went down," and Micah i. 15, where it is named with Mareshah and Achzib); the seat of a Canaanite king (Josh. xii. 15), and evidently a place of great antiquity (Gen. xxxviii. 1, 12, 20); fortified by Rehobam (2 Chron. xi. 7), one of the towns reoccupied by the Jews after their return from Babylon (Neh. xi. 30), and still a city in the times of the Maccabees (2 Macc. xii. 38).—The site of Adullam has not yet been identified, but from the mention of it in the passages quoted above in proximity with other known towns of the Shefelah, it is likely that it was near Deir Dabbân, 5 or 6 miles N. of Eleutheropolis. The limestone cliffs of the whole of that locality are pierced with extensive excavations, some one of which is doubtless the "cave of Adullam," the refuge of David (1 Sam. xxii. 1; 2 Sam. xxiii. 13; 1 Chr. xi. 15). Monastic tradition places the cave at Khirvâin, at the south end of the Wady Urtâs, between Bethlehem and the Dead Sea.

Adullamite, a native of Adullam (Gen. xxxviii, 1, 12; 20).

Adultery. The parties to this crime were a married woman and a man who was not her husband. The toleration of polygamy, indeed, renders it nearly impossible to make criminal a similar offence committed by a married man with a woman not his wife. In the patriarchal period the sanctity of marriage is noticeable from the history of Abraham, who fears, not that his wife will be seduced from him, but that he may be killed for her sake, and especially from the scruples ascribed to Pharaoh and Abimelech (Gen. xii., xx.). The woman's punishment, as commonly amongst eastern nations, was no doubt capital, and probably, as in the case of Tamar's unchastity, death by fire (xxxviii. 24). The Mosaic penalty was that both the guilty parties should be stoned, and it applied as well to the betrothed as to the married woman, provided she were free (Deut. xxii. 22-24). A bondwoman so offending was to be scourged, and the man was to make a trespass offering (Lev. xix. 20-22).—The system of inheritances, on which the polity of Moses was based, was threatened with confusion by the doubtful offspring caused by this crime, and this secured popular sympathy on the side of morality until a far advanced stage of corruption was reached. It is probable that, when that territorial basis of polity passed away—as it did after the captivity—and when, owing to Gentile example, the marriage tie became a looser bond of union, public feeling in regard to adultery changed, and the penalty of death was seldom or never inflicted. Thus, in the case of the woman brought under our Lord's notice (John viii.), it is likely that no one then thought of stoning her in fact, though there remained the written law ready for the purpose of the caviller. It is likely also that a divorce, in which the adulteress lost her dower and rights of maintenance, &c., was the usual remedy, suggested by a wish to avoid scandal and the excitement of commiseration for crime. The expression in St. Matthew (i. 19) "to make her a public example," probably means to bring the case before the local Sanhedrim, which was the usual course, but which Joseph did not propose to take, preferring repudiation, because that could be managed privately.—Concerning the famous trial by the waters of jealousy (Num. v. 11-29), it has been questioned whether a husband was, in case of certain facts, bound to adopt it. The more likely view is, that it was meant as a relief to the vehemence of implacable jealousy to which Orientals appear prone, but which was not consistent with the laxity of the nuptial tie prevalent in the period of the New Testament. The ancient strictness of that tie gave room for a more intense feeling; and in that intensity probably arose this strange custom, which no doubt Moses found prevailing and deeply seated, and which is said to be paralleled by a form of ordeal called the "red water" in Western Africa. The forms of Hebrew justice all tended to limit the application of this test. 1. By prescribing certain facts presumptive of guilt, to be established on oath by two witnesses, or of preponderating but not conclusive testimony to the fact of the woman's adultery. 2. By technical rules of evidence which made proof of those presumptive facts difficult. 3. By exempting certain large classes of women (all indeed, except a pure Israelite married to a pagan Israelite, and some even of them) from the liability. 4. By providing that the trial could only be before the great Sanhedrim. 5. By investing it with a ceremonial at once humiliating and intimidating, yet which still harmonised with the spirit of the whole ordeal as recorded in Num. v. But, 6. Above all, by the conventional and even mercenary light in which the nuptial contract was latterly regarded.—When adultery ceased to be capital, as no doubt it did, and divorce became a matter of mere convenience, it would be absurd to suppose that this trial was continued. And when adultery became common, as the Jews themselves confess, it would have been impious to expect the miracle which it supposed. If ever the Sanhedrim were driven by force of circumstances to adopt this trial, no doubt every effort was used, nay, was prescribed to overawe the culprit and induce confession. Besides, however, the intimidation of the woman, the man was likely to feel the public exposure of his suspicions odious and repulsive. Divorce was a ready and quiet remedy.

Adum'mim, "THE GOING UP TO" or "OF" = the "pass of the red," one of the landmarks of the boundary of Benjamin, a rising ground or pass "over against Gilgal," and "on the south side of the 'torrent'" (Josh. xv. 7, xviii. 17), which is the position still occupied by the road leading up from Jericho and the Jordan valley to Jerusalem, on the south face of the gorge of the Wady Kelt. Jerome ascribes the name to the blood shed there by the robbers who infested the pass in his day, as they do still, and as they did in the days of our Lord, of whose parable of the Good Samaritan this is the scene. But the name is doubtless of a date and significance far more remote, and is probably derived from some tribe of "red men" of the earliest inhabitants of the country.

Ænon, a place "near to Salim," at which John baptized (John iii. 23). It was evidently west of the Jordan (comp. iii. 22, with 26, and with i. 28), and abounded in water. This is indicated by the name, which is merely a Greek version of a Chaldee word, signifying "springs." Ænon is given in the Onomasticum as 8 miles south of Scythopolis "near Salem and the Jordan." Dr. Robinson's careful search, on his second visit, however, failed to discover any trace either of name or remains in that locality. But a Sâlim has been found by him to the east of and close to Nâbulus, where there are two very copious springs. This position agrees with the requirements of Gen. xxxiii. 18. [SALEM.] In favour of its distance from the Jordan is the consideration that, if close by the river, the Evangelist would hardly have drawn attention to the "much water" there.—The latest writer on Jerusalem, Dr. Barclay, reports the discovery of Ænon at Wady Farah, a secluded valley about 5 miles to the N.E. of Jerusalem, running into the great Wady Fouar immediately above Jericho. But it requires more examination than it has yet received.

age, mentioned in Acts xi. 28 and xxi. 10. He predicted (Acts xi. 28) that a famine would take place in the reign of Claudius "throughout all the world." This expression may take a narrower or a wider sense, either of which confirms the prediction. As Greek and Roman writers used "the world" of the Greek and the Roman world, so a Jewish writer could use it naturally of the Jewish world or Palestine. Ancient writers give no account of any universal famine in the reign of Claudius, but they speak of several local famines which were severe in particular countries. Josephus mentions one which prevailed at that time in Judaea, and swept away many of the inhabitants. This, in all probability, is the famine to which Agabus refers in Acts xi. 28. The chronology admits of this supposition. According to Josephus, the famine which he describes took place when Cuspius Fadus and Tiberius Alexander were procurators; i. e. it may have begun about the close of A.D. 44, and lasted three or four years. Fadus was sent into Judaea on the death of Agrippa, which occurred in A.D. 44. If we attach the wider sense to "world," the prediction may import that a famine should take place throughout the Roman empire during the reign of Claudius (the year is not specified), and not that it should prevail in all parts at the same time. We find mention of three other famines during the reign of Claudius: one in Greece, and two in Rome.

Agag, possibly the title of the kings of Amalek, like Pharaoh of Egypt. One king of this name is mentioned in Num. xiv. 7, and another in 1 Sam. xv. 8, 9, 20, 32. The latter was the king of the Amalekites, whom Saul spared, together with the best of the spoil, although it was the well-known will of Jehovah that the Amalekites should be extirpated (Ex. xvii. 14; Dent. xxv. 17). For this act of disobedience Samuel was commissioned to declare to Saul his rejection, and he himself sent for Agag and cut him in pieces. [SAMUEL.]—Haman is called the AGAGITE in Esther iii. 1, 10, viii. 3, 5. The Jews consider Haman a descendant of Agag, the Amalekite, and hence account for the hatred with which he pursued their race.

Agar. [HAGAR.]

Agarenes, Bar. iii. 23. [HAGAR.]

Agate is mentioned four times in the text of the A. V.; viz. in Ex. xxviii. 19, xxxix. 12; Is. liv. 12; Ez. xxvii. 16. In the two former passages, where it is represented by the Hebrew word shebô, it is spoken of as forming the second stone in the third row of the high priest's breastplate; in each of the two latter places the original word is cadabâ, by which, no doubt, is intended a different stone. [RUBY.] In Ez. xxvii. 16, where the text has agate, the margin has chrysoprase, whereas in the very next chapter, Ez. xxviii. 13, chrysoprase occurs in the margin instead of emerald, which is in the text, as the translation of an entirely different Hebrew word, nôphec; this will show how much our translators were perplexed as to the meanings of the minerals and precious stones mentioned in the sacred volume. It is probable, however, that shebô does stand for some variety of agate, for there is a wonderful agreement amongst interpreters, who all understand an agate by the term.—Our English agate; or achat, derives its name from the Achates, in Sicily, on the banks of which, according to Theophrastus and Pliny, it was first found; but as agates are met with in almost every country, this stone was doubtless from the earliest times known to the Orientals. It is a silicious stone of the quartz family, and is met with generally in rounded nodules, or in veins in trap-rocks; specimens are often found on the sea-shore, and in the beds of streams, the rocks in which they had been imbedded having been decomposed by the elements, when the agates have dropped out.

Age, Old. In early stages of civilization, when experience is the only source of practical knowledge, old age has its special value, and consequently its special honours. A further motive was superadded in the case of the Jew, who was taught to consider old age as a reward for piety, and a signal token of God's favour. For these reasons the aged occupied a prominent place in the social and political system of the Jews. In private life they were looked up to as the depositaries of knowledge (Job xv. 10): the young were ordered to rise up in their presence (Lev. xix. 32): they allowed them to give their opinion first (Job xxii. 4): they were taught to regard grey hairs as a "crown of glory" and as the "beauty of old men" (Prov. xvi. 31, xx. 29). The attainment of old age was regarded as a special blessing (Job v. 26), not only on account of the prolonged enjoyment of life to the individual, but also because it indicated peaceful and prosperous times (Zech. viii. 4; 1 Macc. xiv. 9; Is. lxx. 20). In public affairs age carried weight with it, especially in the infancy of the state: it formed under Moses the main qualification of those who acted as the representatives of the people in all matters of difficulty and deliberation. The old men or Elders thus became a class, and the title gradually ceased to convey the notion of age, and was used in an official sense, like Patres, Senatores, and other similar terms. [ELDERS.] Still it would be but natural that such an office should be generally held by men of advanced age (1 K. xii. 8).

Agriculture. This, though prominent in the Scriptural narrative concerning Adam, Cain, and Noah, was little cared for by the patriarchs; more so, however, by Isaac and Jacob than by Abraham (Gen. xxvi. 12, xxxvii. 7), in whose time, probably, if we except the lower Jordan valley (xiii. 10), there was little regular culture in Canaan. Thus Gerar and Shechem seem to have been cities where pastoral wealth predominated (xxxiv. 28). The herdmen strove with Isaac about his wells; about his crops there was no contention. In Joshua's time, as shown by the story of the 'Eshcol' (Num. xiii. 23, 24), Canaan was found in a much more advanced agricultural state than Jacob had left it in (Deut. viii. 8), resulting probably from the severe experience of famines, and the example of Egypt, to which its people were thus led. The pastoral life was the means of keeping the sacred race, whilst yet a family, distinct from mixture and locally unattached, especially whilst in Egypt. When, grown into a nation, they conquered their future seats, agriculture supplied a similar check on the foreign intercourse and speedy demoralisation, especially as regards idolatry, which commerce would have caused. Thus agriculture became the basis of the Mosaic commonwealth. It tended to check also the freebooting and nomad life, and made a numerous offspring profitable, as it was already honourable by natural sentiment and by law. Thus, too, it indirectly discouraged slavery, or, where it existed, made the slave somewhat like a son, though it made the son also somewhat of a slave. Taken in connexion with the inalienable character of inheritances, it gave each man and each family a stake in the soil and nurtured a hardy patriotism. "The land is Mine" (Lev. xxv. 23) was a dictum which made agriculture likewise the basis of the theocratic relation. Thus every family felt its own life with intense keenness, and had its divine tenure which it was to guard from alienation. The prohibition of culture in the sabbatical year formed, under this aspect, a kind of rent reserved by the Divine Owner. Landmarks were deemed sacred (Deut. xix. 14), and the inalienability of the heritage was ensured by its reversion to the owner in the year of jubilee; so that only so many years of occupancy could be sold (Lev. xxv. 8-16, 23-35). The prophet Isaiah (v. 8) denounces the contempt of such restrictions by wealthy grandees, who sought to "add field to field," erasing families and depopulating districts.

Agricultural Calendar.—The Jewish calendar, as fixed by the three great festivals, turned on the seasons of green, ripe, and fully-gathered produce. Hence, if the season was backward, or, owing to the imperfections of a non-astronomical reckoning, seemed to be so, a month was intercalated. This rude system was fondly retained long after mental progress and foreign intercourse placed a correct calendar within their power; so that notice of a Veadar, i. e. second or intercalated Adar, on account of the lambs being not yet of paschal size, and the barley not forward enough for the Abib (green sheaf), was sent to the Jews of Babylon and Egypt early in the season.—The year ordinarily consisting of 12 months was divided into 6 agricultural periods as follows:—

I. SOWING TIME.

Tisri, latter half	{ beginning about autumnal equinox	} Early rain due Marchesvan
Kasleu, former half

II. UNRIPE TIME.

Kasleu, latter half.
Tebeth.
Shebath, former half.

III. COLD SEASON.

Shebath, latter half	} Latter rain due.
Adar
[Veadar]
Nisan, former half

IV. HARVEST TIME.

Nisan, latter half	{ Beginning about vernal equinox. Barley green. Passover.
Ijar.
Sivan, former half

{ Wheat ripe.
Pentecost.

V. SUMMER.

Sivan, latter half.
Tamuz.
Ab, former half.

VI. SULTRY SEASON.

Ab, latter half.
Eloj.
Tisri, former half Ingathering of fruits.

Thus the 6 months from mid Tisri to mid Nisan were mainly occupied with the process of cultivation, and the rest with the gathering of the fruits. The ancient Hebrews had little notion of green or root-crops grown for fodder, nor was the long summer drought suitable for them. Barley supplied food both to man and beast, and the plant, called in Ez. iv. 9, "Millet," was grazed while green, and its ripe grain made into bread. Mowing (Am. vii. 1; Ps. lxxii. 6) and hay-making were familiar processes.

Climate and Soil.—A change in the climate of Palestine, caused by increase of population and the clearance of trees, must have taken place before the period of the N. T. A further change caused by the decrease of skilled agricultural labour, e. g. in irrigation and terrace-making, has since ensued. Not only this, but the great variety of elevation and local character in so small a compass of country necessitates a partial and guarded application of general remarks. Yet wherever industry is secure, the soil still asserts its old fertility. The Haurân (l'eraea) is as fertile as Damascus, and its bread enjoys the highest reputation. The black and rich, but light, soil about Gaza is said to hold so much moisture as to be very fertile with little rain. Here, as in the neighbourhood of Bejrât, is a vast olive-ground, and the very sand of the shore is said to be productive if watered.

Timber.—The Israelites probably found in Canaan a fair proportion of woodland, which their necessities, owing to the discouragement of commerce, must have led them to reduce (Josh. xvii. 18). But even in early times timber seems to have been far less used for building material than among western nations; the Israelites were not skillful hewers, and imported both the timber and the workmen (1 K. v. 6, 8). No store of wood-fuel seems to have been kept: ovens were heated with such things as dung and hay (Ez. iv. 12, 13, Matt. vi. 30); and, in any case of sacrifice on an emergency, some, as we should think, unusual source of supply is constantly mentioned for the wood (1 Sam. vi. 14; 2 Sam. xxiv. 22; 1 K. xix. 21; comp. Gen. xlii. 3, 6, 7). All this indicates a non-abundance of timber.

Rain and Irrigation.—The abundance of water in Palestine, from natural sources, made Canaan a contrast to rainless Egypt (Deut. viii. 7, xi. 8-12). Rain was commonly expected soon after the autumnal equinox or mid Tisri; and if by the first of Kasleu none had fallen, a fast was proclaimed. The common scriptural expressions of the "early" and the "latter rain" (Deut. xi. 14; Jer. v. 24; Hos. vi. 3; Zech. x. 1; Jam. v. 7) are scarcely confirmed by modern experience, the season of rains being unbroken, though perhaps the fall is more strongly marked at the beginning and the end of it. The consternation caused by the failure of the former rain is depicted in Joel i. ii.; and the prophet seems to promise the former and latter rain together "in the first month," i. e. Nisan (ii. 23). The peculiar Egyptian method of irrigation alluded to in Deut. xi. 10—"where thou wateredst it with thy foot"—was not unknown, though less prevalent in Palestine. That peculiarity seems to have consisted in making in the fields square shallow beds, like our salt-pans, surrounded by a raised border of earth to keep in the water, which was then turned from one square to another by pushing aside the mud, to open one and close the next with the foot. A very similar method is apparently described by Robinson as used especially for garden vegetables, in Palestine. There irrigation was as essential as drainage in our region; and for this the large extent of rocky surface, easily excavated for cisterns and ducts, was most useful. Even the plain of Jericho is watered not by canals from the Jordan, since the river lies below the land, but by rills converging from the mountains. In these features of the country lay its expansive resources to meet the wants of a multiplying population. The lightness of agricultural labour in the plains set free an abundance of hands for the task of terracing and watering; and the result gave the highest stimulus to industry.

Crops.—The cereal crops of constant mention are wheat and barley, and more rarely rye and millet (?). Of the two former, together with the vine, olive, and fig, the use of irrigation, the plough and the harrow, mention is made in the book of Job (xxxi. 40, xv. 33, xxiv. 6, xxix. 19, xxxix. 10). Two kinds of cummin (the black variety called "fitches," Is. xxviii. 27), and such podded plants as beans and lentiles, may be named among the staple produce. To these, later writers add a great variety of garden plants, e.g. kidney-beans, peas, lettuce, endive, leek, garlic, onions, melons, cucumbers, cabbage, &c. The produce which formed Jacob's present was of such kinds as would keep, and had been preserved during the famine (Gen. xliii. 11).

Ploughing and Sowing.—The plough probably was like the Egyptian, and the process of ploughing mostly very light, one yoke of oxen usually sufficing to draw it. Such is still used in Asia Minor, and its parts are shown in the accompanying drawing:

a is the pole to which the cross beam with yokes, b, is attached; c, the share; d, the handles; e represents three modes of arming the share, and f is a goad with a scraper at the other end, probably for cleaning the share. Mountains and steep places were hoed (Is. vii. 25). New ground and fallows, the use of which latter was familiar to the Jews (Jer. iv. 3; Hos. x. 12), were cleared of stones and of thorns (Is. v. 2) early in the year, sowing or gathering from "among thorns" being a proverb for slovenly husbandry (Job v. 5; Prov. xxiv. 30, 31). Virgin land was ploughed a second time. Sowing also took place without previous ploughing, the seed, as in the parable of the sower, being scattered broadcast, and ploughed in afterwards, the roots of the late crop being so far decayed as to serve for manure (Fellows, Asia Minor, p. 72). The soil was then brushed over with a light harrow, often of thorn bushes. In highly irrigated spots the seed was trampled in by cattle (Is. xxxii. 20), as in Egypt by goats. Sometimes, however, the sowing was by patches only in well manured spots, a process represented in the accompanying drawing by Surenhusius to illustrate the Mishna. Where the soil was heavier, the ploughing was best done dry; but the more formal routine of heavy western soils must not be made the standard of such a naturally fine tilth as that of Palestine generally. During the rains, if not too heavy, or between their two periods, would be the best time for these operations; thus 70 days before the passover was the time prescribed for sowing for the "wave-sheaf," and, probably, therefore, for that of barley generally. The oxen were urged on by a goad like a spear (Judg. iii. 31). The custom of watching ripening crops and threshing floors against theft, or damage, is probably ancient. Thus Boaz slept on the floor (Ruth iii. 4, 7). Barley ripened a week or two before wheat, and as fine harvest weather was certain (Prov. xxvi. 1; 1 Sam. xii. 17; Am. ix. 7), the crop chiefly varied with the quantity of timely rain. The period of harvest must always have differed according to elevation, aspect, &c. The proportion of harvest gathered to seed sown was often vast, a hundredfold is mentioned, but in such a way as to signify that it was a limit rarely attained (Gen. xxi. 12; Matt. xiii. 8).—The rotation of crops, familiar to the Egyptians, can hardly have been unknown to the Hebrews. Sowing a field with diverse seeds was forbidden (Deut. xxii. 9), and minute directions are given by the rabbis for arranging a seeded surface with great variety, yet avoiding juxtaposition of heterogenea.

Reaping and threshing.—The wheat, &c., was reaped by the sickle, or was pulled up by the roots. It was bound in sheaves—a process prominent in Scripture. The sheaves or heaps were carted (Am. ii. 13) to the floor—a circular spot of hard ground, probably, as now, from 50 to 80 or 100 feet in diameter. Such floors were probably permanent, and became well known spots (Gen. i. 10, 11; 2 Sam. xxiv. 16, 18). On these the oxen, &c., forbidden to be muzzled (Deut. xxv. 4), trampled out the grain, as we find represented in the Egyptian monuments. At a later time the Jews used a threshing sledge called Morag (Is. xli. 15; 2 Sam. xiv. 22; 1 Chr. xxi. 23), probably resembling the nôrey, still employed in Egypt—a stage with grain, as well as cut or tore the straw, which thus became fit for fodder. Lighter grains were beaten out with a stick (Is. xxviii. 27). Barley was sometimes soaked and then parched before treading out, which got rid of the pellicle of the grain.—The use of animal manure is proved frequent by such recurring expressions as “dung on the face of the earth, field,” &c. (Ps. lxxiii. 10; 2 K. ix. 37; Jer. viii. 2, &c.).

Winnowing.—The “shovel” and “fan” (Is. xxx. 24), the precise difference of which is doubtful, indicate the process of winnowing—a conspicuous part of ancient husbandry (Ps. xxxv. 5; Job xxi. 18; Is. xvii. 13), and important, owing to the slovenly threshing. Evening was the favourite time (Ruth iii. 2) when there was mostly a breeze. The “fan” (Matt. iii. 12) was perhaps a broad shovel which threw the grain up against the wind. The last process was the shaking in a sieve to separate dirt and refuse (Am. ix. 9).—Fields and floors were not commonly enclosed; vineyards mostly were, with a tower and other buildings (Num. xxii. 24; Ps. lxxx. 12; Is. v. 5; Matt. xxi. 33; comp. Jud. vi. 11). Banks of mud from ditches were also used.—With regard to occupancy, a tenant might pay a fixed money rent (Cant. viii. 11), or a stipulated share of the fruits (2 Sam. ix. 10; Matt. xxi. 34), often a half or a third; but local custom was the only rule. A passer by might eat any quantity of corn or grapes, but not reap or carry off fruit (Deut. xxiii. 24-25; Matt. xii. 1).—The rights of the corner to be left, and of gleaning [CORNER; GLEANING], formed the poor man's claim on the soil for support. For his benefit, too, a sheaf forgotten in carrying to the floor was to be left; so also with regard to the vineyard and the olive-grove (Lev. xix. 9, 10, Deut. xxiv. 19). Besides there seems a probability that every third year a second tithe, besides the priests', was paid for the poor (Deut. xiv. 28, xxvi. 12; Am. iv. 4; Tob. i. 7).

Agrippa. [HEROD.]

Agur, the son of Jakeh, an unknown Hebrew sage, who uttered or collected the sayings of wisdom recorded in Prov. xxx. Ewald attributes to him the authorship of Prov. xxx. 1-xxxi. 9, in consequence of the similarity of style exhibited in the three sections therein contained, and assigns as his date a period not earlier than the end of the 7th or beginning of the 6th cent. B.C. The Rabbins, according to Jarchi, and Jerome after them, interpreted the name symbolically of Solomon, who “collected understanding,” and is elsewhere called

"Koheleth." Bunsen contends that Agur was an inhabitant of Massa, and probably a descendant of one of the 500 Simeonites, who in the reign of Hezekiah drove out the Amalekites from Mount Seir. Hitzig goes further, and makes him the son of the Queen of Massa and brother of Lemuel. [JAKEH.]

Ahab. 1. Son of Omri, seventh king of the separate kingdom of Israel, and second of his dynasty, reigned B.C. 919-896. The great lesson which we learn from his life is the depth of wickedness into which a weak man may fall, even though not devoid of good feelings and amiable impulses, when he abandons himself to the guidance of another person, resolute, unscrupulous, and depraved. The cause of his ruin was his marriage with Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal, king of Tyre, who had been priest of Astarte. [JEZEHEL.] We have a comparatively full account of Ahab's reign, because it was distinguished by the ministry of the great prophet Elijah, who was brought into direct collision with Jezebel when she ventured to introduce into Israel the impure worship of Baal and her father's goddess Astarte. In obedience to her wishes, Ahab caused a temple to be built to Baal in Samaria itself, and an oracular grove to be consecrated to Astarte. With a fixed determination to extirpate the true religion, Jezebel hunted down and put to death God's prophets, some of whom were concealed in caves by Obadiah, the governor of Ahab's house; while the Phœnician rites were carried on with such splendour, that we read of 450 prophets of Baal, and 400 of Asherah. (See 1 K. xviii. 19, where our version erroneously substitutes "the groves" for the proper name Asherah, as again in 2 K. xxi. 7, xxiii. 6). [ASHERAH.] How the worship of God was restored, and the idolatrous priests slain, in consequence of "a sore famine in Samaria," is related under ELIJAH. But heathenism and persecution were not the only crimes into which Jezebel led her yielding husband. One of his chief tastes was for splendid architecture, which he showed by building an ivory house and several cities. But the place in which he chiefly indulged this passion was the beautiful city of Jezreel (now Zerin), in the plain of Esdraelon, which he adorned with a palace and park for his own residence, though Samaria remained the capital of his kingdom, Jezreel standing in the same relation to it as the Versailles of the old French monarchy to Paris (Stanley, S. & P. 244). Desiring to add to his pleasure-grounds the vineyard of his neighbour Naboth, he proposed to buy it or give land in exchange for it; and when this was refused by Naboth, in accordance with the Mosiac law, on the ground that the vineyard was "the inheritance of his fathers" (Lev. xxv. 23), a false accusation of blasphemy was brought against him, and not only was he himself stoned to death, but his sons also, as we learn from 2 K. ix. 26. Elijah, already the great vindicator of religion, now appeared as the assertor of morality, and declared that the entire extirpation of Ahab's house was the penalty appointed for his long course of wickedness, now crowned by this atrocious crime. The execution, however, of the sentence was delayed in consequence of Ahab's deep repentance.—Ahab undertook three campaigns against Benhadad II. king of Damascus, two defensive and one offensive. In the first, Benhadad laid siege to Samaria; and Ahab, encouraged by the patriotic counsels of God's prophets, made a sudden attack on him whilst in the plenitude of arrogant confidence he was banqueting in his tent with his thirty-two vassal kings. The Syrians were totally routed, and fled to Hamascus.—Next year Benhadad, believing that his failure was owing to some peculiar power which the God of Israel exercised over the hills, invaded Israel by way of Aphek, on the E. of Jordan. Yet Ahab's victory was so complete that Benhadad himself fell into his hands; but was released (contrary to the will of God as announced by a prophet) on condition of restoring all the cities of Israel which he held, and making "streets" for Ahab in Damascus; that is, admitting into his capital permanent Hebrew officers, in an independent position, with special dwellings for themselves and their retinues, to watch over the commercial and political interests of Ahab and his subjects. This was apparently in retaliation for a similar privilege exacted by Benhadad's predecessor from Omri in respect to Samaria. After this great success Ahab enjoyed peace for three years, when, in conjunction with Jehoshaphat king of Judah, he attacked Ramoth in Gilead on the east of Jordan, which town he claimed as belonging to Israel. But God's blessing did not rest on the expedition, and Ahab was told by the prophet Micaiah that it would fail. For giving this warning Micah was imprisoned; but Ahab was so far roused by it as to take the precaution of disguising himself, so as not to offer a conspicuous mark to the archers of Benhadad. But he was slain by a "certain man who drew a bow at a venture;" and, though staid up in his chariot for a time, yet he died towards evening, and his army dispersed. When he was brought to be buried in Samaria, the dogs licked up his blood as a servant was washing his chariot; a partial fulfilment of Elijah's prediction (1 K. xxi. 19), which was more literally accomplished in the case of his son (2 K. ix. 26). —2. A lying prophet, who deceived the captive Israelites in Babylon, and was burnt to death by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xxix. 21).

Aharah, third son of Benjamin (1 Chr. viii. 1). [AHER; AHIRAM.]

Ahar'el, a name occurring in an obscure fragment of the genealogies of Judah. "The families of Ahar'el" apparently traced their descent through Coz to Ashur, the posthumous son of Hezron. The Targum of R. Joseph on Chronicles identifies him with "Hur the firstborn of Miriam" (1 Chr. iv. 8).

Ahasa'i, a priest, ancestor of Maasiai (Neh. xi. 13); called JANZERAI in 1 Chr. ix. 12.

Ahasba'i, father of Eliphelet, one of David's thirty-seven captains (2 Sam. xxiii. 34). In the corrupt list in 1 Chr. xi. 35, Eliphelet appears as "Eliphal the son of Ur."

Ahasuerus, the name of one Median and two Persian kings mentioned in the O. T. It may be desirable to prefix to this article a chronological table of the Medo-Persian kings from Cyaxares to Artaxerxes Longimanus, according to their ordinary classical names. The Scriptural names conjectured to correspond to them are added in italics.—1. Cyaxares, king of Media, son of Phraortes, grandson of Deioces and conqueror of Nineveh, began to reign B.C. 634: Ahasuerus. 2. Astages his son, last king of Media, B.C. 594: Darius the Mede. — Cyrus, son of his daughter: Mandares and Cambyses, a Persian noble, first king of Persia, 559

Cyrus. 4. Cambyses his son, 529: Ahasuerus, 5. A Magian usurper, who personated Smerdis. the younger son of Cyrus, 521: Artaxerxes. 6. Darius Hystaspis, raised to the throne on the overthrow of the Magi, 521: Darius. 7. Xerxes his son, 485: Ahasuerus. 8. Artaxerxes Longimanus (Macrocheir), his son, 465-495: Artaxerxes. —The name Ahasuerus, or Achashverosh, is the same as the Sanstrit kshatra, a king, which appears as kshershé in he arrow-headed inscriptions of Persepolis. —1. In Dan. ix. 1, Ahasuerus is said to be the father of Darius the Mede. Now it is almost certain that Cyaxares is a form of Ahasuerus, grieved into Axares with the prefix Cy- or Kai-, common to the Kaianian dynasty of kings (Malcolm's Persia, ch. iii.), with which may be compared Kai Khosroo, the Persian name of Cyrus. The son of this Cyaxares was Astyages, and it is no improbable conjecture that Darius the Mede was Astyages, set over Babylon as viceroy by his grandson Cyrus, and allowed to live there in royal state. [DARIUS.] This first Ahasuerus, then, is Cyaxares, the conqueror of Nineveh. And, in accordance with this view, we read in Tobit xiv. 15 that Nineveh was taken by Nabuchodonosor and Assuerus, i. e. Cyaxares. —2. In Ezr. iv. 6 the enemies of the Jews, after the death of Cyrus, desirous to frustrate the building of Jerusalem, send accusations against them to Ahasuerus king of Persia. This must be Cambyses. For we read (v. 5) that their opposition continued from the time of Cyrus to that of Darius, and Ahasuerus and Artaxerxes, i. e. Cambyses and the pseudo-Smerdis, are mentioned as reigning between them. [ARTAXERXES.] Xenophon calls the brother of Cambyses Tanyoxares, i. e. the younger Oxares, whence we infer that the elder Oxares or Axares, or Ahasuerus, was Cambyses. His constant wars probably prevented him from interfering in the concerns of the Jews. He was plainly called after his grandfather, who was not of royal race, and therefore it is very likely that he also assumed the kingly name or title of Axares or Cyaxares, which had been borne by his most illustrious ancestor. —3. The third is the Ahasuerus of the book of Esther. It is needless to give more than the heads of the well-known story. Having divorced his queen Vashti for refusing to appear in public at a banquet, he married, four years afterwards, the Jewess Esther, cousin and ward of Mordecai. Five years after this, Haman, one of his counsellors, having been slighted by Mordecai, prevailed upon the king to order the destruction of all the Jews in the empire. But before the day appointed for the massacre, Esther and Mordecai overthrew the influence which Haman had exercised, and so completely changed his feelings in the matter, that they induced him to put Haman to death, and to give the Jews the right of self-defence. This they used so vigorously that they killed several thousands of their opponents. Now, from the extent assigned to the Persian empire (Esth. i. 1), "from India even unto Ethiopia," it is proved that Darius Hystaspis is the earliest possible king to whom this history can apply, and it is hardly worth while to consider the claims of any after Artaxerxes Longimanus. But Ahasuerus cannot be identical with Darius, whose wives were the daughters of Cyrus and Otanes, and who in name and character equally differs from that foolish tyrant. Neither can he be Artaxerxes Longimanus, although, as Artaxerxes is a compound of Xerxes, there is less difficulty here as to the name. But in the first place the character of Artaxerxes is also very unlike that of Ahasuerus. Besides this, in Ezr. vii. 1-7, 11-26, Artaxerxes, in the seventh year of his reign, issues a decree very favourable to the Jews, and it is unlikely therefore that in the twelfth (Esth. iii. 7) Haman could speak to him of them as if he knew nothing about them, and persuade him to sentence them to an indiscriminate massacre. We are therefore reduced to the belief that Ahasuerus is Xerxes (the names being identical): and this conclusion is fortified by the resemblance of character, and by certain chronological inflections. As Xerxes scourged the sea, and put to death the engineers of his bridge because their work was injured by a storm, so Ahasuerus repudiated his queen Vashti because she would not violate the decorum of her sex, and ordered the massacre of the whole Jewish people to gratify the malice of Haman. In the third year of the reign of Xerxes was held an assembly to arrange the Grecian war (Herod. vii. 7 ff.). In the third year of Ahasuerus was held a great feast and assembly in Shushan the palace (Esth. i. 3). In the seventh year of his reign Xerxes returned defeated from Greece, and consoled himself by the pleasures of the harem (Herod. ix. 108). In the seventh year of his reign "four young virgins were sought" for Ahasuerus, and he replaced Vashti by marrying Esther. The tribute he "laid upon the land and upon the isles of the sea" (Esth. x. 1) may well have been the result of the expenditure and ruin of the Grecian expedition.

Ah'ava, a place (Ezr. viii. 15), or a river (viii. 21), on the banks of which Ezra collected the second expedition which returned with him from Babylon to Jerusalem. Various have been the conjectures as to its locality: but the latest researches are in favour of its being the modern Hil, or the Euphrates, due east of Damascus.

A' haz, 1. Eleventh king of Judah, son of Jotham, reigned B.C. 741-726. At the time of his accession, Rezin king of Damascus and Pekah king of Israel had recently formed a league against Judah, and they proceeded to lay siege to Jerusalem. Upon this the great prophet hastened to give advice and encouragement to Ahaz, and it was probably owing to the spirit of energy and religious devotion which he poured into his counsels, that the allies failed in their attack on Jerusalem (Is. vii. viii. ix.). But the allies took a vast number of captives, who, however, were restored in virtue of the remonstrances of the prophet Oded; and they also inflicted a most severe injury on Judah by the capture of Elath, a flourishing port on the Red Sea; while the Philistines invaded the W. and S. (2 K. xvi.; 2 Chr. xxvii.). The weakminded and helpless Ahaz sought deliverance from these numerous troubles by appealing to Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, who freed him from his most formidable enemies by invading Syria, taking Damascus, killing Rezin, and depriving Israel of its Northern and trans-Jordanic districts. But Ahaz had to purchase this help at a costly price: he became tributary to Tiglath-pileser, sent him all the treasures of the Temple and his own palace, and even appeared before him in Damascus as a vassal. He also ventured to seek for safety in heathen ceremonies; making his son pass through the fire to Moloch, consulting wizards and necromancers (Is. viii. 19), sacrificing to the Syrian gods, introducing a foreign altar from Damascus, and probably the worship of the heavenly bodies from Assyria and Babylon, as he would seem to have set up the horses of the sun mentioned in 2 K. xxiii. 11; and "the altars on the top (or roof) of the upper chamber of Ahaz" (2 K. xxiii. 12) were connected with the adoration of the stars. We see another and blameless result of this intercourse with an astronomical people in the "sundial of Ahaz" (Is. xxxviii. 8).—2. A son of Micah the grandson of Jonathan through Meribbaal or Mephibosheth (1 Chr. viii. 35, 36, ix. 42).

Ahazi'ah. 1. Son of Ahab and Jezebel, and eighth king of Israel, reigned B.C. 886-895. After the battle of Ramoth in Gilead [AHAB] the Syrians had the command of the country along the east of Jordan, and they cut off all communication between the Israelites and Moabites, so that the vassal king of Moab refused his yearly tribute of 100,000 lambs and 100,000 rams with their wool (comp. Is. xvi. 1). Before Ahaziah could take measures for enforcing his claim, he was seriously injured by a fall through a lattice in his palace at Samaria. In his health he had worshipped his mother's gods, and now he sent to inquire of the oracle of Baalzebub in the Philistine city of Ekron whether he should recover his health. But Elijah, who now for the last time exercised the prophetic office, rebuked him for this impiety, and announced to him his approaching death. The only other recorded transaction of his reign, his endeavour to join the king of Judah in trading to Ophir, is more fitly related under JEHOASHAPHAT (1 K. xxii. 49-53; 2 K. i.; 2 Chr. ix. 35-37).—2. Fifth king of Judah, son of Jehoram and Athaliah, daughter of Ahab, and therefore nephew of the preceding Ahaziah. He is called Azariah, 2 Chr. xxii. 6, probably by a copyist's error, and Jehoahaz, 2 Chr. xxi. 17. So, too, while in 2 K. viii. 26 we read that he was 22 years old at his accession, we find in 2 Chr. xxii. 2 that his age at that time was 42. The former number is certainly right, as in 2 Chr. xxi. 5, 20, we see that his father Jehoram was 40 when he died, which would make him younger than his own son; so that a transcriber must have made a mistake in the numbers. Ahaziah was an idolater, and he allied himself with his uncle Jehoram king of Israel, brother and successor of the preceding Ahaziah, against Hazael, the new king of Syria. The two kings were, however, defeated at Ramoth, where Jehoram was so severely wounded that he retired to his mother's palace at Jezreel to be healed. The revolution carried out in Israel by Jehu under the guidance of Elisha broke out while Ahaziah was visiting his uncle at Jezreel. As Jehu approached the town, Jehoram and Ahaziah went out to meet him; the former was shot through the heart by Jehu, and Ahaziah was pursued as far as the pass of Gur, near the city of Beersai, and there mortally wounded. He died when he reached Megiddo. In 2 Chr. xxii. 9, an apparently different account is given of his death. Ahaziah reigned one year, B.C. 884 (2 K. viii. 26; 2 K. ix. 29).

Ah'ban, son of Abishur, by his wife Abihail (1 Chr. ii. 29). He was of the tribe of Judah.

A'her, ancestor of Hushim, or rather "the Hushim," as the plural form seems to indicate a family rather than an individual. The name occurs in an obscure passage in the genealogy of Benjamin (1 Chr. vii. 12). Some translators consider it as not a proper name at all, and render it literally "another;" because, as Jarchi says, Ezra, who compiled the genealogy, was uncertain whether the families belonged to the tribe of Benjamin or not. It is not improbable that Aher and Ahiram (Num. xxvi. 38) are the same; unless the former belonged to the tribe of Dan, whose genealogy is omitted in 1 Chr. vii.; Hushim being a Danite as well as a Benjamite name.

A'hi. 1. A Gadite, chief of a family who lived in Gilead in Bashan (1 Chr. v. 15), in the days of Jotham, king of Judah. By the LXX. and Vulg. it was not considered a proper name.—2. A descendant of Shamer, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 34). The name, according to Gesenius, is a contraction of Ahijah.

Ahi'ah or Ahi'jah. 1. Son of Ahitub, brother of Ichabod, grandson of Phinehas, and great-grandson of Eli. He is described as being the Lord's priest in Shiloh, wearing an ephod (1 Sam. xiv. 3, 18). There is, however, great difficulty in reconciling the statement in 1 Sam. xiv. 18, concerning the ark being used for inquiring by Ahiah at Saul's bidding, and the statement that they inquired not at the ark in the days of Saul (1 Chr. xiii. 3), if we understand the latter expression in the strictest sense. But all difficulty will disappear if we apply the expression only to all the latter years of the reign of Saul, when we know that the priestly establishment was at Nob, and not at Kirjath-jearim, or Baale of Judah, where the ark was. The narrative in 1 Sam. xiv. is entirely favourable to the mention of the ark. Ahiah is probably the same person as Ahimelech the son of Ahitub. Such changes of name as Ahimelech and Ahi-jah are not uncommon. However it is not impossible that Ahimelech may have been brother to Ahiah.—2. One of Solomon's princes (1 K. iv. 3).—3. A prophet of Shiloh (1 K. xiv. 2), hence called the Shilonite (xi. 29) in the days of Solomon and of Jeroboam king of Israel, of whom we have two remarkable prophecies extant: the one in 1 K. xi. 31-39, addressed to Jeroboam, announcing the rending of the ten tribes from Solomon, and the transfer of the kingdom to Jeroboam: the other in 1 K. xiv. 6-16, was delivered in the prophet's extreme old age to Jeroboam's wife, in which he foretold the death of Abijah, the king's son, who was sick, and the destruction of Jeroboam's house on account of the images which he had set up. Jeroboam's speech concerning Ahijah (1 K. xiv. 2, 3) shows the estimation in which he held his truth and prophetic powers (comp. 2 Chr. ix. 29).—4. Father of Baasha, king of Israel (1 K. xv. 27, 33).—5. Son of Jerahmeel (1 Chr. ii. 25).—6. Son of Bela (1 Chr. viii. 7).—7. One of David's mighty men (1 Chr. x. 36).—8. A Levite in David's reign (1 Chr. xxvi. 20).—9. One of "the heads of the people" who joined in the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 26).

Ahi'am, son of Sharar the Hararite (or of Shacar, 1 Chr. xi. 35), one of David's thirty mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii. 33).

Ahi'an, a Manassite, of the family of Shemidah (1 Chr. vii. 19).

Ahi'zer. 1. Son of Ammishaddai, hereditary chieftain of the tribe of Dan (Num. i. 12, ii. 25, vii. 66).—2. The Benjamite chief of a body of archers in the time of David (1 Chr. xii. 3). • •

Ahi'hud. 1. The son of Shelomi, and prince of the tribe of Asher (Num. xxix. 27).—2. Chief-tain of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chr. viii. 7):

Ahi'kam, son of Shaphan the scribe, influential officer at the court of Josiah, and of Jehoiakim his son. He was one of the delegates sent by Hilkiah to consult Huldah (2 K. xxii. 12-14). In the reign of Jehoiakim he successfully used his influence to protect the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. xxvi. 24). His son Gedaliah was made governor of Judah by Nebuchadnezzar, the Chaldean king, and to his charge Jeremiah was entrusted when released from prison (Jer. xxxix. 14, xl. 5).

Ahi'tad. 1. Father of Jehoshaphat, the recorder or chronicler of the kingdom in the reigns of David and Solomon (2 Sam. viii. 16, xx. 24; 1 K. iv. 3; 1 Chr. xviii. 15).—2. The father of Baana, one of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers (1 K. iv. 12). It is uncertain whether he is the same with the foregoing.

Ahimaaz. 1. Father of Saul's wife, Ahinoam (1 Sam. xiv. 50).—2. Son of Zadok, the high-priest in David's reign, and celebrated for his swiftness of foot. When David fled from Jerusalem, on account of Absalom's rebellion, the high-priests, accompanied by their sons, Ahimaaz and Jonathan, and the Levites, carried the ark of God forth, intending to accompany the king. But at his bidding they returned to the city, as did likewise Hushai the Archite. It was then arranged that Hushai should feign himself to be a friend of Absalom, and should tell Zadok and Abiathar whatever intelligence he could obtain in the palace. They, on their parts, were to forward the intelligence through Ahimaaz and Jonathan, who accordingly stayed outside the walls of the city at En-Rogel, on the road towards the plain. A message soon came to them from Zadok and Abiathar through the maid-servant, to say that Ahithophel had counselled an immediate attack upon David and his followers, and that, consequently, the king must cross the Jordan without the least delay. They started at once on their errand, but not without being suspected, for a lad seeing the wench speak to them, and seeing them immediately run off quickly, went and told Absalom, who ordered a hot pursuit. In the mean time, however, they had got as far as Bahurim, to the house of a steadfast partizan of David's. Here the woman of the house effectually hid them in a well in the court-yard, and covered the well's mouth with ground or bruised corn. Absalom's servants coming up searched for them in vain; and as soon as they were gone, and returned by the road to Jerusalem, Ahimaaz and Jonathan hastened on to David, and told him Ahithophel's counsel. David with his whole company crossed the Jordan that very night (2 Sam. xv. 24-37, xvii. 15-22). Shortly afterwards the narrative gives us a singular instance of oriental or Jewish craft in Ahimaaz. When Absalom was killed by Joab and his armour-bearers, Ahimaaz was very urgent with Joab to be employed as the messenger to run and carry the tidings to David. The politic Joab, well knowing the king's fond partiality for Absalom, would not allow him to be the bearer of such tidings, but employed Cushai instead. But, after Cushai had started, Ahimaaz was so importunate to be allowed to run too that at length he extorted Joab's consent. Taking a shorter or an easier way by the plain he managed to outrun Cushai, and, arriving first, he reported to the king the good news of the victory, suppressing his knowledge of Absalom's death, and leaving to Cushai the task of announcing it. He had thus the merit of bringing good tidings, without the alloy of the disaster of the death of the king's son (2 Sam. xviii. 19-33). This is the last we hear of Ahimaaz. There is no evidence, beyond the assertion of Josephus, that he ever filled the office of high-priest, and Josephus may have concluded that he did, merely because, in the genealogy of the high-priests (1 Chr. vi. 8, 9), he intervenes between Zadok and Azariah. Judging only from 1 K. iv. 2, compared with 1 Chr. vi. 10, we should conclude that Ahimaaz died before his father Zadok, and that Zadok was succeeded by his grandson Azariah.—3. Solomon's officer in Naphtali, the king's son-in-law, having married his daughter Basmath (1 K. iv. 15).

Ahi'man. 1. One of the three giant Anakim who inhabited Mount Hebron (Num. xiii. 22, 33), seen by Caleb and the spies. The whole race were cut off by Joshua (Josh. xi. 21), and the three brothers were slain by the tribe of Judah (Judg. i. 10).—2. One of the porters or gatekeepers who had charge of the king's gate for the "camps" of the sons of Levi (1 Chr. ix. 17).

Ahim'elech. 1. Son of Ahitub (1 Sam. xxii. 11, 12), and high-priest at Nob in the days of Saul. He gave David the shew-bread to eat, and the sword of Goliath; and for so doing was, upon the accusation of Doeg the Edomite, put to death with his whole house by Saul's order. Eighty-five priests wearing an ephod were thus cruelly slaughtered; Abiathar alone escaped. [ABIATHAR.] On the question of Ahimelech's identity with Ahijah, see AHIJAH. For the singular confusion between Ahimelech and Abiathar in the 1st book of Chronicles, see ABIATHAR.—2. A Hittite, one of David's companions while he was persecuted by Saul; called in the LXX. Abimelech; which is perhaps the right reading, after the analogy of Abimelech, king of Gerar (1 Sam. xxvi. 8).

Ahi'moth, a Levite, apparently in the time of David (1 Chr. vi. 25). In ver. 35, for Ahimoth we find Mahath, as in Luke iii. 26.

Ahin'adab, son of Iddo, one of Solomon's twelve commissaries who supplied provisions for the royal household (1 K. iv. 14).

Ahin'oam. 1. The daughter of Ahimaaz and wife of Saul (1 Sam. xiv. 50).—2. A Jezzeelitess who was married to David during his wandering life (1 Sam. xxv. 43). She lived with him and his other wife Abigail at the court of Achish (xxvii. 3), was taken prisoner with her by the Amalekites when they plundered Ziklag (xxx. 5), but was rescued by David (18). She is again mentioned as living with him when he was king of Judah in Hebron (2 Sam. ii. 2); and was the mother of his eldest son Amnon (iii. 2).

Ahi'o. 1. Son of Abinadab, who accompanied the ark when it was brought out of his father's house (2 Sam. vi. 3, 4; 1 Chr. xiii. 7).—2. A Benjamite, one of the sons of Beriah who drove out the inhabitants of Gath (1 Chr. viii. 14).—3. A Benjamite, son of Jehiel, father or founder of Gibeon (1 Chr. viii. 31, ix. 37).

Ahi'ra, chief of the tribe of Naphtali when Moses took the census in the year after the Exodus (Num. i. 15, ii. 29, vii. 78, 83, x. 27).

Ahi'ram, one of the sons of Benjamin, and ancestor of the AHIRAMITES (Num. xxvi. 38). In the list of Benjamin's children, in Gen. xli. 21, the name of Ahi'ram appears as "Ehi and Rosh," the former being probably the true reading, of which the latter was an easy corruption. It is uncertain whether Ahirap is the same as Aher (1 Chr. vii. 12), or Aharah (1 Chr. viii. 1).

Ahisamach, a Danite, father of Aholiab, one of the architects of the tabernacle (Ex. xxxi. 6, xxxv. 34, xxxviii. 23).

Ahiashar, one of the sons of Bilhan, the grandson of Benjamin (1 Chr. vii. 10).

Ahiashar, the controller of Solomon's household (1 K. iv. 6).

Ahiathophel (brother of foolishness), a native of Giloh, in the hill-country of Judah (Josh. xv. 51), and privy councillor of David, whose wisdom was so highly esteemed, that his advice had the authority of a divine oracle, though his name had an exactly opposite signification (2 Sam. xvi. 23). He was the grandfather of Bathsheba (comp. 2 Sam. xi. 3 with xxiii. 34). Absalom immediately he had revolted sent for him, and when David heard that Ahiathophel had joined the conspiracy, he prayed Jehovah to turn his counsel to foolishness (xv. 31), alluding possibly to the signification of his name. David's grief at the treachery of his confidential friend found expression in the Messianic prophecies (Ps. xli. 9, lv. 12-14).—In order to show to the people that the breach between Absalom and his father was irreparable Ahiathophel persuaded him to take possession of the royal harem (2 Sam. xvi. 21). David, in order to counteract his counsel, sent Hushai to Absalom. Ahiathophel had recommended an immediate pursuit of David; but Hushai advised delay, his object being to send intelligence to David, and to give him time to collect his forces for a decisive engagement. When Ahiathophel saw that Hushai's advice prevailed, he despaired of success, and returning to his own home "put his household in order and hanged himself" (xvii. 1-23).

Ahitub. 1. Father of Ahimelech, or Ahijah, the son of Phinehas, and the elder brother of Ichabod (1 Sam. xiv. 3, xxii. 9, 11), and therefore of the house of Eli and the family of Ithamar. There is no record of his high-priesthood, which, if he ever was high-priest, must have coincided with the early days of Samuel's judgeship.—2. Son of Amariah, and father of Zadok the high-priest (1 Chr. vi. 7, 8; 2 Sam. viii. 17), of the house of Eleazar. From 1 Chr. ix. 11, where the genealogy of Amariah, the head of one of the priestly families that returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, is traced, through Zadok, to "Ahitub, the ruler of the house of God," it appears tolerably certain that Ahitub was high-priest. The passage is repeated in Neh. xi. 11. If the line is correctly given in these two passages Ahitub was not the father, but the grandfather of Zadok, his father being Meraioth. But in 1 Chr. vi. 8, and in Ezr. vii. 2, Ahitub is represented as Zadok's father. This uncertainty makes it difficult to determine the exact time of Ahitub's high-priesthood. If he was father to Zadok he must have been high-priest with Ahimelech. But if he was grandfather, his age would have coincided exactly with the other Ahitub, the son of Phinehas. Certainly a singular coincidence.—3. The genealogy of the high-priests in 1 Chr. vi. 11, 12, introduces another AHITUB, son of another Amariah, and father of another Zadok. But there are reasons for believing that the second Ahitub and Zadok are spurious.

Ahi'lab, a city of Asher from which the Canaanites were not driven out (Judg. i. 31). It is more probable that Achlab reappears in later history as Gush Chaleb (Giscala), a place identified by Robinson under the abbreviated name of el-Ija, near Safed, in the hilly-country to the N.W. of the Sea of Galilee.

Ahla'i, daughter of Sheshan, whom, having no issue, he gave in marriage to his Egyptian slave Jarha (1 Chr. ii. 31, 35). In consequence of the failure of male issue, she became the foundress of an important branch of the family of the Jerahmeelites, and from her were descended Zabad, one of David's mighty men (1 Chr. xi. 41), and Azariah, one of the captains of hundreds in the reign of Josiah (2 Chr. xxiii. 1).

Aho'ah, son of Bela, the son of Benjamin (1 Chr. viii. 4). In 1 Chr. viii. 7, he is called AHIAH. The patronymic, AHOHITE, is found in 2 Sam. xxiii. 9, 28; 1 Chr. xi. 12, 29, xxvii. 4.

Aho'hite. [AHOAH.]

Ah'olah, a harlot, used by Ezekiel as the symbol of Samaria (Ez. xxiii. 4, 5, 36, 44).

Aho'liab, a Danite of great skill as a weaver and embroiderer, whom Moses appointed with Bezaleel to erect the tabernacle (Ex. xxxv. 30-35).

Aho'libah, a harlot, used by Ezekiel as the symbol of Judah (Ez. xxiii. 4, 11, 22, 36, 44).

Aholibamah, one (probably the second) of the three wives of Esau. She was the daughter of ANAH, a descendant of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 2, 25). In the earlier narrative (Gen. xxvi. 34) Aholibamah is called Judith, daughter of Beeri, the Hittite. The explanation of the change in the name of the woman seems to be that her proper personal name was Judith, and that Aholibamah was the name which she received as the wife of Esau and foundress of three tribes of his descendants; she is therefore in the narrative called by the first name, whilst in the genealogical table of the Edomites she appears under the second. This explanation is confirmed by the recurrence of the name Aholibamah in the concluding list of the genealogical table (Gen. xxxvi. 40-43), which we must regard as a list of names of places and not of persons. The district which received the name of Esau's wife, or perhaps rather from which she received her married name, was no doubt (as the name itself indicates) situated in the heights of the mountains of Edom, probably therefore in the neighbourhood of Mount Hor and Petra.

Ahuma'i, son of Jahath, a descendant of Judah, and head of one of the families of the Zorathites (1 Chr. iv. 2).

Ahu'zam, properly Ahuzzam, son of Ashur, the father or founder of Tekoa, by his wife Naamah (1 Chr. iv. 6).

Ahur'zath, one of the friends of the Philistine king Ahimelech, who accompanied him at his interview with Isaac (Gen. xxvi. 26).

Ai (heap of ruins). 1. A royal city (comp. Josh. viii. 23, 29, x. 1, xii. 9) of Canaan, already existing in the time of Abraham (Gen. xii. 8) [HAI], and lying east of Bethel (comp. Josh. xii. 9), and "beside Bethaven" (Josh. vii. 2, viii. 9). It was the second city taken by Israel after the passage of the Jordan, and was "utterly destroyed" (Josh. vii. 3, 4, 5, viii. 1, 2, 3, 10, 11, 12, 14, 16, 17, 18, 20, 21, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28, 29, ix. 3, x. 1, 2, xii. 9). However, if Aiath be Ai—and from its mention with Migron and Michmash, it is at least probable that it was so—the name was still attached to the locality at the time of Sennacherib's march on Jerusalem. (Is

x. 28). At any rate, the "men of Bethel and Ai," to the number of two hundred and twenty-three, returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 28; Neh. vii. 32, "one hundred and twenty-three" only); and when the Benjamites again took possession of their towns, "Michmash, Aija, and Bethel, with their "daughters," are among the places named (Neh. xi. 31). [AIAJ.]—No attempt has yet succeeded in fixing the site of the city which Joshua doomed to be a "heap and a desolation for ever." It is the opinion of some that the words Avim in Josh. xviii. 23, and Gaza in 1 Chr. vii. 28 are corruptions of Ai. [AVIM; AZZAH.]—2. A city of the Ammonites, apparently attached to Heshbon (Jer. xlix. 3).

Ai'ah. 1. Son of Zibeon, a descendant of Seir, and ancestor of one of the wives of Esau (1 Chr. i. 40), called in Gen. xxxvi. 24 AJAH. He probably died before his father, as the succession fell to his brother Anah.—2. Father of Rizpah, the concubine of Saul (2 Sam. iii. 7, xxi. 8, 10, 11).

Ai'ath, a place named by Isaiah (x. 28), in connexion with Migron and Michmash, probably the same as Ai. [AI.]

Ai'ja, like Aiath, probably a variation of the name Ai, mentioned with Michmash and Bethel (Neh. xi. 31).

Ai'jalon, "a place of deer or gazelles." 1. A city of the Kohathites (Josh. xxi. 24; 1 Chr. vi. 69), originally allotted to the tribe of Dan (Josh. xix. 42; A. V. "Ajalon"), which tribe, however, was unable to dispossess the Amorites of the place (Judg. i. 35). Aijalon was one of the towns fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chr. xi. 10) during his conflicts with the new kingdom of Ephraim (1 K. xiv. 30), and the last we hear of it is as being in the hands of the Philistines (2 Chr. xxviii. 18, A. V. "Ajalon"). Being on the very frontier of the two kingdoms, we can understand how Aijalon should be spoken of sometimes (1 Chr. vi. 69, comp. with 66) as in Ephraim, and sometimes (2 Chr. xi. 10; 1 Sam. xiv. 31) as in Judah and Benjamin. The name is most familiar to us from its mention in the celebrated speech of Joshua during his pursuit of the Canaanites (Josh. x. 12, "valley of Aijalon"). The town has been discovered by Dr. Robinson in the modern Yalo, a little to the N. of the Jaffa road, about 14 miles out of Jerusalem.—2. A place in Zebulun, mentioned as the burial-place of Elon, one of the judges (Judg. xii. 12).

Ai'joleth Sha'har (i. e. the hind of the morning dawn), found once only in the Bible, in connexion with Ps. xxii., of which it forms part of the introductory verse or title. This term has been variously interpreted. Some take it for the name of a musical instrument; others suppose it to express allegorically the argument of the 22nd Psalm; but the weight of authority preponderates in favour of the interpretation which assigns to the phrase the sole purpose of describing to the musician the melody to which the psalm was to be played,—"a Psalm of David, addressed to the music master who presides over the band called the Morning Hind."

Ain, an eye, and also, in the simple but vivid imagery of the East, a spring or natural burst of living water, always contradistinguished from the well or tank of artificial formation, and which latter is designated by the words Beer and Bor. Ain oftenest occurs in combination with other words forming the names of definite localities: these will be found under En, as En-gedi, En-gannim, &c. It occurs alone in two cases:—1. One of the landmarks on the eastern boundary of Palestine, as described by Moses (Num. xxxiv. 11). It is probably 'Ain el-'Ary, the main source of the Orontes, a spring remarkable for its force and magnitude.—2. One of the southernmost cities of Judah (Josh. xv. 32), afterwards allotted to Simeon (Josh. xix. 7; 1 Chr. iv. 32) and given to the priests (Josh. xxi. 16). In the list of priests' cities in 1 Chr. vi. Ashan takes the place of Ain.

Ai'tus, one of the "servants of the Temple," or Nethinim, whose sons came up with Zerobabel (1 Esd. v. 31). Perhaps the same as REAIAH.

A'jah = Aiah, 1 (Gen. xxxvi. 24).

A'jalon (Josh. x. 12, xix. 42; 2 Chr. xxviii. 18). The same place as AIJALON (1), which see. The Hebrew being the same in both, there is no reason for the inconsistency in the spelling of the name in the A. V.

A'kan, son of Ezer, one of the "dukes" or chieftains of the Horites, and descendant of Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 27). He is called JAKAN in 1 Chr. i. 42 = JAAKAN, which last is probably the true reading in both cases.

Ak'kub. 1. A descendant of Zerubbabel and son of Elieonai (1 Chr. iii. 24).—2. One of the porters or doorkeepers at the east gate of the Temple. His descendants succeeded to his office, and appear among those who returned from Babylon (1 Chr. ix. 17; Ezr. ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45, xi. 19, xii. 25). Also called DACOB (1 Esd. v. 28).—3. One of the Nethinim, whose family returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 45). Called ACUB in 1 Esd. v. 31.—4. A Levite who assisted Ezra in expounding the law to the people (Neh. viii. 7). Called JACUBUS in 1 Esd. ix. 48.

Akrab'him, "THE ASCENT OF," and "THE GOING UP TO;" also "MAALEH-ACRABHIM" ("the scorpion-pass"). A pass between the south end of the Dead Sea and Zin, forming one of the landmarks on the south boundary at once of Judah (Josh. xv. 3) and of the Holy Land (Num. xxxiv. 4). Also the north (?) boundary of the Amorites (Judg. i. 36). Judas Maccabaeus gained here a great victory over the Edomites (1 Macc. v. 3, "Arabattine"). Perhaps Akrabhim is the steep pass es-Sufrah, by which the final step is made from the desert to the level of the actual land of Palestine. As to the name, scorpions abound in the whole of this district.

Alabaster occurs in the N. T. only in the notice of the alabaster-box of ointment which a woman brought to our Lord when he sat at meat in the house of Simon the leper at Bethany, the contents of which she poured on the head of the Saviour (Matt. xxvi. 7; Mark xiv. 3; Luke vii. 37). By the English word alabaster is to be understood both that kind which is also known by the name of gypsum, as well as the oriental alabaster which is so much valued on account of its translucency, and for its variety of coloured streakings, red, yellow, gray, &c., which it owes for the most part to the admixture of oxides of iron. The latter is a fibrous carbonate of lime, of which there are many varieties, satın spar being one of the most common. The former is a hydrous sulphate of lime, and forms when calcined and ground the well-known and useful substance called plaster of Paris. Both these kinds of alabaster, but especially the latter, are and have been long used for various ornamental purposes, such as in the fabrication of vases, boxes, &c. The ancients considered alabaster (carbonate of lime) to be the best material in which to preserve their ointments. "Unguenta," says Pliny, "keep best in alabaster." In Mark xiv. 3, the woman who brought "the alabaster-box of ointment of spikenard" is said to break the box before pouring out the ointment, which probably only means breaking the seal which kept the essence of the perfume from evaporating.

Alabaster Vessels.—From the British Museum. The inscription on the centre vessel denotes the quantity it holds.

Alameth, properly Alemeth, one of the sons of Becher, the son of Benjamin (1 Chr. vii. 8).

Alam melech ("king's oak"), a place within the limits of Asher, named between Achshaph and Anad (Josh. xix. 26 only).

Al'amo (Ps. xli. title; 1 Chr. xv. 20), a word of exceedingly doubtful meaning, some interpreting it to mean a musical instrument, and others a melody.

Al'cimus (valiant, a Greek name, assumed, according to the prevailing fashion, as representing Eliakim, whom God will establish), a Jewish priest (1 Macc. vii. 14), who was attached to the Hellenizing party (2 Macc. xiv. 3). On the death of Menelaus, though not of the pontifical family, he was appointed to the high-priesthood by the influence of Lysias (1 Macc. vii. 14), to the exclusion of Onias, the nephew of Menelaus. When Demetrius Soter obtained the kingdom of Syria he paid court to that monarch, who confirmed him in his office, and through his general Bacchides [BACCHIDES] established him at Jerusalem. His cruelty, however, was so great that, in spite of the force left in his command, he was unable to withstand the opposition which he provoked, and he again fled to Demetrius, who immediately took measures for his restoration. The first expedition under Nicanor proved unsuccessful; but upon this Bacchides marched a second time against Jerusalem with a large army, routed Judas, who fell in the battle (161 B.C.), and reinstated Alcimus. After his restoration, Alcimus seems to have attempted to modify the ancient worship, and as he was engaged in pulling down "the wall of the inner court of the sanctuary" (i. e. which separated the court of the Gentiles from it) he was "plagued" (by paralysis), and "died at that time," 160 B.C. (1 Macc. vii. ix.; cf. 2 Macc. xiv. xv.).

Al'ema, a large and strong city in Gilead in the time of the Maccabees (1 Macc. v. 26).

Alem'eth, a Benjamite, son of Jehoadah or Jahrah (1 Chr. viii. 36, ix. 42), and descended from Jonathan the son of Saul.

Alem'eth, the form under which ALMON, the name of a city of the priests in Benjamin, appears in 1 Chr. vi. 60 [45]. Under the very similar form of 'Almt or Almuth, it has been apparently identified in the present day at about a mile N.E. of Anata, the site of Anathoth. Among the genealogies of Benjamin the name occurs in the A. V. in connexion with Azmaveth, also the name of a town of that tribe (1 Chr. viii. 36, ix. 42, compared with Ezer. ii. 24), but the form in Hebrew is different.

Alexander III., king of Macedon, surnamed THE GREAT, "the son of Philip" (1 Macc. vi. 2) and Olympias, was born at Pella, B.C. 356. On the murder of Philip (B.C. 336) Alexander put down with resolute energy the disaffection and hostility by which his throne was menaced; and in two years crossed the Hellespont (B.C. 334) to carry out the plans of his father, and execute the mission of Greece to the civilised world. The battle of the Granicus was followed by the subjugation of western Asia; and in the following year the fate of the East was decided at Issus (B.C. 333). Tyre and Gaza were the only cities in western Syria which offered Alexander any resistance, and these were reduced and treated with unusual severity (B.C. 332). Egypt next submitted to him; and in B.C. 331 he founded Alexandria, which remains to the present day the most characteristic monument of his life and work. In the same year he finally defeated Darius at Gaugamela; and in B.C. 330 his unhappy rival was murdered by Bessus, satrap of Bactria. The next two years were occupied by Alexander in the consolidation of his Persian conquests and the reduction of Bactria. In B.C. 327 he crossed the Indus, penetrated to the Hydaspes, and was there forced by the discontent of his army to turn westward. He reached Susa, B.C. 325, and proceeded to Babylon, B.C. 324, which he chose as the capital of his empire. In the next year (B.C. 323) he died there in the midst of his gigantic plans; and those who inherited his conquests left his designs unachieved and unattempted, (cf. Dan. vii. 6, viii. 5, xi. 3).—The famous tradition of the visit of Alexander to Jerusalem during his Phœnician campaign (Joseph. Ant. xi. 8, §1 ff.) has been a fruitful source of controversy. The Jews, it is said, had provoked his anger by refusing to transfer their allegiance to him when summoned to do so during the siege of Tyre, and after the reduction of Tyre and Gaza he turned towards Jerusalem. Jaddua (Jaddus) the high-priest (Neh. xii. 11, 22), who had been warned in a dream how to avert the king's anger, calmly awaited his approach, and when he drew near went out to meet him, clad in his robes of hyacinth and gold, and accompanied by a train of priests and citizens arrayed in white. Alexander was so moved by the solemn spectacle that he did reverence to the holy name inscribed upon the tiara of the high-priest; and when Parmenio expressed surprise, he replied that "he had seen the god whom Jaddua represented in a dream at Dium, encouraging him to cross over into Asia, and promising him success." After this it is said that he visited Jerusalem, offered sacrifice there, heard the prophecies of Daniel which foretold his victory, and conferred important privileges upon the Jews, not only in Judaea, but in Babylonia and Media, which they enjoyed during the supremacy of his successors. The narrative is repeated in the Talmud and in later Jewish writers. On the other hand, no mention of the event occurs in Arrian, Plutarch, Diodorus, or Curtius. But internal evidence is decidedly in favour of the story even in its picturesque fulness. From policy or conviction Alexander delighted to represent himself as chosen by destiny for the great act which he achieved. The siege of Tyre arose professedly from a religious motive. The battle of Issus was preceded by the visit to Gordium; the invasion of Persia by the pilgrimage to the temple of Ammon. And the silence of the classical historians, who notoriously disregarded and misrepresented the fortunes of the Jews, cannot be held to be conclusive against the occurrence of an event which must have appeared to them trivial or unintelligible.—In the prophetic visions of Daniel the influence of Alexander is necessarily combined with that of his successors. They represented with partial exaggeration the several phases of his character; and to the Jews nationally the policy of the Syrian kings was of greater importance than the original conquest of Asia. But some traits of "the first mighty king" (Dan. viii. 21, xi. 3) are given with vigorous distinctness. The emblem by which he is typified (a he-goat) suggests the notions of strength and speed; and the universal extent (Dan. viii. 5, . . . from the west on the frize of the whole earth) and marvellous rapidity of his conquests (Dan. i. c., he touched not the ground) are brought forward as the characteristics of his power, which was directed by the strongest personal impetuosity (Dan. viii. 6, in the fury of his power). He ruled with great dominion, and did according to his will (xi. 3), "and there was none that could deliver . . . out of his hand" (viii. 7).

Tetradrachm (Attic talent) of Lysimachus, King of Thrace.
Obv. Head of Alexander the Great as a young Jupiter Ammon.
Rev. Pallas seated to left, holding a Victory.

Alexander Balas was, according to some, a natural son of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, but he was more generally regarded as an impostor who falsely assumed the connexion. He claimed the throne of Syria, in 152 B.C., in opposition to Demetrius Soter, who had provoked the hostility of the neighbouring kings and alienated the affections of his subjects. After landing at Ptolemais (1 Macc. x. 1) Alexander gained the warm support of Jonathan, who was now the leader of the Jews (1 Macc. ix. 73); and in 150 B.C. he completely routed the forces of Demetrius, who himself fell in the retreat (1 Macc. x. 48-50). After this Alexander married Cleopatra, the daughter of Ptolemy VI. Philometor; and in the arrangement of his kingdom appointed Jonathan governor (1 Macc. x. 85) of a province (Judaea: cf. 1 Macc. xi. 57). But his triumph was of short duration. After obtaining power he gave himself up to a life of indulgence; and when Demetrius Nicator, the son of Demetrius Soter, landed in Syria, in 147 B.C., the new pretender found powerful support (1 Macc. x. 67 ff.). At first Jonathan defeated and slew Apollonius, the governor of Coele-Syria, who had joined the party of Demetrius, for which exploit he received fresh favours from Alexander (1 Macc. x. 69-89); but shortly afterwards (B.C. 146) Ptolemy entered Syria with a large force, and after he had placed garrisons in the chief cities on the coast, which received him according to the commands of Alexander, suddenly pronounced himself in favour of Demetrius (1 Macc. xi. 1-11), alleging, probably with truth, the existence of a conspiracy against his life. Alexander, who had been forced to leave Antioch, was in Cilicia when he heard of Ptolemy's defection (1 Macc. xi. 14). He hastened to meet him, but was defeated (1 Macc. xi. 15), and fled to Abae in Arabia, where he was murdered, B.C. 146 (1 Macc. xi. 17). The narrative in 1 Macc. shows clearly the partiality which the Jews entertained for Alexander "as the first that entreated of true peace with them" (1 Macc. x. 47); and the same feeling was exhibited afterwards in the zeal with which they supported his son Antiochus. [ANTIOCHUS VI.]

Alexander, in N. T. 1. Son of Simon the Cyrenian, who was compelled to bear the cross for our Lord (Mark xv. 21).—2. One of the kindred of Annas the high-priest (Acts iv. 6), apparently in some high office, as he is among three who are mentioned by name. Some suppose him identical with Alexander the Alabarch at Alexandria, the brother of Philo Judaeus, mentioned by Josephus.—3. A Jew at Ephesus, whom his countrymen put forward during the tumult raised by Demetrius the silversmith (Acts xix. 33), to plead their cause with the mob, as being unconnected with the attempt to overthrow the worship of Artemis. Or he may have been, as imagined by Calvin and others, a Jewish convert to Christianity, whom the Jews were willing to expose as a victim to the frenzy of the mob.—4. An Ephesian Christian, reproached by St. Paul in 1 Tim. i. 20, as having, together with one Hymenaeus, put from him faith and a good conscience, and so made shipwreck concerning the faith. This may be the same with—5. ALEXANDER the coppersmith, mentioned by the same apostle (2 Tim. iv. 14) as having done him many mischiefs. It is quite uncertain where this person resided; but, from the caution to Timotheus to beware of him, probably at Ephesus.

Alexandria (3 Macc. iii. 1; Acts xviii. 24, vi. 9), the Hellenic, Roman, and Christian capital of Egypt, was founded by Alexander the Great, B.C. 332, who himself traced the ground-plan of the city, which he designed to make the metropolis of his western empire. The work thus begun was continued after the death of Alexander by the Ptolemies. Every natural advantage contributed to its prosperity. The climate and site were singularly healthy. The harbours, formed by the island of Pharos and the headland Lochias, were safe and commodious, alike for commerce and for war; and the Lake Mareotis was an inland haven for the merchandise of Egypt and India. Under the despotism of the later Ptolemies the trade of Alexandria declined, but its population and wealth were enormous. After the victory of Augustus it suffered for its attachment to the cause of Antony; but its importance as one of the chief corn-ports of Rome¹ secured for it the general favour of the first emperors. In later times the seditious tumults for which the Alexandrians had always been notorious desolated the city, and religious feuds aggravated the popular distress. Yet even thus, though Alexandria suffered greatly from constant dissensions and the weakness of the Byzantine court, the splendour of "the great city of the West" amazed Amrou, its Arab conqueror; and, after centuries of Mohammedan misrule, it promises once again to justify the wisdom of its founder.—The population of Alexandria was mixed from the first; and this fact formed the groundwork of the Alexandrine character. The three regions into which the city was divided (Regio Judaeorum, Bruchium, Rhacotis) corresponded to the three chief classes of its inhabitants, Jews, Greeks, Egyptians; but, in addition to these principal races, representatives of almost every nation were found there. According to Josephus, Alexander himself assigned to the Jews a place in his new city; "and they obtained," he adds, "equal privileges with the Macedonians," in consideration "of their services against the Egyptians." Ptolemy I. imitated the policy of Alexander, and, after the capture of Jerusalem, removed a considerable number of its citizens to Alexandria. Many others followed of their own accord; and all received the full Macedonian franchise, as men of known and tried fidelity. Already on a former occasion the Jews had sought a home in the land of their bondage. More than two centuries and a half before the foundation of Alexandria a large body of them had taken refuge in Egypt, after the murder of Gedaliah; but these, after a general apostasy, were carried captive to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar (2 K. xxv. 26; Jer. xlv.).—The fate of the later colony was far different. The numbers and importance of the Egyptian Jews were rapidly increased under the Ptolemies by fresh immigrations and untiring industry. Philo estimates them in his time at little less than 1,000,000; and adds, that two of the five districts of Alexandria were called "Jewish districts;" and that many Jews lived scattered in the remaining three. Julius Caesar and Augustus confirmed to them the privileges which they had enjoyed before, and they retained them, with various interruptions, during the tumults and persecutions of later reigns. They were represented, at least for some time (from the time of Cleopatra to the reign of Claudius), by their own officer, and Augustus appointed a council (i. e. Sanhedrin) "to superintend the affairs of the Jews" according to their own laws. The establishment of Christianity altered the civil position of the Jews, but they maintained their relative prosperity; and when Alexandria was taken by Amrou 40,000 tributary Jews were reckoned among the marvels of the city.—For some time the Jewish Church in Alexandria was in close dependence on that of Jerusalem. Both were subject to the civil power of the first Ptolemies, and both acknowledged the high-priest as their religious head. The persecution of Ptolemy Philopator (217 B.C.) occasioned the first political separation between the two bodies. From that time the Jews of Palestine attached themselves to the fortunes of Syria [ANTIOCHUS the Great], and the same policy which alienated the Palestinian party gave unity and decision to the Jews of Alexandria. The Septuagint translation, which strengthened the barrier of language between Palestine and Egypt, and the temple at Leontopolis (161 B.C.), which subjected the Egyptian Jews to the charge of schism, widened the breach which was thus opened. But the division, though marked, was not complete. At the beginning of the Christian era the Egyptian Jews still paid the contributions to the temple-service. Jerusalem, though its name was fashioned to a Greek shape, was still the Holy City, the metropolis not of a country but of a people, and the Alexandrians had a synagogue there (Acts vi. 9). The internal administration of the Alexandrine Church was independent of the Sanhedrim at Jerusalem; but respect survived submission.—According to the common legend St. Mark first "preached the Gospel in Egypt, and founded the first Church in Alexandria." At the beginning of the 2nd century the number of Christians at Alexandria must have been very large, and the great leaders of Gnosticism who arose there (Basilides, Valentinus) exhibit an exaggeration of the tendency of the Church.

Alexandrians. 1. The Greek inhabitants of Alexandria (3 Macc. ii. 30, iii. 21). 2. The Jewish colonists of that city, who were admitted to the privileges of citizenship, and had a synagogue at Jerusalem (Acts vi. 9). See above.

Algum or Almag Trees; the former occurring in 2 Chr. ii. 8, ix. 10, 11, the latter in 1 K. x. 11, 12. There can be no question that these words are identical. From 1 K. x. 11, 12, 2 Chr. ix. 10, 11, we learn that the almag was brought in great plenty from Ophir, together with gold and precious stones, by the fleet of Hiram, for Solomon's Temple and house, and for the construction of musical instruments. In 2 Chr. ii. 8, Solomon is represented as desiring Hiram to send him "cedar-trees, fir-trees, and almag-trees out of Lebanon." From the passage in Kings it seems clear that Ophir was the country from which the almag-trees came; and as it is improbable that Lebanon should also have been a locality for them, the passage which appears to ascribe the growth of the almag-tree to the mountains of Lebanon must be considered to be either an interpolation of some transcriber, or else it must bear a different interpretation. Perhaps the wood had been brought from Ophir to Lebanon, and Solomon's instructions to Hiram were to send on to Jerusalem the timber imported from Ophir that was lying at the port of Tyre, with the cedars which had been cut in Mount Lebanon. It is impossible to identify the algum or almag-tree with any certainty, but the arguments are more in favour of the red sandal-wood (Pterocarpus santalinus) than of any other species. This tree, which belongs to the natural order Leguminosae, and sub-order Papilionaceae, is a native of India and Ceylon. The wood is very heavy, hard, and fine grained, and of a beautiful garnet colour.

Al'iah. [ALVAH.]

Al'ian. [ALVAN.]

Allegory, a figure of speech, which has been defined by Bishop Marsh, in accordance with its etymology, as "a representation of one thing which is intended to excite the representation of another thing;" the first representation being consistent with itself, but requiring, or capable of admitting, a moral or spiritual interpretation over and above its literal sense. An allegory has been considered by some as a lengthened or sustained metaphor, or a continuation of metaphors, as by Cicero, thus standing in the same relation to metaphor as parable to simile; but the interpretation of allegory differs from that of metaphor, in having to do not with words but things. In every allegory there is a twofold sense; the immediate or historic, which is understood from the words, and the ultimate, which is concerned with the things signified by the words. The allegorical interpretation is not of the words, but of the things signified by them; and not only may, but actually does, coexist with the literal interpretation in every allegory, whether the narrative in which it is conveyed be of things possible or real. An illustration of this may be seen in Gal. iv. 24, where the apostle gives an allegorical interpretation to the historical narrative of Hagar and Sarah; not treating that narrative as an allegory in itself, as our A. V. would lead us to suppose, but drawing from it a deeper sense than is conveyed by the immediate representation. For examples of pure and mixed allegory, see Ps. lxxx.; Luke xv. 11-32; John xv. 1-8.

Alleluia, so written in Rev. xix. 1, foll. or more properly HALLELUJAH, "praise ye Jehovah," as it is found in the margin of Ps. cv. cvi. cxii. 1, cxiii. 1, cxlvi.-cl. (comp. Ps. cxiii. 9, cxv. 18, cxvi. 19, cxvii. 2). The Psalms from cxiii. to cxviii. were called by the Jews the Hallel, and were sung on the first of the month, at the feast of Dedication, and the feast of Tabernacles, the feast of Weeks, and the feast of the Passover. [HOSANNA]. On the last occasion Pss. cxiii. and cxiv., according to the school of Hillel (the former only according to the school of Shammai), were sung before the feast, and the remainder at its termination, after drinking the last cup. The hymn (Matt. xxvi. 30), sung by Christ and his disciples after the last supper, is supposed to have been the great Hallel, which seems to have varied according to the feast. The literal meaning of "Hallelujah" sufficiently indicates the character of the Psalms in which it occurs, as hymns of praise and thanksgiving. They are all found in the last book of the collection, and bear marks of being intended for use in the temple-service; the words "praise ye Jehovah" being taken up by the full chorus of Levites. In the great hymn of triumph in heaven over the destruction of Babylon, the apostle in vision heard the multitude in chorus like the voice of mighty thunders burst forth, "Alleluia, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth," responding to the voice which came out of the throne saying "Praise our God, all ye his servants, and ye that fear him, both small and great" (Rev. xix. 1-6). In this, as in the offering of incense (Rev. viii.), there is evident allusion to the service of the temple, as the apostle had often witnessed it in all its grandeur.

Alliances. On the first establishment of the Hebrews in Palestine no connexions were formed between them and the surrounding nations. But with the extension of their power under the kings, the Jews were brought more into contact with foreigners, and alliances became essential to the security of their commerce. Solomon concluded two important treaties exclusively for commercial purposes; the first with Hiram, king of Tyre, originally with the view of obtaining materials and workmen for the erection of the Temple, and afterwards for the supply of ship-builders and sailors (1 K. v. 2-12, ix. 27): the second with a Pharaoh, king of Egypt; by this he secured a monopoly of the trade in horses and other products of that country (1 K. x. 28, 29). After the division of the kingdom the alliances were of an offensive and defensive nature. When war broke out between Amaziah and Jeroboam II. a coalition was formed between Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah on the one side, and Ahaz and Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, on the other (2 K. xvi. 5-9). By this means an opening was afforded to the advances of the Assyrian power; and the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, as they were successively attacked, sought the alliance of the Egyptians, who were strongly interested in maintaining the independence of the Jews as a barrier against the encroachments of the Assyrian power. Thus Hoshea made a treaty with So (Sabaco, or Sevechus), and rebelled against Shalmaneser (2 K. xvii. 4). Hezekiah adopted the same policy in opposition to Sennacherib (Is. xxx. 2); but in neither case was the alliance productive of much good: the Israelites were abandoned by So, and it was only when the independence of Egypt itself was threatened that the Assyrians were defeated by the joint forces of Sethos and Tirhakah, and a temporary relief afforded thereby to Judah (2 K. xix. 9, 36). On the restoration of independence Judas Maccabeus sought an alliance with the Romans as a counterpoise to the neighbouring state of Syria (1 Macc. viii.). This alliance was renewed by Jonathan (1 Macc. xii. 1) and by Simon (1 Macc. xv. 17). On the last occasion the independence of the Jews was recognised and formally notified to the neighbouring nations, B.C. 140 (1 Macc. xv. 22, 23). Treaties of a friendly nature were at the same period concluded with the Laedæmonians under an impression that they came of a common stock (1 Macc. xii. 2, xiv. 20).—The formation of an alliance was attended with various religious rites: a victim was slain and divided into two parts, between which the contracting parties passed, (Gen. xv. 10). That this custom was maintained to a late period appears from Jer. xxiv. 18-20. Generally speaking the oath alone is mentioned in the contracting of alliances, either between nations (Josh. ix. 15) or individuals (Gen. xxvi. 28, xxxi. 53; 1 Sam. xx. 17; 2 K. xi. 4). The event was celebrated by a feast (Gen. l. c.; Ex. xxiv. 11; 2 Sam. iii. 12, 20). Salt, as symbolical of fidelity, was used on these occasions; it was applied to the sacrifices (Lev. ii. 13), and probably used, as among the Arabs, at hospitable entertainments; hence the expression "covenant of salt" (Num. xviii. 19; 2 Chr. xiii. 5). Occasionally a pillar or a heap of stones was set up as a memorial of the alliance (Gen. xxxi. 52). Presents were also sent by the party soliciting the alliance (1 K. xv. 18; Is. xxx. 6; 1 Macc. xv. 18). The fidelity of the Jews to their engagements was conspicuous at all periods of their history (Josh. ix. 18), and any breach of covenant was visited with very severe punishment (2 Sam. xxi. 1; Ez. xvii. 96).

Al'lon = Ami = Amon (1 Eed. v. 34; cf. Ezr. ii. 57; Neh. vii. 59).

Al'lon, a Simeonite, ancestor of Ziza, a prince of his tribe in the reign of Hezekiah (1 Chr. iv. 37).

Allon, a large strong tree of some description, probably an oak. The word is found in two names in the topography of Palestine.—1. ALLON, more accurately ELON, a place named among the cities of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 33). Probably the more correct construction is to take it with the following word, i. e. "the oak by Zaanaim," or "the oak of the loading of tents," as if deriving its name from some nomad tribe frequenting the spot. Such a tribe were the Kenites, and in connexion with them the place is again named in Judg. iv. 11, with the additional definition of "by Kedesh (Naphtali)." Here, however, the A. V. following the Vulgate, renders the words "the plain of Zaanaim." [ELON].—2. AL'LOH-BA'CHUTH ("oak of weeping"), the tree under which Rebekah's nurse, Deborah, was buried (Gen. xxxv. 8).

Almodad, the first, in order, of the descendants of Joktan (Gen. x. 26; 1 Chr. i. 20), and the progenitor of an Arab tribe. His settlements must be looked for, in common with those of the other descendants of Joktan, in the Arabian peninsula; and his name appears to be preserved in that of Mudād, a famous personage in Arabian history, the reputed father of Ishmael's Arab wife, and the chief of the Joktanite tribe Jurhum.

Almon, a city within the tribe of Benjamin, with "suburbs" given to the priests (Josh. xxi. 18). In the parallel list in 1 Chr. vi. it is found as Alemeth. [ALEMETH.]

Al'mon-Diblah'ta'im, one of the latest stations of the Israelites, between Dibon-gad and the mountains of Abarim (Num. xxxiii. 46, 47). Dibon-gad is the present Dhibān, just to the north of the Arnon; and it is thus probable that Almon-diblah'ta'im is identical with Beth-diblah'ta'im, a Moabite city mentioned by Jeremiah (xlviii. 22) in company with both Dibon and Nebo.

Almond-tree; Almond. This word is found in Gen. xliii. 11; Ex. xxv. 33, 34, xxxvii. 19, 20; Num. xvii. 8; Eccles. xii. 5; Jer. i. 11, in the text of the A. V. It is invariably represented by the same Hebrew word (shâkêd), which sometimes stands for the whole tree, sometimes for the fruit or nut; for instance, in Gen. xliii. 11, Jacob commands his sons to take as a present to Joseph "a little honey, spices and myrrh, nuts and almonds;" here the fruit is clearly meant. In the passages referred to above out of the book of Exodus the "bowls made like unto almonds," which were to adorn the golden candlestick, seem to allude to the nut also. Aaron's rod, that so miraculously budded, yielded almond-nuts. In the two latter passages from Ecclesiastes and Jeremiah the Hebrew shâkêd is translated almond-tree, which from the context it certainly represents. It is clearly then a mistake to suppose, as some writers have done, that shâkêd stands exclusively for "almond-nuts," and that lûz signifies "the tree." It is probable that this tree, conspicuous as it was for its early flowering and useful fruit, was known by these two different names. The Hebrew lûz occurs only in Gen. xxx. 37, where it is translated hazel in the text of the A. V., yet there can be little or no doubt that it is another word for the almond, for in the Arabic this identical word, lûz, denotes the almond. [HAZEL].—Shâkêd is derived from a root which signifies "to be wakeful," "to hasten," for the almond-tree blossoms very early in the season, the flowers appearing before the leaves. Hence it was regarded by the Jews as a welcome harbinger of spring, reminding them that the winter was passing away—that the flowers would soon appear on the earth, that the time of the singing of birds was come, and the voice of the turtle would soon be heard in the land (Cant. i. 11, 12). The word shâkêd, therefore, or the tree which hastened to put forth its blossoms, was a very beautiful and fitting synonym for the lûz, or almond-tree, in the language of a people so fond of imagery and poetry as were the Jews. The almond-tree has been noticed in flower as early as the 9th of January; the 19th, 23rd, and 25th are also recorded dates. The knowledge of this interesting fact will explain that otherwise unintelligible passage in Jeremiah (i. 11, 12), "The word of the Lord came unto me, saying, Jeremiah, what seest thou? And I said, I see the rod of an almond-tree (shâkêd). Then said the Lord unto me, thou hast well seen, for I will hasten (shâkêd) my word to perform it."—The almond-tree has always been regarded by the Jews with reverence, and even to this day the modern English Jews on their great feast-days carry a bough of flowering almond to the synagogue, just as the Jews of old time used to present palm-branches in the Temple.—The almond-tree, whose scientific name is Amygdalus communis, is a native of Almond-tree and blossom.

Asia and North Africa, but it is cultivated in the milder parts of Europe. The height of the tree is about 12 or 14 feet; the flowers are pink, and arranged for the most part in pairs; the leaves are long, ovate, with a serrated margin, and an acute point. The covering of the fruit is downy and succulent, enclosing the hard shell which contains the kernel. It is curious to observe, in connexion with the almond-bowls of the golden candle-stick, that, in the language of lapidaries, Almonds are pieces of rock-crystal, even now used in adorning branch-candlesticks.

Alms. This word is not found in our version of the canonical books of O. T., but it occurs repeatedly in N. T., and in the Apocryphal books of Tobit and Ecclesiasticus.—The duty of almsgiving, especially in kind, consisting chiefly in portions to be left designedly from produce of the field, the vineyard, and the oliveyard (Lev. xix. 9, 10, xxiii. 22; Deut. xv. 11, xxiv. 19, xxvi. 2-13; Ruth ii. 2), is strictly enjoined by the Law. Every third year also (Deut. xiv. 28) each proprietor was directed to share the tithe of his produce with "the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow." The theological estimate of almsgiving among the Jews is indicated in the following passages:—Job xxxi. 17; Prov. x. 2, xi. 4; Esth. ix. 22; Ps. cxii. 9; Acts ix. 36, the case of Dorcas; x. 2, of Cornelius; to which may be added, Tob. iv. 10, 11, xiv. 10, 11; and Eccles. ii. 30, xl. 24. And the Talmudists went so far as to interpret righteousness by almsgiving in such passages as Gen. xviii. 19; Is. liv. 14; Ps. xvii. 15.—In the women's court of the Temple there were 13 receptacles for voluntary offerings (Mark xii. 41), one of which was devoted to alms for education of poor children of good family. Before the Captivity there is no trace of permission of mendicancy, but it was evidently allowed in later times (Matt. xx. 30; Mark x. 46; Acts iii. 2).—The Pharisees were zealous in almsgiving, but too ostentatious in their mode of performance, for which our Lord finds fault with them (Matt. vi. 2). But there is no ground for supposing that the expression “do not sound a trumpet” is more than a mode of denouncing their display, by a figure drawn from the frequent and well-known use of trumpets in religious and other celebrations, Jewish as well as heathen.—The duty of relieving the poor was not neglected by the Christians (Matt. vi. 14; Luke xiv. 13; Acts xx. 35; Gal. ii. 10). Every Christian was exhorted to lay by on the first day of each week some portion of his profits, to be applied to the wants of the needy (Acts xi. 30; Rom. xv. 25-27; 1 Cor. xvi. 1-4). It was also considered a duty specially incumbent on widows to devote themselves to such ministrations (1 Tim. v. 10).

Alnathan [ELNATHAN 2.] (1 Esd. viii. 44).

Aquilaria Agallochum.

Aloes, Lign Aloes (in Heb. Ahālīm, Ahālōth), the name of a costly and sweet-smelling wood which is mentioned in Num. xiv. 6, Ps. xlv. 8, Prov. vii. 17. In Cant. iv. 14, Solomon speaks of “myrrh and aloes, with all the chief spices.” The word occurs once in the N. T. (John xix. 39), when Nicodemus brings “a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about an hundred pound weight,” for the purpose of anointing the body of our Lord. It is usually identified with the Aquilaria Agallochum, a tree which supplies the agallochum, or aloes-wood of commerce, much valued in India on account of its aromatic qualities for purposes of fumigation and for incense. This tree grows to the height of 120 feet, being 12 feet in girth. It is, however, uncertain whether the Ahālīm or Ahālōth is in reality the aloes-wood of commerce; it is quite possible that some kind of odoriferous cedar may be the tree denoted by these terms.

Aloth, a place or district, forming with Asier the jurisdiction of the ninth of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 K. iv. 18).

Al'pha, the first letter of the Greek alphabet, as Omega is the last. Its significance is plainly indicated in the context, “I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last” (Rev. xxii. 13, i. 8, 11, xxi. 6), which may be compared with Is. xli. 4. Both Greeks and Hebrews employed the letters of the alphabet as numerals.

Alphabet. [WRITING.]

Alphæus, the father of the Apostle St. James the Less (Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13), and husband of that Mary (called in Mark xv. 40, mother of James the Less and of Jesus) who, with the mother of Jesus and others, was standing by the cross during the crucifixion (John xix. 25). [MARY.] In this latter place he is called Clopas (not, as in the A. V., Cleophas); a variation arising from the double pronunciation of the Hebrew letter Cheth; and found also in the rendering of Hebrew names by the LXX. Whether the existence of this variety gives us a further right to identify Alphæus with the Clopas of Luke xxiv. 18, can never be satisfactorily determined. If, as commonly, the ellipsis in Ἰουδᾶ: ἱακώβου in Luke vi. 15, Acts i. 13, is to be filled up, by inserting “brother,” then the apostle St. Jude was another son of Alphæus. And in Mark ii. 14, Levi (or Matthew) is also said to have been the son of Alphæus. For further particulars, see JAMES.

Altane'us, the same as Mattenai (Ezr. x. 33), one of the sons of Hashum (1 Esd. ix. 33).

Altar. (A.) The first altar of which we have any account is that built by Noah when he left the ark (Gen. viii. 20). In the early times altars were usually built in certain spots hallowed by religious associations, e.g. where God appeared (Gen. xii. 7, xiii. 18, xvi. 26, xxxv. 1). Generally of course they were erected for the offering of sacrifice; but in some instances they appear to have been only memorials. Such was the altar built by Moses, and called Jehovah Nissi, as a sign that Jehovah would have war with Amalek from generation to generation (Ex. xvii. 15, 16). Such too was the altar which was built by the Reubenites, Gadites, and half-tribe of Manasseh, “in the borders of Jordan,” and which was erected “not for burnt-offerings nor for sacrifice,” but that it might be “a witness” between them and the rest of the tribes (Josh. xxii. 10-29). Altars were most probably originally made of earth. The Law of Moses allowed them to be made either of earth or unhewn stones (Ex. xx. 24, 25): any iron tool would have profaned the altar—but this could only refer to the body of the altar, and that part on which the victim was laid, as directions were given to make a casing of shittim-wood overlaid with brass for the altar of burnt offering. (See below.) In later times they were frequently built on high places, especially in idolatrous worship (Deut. xii. 2). The altars so erected were themselves sometimes called "high places." By the Law of Moses all altars were forbidden, except those first in the Tabernacle, and afterwards in the Temple (Lev. xvii. 8, 9; Deut. xii. 13, &c.). This prohibition, however, was not strictly observed, at least till after the building of the Temple, even by pious Israelites. Thus Gideon built an altar (Judg. vi. 24). So likewise did Samuel (1 Sam. vii. 9, 10), David (2 Sam. xxiv. 25), and Solomon (1 K. iii. 4). The sanctity attaching to the altar led to its being regarded as a place of refuge or asylum (Ex. xxi. 14; 1 K. i. 50).—(B) The Law of Moses directed that two altars should be made, the one the Altar of Burnt-offering (called also simply the Altar), and the other the Altar of Incense.—I. The Altar of Burnt-offering, called in Mal. i. 7, 12, "the table of the Lord," perhaps also in Ez. xlv. 16. It differed in construction at different times. (1.) In the Tabernacle (Ex. xxvii. 1 ft. xxxviii. 1 ft.) it was comparatively small and portable. In shape it was square. It was five cubits in length, the same in breadth, and three cubits high. It was made of planks of shittim (or acacia) wood overlaid with brass. The interior was hollow (Ex. xxvii. 8). At the four corners were four projections called horns, made, like the altar itself, of shittim-wood overlaid with brass (Ex. xxvii. 2). They probably projected upwards; and to them the victim was bound when about to be sacrificed (Ps. cxviii. 27). On the occasion of the consecration of the priests (Ex. xxix. 12) and the offering of the sin-offering (Lev. iv. 7 ft.) the blood of the victim was sprinkled on the horns of the altar. Round the altar, midway between the top and bottom, ran a projecting ledge (A. V. "compass"), on which perhaps the priests stood when they officiated. To the outer edge of this, again, a grating or net-work of brass was affixed, and reached to the bottom of the altar, which thus presented the appearance of being larger below than above. At the four corners of the net-work were four brassen rings, into which were inserted the staves by which the altar was carried. These staves were of the same materials as the altar itself. As the priests were forbidden to ascend the altar by steps (Ex. xx. 26), it has been conjectured that a slope of earth led gradually up to the ledge from which they officiated. The place of the altar was at "the door of the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation" (Ex. xl. 29). The various utensils for the service of the altar (Ex. xxvii. 3) were: (1.) Pans to clear away the fat and ashes with. (2.) Shovels. (3.) Basons, in which the blood of the victims was received, and from which it was sprinkled. (4.) Flesh-hooks, by means of which the flesh was removed from the caldron or pot. (See 1 Sam. ii. 13, 14, where they are described as having three prongs.) (5.) Fire-pans, or perhaps censers. These might either be used for taking coals from the fire on the altar (Lev. xvi. 12); or for burning incense (Num. xvi. 6, 7). All these utensils were of brass.—(2.) In Solomon's Temple the altar was considerably larger in its dimensions, as might have been expected from the much greater size of the building in which it was placed. Like the former it was square; but the length and breadth were now twenty cubits, and the height ten (2 Chr. iv. 1). It differed, too, in the material of which it was made, being entirely of brass (1 K. viii. 64; 2 Chr. vii. 7). It had no grating: and instead of a single gradual slope, the ascent to it was probably made by three successive platforms, to each of which it has been supposed that steps led, as in the figure annexed. Against this may be urged the fact that the Law of Moses positively forbade the use of steps (Ex. xx. 26) and the assertion of Josephus that in Herod's temple the ascent was by an inclined plane. On the other hand steps are introduced in the ideal, or symbolical, temple of Ezekiel (xliii. 17), and the prohibition in Ex. xx. has been interpreted as applying to a continuous flight of stairs, and not to a broken ascent. But the Biblical account is so brief that we are necessarily unable to determine the question. Asa, we read, renewed this altar (2 Chr. xv. 8). This may either mean that he repaired it, or more probably perhaps that he reconsecrated it after it had been polluted by idol-worship. Subsequently Ahaz had it removed from its place to the north side of the new altar which Urijah the priest had made in accordance with his directions (2 K. xvi. 14). It was "cleansed" by command of Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxix. 18), and Manasseh, after his repentance, either repaired or rebuilt it (2 Chr. xxxiii. 16). It may finally have been broken up, and the brass carried to Babylon, but this is not mentioned (Jer. lii. 17 ft.).—(3.) The altar of burnt-offering in the second (Zerubbabel's) temple. Of this no description is given in the Bible. We are only told (Ez. iii. 2) that it was built before the foundations of the Temple were laid. According to Josephus (Ant. xi. 4, §1) it was placed on the same spot on which that of Solomon had originally stood. It was constructed, as we may infer from 1 Macc. iv. 47, of unhewn stones. Antiochus Epiphanes desecrated it (1 Macc. i. 54): and according to Josephus (Ant. xii. 5, §4) removed it altogether. In the restoration by Judas Maccabaeus a new altar was built of unhewn stone in conformity with the Mosaic Law (1 Macc. iv. 47).—(4.) The altar erected by Herod, which is thus described by Josephus (B. J. v. 5, §6);—"In front of the Temple stood the altar, 15 cubits in height, and in breadth and length of equal dimensions, viz. 50 cubits; it was built foursquare, with horn-like corners projecting from it; and on the south side a gentle acclivity led up to it. Moreover it was made without any iron tool, neither did iron ever touch it at any time." The dimensions given in the Mishna are different. In connexion with the horn on the southwest was a pipe intended to receive the blood of the victims, which was sprinkled on the left side of the altar: the blood was afterwards carried by means of a subterranean passage into the brook Kidron. Under the altar was a cavity into which the drink-offerings passed. It was covered over with a slab of marble, and emptied from time to time. On the north side of the altar were a number of brazen rings, to secure the animals which were brought for sacrifice. Lastly, round the middle of the altar ran a scarlet thread to mark where the blood was to be sprinkled, whether above or below it.—According to Lev. vi. 12, 13, a perpetual fire was to be kept burning on the altar. This was the symbol and token of the perpetual worship of Jehovah. For inasmuch as the whole religion of Israel was concentrated in the sacrifices which were offered, the extinguishing of the fire would have looked like the extinguishing of the religion itself. The fire which consumed the sacrifices was kindled from this: and besides these there was the fire from which the coals were taken to burn incense with.—II. The Altar of Incense, called also the golden altar to distinguish it from the Altar of Burnt-offering, which was called the brazen altar (Ex. xxxviii. 30). Probably this is meant by the “altar of wood” spoken of Ezek. xli. 22, which is further described as the “table that is before the Lord,” precisely the expression used of the altar of incense. The name “altar” was not strictly appropriate, as no sacrifices were offered upon it; but once in the year, on the great day of atonement, the high-priest sprinkled upon the horns of it the blood of the sin-offering (Ex. xxx. 10).—(a.) That in the Tabernacle was made of acacia-wood, overlaid with pure gold. In shape it was square, being a cubit in length and breadth, and 2 cubits in height. Like the Altar of Burnt-offering it had horns at the four corners, which were of one piece with the rest of the altar. It had also a top or roof, on which the incense was laid and lighted. Many, following the interpretation of the Vulgate craticulam ejus, have supposed a kind of grating to be meant; but for this there is no authority. Round the altar was a border or wreath. Below this were two golden rings which were to be “for places for the staves to bear it withal.” The staves were of acacia-wood overlaid with gold. Its appearance may be illustrated by the following figure:—

Supposed form of the Altar of Incense.

AL-TASCHITH

This altar stood in the Holy Place, “before the veil that is by the ark of the testimony” (Ex. xxx. 6, xi. 5).—(b.) The Altar in Solomon’s Temple was similar (1 K. vii. 48; 1 Chr. xviii. 18), but was made of cedar overlaid with gold. The altar mentioned in Is. vi. 6 is clearly the Altar of Incense, not the Altar of Burnt-offering. From this passage it would seem that heated stones were laid upon the altar, by means of which the incense was kindled. Although it is the heavenly altar which is there described, we may presume that the earthly corresponded to it.—(c.) The Altar of Incense is mentioned as having been removed from the Temple of Zerubbabel by Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc. i. 21). Judas Maccabaeus restored it, together with the holy vessels, &c. (1 Macc. iv. 49). On the arch of Titus no Altar of Incense appears. But that it existed in the last Temple, and was richly overlaid, we learn from the Mishna. From the circumstance that the sweet incense was burnt upon it every day, morning and evening (Ex. xxx. 7, 8), as well as that the blood of atonement was sprinkled upon it (v. 10), this altar had a special importance attached to it. It is the only altar which appears in the Heavenly Temple (Is. vi. 6; Rev. vii. 3, 4).—C. Other Altars. (1.) Altars of brick. There seems to be an allusion to such in Is. lxv. 3.

(2.) An Altar to an Unknown God. What altar this was has been the subject of much discussion. St. Paul merely mentions in his speech on the Areopagus that he had himself seen such an altar in Athens. His assertion is confirmed by other writers, from whom we learn that there were several altars of this kind at Athens. It is not at all probable that such inscription referred to the God of the Jews, as One whose Name it was unlawful to utter, as some have supposed. As to the origin of these altars, we are told by Diogenes Laertius that in the time of a plague, when the Athenians knew not what god to propitiate in order to avert it, Epimenides caused black and white sheep to be let loose from the Areopagus, and wherever they lay down, to be offered to the respective divinities. It was probably on this or similar occasions that altars were dedicated to an Unknown God, since they knew not what god was offended and required to be propitiated.

Al-Taschith, found in the introductory verse to the four following Psalms, lvii., lviii., lix., lxxv.

Literally rendered, the import of the words is "destroy not," probably the beginning of some song or poem to the tune of which those psalms were to be chanted.

Amalek, son of Eliphaz by his concubine Timnah, grandson of Esau, and chieftain ("duke" A. V.) of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 12, 16; 1 Chr. i. 36).

Amalekites, a nomadic tribe, which occupied the peninsula of Sinai and the wilderness intervening between the southern hill-ranges of Palestine and the border of Egypt (Num. xii. 29; 1 Sam. xv. 7, xxvii. 8). Arabian historians represent them as originally dwelling on the shores of the Persian Gulf, whence they were pressed westwards by the growth of the Assyrian empire, and spread over a portion of Arabia at a period antecedent to its occupation by the descendants of Joktan. This account of their origin harmonizes with Gen. xiv. 7, where the "country" of the Amalekites is mentioned several generations before the birth of the Edomite Amalek: it throws light on the traces of a permanent occupation of central Palestine in their passage westward, as indicated by the names Amalek and Mount of the Amalekites (Judg. v. 14, xii. 15): and it accounts for the silence of Scripture as to any relationship between the Amalekites on the one hand, and the Edomites or the Israelites on the other. That a mixture of the two former races occurred at a later period, would in this case be the only inference from Gen. xxxvi. 16, though many writers have considered that passage to refer to the origin of the whole nation, explaining Gen. xiv. 7, as a case of prolepsis. The physical character of the district, which the Amalekites occupied, necessitated a nomadic life, which they adopted to its fullest extent, taking their families with them even on their military expeditions (Judg. vi. 5). Their wealth consisted in flocks and herds. Mention is made of a "town" (1 Sam. xv. 5), but their towns could have been little more than stations, or nomadic enclosures. The kings or chieftains were perhaps distinguished by the hereditary title Agag (Num. xxiv. 7; 1 Sam. xv. 8). Two important routes led through the Amalekite district, viz., from Palestine to Egypt by the Isthmus of Suez, and to southern Asia and Africa by the Aelanitic arm of the Red Sea. It has been conjectured that the expedition of the four kings (Gen. xiv.) had for its object the opening of the latter route; and it is in connexion with the former that the Amalekites first came in contact with the Israelites, whose progress they attempted to stop, adopting a guerilla style of warfare (Deut. xxv. 18), but were signally defeated at REPHIDIM (Ex. xvii.). In union with the Canaanites they again attacked the Israelites on the borders of Palestine, and defeated them near Hormah (Num. xiv. 45). Thenceforward we hear of them only as a secondary power, at one time in league with the Moabites (Judg. iii. 13). When they were defeated by Ehud near Jericho; at another time in league with the Midianites (Judg. vi. 3) when they penetrated into the plains of Esdraelon, and were defeated by Gideon. Saul undertook an expedition against them, overrunning their whole district from Havilah to Shur, and inflicting an immense loss upon them (1 Sam. xv.). Their power was thenceforth broken, and they degenerated into a horde of banditti. Their destruction was completed by David (1 Sam. xxvii., xxx.).

Amam, a city in the south of Judah, named with Shema and Moladah in Josh. xv. 26 only.

Am'an. [HAMAN.] (Job. xiv. 2, Esth. x. 7, xii. 6, xiii. 3, 12, xiv. 17, xvi. 10, 17).

Am'ana, apparently a mountain in or near Lebanon—"from the head of Am'ana" (Cant. iv. 8). It is commonly assumed that this is the mountain in which the river Abana (2 K. v. 12) has its source, but in the absence of further research in the Lebanon this is mere assumption.

Amari'ah. 1. Father of Ahitub, according to 1 Chr. vi. 7, 52, and son of Merioth, in the line of the high-priests. 2. The high-priest in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xix. 11). He was the son of Azariah, and the fifth high-priest who succeeded Zadok (1 Chr. vi. 11). 3. The head of a Levitical house of the Kohathites in the time of David (1 Chr. xxiii. 19, xxiv. 23). 4. The head of one of the twenty-four courses of priests, which was named after him, in the times of David, of Hezekiah, and of Nehemiah (1 Chr. xxiv. 14; 2 Chr. xxxi. 15; Neh. x. 3, xii. 2, 13). In the first passage the name is written, Immer, but it seems to be the same name. Another form of the name is Imri (1 Chr. ix. 4), a man of Judah, of the sons of Bani. 5. One of the sons of Bani in the time of Ezra, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 42). 6. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. x. 3, xii. 2, 13). 7. A descendant of Pharez, the son of Judah (Neh. xi. 4), probably the same as IMRI in 1 Chr. ix. 4. 8. An ancestor of Zephaniah the prophet (Zeph. i. 1).

Amari'as. [AMARIAH I.] (1 Esd. viii. 3; 2 Esd. i. 2).

Am'sa. 1. Son of Ithra or Jether, by Abigail, David's sister (2 Sam. xvii. 25). He joined Absalom in his rebellion, and was by him appointed commander-in-chief in the place of Joab, by whom he was totally defeated in the forest of Ephraim (2 Sam. xviii. 6). When Joab incurred the displeasure of David for killing Absalom, David forgave the treason of Amasa, recognized him as his nephew, and appointed him Joab's successor (ix. 13). Joab afterwards, when they were both in pursuit of the rebel Sheba, pretending to salute Amasa, stabbed him with his sword (xx. 10), which he held concealed in his left hand. 2. A prince of Ephraim, son of Hadlai, in the reign of Ahaz (2 Chr. xxviii. 12).

Amasai. 1. A Kohathite, father of Mahath, and ancestor of Samuel and Heman the singer (1 Chr. vi. 25, 35). 2. Chief of the captains of Judah and Benjamin, who deserted to David while an outlaw at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 18). Whether the same as Amasa, David's nephew, is uncertain. 3. One of the priests who blew trumpets before the Ark, when David brought it from the house of Obededom (1 Chr. xv. 24). 4. Another Kohathite, father of another Mphath, in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxix. 12), unless the name is that of a family.

Amasha'i, son of Azareel, a priest in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. xi. 13), apparently the same as AMASIAI (1 Chr. ix. 12).

Amasi'ah, son of Zichri, and captain of 200,000 warriors of Judah, in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xvii. 16).

A'math. [HAMATH.]

Amath'is (1 Esd. ix. 29). [ATHLAI.]

Am'athis, "THE LAND OF," a district to the N. of Palestine (1 Macc. xii. 25). From the context it is evidently HAMATH.

Amasi'ah, son of Joash, and eighth king of Judah, reigned B.C. 837-809. He succeeded to the throne at the age of 25, on the murder of his father, and punished the murderers; sparing, however, their children, in accordance with Deut. xxiv. 16, as the 2nd book of Kings (xiv. 6) expressly informs us, thereby implying that the precept had not been generally observed. In order to restore his kingdom to the greatness of Jehoshaphat's days, he made war on the Edomites, defeated them in the valley of Salt, south of the Dead Sea, and took their capital, Selah or Petra, to which he gave the name of Jokteel, i. e. "God-subdued." We read in 2 Chr. xxv. 12-14, that the victorious Jews threw 10,000 Edomites from the cliffs, and that Amaziah performed religious ceremonies in honour of the gods of the country; an exception to the general character of his reign (cf. 2 K. xiv. 3, with 2 Chr. xxv. 2). In consequence of this he was overtaken by misfortune. Having already offended the Hebrews of the northern kingdom by sending back, in obedience to a prophet's direction, some mercenary troops whom he had hired from it, he had the foolish arrogance to challenge Joash, king of Israel, to battle, despising probably a sovereign whose strength had been exhausted by Syrian wars, and who had not yet made himself respected by the great successes recorded in 2 K. xiii. 25. But Judah was completely defeated, and Amaziah himself was taken prisoner, and conveyed by Joash to Jerusalem, which opened its gates to the conqueror. A portion of the wall of Jerusalem on the side towards the Israelitish frontier was broken down, and treasures and hostages were carried off to Samaria. Amaziah lived 15 years after the death of Joash; and in the 29th year of his reign was murdered by conspirators at Lachish, whither he had retired for safety from Jerusalem (2 Chr. xxv. 27). 2. A descendant of Simeon (1 Chr. iv. 34). 3. A Levite (1 Chr. vi. 45). 4. Priest of the golden calf at Bethel, who endeavoured to drive the prophet Amos from Israel into Judah (Am. vii. 10, 12, 14).

Ambassador. The earliest examples of ambassadors employed occur in the cases of Edom, Moab, and the Amorites (Num. x. 14, xxi. 21; Judg. xi. 17-19), afterwards in that of the fraudulent Gibeonites (Josh. ix. 4, &c.), and in the instances of civil strife mentioned Judg. xi. 12, and xx. 12. They are alluded to more frequently during and after the contact of the great adjacent monarchies of Syria, Babylon, &c., with those of Judah and Israel, as in the invasion of Sennacherib. They were usually men of high rank. In the case quoted the chief captain, the chief cup-bearer and chief of the eunuchs, were met by delegates of similar dignity from Hezekiah (2 K. xviii. 17, 18; see also Is. xxx. 4). Ambassadors are found to have been employed, not only on occasions of hostile challenge or insolent menace (2 K. xiv. 8; 1 K. xx. 2, 6), but of friendly compliment, of request for alliance or other aid, of submissive deprecation, and of curious inquiry (2 K. xiv. 8, xvi. 7, xviii. 14; 2 Chr. xxxii. 31).

Amber (Heb. chashmal) occurs only in Ez. i. 4, 27, viii. 2. It is usually supposed that the Hebrew word chashmal denotes a metal, and not the fossil resin called amber. The LXX. and Vulg. afford no certain clue to identification, for the word electron was used by the Greeks to express both amber and a certain metal, which was composed of gold and silver, and held in very high estimation by the ancients.

A'men, literally, "true;" and, used as a substantive, "that which is true," "truth" (Is. lxxv. 16); a word used in strong asseverations, fixing as it were the stamp of truth upon the assertion which it accompanied, and making it binding as an oath (comp. Num. v. 22). In Deut. xvii. 15-26, the people were to say "Amen," as the Levites pronounced each of the curses upon Mount Ebal, signifying by this their assent to the conditions under which the curses would be inflicted. In accordance with this usage we find that among the Rabbins, "Amen" involves the ideas of swearing, acceptance, and truthfulness. The first two are illustrated by the passages already quoted; the last by 1 K. i. 36; John iii. 3, 5, 11 (A. V. "verily"), in which the assertions are made with the solemnity of an oath, and then strengthened by the repetition of "Amen." "Amen" was the proper response of the person to whom an oath was administered (Neh. v. 13, viii. 6; 1 Chr. xvi. 36; Jer. xi. 5, marg.), and the Deity to whom appeal is made on such occasions is called "the God of Amen" (Is. lxxv. 16), as being a witness to the sincerity of the implied compact. With a similar significance Christ is called "the Amen, the faithful and true witness" (Rev. iii. 14; comp. John i. 14, xiv. 6; 2 Cor. i. 20). It is matter of tradition that in the Temple the "Amen" was not uttered by the people, but that, instead, at the conclusion of the priest's prayers, they responded, "Blessed be the name of the glory of his kingdom for ever and ever." Of this a trace is supposed to remain in the concluding sentence of the Lord's Prayer (comp. Rom. xi. 36). But in the synagogues and private houses it was customary for the people or members of the family who were present to say "Amen" to the prayers which were offered by the minister or the master of the house, and the custom remained in the early Christian Church (Matt. vi. 13; 1 Cor. xiv. 16). And not only public prayers, but those offered in private, and doxologies were appropriately concluded with "Amen" (Rom. ix. 5, xi. 36, xv. 33, xvi. 27; 2 Cor. xiii. 13, &c.).

Amethyst (Heb. achlâmâh). Mention is made of this precious stone, which formed the third in the third row of the high-priest's breastplate, in Ex. xxviii. 19, xxix. 12, "And the third row a figure, an agate, and an amethyst." It occurs also in the N. T. (Rev. xxi. 20) as the twelfth stone which garnished the foundations of the wall of the heavenly Jerusalem. Commentators generally are agreed that the amethyst is the stone indicated by the Hebrew word, an opinion which is abundantly supported by the ancient versions.—Modern mineralogists by the term amethyst usually understand the amethystine variety of quartz, which is crystalline and highly transparent.—The Greek word amethystos, the origin of the English amethyst, is usually derived from a, "not," and methuō, "to be intoxicated," this stone having been believed to have the power of dispelling drunkenness in those who wore it.

Ami, one of "Solomon's servants" (Ezr. ii. 57); called AMON in Neh. vii. 59, and ALLON, 1 Esd. v. 34.

Amin'adab (Matt. i. 4; Luke iii. 33). [AMMINADAB 1.]

• Amit'tai, father of the prophet Jonah (2 K. xiv. 25; Jon. i. 1).

Am'mah, the hill of, a hill "facing" Giah by the way of the wilderness of Gibeon, named as the point to which Job's pursuit of Abner after the death of Asahel extended (2 Sam. ii. 24).

Am'mi, i. e. as explained in the marg. of A. V. "my people," a figurative name, applied to the kingdom of Israel in token of God's reconciliation with them, in contrast with the equally significant name Loammî given by the prophet Hosea to his second son by Gomer the daughter of Diblaim (Hos. ii. 1). In the same manner Ruhamah contrasts with Lo-Ruhamah.

Am'midoi, in some copies AMMIDIOI, named in 1 Esdr. v. 20, among those who came up from Babylon with Zorobabel.

Am'miel. 1. The spy selected by Moses from the tribe of Dan (Num. xiii. 12). 2. Father of Machir of Lodebar (2 Sam. ix. 4, 5, xvii. 27). 3. Father of Bathsheba (1 Chr. iii. 5), called ELIAM in 2 Sam. xi. 3. He was the son of Ahithophel, David's prime minister. 4. The sixth son of Obed-Edom (1 Chr. xxvi. 5), and one of the doorkeepers of the Temple.

Am'mihud. 1. An Ephraimite, father of Elishama, the chief of the tribe at the time of the Exodus (Num. i. 10, ii. 18, vii. 48, 53, x. 22; 1 Chr. vii. 26), and, through him, ancestor of Joshua. 2. A Simeonite, father of Shemuel, prince of the tribe (Num. xxxiv. 20) at the time of the division of Canaan. 3. The father of Pedahel, prince of the tribe of Naphtali at the same time (Num. xxxiv. 28). 4. The father of Talmai, king of Geshur (2 Sam. xiii. 37). 5. A descendant of Pharez, son of Judah (1 Chr. ix. 4).

Ammin'adab. 1. Son of Rum or Aram, and father of Nahshon, or Naason (as it is written, Matt. i. 4; Luke iii. 32), who was the prince of the tribe of Judah, at the first numbering of Israel in the second year of the Exodus (Num. i. 7, ii. 3; Ruth iv. 19, 20; 1 Chr. ii. 10). He was the fourth generation after Judah the patriarch of his tribe, and one of the ancestors of JESUS CHRIST. 2. The chief of the 112 sons of Uzziel, a junior Levitical house of the family of the Kohathites (Ex. vi. 18), in the days of David, whom that king sent for, together with other chief fathers of Levitical houses, to bring the ark of God to Jerusalem (1 Chr. xv. 10-12). 3. In 1 Chr. vi. 22 Izhar, the son of Kohath, and father of Korah, is called Amminadab, but it is probably only a clerical error. In Cant. vi. 12, it is uncertain whether we ought to read, Amminadib, with the A. V., or my willing people, as in the margin.

Ammin'adib [AMMINADAB 3.] (Cant. vi. 12).

Ammishaddai, the father of Ahiezer, prince of the tribe of Dan at the time of the Exodus (Num. i. 12, ii. 25, vii. 66, 71, x. 25).

Ammis'abad, the son of Benaiah, who apparently acted as his father's lieutenant, and commanded the third division of David's army, which was on duty for the third month (1 Chr. xxvii. 6).

Am'mon, Am'monites, Children of Ammon, a people descended from Ben-Ammi, the son of Lot by his younger daughter (Gen. xix. 38; comp. Ps. lxxiii. 7, 8), as Moab was by the elder; and dating from the destruction of Sodom. The near relation between the two peoples indicated in the story of their origin continued throughout their existence (comp. Judg. x. 6; 2 Chr. xx. 1; Zeph. ii. 8, &c.). Indeed, so close was their union, and so near their identity, that each would appear to be occasionally spoken of under the name of the other. Unlike Moab, the precise position of the territory of the Ammonites is not ascertainable. In the earliest mention of them (Deut. ii. 20) they are said to have destroyed the Rephaim, whom they called the Zam-zummim, and to have dwelt in their place, Jabbok being their border (Num. xxi. 24; Deut. ii. 37, iii. 16). "Land" or "country" is, however, but rarely ascribed to them, nor is there any reference to those habits and circumstances of civilisation, which so constantly recur in the allusions to Moab (Is. xv., xvi.; Jer. xlviii.). On the contrary, we find everywhere traces of the fierce habits of marauders in their incursions (1 Sam. xi. 2; Am. i. 13), and a very high degree of crafty cruelty to their foes (Jer. xli. 6, 7; Jud. vii. 11, 12). It appears that Moab was the settled and civilised half of the nation of Lot, and that Ammon formed its predatory and Bedouin section. On the west of Jordan they never obtained a footing. Among the confusions of the times of the Judges we find them twice passing over; once with Moab and Amalek seizing Jericho, the "city of palm-trees" (Judg. iii. 13), and a second time "to fight against Judah and Benjamin, and the house of Ephraim;" but they quickly returned to the freer pastures of Gilead, leaving but one trace of their presence in the name of Chephar ha-Ammonai, "the hamlet of the Ammonites" (Josh. xviii. 24), situated in the portion of Benjamin somewhere at the head of the passes which lead up from the Jordan-valley. The hatred in which the Ammonites were held by Israel is stated to have arisen partly from their opposition, or, rather, their denial of assistance (Deut. xxiii. 4), to the Israelites on their approach to Canaan. But it evidently sprang mainly from their share in the affair of Balaam (Deut. xxiii. 4; Neh. xiii. 1). At the period of Israel's first approach to the south of Palestine the feeling towards Ammon is one of regard. The command is then "distress not the Moabites . . . distress not the children of Ammon, nor meddle with them" (Deut. ii. 9, 19; and comp. 37), and it is only from the subsequent transaction that we can account for the fact that Edom, who had also refused passage through his land, but had taken no part with Balaam, is punished with the ban of exclusion from the congregation for three generations, while Moab and Ammon are to be kept out for ten generations (Deut. xxiii. 3, 8). But whatever its origin it is certain that the animosity continued in force to the latest date. Subdued by Jephthah (Judg. xi. 33), and scattered with great slaughter by Saul (1 Sam. xi. 11)—and that not once only, for he "vexed" them "whithersoever he turned" (xiv. 47)—they enjoyed under his successor* a short respite, probably the result of the connexion of Moab with David (1 Sam. xxii. 3) and David's town, Bethlehem—where the memory of Ruth must have been still fresh. But this was soon brought to a close by the shameful treatment to which their king subjected the friendly messengers of David (2 Sam. x. 4; 1 Chr. xix. 4), and for which he destroyed their city, and inflicted on them the severest blows (2 Sam. xii.; 1 Chr. xx.). [RABBAH.] In the days of Jehoshaphat they made an incursion into Judah with the Moabites and the Maonites, but were signally repulsed, and so many killed that three days were occupied in spoiling the bodies (2 Chr. xx. 1-25). In Uzziah's reign they made incursions, and committed atrocities in Gilead (Am. i. 13); Jotham had wars with them, and exacted from them a heavy tribute of "silver (comp. "jewels," 2 Chr. xx. 25), wheat, and barley" (2 Chr. xxvii. 5). In the time of Jeremiah we find them in possession of the cities of Gad from which the Jews had been removed by Tiglath-Pileser (Jer. xlix., 1-6); and other incursions are elsewhere alluded to (Zeph. ii. 8, 9). At the time of the captivity many Jews took refuge among the Ammonites from the Assyrians (Jer. xl. 11), but no better feeling appears to have arisen, and on the return from Babylon, Tobiah the Ammonite and Sanballat a Moabite (of Horonaim, Jer. xlix.), were foremost among the opponents of Nehemiah's restoration. The last appearances of the Ammonites in the biblical narrative are in the books of Judith (v. vi. vii.) and of the Maccabees (1 Macc. v. 6, 30-43), and it has been already remarked that their chief characteristics—close alliance with Moab, hatred of Israel, and cunning cruelty—are maintained to the end.—The tribe was governed by a king (Judg. xi. 12, &c.; 1 Sam. xii. 12; 2 Sam. x. 1; Jer. xl. 14) and by "princes" (2 Sam. x. 3; 1 Chr. xix. 3). It has been conjectured that Nahash (1 Sam. xi. 1; 2 Sam. x. 2) was the official title of the king as Pharaoh was of the Egyptian monarchs; but this is without any clear foundation.—The divinity of the tribe was Molech, generally named in the O. T. under the altered form of Milcom—"the abomination of the children of Ammon"; and occasionally as Malcham. In more than one passage under the word rendered "their king" in the A. V. an allusion is intended to this idol. [MOLECH.]

Ammonitess, a woman of Ammonite race. Such were Naamah, the mother of Rehoboam, one of Solomon's foreign wives (1 K. xiv. 21, 31; 2 Chr. xii. 13), and Shimeath, whose son Zabab or Jozabab was one of the murderers of Joash (2 Chr. xxiv. 26). For allusions to these mixed marriages see 1 K. xi. 1, and Neh. xiii. 23.

Amnon. 1. Eldest son of David by Ahinoam the Jezreelitess, born in Hebron while his father's royalty was only acknowledged in Judah. He dishonoured his half-sister Tamar, and was in consequence murdered by her brother (2 Sam. xiii. 1-29). [ABSALOM.]—2. Son of Shimon (1 Chr. iv. 20).

Amok, a priest who returned with Zerubabel (Neh. xii. 7, 20).

Amon, an Egyptian divinity, whose name occurs in that of No Amon (Nah. iii. 8), in A. V. "populous No," or Thebes, also called No. [No.] The Greeks called this divinity Ammon. The ancient Egyptian name is Amen, which must signify "the hidden," from the verb amen, "to envelop, conceal." Amen was one of the eight gods of the first order, and chief of the triad of Thebes. He was worshipped at that city as Amen-Ra, or "Amen the sun," represented as a man wearing a cap with two high plumes. The Greeks identified Amon with Zeus, and he was therefore called Zeus Ammon and Jupiter Ammon.

A'mon. 1. King of Judah, son and successor of Manasseh, reigned two years from B.C. 642 to 640. Following his father's example, Amon devoted himself wholly to the service of false gods, but was killed in a conspiracy. The people avenged him by putting all the conspirators to death, and secured the succession to his son Josiah. To Amon's reign we must refer the terrible picture which the prophet Zephaniah gives of the moral and religious state of Jerusalem: idolatry supported by priests and prophets (i. 4, iii. 4), the poor ruthlessly oppressed (iii. 3), and shameless indifference to evil (iii. 11).—2. Prince or governor of Samaria in the reign of Ahab (1 K. xxii. 26; 2 Chr. xviii. 25). What was the precise nature of his office is not known. Perhaps the prophet Micaiah was entrusted to his custody as captain of the citadel.—3. See AMI.

Am'orite, the Am'orites, i. e. the dwellers on the summits—mountaineers—one of the chief nations who possessed the land of Canaan before its conquest by the Israelites. In the genealogical table of Gen. x. "the Amorite" is given as the fourth son of Canaan, with "Zidon, Heth [Hittite], the Jebusite," &c. As dwelling on the elevated portions of the country, they are contrasted with the Canaanites, who were the dwellers in the lowlands; and the two thus formed the main broad divisions of the Holy Land. "The Hittite, and the Jebusite, and the Amorite, dwell in the mountain [of Judah and Ephraim], and the Canaanite dwells by the sea [the lowlands of Philistia and Sharon] and by the 'side' of Jordan" [in the valley of the Arabah]—was the report of the first Israelites who entered the country (Num. xiii. 29; and see Josh. v. 1, x. 6, xi. 3; Deut. i. 7, 20, "mountain of the A.," 44). In the very earliest times (Gen. xiv. 7) they are occupying the barren heights west of the Dead Sea, at the place which afterwards bore the name of Engedi; hills in whose fastnesses, the "rocks of the wild goats," David afterwards took refuge from the pursuit of Saul (1 Sam. xxiii. 29, xxiv. 2)

[HAZEON-TAMAR.] From this point they stretched west to Hebron, where Abram was then dwelling under the "oak-grove" of the three brothers, Aner, Eshcol, and Mamre (Gen. xiv. 13; comp. xiii. 18). From this, their ancient seat, they may have crossed the valley of the Jordan, tempted by the high tablelands on the east, for there we next meet them at the date of the invasion of the country. Sihon, their then king, had taken the rich pasture-land south of the Jabbok, and had driven the Moabites, its former possessors, across the wide chasm of the Arnon (Num. xxi. 43, 26), which thenceforward formed the boundary between the two hostile peoples (Num. xxi. 13). The Israelites apparently approached from the south-east, keeping "on the other side" (that is on the east) of the upper part of the Arnon, which there bends southwards, so as to form the eastern boundary of the country of Moab. Their request to pass through his land was refused by Sihon (Num. xxi. 21; Deut. ii. 26); he "went out" against them (Num. xxi. 23; Deut. ii. 32), was killed with his sons and his people (Deut. ii. 33), and his land, cattle, and cities taken possession of by Israel (Num. xxi. 24, 25, 31; Deut. ii. 34-36). This rich tract, bounded by the Jabbok on the north, the Arnon on the south, Jordan on the west, and "the wilderness" on the east (Judg. xi. 21, 22), was, perhaps, in the most special sense the "land of the Amorites" (Num. xxi. 31; Josh. xii. 2, 3, xiii. 9; Judg. xi. 21, 22); but their possessions are distinctly stated to have extended to the very foot of Hermon (Deut. iii. 8, iv. 48), embracing "all Gilead and all Bashan" (iii. 10), with the Jordan valley on the east of the river (iv. 49), and forming together the land of the "two kings of the Amorites," Sihon and Og (Deut. xxxi. 4; Josh. ii. 10, ix. 10, xxiv. 12). After the passage of the Jordan we again meet with Amorites disputing with Joshua the conquest of the west country (Josh. x. 5, &c., xi. 3, &c.). After the conquest of Canaan nothing is heard in the Bible of the Amorites, except the occasional mention of their name among the early inhabitants of the country.

Amos. 1. A native of Tekoa in Judah, about six miles S. of Bethlehem, originally a shepherd and dresser of sycamore-trees, who was called by God's Spirit to be a prophet, although not trained in any of the regular prophetic schools (i. 1, vii. 14, 15). He travelled from Judah into the northern kingdom of Israel or Ephraim, and there exercised his ministry, apparently not for any long time. His date cannot be later than the 15th year of Uzziah's reign (B.C. 808); for he tells us that he prophesied "in the reigns of Uzziah king of Judah, and Jeroboam the son of Joash king of Israel, two years before the earthquake." This earthquake (also mentioned Zech. xiv. 5) cannot have occurred after the 17th year of Uzziah, since Jeroboam II. died in the 15th of that king's reign, which therefore is the latest year fulfilling the three chronological indications furnished by the prophet himself. But his ministry probably took place at an earlier period of Jeroboam's reign, perhaps about the middle of it, for on the one hand Amos speaks of the conquests of this warlike king as completed (vi. 13; cf. 2 K. xiv. 25), and on the other the Assyrians, who towards the end of his reign were approaching Palestine (Hos. x. 6, xi. 5), do not seem as yet to have caused any alarm in the country. Amos predicts indeed that Israel and other neighbouring nations will be punished by certain wild conquerors from the North (i. 5, v. 27, vi. 14), but does not name them, as if they were still unknown or unheeded. In this prophet's time Israel was at the height of power, wealth, and security but infected by the crimes to which such a state is liable. The poor were oppressed (viii. 4), the ordinances of religion thought burdensome (viii. 5), and idleness, luxury, and extravagance were general (iii. 15). The source of these evils was idolatry, that of the golden calves. Calf-worship was specially practised at Bethel, where was a principal temple and summer palace for the king (vii. 13; cf. iii. 15), also at Gilgal, Dan, and Beersheba in Judah (iv. 4, v. 5, viii. 14), and was offensively united with the true worship of the Lord (v. 14, 21-23; cf. 2 K. xvii. 33). Amos went to rebuke this at Bethel itself, but was compelled to return to Judah by the high-priest Amaziah, who procured from Jeroboam an order for his expulsion from the northern kingdom. The book of the prophecies of Amos seems divided into four principal portions closely connected together. (1) From i. 1 to ii. 3 he denounces the sins of the nations bordering on Israel and Judah, as a preparation for (2), in which, from ii. 4 to vi. 14, he describes the state of those two kingdoms, especially the former. This is followed by (3) vii. 1-ix. 10, in which, after reflecting on the previous prophecy, he relates his visit to Bethel, and sketches the impending punishment of Israel which he predicted to Amaziah. After this in (4) he rises to a loftier and more evangelical strain, looking forward to the time when the hope of the Messiah's kingdom will be fulfilled, and His people forgiven and established in the enjoyment of God's blessings to all eternity. The chief peculiarity of the style consists in the number of allusions to natural objects and agricultural occupations, as might be expected from the early life of the author. See i. 3, ii. 13, iii. 4, 5, iv. 2, 7, 9, v. 8, 19, vi. 12, vii. 1, ix. 3, 9, 13, 14. The references to it in the N. T. are two: v. 25, 26, 27 is quoted by St. Stephen in Acts vii. 42, 43, and ix. 11 by St. James in Acts xv. 16. As the book is evidently not a series of detached prophecies, but logically and artistically connected in its several parts, it was probably written by Amos as we now have it after his return to Tekoa from his mission to Bethel.—

2. Son of Naum, in the genealogy of Jesus Christ (Luke iii. 25).

Amos, father of the prophet Isaiah, and, according to Rabbinical tradition, brother of Amaziah king of Judah (2 K. xix. 2, 20, xx. 1; 2 Chr. xxvi. 22, xxxii. 20, 32; Is. i. 1, ii. 1, xiii. 1, xx. 2, xxxvii. 2, 21, xxxviii. 1).

Amphipolis, a city of Macedonia, through which Paul and Silas passed on their way from Philippi to Thessalonica (Acts xvii. 1). It was distant 33 Roman miles from Philippi. It was called Amphipolis, because the river Strymon flowed almost round the town. It stood upon an eminence on the left or eastern bank of this river, just below its egress from the lake Cercinitis, and at the distance of about three miles from the sea. It was a colony of the Athenians, and was memorable in the Peloponnesian war for the battle fought under its walls, in which both Brasidas and Cleon were killed. Its site is now occupied by a village called Neokhorio, in Turkish Jeni-Keni, or "New Town."

Amphipolis.

Am'plias, a Christian at Rome (Rom. xvi. 8).

Am'ram. 1. A Levite of the family of the Kohathites, and father of Moses, Aaron, and Miriam (Ex. vi. 18, 20; Num. iii. 19; 1 Chr. vi. 2, 3, 18). He is called the "son" of Kohath, but it is evident that in the genealogy several generations must have been omitted; for from Joseph to Joshua ten generations are recorded, while from Levi to Moses there are but three. Again, the Kohathites in the time of Moses mustered 8600 males, from a month old and upward (Num. iii. 28), a number to which they could not have attained in two generations from Kohath. The chief difficulty which attends this explanation is the fact that Jochebed, the wife and aunt of Amram, is described as a daughter of Levi, who was born to him in Egypt (Num. xxvi. 59); but it may be avoided by supposing that by "Levi," the tribe and not the individual is intended.—2. A son of Dishon and descendant of Seir (1 Chr. i. 41); properly "Haimran" = HEMDAN in Gen. xxvi. 26.—3. One of the sons of Bani in the time of Ezra, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 34). Called OMAERUS in 1 Esdr. ix. 34.

Am'ramites. A branch of the great Kohathite family of the tribe of Levi (Num. iii. 27; 1 Chr. xxvi. 23); descended from Amram the father of Moses.

Am'raphel, perhaps a Hamite king of Shinar or Babylonia, who joined the victorious incursion of the Elamite Chedorlaomer against the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah and the cities of the plain (Gen. xiv.).

Amulets were ornaments, gems, scrolls, &c. worn as preservatives against the power of enchantments, and generally inscribed with mystic forms or characters. The word does not occur in the A. V., but the "earrings" in Gen. xxxv. 4 were obviously connected with idolatrous worship, and were probably amulets taken from the bodies of the slain Shechemites. They are subsequently mentioned among the spoils of Midian (Judg. viii. 24), and perhaps their objectionable character was the reason why Gideon asked for them. Again, in Hos. ii. 13, "decking herself with earrings" is mentioned as one of the signs of the "days of Baalim." The earrings" in Is. iii. 20 were also amulets. The Jews were particularly addicted to amulets, and the only restriction placed by the Rabbis on their use was, that none but approved amulets (i. e. such as were known to have cured three persons) were to be worn on the Sabbath.

Am'zi. 1. A Levite of the family of Merari, and ancestor of Ethan the minstrel (1 Chr. vi. 46).—

2. A priest, whose descendant Adaiah with his brethren did the service for the temple in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. xi. 12).

A'nab, a town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 50), named, with Debir and Hebron, as once belonging to the Anakim (Josh. xi. 21). It has retained its ancient name, and lies among the hills about 10 miles S.S.W. of Hebron, close to Shoco and Eshtemoa (Rob. i. 494).

An'ael, brother of Tobit (Tob. i. 21).

A'nah, the son of Zibeon, the son of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxvi. 20, 24), a "duke" or prince of his tribe, and father of Aholibamah, one of the wives of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 2, 14, 25). There is no reason to suppose that he is other than the same Anah who found the "hot springs" (not "mules," as in the A. V.) in the desert as he fed the asses of Zibeon his father, though Bunsen considers him a distinct personage, the son of Seir and brother of Zibeon (Bibelwerk, v. 83). The chief difficulty connected with the identification of Anah arises from the various names which are given to Esau's wives. In the Edomite genealogy of Gen. xxxvi. 2, Aholibamah is described as "the daughter of Anah, the daughter ('son' LXX. and Sam.) of Zibeon the Hivite;" the word "daughter" in the second case referring still to Aholibamah, and not to Anah, as is evident from ver. 25. But in Gen. xxvi. 34, the same wife of Esau is called Judith, the daughter of Beeri the Hittite. If therefore Judith is another name of Aholibamah, Beeri the Hittite is apparently identical with Anah the Hivite, and on this supposition there arises a twofold discrepancy. Anah was not a Hivite but a Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 20); this difficulty may be removed by attributing it to a mistake of the transcriber, or by supposing with Hengstenberg that Anah belonged to that branch of the Hivites, who from living in caves were called Horites or Troglodytes. The former is probably the true solution, and the Alex. MS. of the LXX. has adopted the reading "Horite" in Gen. xxvi. 2. That Anah and Beeri are the same person, is unhesitatingly affirmed by Hengstenberg, who conjectures that from the circumstance of his discovering the hot-springs in the wilderness Anah obtained the name Beeri, "the man of the wells," and that the designation "Hittite," in Gen. xxvi., is a general term, equivalent to "Canaanite" (comp. Gen. xxvii. 46 with xxviii. 1). South-east of the Dead Sea, in the country of the Horites, are the hot-springs of the Wady Al-Akhsa, the ancient Callirhoe.

Anah'arath, a place within the border of Issachar, named with Shihon and Rabbith (Jos. xix. 19).

Anai'ah. 1. Probably a priest: one of those who stood on Ezra's right hand as he read the law to the people (Neh. viii. 4). He is called ANANIAS in 1 Esdr. ix. 43.—2. One of "the heads of the peoples" who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 22).

Anak. [ANAKIM.]

Anakim, a race of giants, descendants of Arba (Josh. xv. 13, xxi. 11), dwelling in the southern part of Canaan, and particularly at Hebron, which from their progenitor received the name of "city of Arba." Besides the general designation Anakim, they are variously called sons of Anak (Num. xiii. 33), descendants of Anak (Num. xiii. 22), and sons of Anakim (Deut. i. 28). These designations serve to show that we must regard Anak as the name of the race rather than that of an individual, and this is confirmed by what is said of Arba, their progenitor, that he "was a great man among the Anakim" (Josh. xiv. 15). The race appears to have been divided into three tribes or families, bearing the names Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmai. Though the warlike appearance of the Anakim had struck the Israelites with terror in the time of Moses (Num. xiii. 28; Deut. ix. 2), they were nevertheless dispossessed by Joshua, and utterly driven from the land, except a small remnant that found refuge in the Philistine cities, Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod (Josh. xi. 21, 22). Their chief city Hebron became the possession of Caleb, who is said to have driven out from it the three sons of Anak mentioned above, that is the three families or tribes of the Anakim (Josh. xv. 14; Judg. i. 20). After this time they vanish from history.

Ananim, a Mizraite people or tribe, respecting the settlements of which nothing certain is known (Gen. x. 13; 1 Chr. i. 11). Judging from the position of the other Mizraite peoples, this one probably occupied some part of Egypt, or of the adjoining region of Africa, or possibly of the south-west of Palestine.

Anam'melech, one of the idols worshipped by the colonists introduced into Samaria from Sepharvaim (2 K. xvii. 31). He was worshipped with rites resembling those of Molech, children being burnt in his honour, and is the companion-god to ADAMMELECH. As Adrammelech is the male power of the sun, so Anammelech is the female power of the sun.

Anan. 1. One of "the heads of the people" who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 26).—2. = HANAN'4 (1 Esdr. v. 30).

Anan'i, the seventh son of Elioenai, descended through Zerubbabel from the royal line of Judah (1 Chr. iii. 24).

Anani'ah. Probably a priest, and ancestor of Azariah, who assisted in rebuilding the city wall in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 23).*

Anani'ah, a place, named between Nob and Hazor, in which the Benjamites lived after their return from captivity (Neh. xi. 32).

Anani'as. 1. The sons of Ananias to the number of 101, are enumerated in 1 Esdr. v. 16 as having returned with Zerobabel. No such name occurs in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah.—2. (1 Esdr. ix. 21). [HANANI 3.]—3. (1 Esdr. ix. 29). [HANANIAH 9.]—4. (1 Esdr. ix. 43). [ANANIAH 1.]—5. (1 Esdr. ix. 48). [HANAN 5.]—6. Father of Azariah, whose name was assumed by the angel Raphael (Tob. v. 12, 13).—7. Ancestor of Judah (Jud. viii. 1).—8. Shadrach (Song of 3 Ch. 66 1 Macc. ii. 59). [HANANIAH 7.]

Ananias. 1. A high-priest in Acts. xxiii. 2-5. xxiv. 1. He was the son of Nebedneus, succeeded Joseph son of Canydus, and preceded Ismael son of Phabi. He was nominated to the office by Herod king of Chalcis, in A.D. 48; and in A.D. 52 sent to Rome by the prefect Ummidius Quadratus to answer before the Emperor Claudius a charge of oppression brought by the Samaritans. He appears, however, not to have lost his office, but to have resumed it on his return. He was deposed shortly before Felix left the province; but still had great power, which he used violently and lawlessly. He was at last assassinated by the sicarii at the beginning of the last Jewish war.—2. A disciple at Jerusalem, husband of Sapphira (Acts v. 1-11.). Having sold his goods for the benefit of the church, he kept back a part of the price, bringing to the apostles the remainder, as if it were the whole, his wife also being privy to the scheme. St. Peter, being enabled by the power of the Spirit to see through the fraud, denounced him as having lied to the Holy Ghost, i. e. having attempted to pass upon the Spirit resident in the apostles an act of deliberate deceit. On hearing this, Ananias fell down and expired. That this incident was no mere physical consequence of St. Peter's severity of tone, as some of the German writers have maintained, distinctly appears by the direct sentence of a similar death pronounced by the same apostle upon his wife Sapphira a few hours after. [SAPPHIRA.] It is of course possible that Ananias's death may have been an act of divine justice unlooked for by the apostle, as there is no mention of such an intended result in his speech; but in the case of the wife, such an idea is out of the question.—3. A Jewish disciple at Damascus (Acts ix. 10-17), of high repute, "a devout man according to the law, having a good report of all the Jews which dwelt there" (Acts xxii. 12). Being ordered by the Lord in a vision, he sought out Saul during the period of blindness and dejection which followed his conversion, and announced to him his future commission as a preacher of the Gospel, conveying to him at the same time, by the laying on of his hands, the restoration of sight, and commanding him to arise, and be baptized, and wash away his sins, calling on the name of the Lord. Tradition makes him to have been afterwards bishop of Damascus, and to have died by martyrdom.

Anan'iel, forefather of Tobit (Tob. i. 1).

Anath, father of Shamgar (Judg. iii. 31, v. 6).

Anath'ema, which literally means a thing sue-pendent, is the equivalent of the Hebrew word signifying a thing or person devoted. Any object so devoted to the Lord was irredeemable: if an inanimate object, it was to be given to the priests (Num. xviii. 14); if a living creature or even a man, it was to be slain (Lev. xxvii. 28, 29). Generally speaking a vow of this description was taken only with respect to the idolatrous nations who were marked out for destruction by the special decree of Jehovah, as in Num. xxi. 2; Josh. vi. 17: but occasionally the vow was made indefinitely, and involved the death of the innocent, as is illustrated in the cases of Jephthah's daughter (Judg. xi. 31), and Jonathan (1 Sam. xiv. 24) who was only saved by the interposition of the people. The breach of such a vow on the part of any one directly or indirectly participating in it was punished with death (Josh. vii. 25). The word anathema frequently occurs in St. Paul's writings, and is generally translated accursed. Many expositors have regarded his use of it as a technical term for judicial excommunication. That the word was so used in the early Church there can be no doubt, but an examination of the passages in which it occurs shows that it had acquired a more general sense as expressive either of strong feeling (Rom. ix. 3) or of dislike and condemnation (1 Cor. xii. 3, xvi. 22; Gal. i. 9).

An'athoth. 1. Son of Becher, a son of Benjamin (1 Chr. vii. 8).—2. One of the heads of the people who signed the covenant in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. x. 19); unless, as is not unlikely, the name stands for "the men of Anathoth" enumerated in Neh. vii. 27.

An'athoth, a priests' city, belonging to the tribe of Benjamin, with "suburbs" (Josh. xxi. 18; 1 Chr. vi. 60). Hither to his "fields" Abiathar was banished by Solomon after the failure of his attempt to put Adonijah on the throne (1 K. ii. 26). This was the native place of Abiezer, one of David's 30 captains (2 Sam. xxiii. 27; 1 Chr. xi. 28, xxvii. 12), and of Jehu, another of the mighty men (1 Chr. xii. 3); and here, "of the priests that were in Anathoth," Jeremiah was born (Jer. i. 1, xi. 21, 23, xxix. 27, xxxii. 7, 8, 9). The "men" of A. returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 23; Neh. vii. 27; 1 Esdr. v. 18). Anathoth lay on or near the great road from the north to Jerusalem (Is. x. 30), and is placed by Eusebius and Jerome at 3 miles from the city. Its position has been discovered by Robinson at Anáta, on a broad ridge $1\frac{1}{2}$ hour N.N.E. from Jerusalem. The cultivation of the priests survives in tilled fields of grain, with figs and olives. There are the remains of walls and strong foundations, and the quarries still supply Jerusalem with building stone.

Anchor. [SHIP.]

An'drew, one among the first called of the Apostles of our Lord (John i. 40; Matt. iv. 18); brother (whether elder or younger is uncertain) of Simon Peter (ibid.). He was of Bethsaida, and had been a disciple of John the Baptist. On hearing Jesus a second time designated by him as the Lamb of God, he left his former master, and, in company with another of John's disciples, attached himself to our Lord. By his means his brother Simon was brought to Jesus (John i. 41). The apparent discrepancy in Matt. iv. 18 ff., Mark i. 16 ff., where the two appear to have been called together, is no real one; St. John relating the first introduction of the brothers to Jesus, the other Evangelists their formal call to follow Him in his ministry. In the catalogue of the Apostles, Andrew appears, in Matt. x. 2, Luke vi. 14, second next after his brother Peter; but in Mark iii. 16, Acts i. 13, fourth, next after the three, Peter, James, and John, and in company with Philip. And this appears to have been his real place of dignity among the Apostles; for in Mark xiii. 8, we find Peter, James, John, and Andrew, inquiring privately of our Lord about His coming; and in John xii. 22, when certain Greeks wished for an interview with Jesus, they applied through Andrew, who consulted Philip, and in company with him made the request known to our Lord. This last circumstance, combined with the Greek character of both their names, may perhaps point to some slight shade of Hellenistic connexion on the part of the two Apostles; though it is extremely improbable that any of the Twelve were Hellenists in the proper sense. On the occasion of the five thousand in the wilderness wanting food, it is Andrew who points out the little lad with the five barley loaves and the two fishes. Scripture relates nothing of him beyond these scattered notices. Except in the catalogue (i. 13), his name does not occur once in the Acts. The traditions about him are various. Eusebius makes him preach in Scythia; Jerome and Theodoret in Achaia (Greece); Nicephorus in Asia Minor and Thrace. He is said to have been crucified at Patrae in Achaia. Some ancient writers speak of an apocryphal Acts of Andrew.

Andron'icus. 1. An officer left as viceroy (2 Macc. iv. 31) in Antioch by Antiochus Epiphanes during his absence (B.C. 171). At the instigation of Menelaus, Andronicus put to death the high-priest Onias. This murder excited general indignation; and on the return of Antiochus, Andronicus was publicly degraded and executed (2 Macc. iv. 31-38).—2. Another officer of Antiochus Epiphanes who was left by him on Garizim (2 Macc. v. 23), probably in occupation of the temple there.—3. A Christian at Rome, saluted by St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 7), together with Junias. The two are called by him his relations and fellow-captives, and of note among the Apostles, using that term probably in the wider sense.

An'em, a city of Issachar, with "suburbs," belonging to the Gershonites (1 Chr. vi. 73).

An'ner, a city of Manasseh west of Jordan, with "suburbs" given to the Kohathites (1 Chr. vi. 70).

An'ner, one of the three Amorite chiefs of Hebron who aided Abraham in the pursuit after the four invading kings (Gen. xiv. 13, 24).

Aneth'othite (2 Sam. xxiii. 27), Anet'othite (1 Chr. xxvii. 12), and An'tothite (1 Chr. xi. 28, xii. 3), an inhabitant of Anathoth of the tribe of Benjamin.

Anet'othite. [ANETHOTHITE.]

Angels. By the word "angels" (i. e. "messengers" of God) we ordinarily understand a race of spiritual beings, of a nature exalted far above that of man, although infinitely removed from that of God, whose office is "to do Him service in heaven, and by His appointment to succour and defend men on earth." 1. Scriptural use of the word.—There are many passages in which the expression the "angel of God," "the angel of Jehovah," is certainly used for a manifestation of God himself. This is especially the case in the earlier books of the Old Testament, and may be seen at once by a comparison of Gen. xxii. 11 with 12, and of Ex. iii. 2 with 6 and 14; where He, who is called the "angel of Jehovah" in one verse, is called "God," and even "Jehovah" in those which follow, and accepts the worship due to God alone. (Contrast Rev. xix. 10, xxii. 9.) See also Gen. xvi. 7, 13, xxxi. 11, 13, xlviii. 15, 16 Num. xxii. 22, 32, 35, and comp. Is. lxiii. 9 with Ex. xxxiii. 14, &c. &c. It is to be observed also, that, side by side with these expressions, we read of God's being manifested in the form of man; as to Abraham at Mamre (Gen. xviii. 2, 22, comp. xix. 1), to Jacob at Peniel (Gen. xxxii. 24, 30), to Joshua at Gilgal (Josh. v. 13, 15), &c. It is hardly to be doubted that both sets of passages refer to the same kind of manifestation of the Divine Presence. This being the case, since we know that "no man hath seen God" (the Father) "at any time," and that "the only-begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father He hath revealed Him" (John i. 18), the inevitable inference is that by the "Angel of the Lord" in such passages is meant He, who is from the beginning the "Word," i. e. the Manifestor or Revealer of God. These appearances are evidently "foreshadowings of the Incarnation." By these God the Son manifested Himself from time to time in that human nature which He united to the Godhead for ever in the Virgin's womb. Besides this, which is the highest application of the word "angel," we find the phrase used of any messengers of God, such as the prophets (Is. xlii. 19; Hag. i. 13; Mal. iii. 1), the priests (Mal. ii. 7), and the rulers of the Christian churches (Rev. i. 20).—II. Nature of angels.—Little is said of their nature as distinct from their office. They are termed "spirits" (as in Heb. i. 14); but it is not asserted that the angelic nature is incorporeal. The contrary seems expressly implied by the words in which our Lord declares, that, after the Resurrection, men shall be "like the angels" (Luke xx. 36); because (as is elsewhere said, Phil. iii. 21) their bodies, as well as their spirits, shall have been made entirely like His. It may also be noticed that the glorious appearance, ascribed to the angels in Scripture (as in Dan. x. 6) is the same as that which shone out in our Lord's Transfiguration, and in which St. John saw him clothed in heaven (Rev. i. 14-16); and moreover, that, whenever angels have been made manifest to man, it has always been in human form (as in Gen. xviii., xix.; Luke xxiv. 4; Acts i. 10, &c. &c.). The very fact that the titles "sons of God" (Job i. 6, xxxvii. 7; Dan. iii. 25 comp. with 28), and "gods" (Ps. viii. 5, xcvi. 7), applied to them, are also given to men (see Luke iii. 38; Ps. lxxxii. 6, and comp. our Lord's application of this last passage in John x. 34-37), points in the same way to a difference only of degree, and an identity of kind, between the human and the angelic nature. The angels are therefore revealed to us as beings, such as man might be and will be when the power of sin and death is removed, partaking in their measure of the attributes of God, Truth, Purity, and Love, because always beholding His face (Matt. xviii. 10), and therefore being "made like Him" (1 John iii. 2). This, of course, implies finiteness, and therefore (in the strict sense) "imperfection" of nature, and constant progress, both moral and intellectual, through all eternity. Such imperfection, contrasted with the infinity of God, is expressly ascribed to them in Job iv. 18; Matt. xxiv. 36; 1 Pet. i. 12. This finiteness of nature implies capacity of temptation; and accordingly we hear of "fallen angels." Of the nature of their temptation and the circumstances of their fall, we know absolutely nothing. All that is certain is, that they "left their first estate," and that they are now "angels of the devil" (Matt. xxv. 41; Rev. xii. 7, 9), partaking therefore of the falsehood, uncleanness, and hatred, which are his peculiar characteristics (John viii. 44). On the other hand, the title especially assigned to the angels of God, that of the "holy ones" (see Dan. iv. 13, 23, viii. 13; Matt. xxv. 31), is precisely the one which is given to those men who are renewed in Christ's image, but which belongs to them in actuality and in perfection only hereafter. (Comp. Heb. ii. 10, v. 9, xii. 23).—III. Office of the angels.—Of their office in heaven, we have, of course, only vague prophetic glimpses (as in 1 K. xxii. 19; Is. vi. 1-3; Dan. vii. 9, 10; Rev. vi. 11, &c.), which show us nothing but a never-ceasing adoration. Their office towards man is far more fully described to us. They are represented as being, in the widest sense, agents of God's Providence, natural and supernatural, to the body and to the soul. The operations of nature are spoken of, as under angelic guidance fulfilling the Will of God. Thus the pestilences which slew the firstborn (Ex. xii. 23; Heb. xi. 28), the disobedient people in the wilderness (1 Cor. x. 10), the Israelites in the days of David (2 Sam. xiv. 16; 1 Chr. xxi. 16), and the army of Sennacherib (2 K. xix. 35), as also the plague which cut off Herod (Acts xii. 23) are plainly spoken of as the work of the "angel of the Lord." Nor can the mysterious declarations of the Apocalypse, by far the most numerous of all, be resolved into mere poetical imagery. (See especially Rev. viii. and ix.) More particularly, however, angels are spoken of as ministers of what is called supernatural Providence of God; as agents in the great scheme of the spiritual redemption and sanctification of man, of which the Bible is the record. In the Book of Genes there is no notice of angelic appearance till after the call of Abraham. Then, as the book is the history of the chosen family, so the angels mingle with and watch over its family life, entertained by Abraham and by Lot (Gen. xviii. xix.), guiding Abraham's servant to Padan-Aram (xix. 7, 40), seen by the fugitive Jacob at Bethel (xxviii. 12), and welcoming his return at Mahanaim (xxxii. 1). Their ministry hallows domestic life, in its trials and its blessings alike, and is closer, more familiar, and less awful than in aftertimes. (Contrast Gen. xviii. with Judg. vi. 21, 22. xiii. 16, 22.) In the subsequent history, that of a chosen nation, the angels are represented more as ministers of wrath and mercy. It is, moreover, to be observed, that the records of their appearance belong especially to two periods, that of the Judges, and that of the captivity, which were transition periods in Israelitish history; the former one destitute of direct revelation or prophetic guidance, the latter one of special trial and unusual contact with heathenism. During the lives of Moses and Joshua there is no record of the appearance of created angels, and only obscure reference to angels at all. In the Book of Judges angels appear at once to rebuke idolatry (ii. 1-4), to call Gideon (vi. 11, &c.) and consecrate Samson (xiii. 3, &c.), to the work of deliverance. The prophetic office begins with Samuel, and immediately angelic guidance is withheld, except when needed by the prophets themselves (1 K. xix. 5; 2 K. vi. 17). During the prophetic, and kingly period, angels are spoken of only (as noticed above) as ministers of God in the operations of nature. But in the captivity, when the Jews were in the presence of foreign nations, each claiming its tutelary deity, then to the prophets Daniel and Zechariah, angels are revealed in a fresh light, as watching, not only over Jerusalem, but also over heathen kingdoms, under the Providence, and to work out the designs, of the Lord. (See Zech. passim, and Dan. iv. 13, 23, x. 10, 13, 20, 21, &c.) The Incarnation marks a new epoch of angelic ministration. "The Angel of Jehovah," the Lord of all created angels, having now descended from heaven to earth, it was natural that His servants should continue to do Him service there. Whether to predict and glorify His birth itself (Matt. i. 20; Luke i. ii.), to minister to Him after his temptation and agony (Matt. iv. 11; Luke xxii. 43), or to declare His resurrection and triumphant ascension (Matt. xxviii. 2; John xx. 12; Acts i. 10, 11), they seem now to be indeed "ascending and descending on the Son of Man," almost as though transferring to earth the ministrations of heaven. The New Testament is the history of the Church of Christ, every member of which is united to Him. Accordingly, the angels are revealed now, as "ministering spirits" to each individual member of Christ for His spiritual guidance and aid (Heb. i. 14). The records of their visible appearance are but unfrequent (Acts v. 19, viii. 26, x. 3, xii. 7, xxvii. 23); but their presence and their aid are referred to familiarly, almost as things of course, ever after the Incarnation. They are spoken of as watching over Christ's little ones (Matt. xviii. 10), as rejoicing over a penitent sinner (Luke xv. 10), as present in the worship of Christians (1 Cor. xi. 10), and, perhaps, bringing their prayers before God (Rev. viii. 3, 4), and as bearing the souls of the redeemed into Paradise (Luke xvi. 22). In one word they are Christ's ministers of grace now, as they shall be of judgment hereafter (Matt. xiii. 39, 41, 49, xvi. 27, xxiv. 31, &c.). That there are degrees of the angelic nature, fallen and unfallen, and special titles and agencies belonging to each, is clearly declared by St. Paul (Eph. i. 21; Rom. viii. 38), but what their general nature is, it is useless to speculate. For what little is known of this special nature see CHERUBIM, SERAPHIM, MICHAEL, GABRIEL.

Angling. [FISHING.]

An'iam, a Manassite, son of Shemidah (1 Chr. vii. 19).

An'im, a city in the mountains of Judah, named with Eshtemoth (Es-Semueh), and Goshen (Josh. xv. 50). Eusebius and Jerome mention a place of this name in Daroma, 9 miles south of Hebron.

Anise. (Gr. anethon.) This word occurs only in Matt. xxiii. 23, "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithe of mint and anise and cummin." It is by no means a matter of certainty whether the anise (Pimpinella anisum, Lin.) or the dill (Anethum graveolens) is here intended, though the probability is more in favour of the latter plant. Both the dill and the anise belong to the natural order Umbelliferae, and are much alike in external character; the seeds of both, moreover, are and have been long employed in medicine and cookery, as condiments and carminatives. Dr. Royle is decidedly in favour of the dill being the proper translation, and says that the anethum is more especially a genus of Eastern cultivation than the other plant.

Common Dill. (Anethum graveolens.)

Anklet. This word does not occur in the A. V., but is referred to in Is. iii. 16, 18, 20, where the prophet speaks of "the tinkling ornaments" about the feet of the daughters of Zion, and of the "ornaments of the legs." They were fastened to the ankle-band of each leg, were as common as bracelets and armlets, and made of much the same materials; the pleasant jingling and tinkling which they made as they knocked against each other, was no doubt one of the reasons why they were admired ("the bravery of their tinkling ornaments"). They are still worn in the East, and Lane quotes from a song, in allusion to the pleasure caused by their sound, "the ringing of thine anklets has deprived me of reason." Hence Mohammed forbade them in public; "let them not make a noise with their feet, that the ornaments which they hide may [thereby] be discovered" (Koran, xxiv. 31).

An'na, occurs in Punic as the name of the sister of Dido. 1. The wife of Tobit (Tob. i. 9 ff.).—2. A "prophetess" in Jerusalem at the time of our Lord's presentation in the Temple (Luke ii. 36). She was of the tribe of Asher.

An'naas, 1 Esd. v. 23. [SENAAN.]

An'nas (1 Esd. ix. 32). A corruption of HARIM (Ezr. x. 31).

An'nas, a high-priest of the Jews. He was son of one Seth, and was appointed high-priest in the year A.D. 7, by Quirinus, the imperial governor of Syria; but was obliged by Valerius Gratus, procurator of Judaea, to give way to Ismael, son of Phabi, at the beginning of the reign of Tiberius, A.D. 14. But soon Ismael was succeeded by Eleazar, son of Annas; then followed, after one year, Simon, son of Camithus, and then, after another year (about A.D. 25), Joseph Caiaphas, son-in-law of Annas (John xviii. 13). But in Luke iii. 2, Annas and Caiaphas are both called high-priests, Annas being mentioned first. Our Lord's first hearing (John xviii. 13) was before Annas, who then sent him bound to Caiaphas. In Acts iv. 6, Annas is plainly called the high-priest, and Caiaphas merely named with others of his family. It is no easy matter to give an account of the seemingly capricious applications of this title. Some maintain that the two, Annas and Caiaphas, were together at the head of the Jewish people,—Caiaphas as actual high-priest, Annas as president of the Sanhedrim. Others again suppose that Annas held the office of sagan, or substitute of the high-priest, mentioned by the later Talmudists. He lived to old age, having had five sons high-priests.

Annu's (1 Esd. viii. 48). Probably a corruption of the Hebrew word rendered "with him" Ezr. viii. 19.

Anointing in Holy Scripture is either I. Material, with oil, or II. Spiritual, with the Holy Ghost.—I. MATERIAL.—1. Ordinary. Anointing the body or head with oil was a common practice with the Jews, as with other Oriental nations (Deut. xxviii. 40; Ruth iii. 3; Mic. vi. 15). Abstinence from it was a sign of mourning (2 Sam. xiv. 2; Dan. x. 3; Matt. vi. 17). Anointing the head with oil or ointment seems also to have been a mark of respect sometimes paid by a host to his guests (Luke vii. 46 and Ps. xxiii. 5), and was an ancient Egyptian custom at feasts.—2. Official. Anointing with oil was a rite of inauguration into each of the three typical offices of the Jewish commonwealth. (a) Prophets were occasionally anointed to their office (1 K. xix. 16), and are called messiahs, or anointed (1 Chr. xvi. 22; Ps. cv. 15). (b) Priests, at the first institution of the Levitical priesthood, were all anointed to their offices, the sons of Aaron as well as Aaron himself (Ex. xl. 15; Num. iii. 3); but afterwards, anointing seems not to have been repeated at the consecration of ordinary priests, but to have been especially reserved for the high-priest (Ex. xxix. 29; Lev. xvi. 32); so that "the priest that is anointed" (Lev. iv. 3) is generally thought to mean the high-priest. See also Lev. iv. 5, 16, and vi. 22. (c) Kings. Anointing was the principal and divinely-appointed ceremony in the inauguration of the Jewish kings (1 Sam. ix. 16, x. 1; 1 K. i. 34, 39); indeed, so pre-eminently did it belong to the kingly office, that "the Lord's anointed" was a common designation of the theocratic king (1 Sam. xii. 3, 5; 2 Sam. i. 14, 16). The rite was sometimes performed more than once. David was thrice anointed to be king; first, privately by Samuel, before the death of Saul, by way of conferring on him a right to the throne (1 Sam. xvi. 1, 13); again over Judah at Hebron (2 Sam. ii. 4), and finally over the whole nation (2 Sam. v. 3). After the separation into two kingdoms, the kings both of Judah and of Israel seem still to have been anointed (2 K. ix. 3, xi. 12). So late as the time of the captivity the king is called "the anointed of the Lord" (Ps. lxxxix. 38, 51; Lam. iv. 20). Besides Jewish kings, we read that Hazael was to be anointed king over Syria (1 K. xix. 15). Cyrus also is called the Lord's anointed, as having been raised by God to the throne for the special purpose of delivering the Jews out of captivity (Is. xlv. 1). (d) Inanimate objects also were anointed with oil in token of their being set apart for religious service. Thus Jacob anointed a pillar at Bethel (Gen. xxxi. 18); and at the introduction of the Mosaic economy, the tabernacle and all its furniture were consecrated by anointing (Ex. xxx. 26-28).—3. Ecclesiastical. Anointing with oil in the name of the Lord is prescribed by St. James to be used together with prayer, by the elders of the church, for the recovery of the sick (James v. 14). Analogous to this is the anointing with oil practised by the twelve (Mark vi. 13), and our Lord's anointing the eyes of a blind man with clay made from saliva, in restoring him miraculously to sight (John ix. 6, 11).—II. SPIRITUAL.—1. In the O. T. a Deliverer is promised under the title of Messiah, or Anointed (Ps. ii. 2; Dan. ix. 25, 26); and the nature of his anointing is described to be spiritual, with the Holy Ghost (Is. lxi. 1; see Luke iv. 18). As anointing with oil betokened prosperity, and produced a cheerful aspect (Ps. civ. 15), so this spiritual unction is figuratively described as anointing "with the oil of gladness" (Ps. xlv. 7; Heb. i. 9). In the N. T. Jesus of Nazareth is shown to be the Messiah, or Christ, or Anointed of the Old Testament (John i. 41; Acts ix. 22, xvii. 2, 3, xviii. 5, 28); and the historical fact of his being anointed with the Holy Ghost is asserted and recorded (John i. 32, 33; Acts iv. 27, x. 38). 2. Spiritual anointing with the Holy Ghost is conferred also upon Christians by God (2 Cor. i. 21), and they are described as having an unction from the Holy One, by which they know all things (1 John ii. 20, 27). To anoint the eyes with eyesalve is used figuratively to denote the process of obtaining spiritual perception (Rev. iii. 18).

A'nos, 1 Esd. ix. 34. [VANIAH.]

Ant (Heb. nemaldah). This insect is mentioned twice in the O. T.: in Prov. vi. 6, "Go to the ant thou sluggard, consider her ways and be wise;" in Prov. xxx. 25, "The ants are a people not strong, yet they prepare their meat in the summer." In the former of these passages the diligence of this insect is instanced by the wise man as an example worthy of imitation; in the second passage the ant's wisdom is especially alluded to, for these insects, "though they be little on the earth, are exceeding wise." It is well known that the ancient Greeks and Romans, believed that the ant stored up food, which it collected in the summer, ready for the winter's consumption; but this is an error. The European species of ants are all dormant in the winter, and consequently require no food; and the observations of modern naturalists seem almost conclusive that no ants lay up for future consumption. The words of Solomon do not necessarily teach that ants store up food for future use, but they seem to imply that such was the case. If this was the general opinion, is it a matter of surprise that the wise man should select the ant as an instance whereon he might ground a lesson of prudence and forethought?—The teaching of the Bible is accommodated to the knowledge and opinions of those to whom its language is addressed, and the observations of naturalists are no more an argument against the truth of the Word of God than are the ascertained laws of astronomical science.

Antichrist. This term is employed by the Apostle John alone, and is defined by him in a manner which leaves no doubt as to its intrinsic meaning. With regard to its application there is less certainty. In the first passage (1 John ii. 18) in which it occurs the apostle makes direct reference to the false Christs, whose coming, it had been foretold, should mark the last days. "Little children, it is the last time: and as ye have heard that the Antichrist cometh, even now have there been many Antichrists; whereby we know that it is the last time." The allusion to Matt. xxiv. 24. was clearly in the mind of the Syriac translator, who rendered Antichrist by "the false Christ." In ver. 22 we find, "he is the Antichrist that denieth the Father and the Son;" and still more positively, "every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh" is of Antichrist (comp. 2 John 7). From these emphatic and repeated definitions it has been supposed that the object of the apostle in his first epistle was to combat the errors of Cerinthus, the Docetæ, and the Gnostics on the subject of the Incarnation. The Antichrists, against which he warned the churches of Asia Minor as being already in the world, had been of their own number; "they went out from us, but they were not of us" (1 John ii. 19); and the manner in which they are referred to, implies that the name was already familiar to those to whom the epistle was addressed, through the apostles' oral teaching (2 Thess. ii. 5). The coming of Antichrist was believed to be foretold in the "vile person" of Daniel's prophecy (xi. 21), which received its first accomplishment in Antiochus Epiphanes, but of which the complete fulfilment was reserved for the last times. He is identified with "the man of sin, the son of perdition" (2 Thess. ii. 3), who should be revealed when he "who now letteth" was removed; that is, according to the belief of the primitive church, when the Roman order of things ceased to be. This interpretation brings Antichrist into close connexion with the gigantic power of evil, symbolised by the "beast" (Rev. xiii.), who received his power from the dragon (i. e. the devil, the serpent of Genesis), continued for forty and two months, and was invested with the kingdom of the ten kings who destroyed the harlot Babylon (Rev. xvii. 12, 17), the city of seven hills. The destruction of Babylon is to be followed by the rule of Antichrist for a short period (Rev. xvii. 10), to be in his turn overthrown in "the battle of that great day of God Almighty" (Rev. xvi. 14) with the false prophet and all his followers (Rev. xix.). The personality of Antichrist is to be inferred as well from the personality of his historical precursor, as from that of Him to whom he stands opposed. Such an interpretation is to be preferred to that which regards Antichrist as the embodiment and personification of all powers and agencies inimical to Christ, or of the Antichristian might of the world. In the Jewish traditions Antichrist is represented by Armilus, or Armilaus, which is the translation of "the wicked" in the Targum of Pseudo-Jonathan on Is. xi. 4. He was the last enemy of the Jewish race, who, after Gog and Magog, should wage fierce wars and slay Messiah ben Ephraim, but should himself be slain by Messiah ben David. His history will be found in Buxtorf's Lex. Talm. pp. 221-224. A type of Antichrist has been sought in Balaam the antagonist of Moses, the type of Christ, and the allusions in Jude 11, and 2 Pet. ii. 15, are presumed to be directed against the errors of the Nicolaitanes, Nicolaus signifying in Greek the same as Balaam in Hebrew. But of such speculations there is no end; the language of the apostles is intentionally obscure, and this obscurity has been rather deepened than removed by the conflicting interpretations of expositors. All that the dark hints of the apostles teach us is, that they regarded Antichrist as a power whose influence was beginning to be felt even in their time, but whose full development was reserved till the passing away of the principle which hindered it, and the destruction of the power symbolised by the mystical Babylon.

Antioch. 1. In SYRIA. The capital of the Greek kings of Syria, and afterwards the residence of the Roman governors of the province which bore the same name. This metropolis was situated where the chain of Lebanon, running northwards, and the chain of Taurus, running eastwards, are brought to an abrupt meeting. Here the Orontes breaks through the mountains; and Antioch was placed at a bend of the river, partly on an island, partly on the level which forms the left bank, and partly on the steep and craggy ascent of Mount Silpius, which rose abruptly on the south. In the immediate neighbourhood was Daphne, the celebrated sanctuary of Apollo (2 Macc. iv. 33); whence the city was sometimes called ANTIOCH BY DAPHNE, to distinguish it from other cities of the same name.—No city, after Jerusalem, is so intimately connected with the history of the apostolic church. Certain points of close association between these two cities, as regards the progress of Christianity, may be noticed in the first place. One of the seven deacons, or almoners appointed at Jerusalem, was Nicolas, a proselyte of Antioch (Acts vi. 5). The Christians, who were dispersed from Jerusalem at the death of Stephen, preached the Gospel at Antioch (ibid. xi. 19). It was from Jerusalem that Agabus and the other prophets, who foretold the famine, came to Antioch (ibid. xi. 27, 28); and Barnabas and Saul were consequently sent on a mission of charity from the latter city to the former (ibid. xi. 30, xi. 25). It was from Jerusalem again that the Judaizers came, who disturbed the church at Antioch (ibid. xv. 1); and it was at Antioch that St. Paul rebuked St. Peter for conduct into which he had been betrayed through the influence of emissaries from Jerusalem (Gal. ii. 11, 12).—The chief interest of Antioch, however, is connected with the progress of Christianity among the heathen. Here the first Gentile church was founded (Act xi. 20, 21); here the disciples of Jesus Christ were first called Christians (xi. 26); here St. Paul exercised (so far as is distinctly recorded) his first systematic ministerial work (xi. 22-26; see xiv. 26-28; also xv. 35 and xviii. 22); hence he started at the beginning of his first missionary journey (xiii. 1-3), and hither he returned (xiv. 26). So again after the apostolic council (the decrees of which were specially addressed to the Gentile converts at Antioch, xv. 23), he began and ended his second missionary journey at this place (xv. 36, xviii. 22). This too was the starting point of the third missionary journey (xviii. 23), which was brought to a termination by the imprisonment at Jerusalem and Caesarea. Though St. Paul was never again, so far as we know, at Antioch, it did not cease to be an important centre for Christian progress; but it does not belong to this place to trace its history as a patriarchate, and its connexion with Ignatius, Chrysostom, and other eminent names. Antioch was founded in the year 300 B.C., by Seleucus Nicator. Jews were settled there from the first in large numbers, were governed by their own ethnarch, and allowed to have the same political privileges with the Greeks. Antioch grew under the successive Seleucid kings, till it became a city of great extent and of remarkable beauty. Some of the most magnificent buildings were on the island. One feature, which seems to have been characteristic of the great Syrian cities, a vast street with colonnades, intersecting the whole from end to end—was added by Antiochus Epiphanes. Some lively notices of the Antioch of this period, and of its relation to Jewish history, are supplied by the books of Maccabees. (See especially 1 Macc. iii. 37, xi. 13; 2 Macc. iv. 7-9, v. 21, xi. 36.) It is the Antioch of the Roman period with which we are concerned in the N. T. By Pompey it had been made a free city, and such it continued till the time of Antoninus Pius. The early Emperors raised there some large and important structures, such as aqueducts, amphitheatres, and baths.

Gate of St. Paul, Antioch.

Herod the Great contributed a road and a colonnade.* It should be mentioned here that the citizens of Antioch under the Empire were noted for scurrilous wit and the invention of nicknames. This perhaps was the origin of the name by which the disciples of Jesus Christ are designated, and which was probably given by Romans to the despised sect, and not by Christians to themselves.—2. IN PISIDIA (Acts xiii. 14, xiv. 19, 21; 2 Tim. iii. 11), on the borders of Phrygia, corresponds to Yalobatch, which is distant from Ak-sheer six hours over the mountains. This city, like the Syrian Antioch, was founded by Seleucus Nicator. Under the Romans it became a colonia, and was also called Cæsarea. The occasion on which St. Paul visited the city for the first time (Acts xiii. 14) was very interesting and important. His preaching in the synagogue led to the reception of the Gospel by a great number of the Gentiles; and this resulted in a violent persecution on the part of the Jews, who first, using the influence of some of the wealthy female residents, drove him from Antioch to Iconium (ib. 50, 51), and subsequently followed him even to Lystra (Acts xiv. 19). St. Paul on his return from Lystra, revisited Antioch for the purpose of strengthening the minds of the disciples (ib. 21). These events happened when he was on his first missionary journey, in company with Barnabas. He probably visited Antioch again at the beginning of his second journey, when Silas was his associate, and Timotheus, who was a native of this neighbourhood, had just been added to the party. The allusion in 2 Tim. iii. 11 shows that Timotheus was well acquainted with the sufferings which the apostle had undergone during his first visit to the Pisidian Antioch. [PHRYGIA; PISIDIA.]

Antiochia (1 Macc. iv. 35, vi. 63; 2 Macc. iv. 38, v. 21). [ANTIOCH 1.]

Antiochians, partizans of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc. iv. 9, 19).

Antiochis, concubine of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc. iv. 30).

Antiochus, father of Numenius, one of the ambassadors from Jonathan to the Romans (1 Macc. xii. 16, xiv. 22).

Antiochus II., king of Syria, surnamed the God, succeeded his father Antiochus Soter in B.C. 261. During the earlier part of his reign he was engaged in a fierce war with Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, in the course of which Parthia and Bactria revolted and became independent kingdoms. At length (B.C. 250) peace was made, and the two monarchs "joined themselves together" (Dan. xi. 6), and Ptolemy ("the king of the south") gave his daughter Berenice in marriage to Antiochus ("the king of the north"), who set aside his former wife, Laodice, to receive her. After some time, on the death of Ptolemy (B.C. 247), Antiochus recalled Laodice and her children Seleucus and Antiochus to court. Thus Berenice was "not able to retain her power;" and Laodice, in jealous fear lest she might a second time lose her ascendancy, poisoned Antiochus (him "that strengthened her," i. e. Berenice), and caused Berenice and her infant son to be put to death, B.C. 246 (Dan. xi. 6). After the death of Antiochus, Ptolemy Evergetes, the brother of Berenice ("out of a branch of her roots"), who succeeded his father Ptol. Philadelphus, exacted vengeance for his sister's death by an invasion of Syria, in which Laodice was killed, her son Seleucus Callinicus driven for a time from the throne, and the whole country plundered (Dan. xi. 7-9). The hostilities thus renewed continued for many years; and on the death of Seleucus B.C. 226, after his "return into his own land" (Dan. xi. 9), his sons Alexander (Seleucus) Keraunos, and Antiochus "assembled a multitude of great forces" against Ptol. Philopator the son of Evergetes, and one of them (Antiochus) threatened to overthrow the power of Egypt (Dan. xi. 9, 10).

Antiochus III., surnamed the Great, succeeded his brother Seleucus Keraunos, who was assassinated after a short reign in B.C. 223. He prosecuted the war against Ptolemy Philopator with vigour, and at first with success. In B.C. 218 he drove the Egyptian forces to Sidon, conquered Samaria and Gilead, and wintered at Ptolemais, but was defeated next year at Raphia, near Gaza (B.C. 217), with immense loss, and in consequence made a peace with Ptolemy, in which he ceded to him the disputed provinces of Coele-Syria, Phœnicia and Palestine (Dan. xi. 11, 12). During the next thirteen years Antiochus was engaged in strengthening his position in Asia Minor, and on the frontiers of Parthia, and by his successes gained his surname of the Great. At the end of this time, B.C. 205, Ptolemy Philopator died, and left his kingdom to his son Ptol. Epiphanes, who was only five years old. Antiochus availed himself of the opportunity which was offered by the weakness of a minority and the unpopularity of the regent, to unite with Philip III. of Macedon for the purpose of conquering and dividing the Egyptian dominions. The Jews, who had been exasperated by the conduct of Ptol. Philopator, both in Palestine and Egypt, openly espoused his cause, under the influence of a short-sighted policy ("the factious among thy people shall rise," i. e. against Ptolemy, Dan. xi. 14). Antiochus succeeded in occupying the three disputed provinces, but was recalled to Asia by a war which broke out with Attalus, king of Pergamus; and his ally Philip was himself embroiled with the Romans. In consequence of this diversion Ptolemy, by the aid of Scopas, again made himself master of Jerusalem, and recovered the territory which he had lost. In B.C. 198 Antiochus reappeared in the field and gained a decisive victory "near the sources of the Jordan;" and afterwards captured Scopas and the remnant of his forces who had taken refuge in Sidon (Dan. xi. 15). The Jews, who had suffered severely during the struggle, welcomed Antiochus as their deliverer, and "he stood in the glorious land which by his hand was to be consumed" (Dan. xi. 16). His further designs against Egypt were frustrated by the intervention of the Romans; and his daughter Cleopatra, whom he gave in marriage to Ptol. Epiphanes, with the Phoenician provinces for her dowry, favoured the interests of her husband rather than those of her father (Dan. xi. 17). From Egypt Antiochus turned again to Asia Minor, and after various successes in the Aegæan crossed over to Greece, and by the advice of Hannibal entered on a war with Rome. His victorious course was checked at Thermopylae (B.C. 191), and after subsequent reverses he was finally defeated at Magnesia in Lydia, B.C. 190. By the peace which was concluded shortly afterwards (B.C. 188) he was forced to cede all his possessions "on the Roman side of Mt. Taurus," and to pay in successive instalments an enormous sum of money to defray the expenses of the war. This last condition led to his ignominious death. In B.C. 187 he attacked a rich temple of Belus in Elymais, and was slain by the people who rose in its defence. Thus "he stumbled and fell, and was not found" (Dan. xi. 19).—Two sons of Antiochus occupied the throne after him, Seleucus Philopator, his immediate successor, and Antiochus IV., who gained the kingdom upon the assassination of his brother.

Head of Antiochus III. (From a coin.)

Antiochus IV., Epiphanes (the Illustrious), was the youngest son of Antiochus the Great. He was given as a hostage to the Romans (B.C. 188) after his father's defeat at Magnesia. In B.C. 175 he was released by the intervention of his brother Seleucus, who substituted his own son Demetrius in his place. Antiochus was at Athens when Seleucus was assassinated by Heliodorus. He took advantage of his position, and, by the assistance of Eumenes and Attalus, easily expelled Heliodorus who had usurped the crown, and himself "obtained the kingdom by flatteries" (Dan. xi. 21) to the exclusion of his nephew Demetrius (Dan. viii. 7). The accession of Antiochus was immediately followed by desperate efforts of the Hellenizing party at Jerusalem to assert their supremacy. Jason, the brother of Onias III., the high priest, persuaded the king to transfer the high priesthood to him, and at the same time bought permission (2 Macc. iv. 9) to carry out his design of habituating the Jews to Greek customs (2 Macc. iv. 7, 20). Three years afterwards, Menelaus, of the tribe of Benjamin, who was commissioned by Jason to carry to Antiochus the price of his office, supplanted Jason by offering the king a larger bribe, and was himself appointed high priest, while Jason was obliged to take refuge among the Ammonites (2 Macc. iv. 23-26). From these circumstances and from the marked honour with which Antiochus was received at Jerusalem very early in his reign (c. B.C. 173; 2 Macc. iv. 22), it appears that he found no difficulty in regaining the border provinces which had been given as the dowry of his sister Cleopatra to Ptol. Epiphanes. But his ambition led him still farther, and he undertook four campaigns against Egypt, B.C. 171, 170, 169, 168, with greater success than had attended his predecessor, and the complete conquest of the country was prevented only by the interference of the Romans (Dan. xi. 24; 1 Macc. i. 16 ff.; 2 Macc. v. 11 ff.). The course of Antiochus was everywhere marked by the same wild prodigality as had signalised his occupation of the throne (Dan. i. c.). The consequent exhaustion of his treasury, and the armed conflicts of the rival high priests whom he had appointed, furnished the occasion for an assault upon Jerusalem on his return from his second Egyptian campaign (B.C. 170) which he had probably planned in conjunction with Ptol. Philometor, who was at that time in his power (Dan. xi. 26). The Temple was plundered, a terrible massacre took place, and a Phrygian governor was left with Menelaus in charge of the city (2 Macc. v. 1-22; 1 Macc. i. 20-28). Two years afterwards, at the close of the fourth Egyptian expedition, Antiochus detached a force under Apollonius to occupy Jerusalem and fortify it, and at this time he availed himself of the assistance of the ancestral enemies of the Jews (1 Macc. iv. 61, v. 3 ff.; Dan. xi. 41). The decrees then followed which have rendered his name infamous. The Temple was desecrated, and the observance of the law was forbidden. "On the fifteenth day of Cisleu [the Syrians] set up the abomination of desolation (i. e. an idol altar: ver. 59) on the altar" (1 Macc. i. 54). Ten days afterwards an offering was made upon it to Jupiter Olympius. At Jerusalem all opposition appears to have ceased; but Mattathias and his sons organised resistance ("holpen with a little help," Dan. xi. 34), which preserved inviolate the name and faith of Israel. Meanwhile Antiochus turned his arms the East, towards Parthia and Armenia (Dan. i. 40). Hearing not long afterwards of the riches of a temple of Nanaea ("the desire of women," Dan. xi. 37) in Elymais, hung with the gifts of Alexander, he resolved to plunder it. The attempt was defeated; and though he did not fall like his father in the act of sacrilege, the event hastened his death. He retired to Babylon, and thence to Tabac in Persia, where he died B.C. 164, the victim of superstition, terror, and remorse, having first heard of the successes of the Maccabees in restoring the temple-worship at Jerusalem (1 Macc. vi. 1-16;

cf. 2 Macc. i. 7-17?). "He came to his end and there was none to help him" (Dan. xi. 45). The reign of Antiochus, thus shortly traced, was the last great crisis in the history of the Jews before the coming of our Lord. The prominence which is given to it in the book of Daniel fitly accords with its typical and representative character (Dan. vii. 8, 25, viii. 11 ff.). The conquest of Alexander had introduced the forces of Greek thought and life into the Jewish nation, which was already prepared for their operation [ALEXANDER]. For more than a century and a half these forces had acted powerfully both upon the faith and upon the habits of the people; and the time was come when an outward struggle alone could decide whether Judaism was to be merged in a rationalised Paganism, or to rise not only victorious from the conflict, but more vigorous and more pure. Nor was the social position of the Jews less perilous. The influence of Greek literature, of foreign travel, of extended commerce, had made itself felt in daily life. At Jerusalem the mass of the inhabitants seem to have desired to imitate the exercises of the Greeks; and a Jewish embassy attended the games of Hercules at Tyre (2 Macc. iv. 9-20). Even their religious feelings were yielding; and before the rising of the Maccabees no opposition was offered to the execution of the king's decrees. Upon the first attempt of Jason the "priests had no courage to serve at the altar" (2 Macc. iv. 14; cf. 1 Macc. i. 43); and this not so much from wilful apostasy, as from a disregard to the vital principles involved in the conflict.

Antiochus V., Eu'pator (of noble descent), succeeded his father Antiochus IV. B.C. 164, while still a child, under the guardianship of Lysias (1 Macc. iii. 32, vi. 17), though Antiochus had on his death-bed assigned this office to Philip his own foster-brother (1 Macc. vi. 14, 15; 55: 2 Macc. ix. 29). Shortly after his accession he marched against Jerusalem with a large army, accompanied by Lysias, to relieve the Syrian garrison, which was hard pressed by Judas Maccabaeus (1 Macc. vi. 19 ff.). He repulsed Judas at Bethzacharia, and took Bethsura (Bethzur) after a vigorous resistance (1 Macc. vi. 31-50). But when the Jewish force in the Temple was on the point of yielding, Lysias persuaded the king to conclude a hasty peace that he might advance to meet Philip, who had returned from Persia and made himself master of Antioch (1 Macc. vi. 51 ff.). Philip was speedily overpowered; but in the next year (B.C. 162) Antiochus and Lysias fell into the hands of Demetrius Soter, the son of Selencus Philopator, who caused them to be put to death in revenge for the wrongs which he had himself suffered from Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc. vii. 2-4; 2 Macc. xiv. 1, 2).

Antiochus VI. was the son of Alexander Balas and Cleopatra. After his father's death (146 B.C.) he remained in Arabia; but though still a child (1 Macc. xi. 54), he was soon afterwards brought forward (c. 145 B.C.) as a claimant to the throne of Syria against Demetrius Nicator by Tryphon or Diodotus (1 Macc. xi. 39), who had been an officer of his father. Tryphon succeeded in gaining Antioch (1 Macc. xi. 56); and afterwards the greater part of Syria submitted to the young Antiochus. Jonathan, who was confirmed by him in the high priesthood (1 Macc. xi. 57) and invested with the government of Judaea, contributed greatly to his success, occupying Ascalon and Gaza, and reducing the country as far as Damascus (1 Macc. xi. 60-62). He afterwards defeated the troops of Demetrius at Hazor (1 Macc. xi. 67) near Cadesh (ver. 73); and repulsed a second attempt which he made to regain Palestine (1 Macc. xii. 24 ff.). Tryphon having now gained the supreme power in the name of Antiochus, no longer concealed his design of usurping the crown. As a first step he took Jonathan by treachery and put him to death, B.C. 143 (1 Macc. xii. 40); and afterwards murdered the young king, and ascended the throne (1 Macc. xlii. 31).

Antiochus VII., Sides (of Side, in Pamphylia), king of Syria, was the second son of Demetrius I. When his brother, Demetrius Nicator, was taken prisoner (c. 141 B.C.) by Mithridates I. (Arsaces VI., 1 Macc. xiv. 1) king of Parthia, he married his wife Cleopatra and obtained possession of the throne (137 B.C.), having expelled the usurper Tryphon (1 Macc. xv. 1 ff.). At first he made a very advantageous treaty with Simon, who was now "high priest and prince of the Jews," but when he grew independent of his help, he withdrew the concessions which he had made and demanded the surrender of the fortresses which the Jews held, or an equivalent in money (1 Macc. xv. 26 ff.). As Simon was unwilling to yield to his demands, he sent a force under Cendebeus against him, who occupied a fortified position at Cedron (? 1 Macc. xv. 41), near Azotus, and harassed the surrounding country. After the defeat of Cendebeus by the sons of Simon and the destruction of his works (1 Macc. xvi. 1-10), Antiochus, who had returned from the pursuit of Tryphon, undertook an expedition against Judaea in person. He laid siege to Jerusalem, but according to Josephus granted honourable terms to John Hyrcanus (B.C. 133), who had made a vigorous resistance. Antiochus next turned his arms against the Parthians, and Hyrcanus accompanied him in the campaign. But after some successes, he was entirely defeated by Phraortes II (Arsaces VII.), and fell in the battle c. B.C. 127-6.

Antipas, martyr at Pergamos (Rev. ii. 13), and according to tradition the bishop of that place.

Antipas. [HEROD.]

Antipater, son of Jason, ambassador from the Jews to the Lacedemonians (1 Macc. xii. 16, xiv. 22).

Antipatris, a town to which the soldiers conveyed St. Paul by night on their march (Acts xxiii. 31). Its ancient name was Capharsaba; and Herod, when he rebuilt the city, changed it to Antipatris, in honour of his father Antipater. According to the Jerusalem Itinerary it was 42 miles from Jerusalem and 26 from Caesarea. The village Kefr-Saba still retains the ancient name of Antipatris, and its position is in sufficient harmony with what Josephus says of the position of Antipatris, which he describes as a well-watered and well-wooded plain, near a hilly ridge, and with his notices of a trench dug from thence for military purposes to the sea near Joppa by one of the Asmonean princes.

Antonia, a fortress built by Herod on the site of the more ancient Baris, on the N.W. of the Temple, and so named by him after his friend Antonius. [JERUSALEM]. The word nowhere occurs in the Bible.

Anthothite, a dweller at Anathoth (1 Ch. xi. 28, xii. 3). [ANATHOTHITE.]

Anthijah. A Benjamite, one of the sons of Jeroham (1 Chr. viii. 24).

Anub. Son of Coz and descendant of Judah, through Ashur the father of Tekoa (1 Chr. iv. 8).

Anus, a Levite (1 Esd. ix. 48). [BANI].

Apama, concubine of Darius, and daughter of Bactarus (1 Esd. iv. 29).

Apes (Heb. kôphim), occur in 1 K. x. 22, "once in three years came the navy of Tharshish, bringing gold, and silver, ivory, and apes, and peacocks," and in the parallel passage of 2 Chr. ix. 21. There can be little doubt but that the apes were brought from the same country which supplied ivory and peacocks, both of which are common in Ceylon; and Sir E. Tennent has drawn attention to the fact that the Tamil names for apes, ivory, and peacocks, are identical with the Hebrew.

Apelles, a Christian saluted by St. Paul in Rom. xvi. 10. Tradition makes him bishop of Smyrna or Heraclea.

Apharsathchites, Aphar'sites, Aphar'sacites, the names of certain tribes, colonies from which had been planted in Samaria by the Assyrian leader Asnapper (Ezr. iv. 9, v. 6). The first and last are regarded as the same. Whence these tribes came is entirely a matter of conjecture.

Aphek (from a root signifying tenacity or firmness), the name of several places in Palestine.—

1. A royal city of the Canaanites, the king of which was killed by Joshua (Josh. xii. 18), probably the same as the Aphekah of Josh. xv. 53.

—2. A city, apparently in the extreme north of Asher (Josh. xix. 30), from which the Canaanites were not ejected (Judg. i. 31; though here it is Aphik). This is probably the same place as the Aphek (Josh. xiii. 4), on the extreme north border of the Amorites, and apparently beyond Sidon, identified with the Aphaca of classical times, famous for its temple of Venus, and now Afka.—

3. A place, at which the Philistines encamped, while the Israelites pitched in Eben-ezer, before the fatal battle in which the sons of Eli were killed and the ark taken (1 Sam. iv. 1). This would be somewhere to the N.W. cf. and at no great distance from Jerusalem.—4. The scene of another encampment of the Philistines, before an encounter not less disastrous than that just named,—the defeat and death of Saul (1 Sam. xxix. 1). It is possible that it may be the same place as the preceding.—5. A city on the military road from Syria to Israel (1 K. xx. 26). It was walled (30), and was apparently a common spot for engagements with Syria (2 K. xiii. 17). It was situated in "the plain" (1 K. xx. 25) and consequently in the level down-country east of the Jordan; and there, accordingly, it is now found in Flk, at the head of the Wady Flk, 6 miles east of the Sea of Galilee, the great road between Damascus, Nabulus, and Jerusalem, still passing through the village.

Aph'ekah, a city of Judah, in the mountains (Josh. xv. 53), probably the same as APHEK (1).

Aphe'rema, one of the three "governments" added to Judaea from Samaria by Demetrius Soter, and confirmed by Nicanor (1 Macc. xi. 34). It is probably the same as Ephraim.

Apher'ra, one of the sons of the servants of Solomon who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esd. v. 34). His name is not found in the parallel lists of Ezra and Nehemiah.

Aphi'ah, one of the forefathers of king Saul (1 Sam. ix. 1).

Aphik, a city of Asher from which the Canaanites were not driven out (Judg. i. 31). Probably the same place as APHEK (2).

Aph'rah, the house of, a place mentioned in Mic. i. 10. Its site is uncertain.

Aph'ses, chief of the 18th of the 24 courses in the service of the Temple (1 Chr. xxiv. 15).

Apoc'alypto. [REVELATION.]

Apoc'rypha. The collection of Books to which this term is popularly applied includes the following (the order given is that in which they stand in the English version):—I. 1 Esdras; II. 2 Esdras; III. Tobit; IV. Judith; V. The rest of the chapters of the Book of Esther, which are found neither in the Hebrew nor in the Chaldee; VI. The Wisdom of Solomon; VII. The Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach, or Ecclesiasticus; VIII. Baruch; IX. The Song of the Three Holy Children; X. The History of Susanna; XI. The History of the destruction of Bel and the Dragon; XII. The Prayer of Manasses, king of Judah; XIII. 1 Maccabees; XIV. 2 Maccabees. The primary meaning of Apocrypha, "hidden, secret," seems, towards the close of the 2nd century, to have been associated with the signification "spurious," and ultimately to have settled down into the latter. The separate books of this collection are treated of in distinct Articles. Their relation to the canonical books of the Old Testament is discussed under CANON.

Apollonia, a city of Macedonia, through which Paul and Silas passed in their way from Philippi and Amphipolis to Thessalonica (Acts xvii. 1). According to the Antonine Itinerary, it was distant 30 Roman miles from Amphipolis, and 37 Roman miles from Thessalonica.

Apollonius. 1. Son of Thrasaeus governor of Coele-Syria and Phoenice, under SELEUCUS IV. PHILOPATOR, B.C. 187 ff., a bitter enemy of the Jews (2 Macc. iv. 4), who urged the king, at the instigation of Simon the commander of the Temple, to plunder the Temple at Jerusalem (2 Macc. iii. 5 ff.).

—2. An officer of Antiochus Epiphanes, and governor of Samaria, who led out a large force against Judas Maccabaeus, but was defeated and slain B.C. 166 (1 Macc. iii. 10-12; Joseph. Ant. xii. 71). He is probably the same person who was chief commissioner of the revenue of Judaea (1 Macc. i. 29; cf. 2 Macc. v. 24), who spoiled Jerusalem, taking advantage of the Sabbath (2 Macc. v. 24-26), and occupied a fortified position there (B.C. 168) (1 Macc. i. 30 ff.).

—3. The son of Menestheus (possibly identical with the preceding), an envoy commissioned (B.C. 173) by Antiochus Epiphanes to congratulate Ptolemy Philometor on his being euthroned (2 Macc. iv. 21).

—4. The son of Genauaeus, a Syrian general under Antiochus V. Eupator, c. B.C. 163 (2 Macc. xii. 2). —5. THE DAIAN (i. e. one of the Dahae or Dai, a people of Sogdiana), a governor of Coele-Syria (1 Macc. x. 69) under Alexander Balas, who embraced the cause of his rival Demetrius Nicator, and was appointed by him to a chief command (1 Macc. i. c.). Apollonius raised a large force and attacked Jonathan, the ally of Alexander, but was entirely defeated by him (B.C. 147) near Azotus (1 Macc. x. 69-87).

Apollophanes, a Syrian, killed by Judas Maccabaeus at Gazara (2 Macc. x. 37).

Apoll'os, a Jew from Alexandria, eloquent (which may also mean learned) and mighty in the Scriptures: one instructed in the way of the Lord, according to the imperfect view of the disciples of John the Baptist (Acts xviii. 25), but on his coming to Ephesus during a temporary absence of St. Paul, A.D. 54, more perfectly taught by Aquila and Priscilla. After this he became a preacher of the Gospel, first in Achaia and then in Corinth (Acts xviii. 27, xix. 1), where he watered that which Paul had planted (1 Cor. iii. 6). When the apostle wrote his first Epistle to the Corinthians, Apoll'os was with or near him (1 Cor. xvi. 12), probably at Ephesus in A.D. 57: we hear of him then that he was unwilling at that time to journey to Corinth, but would do so when he should have convenient time. He is mentioned but once more in the N. T., in Tit. iii. 13, where Titus is desired to "bring Zenas the lawyer and Apoll'os on their way diligently, that nothing may be wanting to them." After this nothing is known of him. Tradition makes him bishop of Caesarea. The exact part which Apoll'os took in the missionary work of the apostolic age can never be ascertained, and much fruitless conjecture has been spent on the subject. After the entire amity between St. Paul and him which appears in the first Epistle to the Corinthians, it is hardly possible to imagine any important difference in the doctrines which they taught. Thus much may safely be granted, that there may have been difference enough in the outward character and expression of the two to attract the lover of eloquence and philosophy rather to Apoll'os, somewhat perhaps to the disparagement of St. Paul. It has been supposed by some that Apoll'os was the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

Apollyon, or, as it is literally in the margin of the A. V. of Rev. ix. 11, "a destroyer," is the rendering of the Hebrew word ABADDON, "the angel of the bottomless pit." The Hebrew term is really abstract, and signifies, "destruction," in which sense it occurs in Job xxvi. 6, xxviii. 22; Prov. xv. 11; and other passages. The angel Apollyon is farther described as the king of the locusts which rose from the smoke of the bottomless pit at the sounding of the fifth trumpet. From the occurrence of the word in Ps. lxxviii. 11, the Rabbins have made Abaddon the nethermost of the two regions into which they divide the lower world. But that in Rev. ix. 11, Abaddon is the angel and not the abyss is perfectly evident in the Greek. There is no authority for connecting it with "the destroyer" alluded to in 1 Cor. x. 10; and the explanation quoted by Bengel, that the name is given in Hebrew and Greek, to show that the locusts would be destructive alike to Jew and Gentile, is far-fetched and unnecessary. The etymology of Asmodeus, the king of the demons in Jewish mythology, seems to point to a connexion with Apollyon, in his character as "the destroyer" or destroying angel. See also Wisd. xviii. 22, 25. [ASMODEUS.]

Apostle (one sent forth), in the N. T., originally the official name of those Twelve of the disciples whom Jesus chose to send forth first to preach the Gospel, and to be with Him during the course of his ministry on earth. The word also appears to have been used in a non-official sense to designate a much wider circle of Christian messengers and teachers (see 2 Cor. viii. 23; Phil. ii. 25). It is only of those who were officially designated Apostles that we treat in this article. The original qualification of an Apostle, as stated by St. Peter, on occasion of electing a successor to the traitor Judas, was, that he should have been personally acquainted with the whole ministerial course of our Lord, from his baptism by John till the day when He was taken up into heaven. He himself describes them as "they that had continued with Him in his temptations" (Luke xxii. 28). By this close personal intercourse with Him, they were peculiarly fitted to give testimony to the facts of redemption; and we gather, from his own words in John xiv. 26, xv. 26, 27, xvi. 13, that an especial bestowal of the Spirit's influence was granted them, by which their memories were quickened, and their power of reproducing that which they had heard from Him increased above the ordinary measure of man. The Apostles were from the lower ranks of life, simple and uneducated; some of them were related to Jesus according to the flesh; some had previously been disciples of John the Baptist. Our Lord chose them early in his public career, though it is uncertain precisely at what time. Some of them had certainly partly attached themselves to Him before; but after their call as Apostles they appear to have been continuously with Him, or in his service. They seem to have been all on an equality, both during and after the ministry of Christ on earth. We find one indeed, St. Peter, from fervour of personal character, usually prominent among them, and distinguished by having the first place assigned him in founding the Jewish and Gentile churches [PETER]; but we never find the slightest trace in Scripture of any superiority or primacy being in consequence accorded to him. We also find that he and two others, James and John, the sons of Zebedee, are admitted to the inner privacy of our Lord's acts and sufferings on several occasions (Matt. xvii. 1-9, xxvi. 37; Mark v. 37); but this is no proof of superiority in rank or office. Early in our Lord's ministry, He sent them out two and two to preach repentance, and perform miracles in his name (Matt. x.; Luke ix.). This their mission was of the nature of a solemn call to the children of Israel, to whom it was confined (Matt. x. 5, 6). The Apostles were early warned by their Master of the solemn nature and the danger of their calling (Matt. x. 17). They accompanied Him in his journeys of teaching and to the Jewish feasts, saw his wonderful works, heard his discourses addressed to the people (Matt. v.-vii., xxiii.; Luke vi. 13-49.) or those which he held with learned Jews (Matt. xix. 13 ff.; Luke x. 25 ff.), made inquiries of Him on religious matters, sometimes concerning his own sayings, sometimes of a general nature (Matt. xlii. 10 ff., xv. 15 ff., xviii. 1 ff.; Luke viii. 9 ff., xii. 41, xvii. 5; John ix. 2 ff., xiv. 5, 22, &c.): sometimes they worked miracles (Mark vi. 13; Luke ix. 6), sometimes attempted to do so without success (Matt. xvii. 16). They recognised their Master as the Christ of God (Matt. xvi. 16; Luke ix. 20), and ascribed to Him supernatural power (Luke ix. 54); but in the recognition of the spiritual teaching and mission of Christ, they made very slow progress, held back as they were by weakness of apprehension and by national prejudices (Matt. xv. 16, xvi. 22, xvii. 20, 21; Luke ix. 54, xxiv. 25; John xvi. 12): they were compelled to ask of Him the explanation of even his simplest parables (Mark viii. 14 ff.; Luke xii. 41 ff.), and openly confessed their weakness of faith (Luke xvii. 5). Even at the removal of our Lord from the earth they were yet weak in their knowledge (Luke xxiv. 21; John xvi. 12), though He had for so long been carefully preparing and instructing them. And when that happened of which He had so often forewarned them—his apprehension by the chief priests and Pharisees—they all forsook Him and fled (Matt. xxvi. 56). They left his burial to one who was not of their number and to the women, and were only convinced of his resurrection on the very plainest proofs furnished by Himself. It was first when this fact became undeniable that light seems to have entered their minds, and not even then without his own special aid, opening their understandings that they might understand the Scriptures. Even after that, many of them returned to their common occupations (John xxi. 3 ff.), and it required a new direction from the Lord to recall them to their mission, and re-unite them in Jerusalem (Acts i. 4). Before the descent of the Holy Spirit on the Church, Peter, at least, seems to have been specially inspired by Him to declare the prophetic sense of Scripture respecting the traitor Judas, and direct his place to be filled up. On the Feast of Pentecost, ten days after our Lord's ascension, the Holy Spirit came down on the assembled church (Acts ii.); and from that time the Apostles became altogether different men, giving witness with power of the life and death and resurrection of Jesus as he had declared they should (Luke xxiv. 48; Acts i. 8, 22, ii. 32, iii. 15, v. 32, xiii. 31). First of all the mother-church at Jerusalem grew up under their hands (Acts iii.-vii.), and their superior dignity and power were universally acknowledged by the rulers and the people (Acts v. 12 ff.). Even the persecution which arose about Stephen, and put the first check on the spread of the Gospel in Judaea, does not seem to have brought peril to the Apostles (Acts viii. 1). Their first mission out of Jerusalem was to Samaria (Acts viii. 5-25), where the Lord himself had, during his ministry, sown the seed of the Gospel. Here ends, properly speaking (or rather perhaps with the general visitation hinted at in Acts ix. 31), the first period of the Apostles' agency, during which its centre is Jerusalem, and the prominent figure is that of St. Peter. Agreeably to the promise or our Lord to him (Matt. xvi. 18), which we conceive it impossible to understand otherwise than in a personal sense, he among the twelve foundations (Rev. xxi. 14) was the stone on whom the Church was first built; and it was his privilege first to open the doors of the kingdom of heaven to Jews (Acts ii. 14, 22) and to Gentiles (Acts x. 11).—The centre of the second period of the apostolic agency is Antioch, where a church soon was built up, consisting of Jews and Gentiles; and the central figure of this and of the subsequent period is St. Paul, a convert not originally belonging to the number of the Twelve, but wonderfully prepared and miraculously won for the high office [PAUL]. This period, whose history (all that we know of it) is related in Acts xi. 19-30, xiii. 1-5, was marked by the united working of Paul and the other Apostles, in the co-operation and intercourse of the two churches of Antioch and Jerusalem.—From this time the third apostolic period opens, marked by the almost entire disappearance of the Twelve from the sacred narrative, and the exclusive agency of St. Paul, the great apostle of the Gentiles. The whole of the remaining narrative of the Acts is occupied with his missionary journeys; and when we leave him at Rome, all the Gentile churches from Jerusalem round about unto Illyricum owe to him their foundation, and look to him for supervision. Of the missionary agency of the rest of the Twelve, we know absolutely nothing from the sacred narrative. Some notices we have of their personal history, which will be found under their respective names, together with the principal legends, trustworthy or untrustworthy, which have come down to us respecting them. [See PETER, JAMES, JOHN especially.]—As regards the apostolic office, it seems to have been pre-eminently that of founding the churches, and upholding them by supernatural power specially bestowed for that purpose. It ceased, as a matter of course, with its first holders: all continuation of it, from the very conditions of its existence (cf. 1 Cor. ix. 1), being impossible. The bishops of the ancient churches co-existed with, and did not in any sense succeed, the Apostles; and when it is claimed for bishops or any church officers that they are their successors, it can be understood only chronologically, and not officially.

Appa'im. Son of Nadab, and descended from Jerahmeel, the founder of an important family of the tribe of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 30, 31).

Appeal. The principle of appeal was recognized by the Mosaic law in the establishment of a central court under the presidency of the judge or ruler for the time being, before which all cases too difficult for the local courts were to be tried (Deut. xvii. 8-9). According to the above regulation, the appeal lay in the time of the Judges to the judge (Judg. iv. 5), and under the monarchy to the king, who appears to have deputed certain persons to inquire into the facts of the case, and record his decision thereon (2 Sam. xv. 3). Jehoshaphat delegated his judicial authority to a court permanently established for the purpose (2 Chr. xix. 8). These courts were re-established by Ezra (Ezr. vii. 25). After the institution of the Sanhedrim the final appeal lay to them. A Roman citizen under the republic had the right of appealing in criminal cases from the decision of a magistrate to the people; and as the emperor succeeded to the power of the people, there was an appeal to him in the last resort. St. Paul, as a Roman citizen, exercised a right of appeal from the jurisdiction of the local court at Jerusalem to the emperor (Acts xxv. 11). But as no decision had been given, there could be no appeal, properly speaking, in his case: the language used (Acts xxv. 9) implies the right on the part of the accused of electing either to be tried by the provincial magistrate, or by the emperor. Since the procedure in the Jewish courts at that period was of a mixed and undefined character, the Roman and the Jewish authorities co-existing and carrying on the course of justice between them, Paul availed himself of his undoubted privilege to be tried by the pure Roman law.

Apphia (a Greek form of the Latin Appia), a Christian woman addressed jointly with Philemon and Archippus in Philem. 2, apparently a member of Philemon's household, and not improbably his wife.

Apphus, "the wary," according to Michaelis, surname of Jonathan Maccabaeus (1 Macc. ii. 5).

Appii Forum, a well-known station on the Appian Way, the great road which led from Rome to the neighbourhood of the Bay of Naples. St. Paul, having landed at Puteoli (Acts xxviii. 13) on his arrival from Malta, proceeded under the charge of the centurion along the Appian Way towards Rome, and found at Appii Forum a group of Christians who had gone to meet him (ver. 15). The position of this place is fixed by the ancient Itineraries at 43 miles from Rome. Horace describes it as full of taverns and boatmen. This arose from the circumstance that it was at the northern end of a canal which ran parallel with the road, through a considerable part of the Pomptine Marshes. There is no difficulty in identifying the site with some ruins near Treponti; and in fact the 43rd milestone is preserved there. [THREE TAVERNS.]

Apple-Tree, Apple (Heb. tappach). Mention of the apple-tree occurs in the A. V., in the following passages. Cant. ii. 3: "As the apple-tree among the trees of the wood, so is my beloved among the sons. I sat down under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit was sweet to my taste." Cant. viii. 5: "I raised thee up under the apple-tree: there thy mother brought thee forth." Joel i. 12, where the apple-tree is named with the vine, the fig, the pomegranate, and the palm-trees, as withering under the desolating effects of the locust, palmer-worm, &c. The fruit of this tree is alluded to in Prov. xxv. 11: "A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver." In Cant. ii. 5: "Comfort me with apples, for I am sick of love;" vii. 8, "The smell of thy nose (shall be) like apples." It is a difficult matter to say what is the specific tree denoted by the Hebrew word tappach. Most modern writers maintain that it is either the quince or the citron. The quince has some plausible arguments in its favour. The fragrance of the quince was held in high esteem by the ancients. "Its scent," says an Arabic author, "cheers my soul, renews my strength, and restores my breath." The quince was sacred to Venus. On the other hand, Dr. Royle says, "The rich colour, fragrant odour, and handsome appearance of the citron, whether in flower or in fruit, are particularly suited to the passages of Scripture mentioned above." But neither the quince nor the citron nor the apple appears fully to answer to all the Scriptural allusions. The tappach must denote some tree the fruit of which is sweet to the taste, and possesses some fragrant and restorative properties, in order to meet all the demands of the Biblical allusions. Both the quince and the citron may satisfy the last-named requirement; but it can hardly be said that either of these fruits are sweet to the taste. The orange would answer all the demands of the Scriptural passages, and orange-trees are found in Palestine; but there does not appear sufficient evidence that this tree was known in the earlier times to the inhabitants of Palestine, the tree having been in all probability introduced at a later period. As to the apple-tree being the tappach, most travellers assert that this fruit is generally of a very inferior quality. Moreover the apple would hardly merit the character for excellent fragrance which the tappach is said to have possessed. The question of identification, therefore, must still be left an open one. As to the APPLES OF SODOM, see VINE OF SODOM. The expression "apple of the eye" occurs in Deut. xxxii. 10; Ps. xvii. 8; Prov. vii. 2; Lam. ii. 18; Zech. ii. 8. The English word is the representative of one entirely different from that considered above: the Hebrew word being ishôn, "little man"—the exact equivalent of the English pupil, the Latin pupillus.

Aquila, a Jew whom St. Paul found at Corinth on his arrival from Athens (Acts xviii. 2). He was a native of Pontus, but had fled, with his wife Priscilla, from Rome, in consequence of an order of Claudius commanding all Jews to leave the city [CLAUDIUS]. He became acquainted with St. Paul, and they abode together, and wrought at their common trade of making the Cilician tent or hair-cloth [PAUL]. On the departure of the Apostle from Corinth, a year and six months after, Priscilla and Aquila accompanied him to Ephesus on his way to Syria. There they remained; and when Apollos came to Ephesus, knowing only the baptism of John, they took him and taught him the way of the Lord more perfectly. At what time they became Christians is uncertain. When 1 Cor was written, Aquila and his wife were still in Ephesus (1 Cor. xvi. 19); but in Rom. xvi. 3 ff., we find them again at Rome, and their house a place of assembly for the Christians. They are there described as having endangered their lives for that of the Apostle. In 2 Tim. iv. 19, they are saluted as being with Timotheus, probably at Ephesus. In both these latter places the form Prisca and not Piscilla is used.

Ar, or Ar of Moab, one of the chief places of Moab (Is. xv. 1; Num. xxi. 28). In later times the place was known as Areopolis and Rabbath-Moab, i. e. the great city of Moab. The site is still called Rabba; it lies about half-way between Kerak and the Wady Mojab, 10 or 11 miles from each, the Roman road passing through it. The remains are not important. In the books of Moses, Ar appears to be used as a representative name for the whole nation of Moab; see Deut. ii. 9, 18, 29; and also Num. xxi. 15.

Aras. One of the sons of Jether, the head of a family of Asherites (1 Chr. vii. 38).

Arab, a city of Judah in the mountainous district, probably in the neighbourhood of Hebron, mentioned only in Josh. xv. 52.

Arabah. Although this word appears* in the A. V. in its original shape only in Josh. xviii.

18, yet in the Hebrew text it is of frequent occurrence. It is used generally to indicate a barren, uninhabitable district, but "the Arabah" indicates more particularly the deep-sunken valley or trench which forms the most striking among the many striking natural features of Palestine, and which extends with great uniformity of formation from the slopes of Hermon to the Élanitic Gulf (Gulf of Akabah) of the Red Sea; the most remarkable depression known to exist on the surface of the globe. Through the northern portion of this extraordinary fissure the Jordan rushes through the lakes of Huleh and Gennesareth down its tortuous course to the deep chasm of the Dead Sea. This portion, about 150 miles in length, is known amongst the Arabs by the name of el-Ghor. The southern boundary of the Ghor is the wall of cliffs which crosses the valley about 10 miles south of the Dead Sea. From their summits, southward to the Gulf of Akabah, the valley changes its name, or, it would be more accurate to say, retains its old name of Wady el-Arabah. There can be no doubt that in the times of the conquest and the monarchy the name "Arabah" was applied to the valley in the entire length of both its southern and northern portions. Thus in Deut. i. 1, probably, and in Deut. ii. 8, certainly (A. V. "plain" in both cases), the allusion is to the southern portion, while the other passages, in which the name occurs, point to the northern portion. In Deut. iii. 17, iv. 49; Josh. iii. 16, xi. 2, xii. 3; and 2 K. xiv. 25, both the Dead Sea and the Sea of Cinneroth (Gennesareth) are named in close connexion with the Arabah. The allusions in Deut. xi. 30; Josh. viii. 14, xii. 1, xviii. 18; 2 Sam. ii. 29, iv. 7; 2 K. xxv. 4; Jer. xxxix. 4, lii. 7, become at once intelligible when the meaning of the Arabah is known. In Josh. xi. 16 and xii. 8 the Arabah takes its place with "the mountain," "the lowland" plains of Philistia and Esdraelon, "the south" and "the plain" of Coele-Syria, as one of the great natural divisions of the conquered country.

Arabattine, in Idumæa (1 Macc. v. 3). [ACRABIM.]

Arabia, a country known in the O. T. under two designations:—1. The East Country (Gen. xxv. 6); or perhaps the East (Gen. x. 30; Num. xxiii. 7; Is. ii. 6); and Land of the sons of the East (Gen. xxix. 1); gentile name, Sons of the East (Judg. vi. 3, vii. 12; 1 K. iv. 30; Job i. 3; Is. xi. 14; Jer. xlix. 28; Ez. xxv. 4). From these passages it appears that the Land of the East and Sons of the East indicate, primarily, the country east of Palestine, and the tribes descended from Ishmael and from Keturah; and that this original signification may have become gradually extended to Arabia and its inhabitants generally, though without any strict limitation. The third and fourth passages above referred to relate to Mesopotamia and Babylonia. 2. Arab and Arab, whence Arabia (2 Chr. ix. 14; Is. xxi. 13; Jer. xxv. 24; Ez. xxvii. 21). This name seems to have the same geographical reference as the former name to the country and tribes east of the Jordan, and chiefly north of the Arabian peninsula.—Arabia may be divided into Arabia Proper, containing the whole peninsula as far as the limits of the northern deserts; Northern Arabia, constituting the great desert of Arabia; and Western Arabia, the desert of Petra and the peninsula of Sinai, or the country that has been called Arabia Petraea. 1. Arabia Proper, or the Arabian peninsula, consists of high table-land, declining towards the north; its most elevated portions being the chain of mountains running nearly parallel to the Red Sea, and the territory east of the southern part of this chain. So far as the interior has been explored, it consists of mountainous and desert tracts, relieved by large districts under cultivation, well peopled, watered by wells and streams, and enjoying periodical rains. The most fertile tracts are those on the south-west and south. The modern Yemen is especially productive, and at the same time, from its mountainous character, picturesque. The settled regions of the interior also appear to be more fertile than is generally believed to be the case: and the deserts afford pasturage after the rains. The products mentioned in the Bible as coming from Arabia will be found described under their respective heads. They seem to refer, in many instances, to merchandise of Ethiopia and India; carried to Palestine by Arab and other traders. Gold, however, was perhaps found in small quantities in the beds of torrents; and the spices, incense, and precious stones, brought from Arabia (1 K. x. 2, 10, 15; 2 Chr. ix. 1, 9, 14; Is. lx. 6; Jer. vi. 20; Ez. xxvii. 22), probably were the products of the southern provinces, still celebrated for spices, frankincense, ambergris, &c., as well as for the onyx and other precious stones.—II. Northern Arabia, or the Arabian Desert, is a high, undulating, parched plain, of which the Euphrates forms the natural boundary from the Persian Gulf to the frontier of Syria, whence it is bounded by the latter country and the desert of Petra on the north-west and west, the peninsula of Arabia forming its southern limit. It has few oases, the water of the wells is generally either brackish or unpotable, and it is visited by the sand-wind called Sannoom. The Arabs find pasture for their flocks and herds after the rains, and in the more depressed plains; and the desert generally produces prickly shrubs, &c., on which the camels feed. The inhabitants were known to the ancients as "dwellers in tents," Scenitas (comp. Is. xiii. 20; Jer. xlix. 31; Ezek. xxxviii. 11); and they extended from Babylonia on the east (comp. Num. xxiii. 7; 2 Chr. xxi. 16; Is. ii. 6, xiii. 20), to the borders of Egypt on the west. These tribes, principally descended from Ishmael and from Keturah, have always led a wandering and pastoral life. Their predatory habits are several times mentioned in the O. T. (2 Chr. xxi. 16, 17, xxvi. 7; Job i. 15; Jer. iii. 2). They conducted a considerable trade of merchandise of Arabia and India from the shores of the Persian Gulf (Ezek. xxvii. 20-24), whence a chain of oases still forms caravan-stations; and they likewise traded from the western portions of the peninsula. The latter traffic appears to be frequently mentioned in connexion with Ishmaelites, Keturahites, and other Arabian peoples (Gen. xxxvii. 25, 28; 1 K. x. 15, 25; 2 Chr. ix. 14, 24; Is. lx. 6; Jer. vi. 20), and probably consisted of the products of southern Arabia and of the opposite shores of Ethiopia: it seems, however, to have been chiefly in the hands of the inhabitants of Idumæa; but it is difficult to distinguish between the references to the latter people and to the tribes of Northern Arabia in the passages relating to this traffic. That certain of these tribes brought tribute to Jehoshaphat appears from 2 Chr. xvii. 11; and elsewhere there are indications of such tribute. respecting these tribes, see ISHMAEL, KETURAH.—

III. Western Arabia includes the peninsula of Sinai [SINAI], and the desert of Petra, corresponding generally with the limits of Arabia Petraea. The latter name is probably derived from that of its chief city; not from its stony character. It was in the earliest times inhabited by a people whose genealogy is not mentioned in the Bible, the Horites or Horim (Gen. xiv. 6, xxxvi. 20, 21, 22, 29, 30; Deut. ii. 12, 22). [HORITES.] Its later inhabitants were in part the same as those of the preceding division of Arabia, as indeed the boundary of the two countries is arbitrary and unsettled; but it was mostly peopled by descendants of Esau, and was generally known as the land of Edom, or Idumaea [EDOM]; as well as by its older appellation, the desert of Seir, or Mount Seir [SEIR]. The common origin of the Idumaeans from Esau and Ishmael is found in the marriage of the former with a daughter of the latter (Gen. xxviii. 9, xxxvi. 3). The Nabathaeans succeeded to the Idumaeans, and Idumaea is mentioned only as a geographical designation after the time of Josephus. The Nabathaeans are identified with Nebaioth, son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 13; Is. lx. 7). Petra was in the great route of the western caravan-traffic of Arabia, and of the merchandise brought up the Elanitic Gulf. See EDM, ELATH, EZION-GEBER, &c. — Inhabitants. The Arabs, like every other ancient nation of any celebrity, have traditions representing their country as originally inhabited by races which became extinct at a very remote period. The majority of their historians derive these tribes from Shem; but some, from Ham, though not through Cush. Their earliest traditions that have any obvious relation to the Bible refer the origin of the existing nation in the first instance to Kahtán, whom they and most European scholars identify with Joktan; and secondly to Ishmael, whom they assert to have married a descendant of Kahtán. They are silent respecting Cushite settlements in Arabia; but modern research, we think, proves that Cushites were among its early inhabitants. [CUSH.]—1. The descendants of JOKTAN occupied the principal portions of the south and south-west of the peninsula, with colonies in the interior. In Genesis (x. 30) it is said, "and their dwelling was from Mesha, as thou goest unto Sephar, a mount of the East [Kedem]." The position of Mesha is very uncertain; it is most reasonably supposed to be the western limit of the first settlers [MESHA]: Sephar is undoubtedly Dhufári, or Zifári, of the Arabs, a name not uncommon in the peninsula, but especially that of two celebrated towns—one being the seaport on the south coast, near Mirbát; the other, now in ruins, near San'á, and said to be the ancient residence of the Himyrite kings. The latter is probably Sephar; it is situated near a thuriferous mountain, and exports the best frankincense [SEPHAR]. In the district indicated above are distinct and undoubted traces of the names of the sons of Joktan mentioned in Genesis (x. 26-29), such as Hadrámáwt for Hazar-maveth, Azál for Uzal, Sebá for Sheba, &c. Their remains are found in the existing inhabitants of (at least) its eastern portion, and their records in the numerous Himyrite ruins and inscriptions.—The principal Joktanite kingdom, and the chief state of ancient Arabia, was that of the Yemen, founded (according to the Arabs) by Yaarub, the son (or descendant) of Kahtán (Joktan). Its most ancient capital was probably San'á, formerly called A'ál after Azál, son of Joktan. [UZAL.] The other capitals were Ma-rib, or Sebá, and Zafára. This was the Biblical kingdom of Sheba. Its rulers, and most of its people, were descendants of Sebá (= Sheba), whence the classical Sabaei. Among its rulers was probably the Queen of Sheba who came to hear the wisdom of Solomon (1 K. x. 2). [SHEBA.] The dominant family was apparently that of Himyer, son (or descendant) of Sebá. A member of this family founded the more modern kingdom of the Himyrites. The testimony of the Bible, and of the classical writers, as well as native tradition, seems to prove that the latter appellation superseded the former only shortly before the Christian era: i.e. after the foundation of the later kingdom. The rule of the Himyrites (whence the Homeritae of classical authors) probably extended over the modern Yemen, Hadrámáwt, and Mahreh. Their kingdom lasted until A.D. 525, when it fell before an Abyssinian invasion. Already, about the middle of the 4th century, the kings of Axum appear to have become masters of part of the Yemen, adding to their titles the names of places in Arabia belonging to the Himyrites. After four reigns they were succeeded by Himyrite princes, vassals of Persia, the last of whom submitted to Mohammád. Kings of Hadrámáwt (the classical Chatramotitae) are also enumerated by the Arabs, and distinguished from the descendants of Yaarub, an indication of their separate descent from Hazar-maveth [HAZARMAVETH]. The Greek geographers mention a fourth people in conjunction with the Sabaei, Homeritae, and Chatramotitae,—the Minaei, who have not been identified with any Biblical or modern name. Some place them as high as Mekkeh, and derive their name from Míná (the sacred valley N.E. of that city), or from the goddess Manáh, worshipped in the district between Mekkeh and El-Medeneh. The other chief Joktanite kingdom was that of the Hijáz, founded by Jurhum, the brother of Yaarub, who left the Yemen and settled in the neighbourhood of Mekkeh. The Arab lists of its kings are inextricably confused; but the name of their leader and that of two of his successors was Mudád (or El-Mudád), who probably represents Almodad [ALMODAD]. Ishmael, according to the Arabs, married a daughter of the first Mudád, whence sprang 'Adnán the ancestor of Mohammad. This kingdom, situated in a less fertile district than the Yemen, and engaged in conflict with aboriginal tribes, never attained the importance of that of the south. It merged, by intermarriage and conquest, into the tribes of Ishmael. An Arab author identifies Jurhum with Hadoram [HADORAM].—2. The ISHMAELITES appear to have entered the peninsula from the north-west. That they have spread over the whole of it (with the exception of one or two districts on the south coast which are said to be still inhabited by unmixed Joktanite peoples), and that the modern nation is predominantly Ishmaelite, is asserted by the Arabs. They do not, however, carry up their genealogies higher than 'Adnán (as we have already said), and they have lost the names of most of Ishmael's immediate and near descendants. Such as have been identified with existing names will be found under the several articles bearing their names. [See also HAGARENES.] They extended northwards from the Hijáz into the Arabian desert, where they mixed with Keturahites and other Abrahamic peoples; and westwards to Idumaea, where they mixed with Edomites, &c. The tribes sprung from Ishmael have always been governed by petty chiefs or heads of families (sheykhs and emers); they have generally followed a patriarchal life, and have not originated kingdoms, though they have in some instances succeeded to those of Joktanites, the principal one of these being that of El-Heerah. With reference to the Ishmaelites generally, we may observe, that although their first settlements in the Hijáz, and their spreading over a great part of the northern portions of the peninsula, are sufficiently proved, there is doubt as to the wide extension given to them by Arab tradition. Mohamad derived from the Jews whatever tradition he pleased, and silenced any contrary, by the Kurán or his own dicta. This religious element, which does not directly affect the tribes of Joktan (whose settlements are otherwise unquestionably identified), has a great influence over those of Ishmael. They therefore cannot be certainly proved to have spread over the peninsula, notwithstanding the almost universal adoption of their language (which is generally acknowledged to have been the Arabic commonly so called), and the concurrent testimony of the Arabs; but from these and other considerations it becomes at the same time highly probable that they now form the predominant element of the Arab nation.—3. Of the descendants of KETURAH the Arabs say little. They appear to have settled chiefly north of the peninsula in Deset Arabia, from Palestine to the Persian Gulf; and the passages in the Bible in which mention is made of Dedan (except those relating to the Cushite Dedan, Gen. x. 7) refer apparently to the tribe sprung from this race (Is. xxi. 13; Jer. xxv. 23; Ez. xxvii. 20), perhaps with an admixture of the Cushite Dedan, who seems to have passed up the western shores of the Persian Gulf. [KETURAH].—4. In Northern and Western Arabia are other peoples which, from their geographical position and mode of life, are sometimes classed with the Arabs. Of these are AMALEK, the descendants of ESAU, &c. —Religion. The most ancient idolatry of the Arabs we must conclude to have been fetichism, of which there are striking proofs in the sacred trees and stones of historical times, and in the worship of the heavenly bodies, or Sabaeism. To the worship of the heavenly bodies we find allusions in Job (xxxi. 26-28) and to the belief in the influence of the stars to give rain (xxxviii. 31), where the Pleiades give rain, and Orion withholds it; and again in Judges (v. 20) where the stars fight against the host of Sisera. The names of the objects of the earlier fetichism, the stone-worship, tree-worship, &c., of various tribes, are too numerous to mention. One, that of Maná, the goddess worshipped between Mekkeh and El-Medeeneh has been compared with Meni (Is. lxx. 11), which is rendered in the A. V. "number." Magianism, an importation from Chaldaea and Persia, must be reckoned among the religions of the Pagan Arabs; but it never had very numerous followers. Christianity was introduced in southern Arabia towards the close of the 2nd century, and about a century later it had made great progress. It flourished chiefly in the Yemen, where many churches were built. It also rapidly advanced in other portions of Arabia, through the kingdom of Heerah and the contiguous countries, Ghassán, and other parts. The persecutions of the Christians brought about the fall of the Himyerite dynasty by the invasion of the Christian ruler of Abyssinia. Judaism was propagated in Arabia, principally by Karaites, at the captivity, but it was introduced before that time: it became very prevalent in the Yemen, and in the Hijáz, especially at Kheybar and El-Medeeneh, where there are said to be still tribes of Jewish extraction.—Language. Arabic, the language of Arabia, is the most developed and the richest of the Semitic languages; and the only one of which we have an extensive literature: it is, therefore, of great importance to the study of Hebrew. Of its early phases we know nothing; while we have archaic monuments of the Himyeritic (the ancient language of southern Arabia), though we cannot fix their precise ages. Of the existence of Hebrew and Chaldee (or Aramaic) in the time of Jacob there is evidence in Gen. xxxi. 47; and probably Jacob and Laban understood each other, the one speaking Hebrew and the other Chaldee. It seems also (Judg. vii. 9-15) that Gideon, or Phurah, or both, understood the conversation of the Midianites, and the Amalakites, and all the children of the east." It is probable, therefore, that in the 14th or 13th cent. B.C. the Semitic languages differed much less than in after times. But it appears from 2 K. xviii. 26, that in the 8th cent. B.C. only the educated classes among the Jews understood Aramaic. With these evidences before us, and making a due distinction between the archaic and the known phases of the Aramaic and the Arabic, we think that the Himyeritic is to be regarded as a sister of the Hebrew, and the Arabic (commonly so called) as a sister of the Hebrew and Aramaic, or, in its classical phase, as a descendant of a sister of these two, but that the Himyeritic is mixed with an African language, and that the other dialects of Arabia are in like manner, though in a much less degree, mixed with an African language.—Respecting the Himyeritic, until lately little was known; but monuments bearing inscriptions in this language have been discovered in the southern parts of the peninsula, principally in Hadramáwt and the Yemen, and some of the inscriptions have been published.—The manners and customs of the Arabs are of great value in illustrating the Bible. No one can mix with this people without being constantly and forcibly reminded either of the early patriarchs or of the settled Israelites. We may instance their pastoral life, their hospitality, that most remarkable of desert virtues [HOSPITALITY], their universal respect for age (comp. Lev. xix. 32), their familiar deference (comp. 2 K. v. 13), their superstitious regard for the beard. On the signet-ring, which is worn on the little finger of the right hand, is usually inscribed a sentence expressive of submission to God, or of His perfection, &c., explaining Ex. xxxix. 30, "the engraving of a signet, Holiness to the Lord," and the saying of our Lord (John iii. 33), "He . . . hath set to his seal that God is true." As a mark of trust, this ring is given to another person (as in Gen. xli. 42). The inkhorn worn in the girdle is also very ancient (Ez. ix. 2, 3, 11), as well as the veil. A man has a right to claim his cousin in marriage, and he relinquishes this right by taking off his shoe, as the kinsman of Ruth did to Boaz (Ruth iv. 7, 8).—References in the Bible to the Arabs themselves are still more clearly illustrated by the manners of the modern people, in their predatory expeditions, their mode of warfare, their caravan journeys, &c. To the interpretation of the book of Job, an intimate knowledge of this people and their language and literature is essential; for many of the most obscure passages can only be explained by that knowledge.—Commerce. Direct mention of the commerce of the south does not appear to be made in the Bible, but it seems to have passed to Palestine principally through the northern tribes. Passages relating to the fleets of Solomon and to the maritime trade, however, bear on this subject, which is a curious study for the historical inquirer. The Joktanite people of southern Arabia have always been, in contradistinction to the Ishmaelite tribes, addicted to a seafaring life. The latter were caravan-merchants; the former, the chief traders of the Red Sea, carrying their commerce to the shores of India, as well as to the nearer coasts of Africa. The classical writers also make frequent mention of the commerce of southern Arabia. It was evidently carried to Palestine by the two great caravan routes from the head of the Red Sea and from that of the Persian Gulf: the former especially taking with it African produce; the latter, Indian. It should be observed that the wandering propensities of the Arabs, of whatever descent, do not date from the promulgation of El-Islām. All testimony goes to show that from the earliest ages the peoples of Arabia formed colonies in distant lands, and have not been actuated by the desire of conquest or by religious impulse alone in their foreign expeditions; but rather by restlessness and commercial activity.

Arabians, the nomadic tribes inhabiting the country to the east and south of Palestine, who in the early times of Hebrew history were known as Ishmaelites and descendants of Keturah. Their roving pastoral life in the desert is alluded to in Is. xiii. 20; Jer. iii. 2; 2 Macc. xii. 11; their country is associated with the country of the Dedanim, the travelling merchants (Is. xxi. 13), with Dedan, Tema, and Buz (Jer. xxv. 24), and with Dedan and Kedar (Ez. xxvii. 21), all of which are supposed to have occupied the northern part of the peninsula later known as Arabia. During the prosperous reign of Jehoshaphat, the Arabians, in conjunction with the Philistines, were tributary to Judah (2 Chr. xvii. 11), but in the reign of his successor they revolted, ravaged the country, plundered the royal palace, slew all the king's sons with the exception of the youngest, and carried off the royal harem (2 Chr. xxi. 16, xxii. 1). The Arabians of Gur-baal were again subdued by Uzziah (2 Chr. xxvi. 7). On the return from Babylon they were among the foremost in hindering Nehemiah in his work of restoration, and plotted with the Ammonites and others for that end (Neh. iv. 7). Geshem, or Gashmu, one of the leaders of the opposition, was of this race (Neh. fi. 19, vii. 1). In later times the Arabians served under Timotheus in his struggle with Judas Maccabeus, but were defeated (1 Macc. v. 39; 2 Macc. xii. 10). The Zabadeans, an Arab tribe, were routed by Jonathan, the brother and successor of Judas (1 Macc. xii. 31). Zabdiel, the assassin of Alexander Balus (1 Macc. xi. 17), and Simalcne, who brought up Antiochus, the young son of Alexander (1 Macc. xi. 39), afterwards Antiochus VI., were both Arabians. In the time of the N. T. the term appears to have been restricted in the same manner. [ARABIA.]

Arad, a Benjamite, son of Beriah, who drove out the inhabitants of Gath (1 Chr. viii. 15).

Arad, a royal city of the Canaanites, named with Hormah and Libnah (Josh. i. 14). The wilderness of Judah was to "the south of Arad" (Judg. i. 15). It is also undoubtedly named in

Num. xxi. 1 (comp. Hormah in ver. 33) and xxxiii. 40, "the Canaanite king of Arad," instead of the reading of the A. V., "king Arad the Canaanite." It is mentioned in the Onomasticon (Arad) as a city of the Amorites, near the desert of Kaides, 4 miles from Malatha (Moladah), and 20 from Hebron. It may be identified with a hill, Tell Arad, an hour and a half N.E. by E. from Milh (Moladah), and 8 hours from Hebron.

Aradus, (1 Macc. xv. 23), the same place as ARVAD.

Arah. 1. An Asherite, of the sons of Ulla (1 Chr. vii. 39).—2. The sons of Arah returned with Zerubabel in number 775 according to Ezr. ii. 5, but 652 according to Neh. vii. 10. One of his descendants, Shechaniah, was the father-in-law of Tobiah the Ammonite (Neh. vi. 10). The name is written as ARES in 1 Esd. r. 10.

Aram (probably from a root signifying height, and which is also the base of "Ramah"), the name by which the Hebrews designated, generally, the country lying to the north-east of Palestine; the great mass of that high table-land which, rising with sudden abruptness from the Jordan and the very margin of the lake of Gennesareth, stretches, at an elevation of no less than 2000 feet above the level of the sea, to the banks of the Euphrates itself, contrasting strongly with the low land bordering on the Mediterranean, the "land of Canaan," or the low country (Gen. xxxi. 18, xxxiii. 18, &c.). Throughout the A. V. the word is, with only a very few exceptions, rendered, as in the Vulgate and LXX., SYRIA; a name which, it must be remembered, includes far more to our ears, than did Aram to the Hebrews. [SYRIA.] Its earliest occurrence in the book of Genesis is in the form of Aram-naharaim, i. e. the "highland of or between the two rivers" (Gen. xxiv. 10, A. V. "Mesopotamia"), but in several succeeding chapters, and in other parts of the Pentateuch, the word is used without any addition, to designate a dweller in Aram-naharaim—Laban or Bethuel—"the Aramite" (see Gen. xxv. 20, xxviii. 2, 5, xxxi. 20, 24; also Judg. iii. 10, compared with 8; Deut. xxvi. 5, compared with xxxiii. 4, and Ps. lx. title). Padan, or accurately Paddan, Aram ("cultivated highland," from paddah to plough) was another designation for the same region (Gen. xxv. 20, xxviii. 2).

Later in the history we meet with a number of small nations or kingdoms forming parts of the general land of Aram:—1. Aram-Zobah, or simply Zobah (1 Sam. xiv. 47; 2 Sam. viii. 3; 1 Chr. xviii. xix.) [ZOBAB.]. 2. Aram beth-rehob (2 Sam. x. 6), or Rehob (x. 8). [REHOB.]. 3. Aram-machah (1 Chr. xix. 6), or Machah only (2 Sam. x. 6). [MAACHAH.]. 4. Geshur, "in Aram" (2 Sam. xv. 8), usually named in connexion with Maachah (Deut. iii. 14; Josh. xiii. 11, 13, &c.). [GESHUR.]. 5. Aram-Dammeseck (Damascus) (2 Sam. viii. 5, 6; 1 Chr. xviii. 5, 6). The whole of these petty states are spoken of collectively under the name of "Aram" (2 Sam. x. 13), but as Damascus increased in importance it gradually absorbed the smaller powers (1 K. xi. 1), and the name of Aram was at last applied to it alone (Is. vii. 8; also 1 K. xi. 24, 25, xv. 18, &c.). According to the genealogical table in Gen. x., Aram was a son of Shem, and his brethren were Elam, Asshur, and Arphaxad. It will be observed that these names occur in regular order from the east.

Aram closing the list on the borders of the "western sea." In three passages Aram would seem to denote Assyria (2 K. xviii. 26; Is. xxxvi. 11; Jer. xxxv. 11).—2. Another Aram is named in Gen. xxii. 21q as a son of Kemuel, and descendant of Nahor. From its mention with Uz and Buz it is probably identical with the tribe of Ram, to the "kindred" of which belonged "Elihu the son of Barachel the Buzite," who was visiting Job in the land of Uz (Job xxxii. 2).—3. An Asherite, one of the sons of Shamer (1 Chr. vii. 34).—4. Son of Esrom, or Hezron, and the same as RAM (Matt. i. 3, 4; Luke iii. 33).

A'ram-naharaim (Ps. lx. title). [ARAM 1.]

A'ram-za'bah (Ps. lx. title). [ARAM 1.]

Arami'tess, a female inhabitant of Aram (1 Chr. vii. 14). In other passages of the A. V. the ethnic of Aram is rendered "Syrian."

A'ran, a Hovite, son of Dishan and brother of Uz (Gen. xxxvi. 28; 1 Chr. i. 42).

Ararat, a mountainous district of Asia mentioned in the Bible in connexion with the following events:—(1.) As the resting-place of the Ark after the Deluge (Gen. viii. 4); (2.) as the asylum of the sons of Semachieib (2 K. xix. 37; Is. xxxvii. 38; A. V. has "the land of Armenia"); (3.) as the ally, and probably the neighbour, of Mimi and Ashchenaz (Jer. li. 27). [ARMENIA.] The name Ararat was unknown to the geographers of Greece and Rome, as it still is to the Armenians of the present day: but that it was an indigenous and an ancient name for a portion of Armenia, appears from the statement of Moses of Chorene, who gives Araratia as the designation of the central province. In its Biblical sense it is descriptive generally of the Armenian highlands—the lofty plateau which overlooks the plain of the Araxes on the N., and of Mesopotamia on the S. Various opinions have been put forth as to the spot where the Ark rested, as described in Gen. viii. 4; but Berosus the Chaldean, contemporary with Alexander the Great, fixes the spot on the mountains of Kurdistan. Tradition still points to the Jebel Judi as the scene of the event, and maintains the belief, as stated by Berosus, that fragments of the ark exist on its summit. Josephus also quotes Nicolaus Damascus to the effect that a mountain named Baris, beyond Minyas, was the spot. That the scene of an event so deeply interesting to mankind had even at that early age been transferred, as was natural, to the loftiest and most imposing mountain in the district, appears from the statements of Josephus that the spot where Noah left the ark had received a name descriptive of that event, which he renders Apobaterion, and which is identical with Nuchdjevan, on the banks of the Araxes. To this neighbourhood all the associations connected with Noah are now assigned by the native Armenians, and their opinion has been so far indorsed by Europeans that they have given the name Ararat exclusively to the mountain which is called Massis by the Armenians, Agri-Dagh, i. e. Steep Mountain, by the Turks, and Kuh-i-Nuh, i. e. Noah's Mountain, by the Persians. It rises immediately out of the plain of the Araxes, and terminates in two conical peaks, named the Great and Less Ararat, about seven miles distant from each other; the former of which attains an elevation of 17,260 feet above the level of the sea and about 14,000 above the plain of the Araxes, while the latter is lower by 4000 feet. The summit of the higher is covered with eternal snow for about 3000 feet. It is of volcanic origin. The summit of Ararat was long deemed inaccessible. It was first ascended in 1829 by Parrot, who approached it from the N.W.; he describes a secondary summit about 400 yards distant from the highest point, and on the gentle depression which connects the two eminences he surmises that the ark rested. The region immediately below the limits of perpetual snow is barren and unvisited by beast or bird. Arguri, the only village known to have been built on its slopes, was the spot where, according to tradition, Noah planted his vineyard. Lower down, in the plain of Araxes, is Nuchdjevan, where the patriarch is reputed to have been buried. Returning to the broader signification we have assigned to the term, "the mountains of Ararat," as co-extensive with the Armenian plateau from the base of Ararat in the N. to the range of Kurdistan in the S., we notice the following characteristics of that region as illustrating the Bible narrative:—(1.) Its elevation. It rises to a height of from 6000 to 7000 feet above the level of the sea, presenting a surface of extensive plains, whence spring other lofty mountain ranges, having a generally parallel direction from E. to W., and connected with each other by transverse ridges of moderate height. (2.) Its geographical position. The Armenian plateau stands equidistant from the Euxine and the Caspian seas on the N., and between the Persian Gulf and the Mediterranean on the S. Viewed with reference to the dispersion of the nations, Armenia is the true centre of the world: and it is a significant fact that at the present day Ararat is the great boundary-stone between the empires of Russia, Turkey, and Persia. (3.) Its physical character. The plains as well as the mountains supply evidence of volcanic agency. Armenia, however, differs materially from other regions of similar geological formation, inasmuch as it does not rise to a sharp well-defined central crest, but expands into plains or steppes, separated by a graduated series of subordinate ranges. The result of this expansion is that Armenia is far more accessible, both from without, and within its own limits, than other districts of similar elevation. The fall of the ground in the centre of the plateau is not decided in any direction, as is demonstrated by the early courses of the rivers—the Araxes, which flows into the Caspian, rising westward of either branch of the Euphrates, and taking at first a northerly direction—the Tigris, which flows to the S., rising northward of the Araxes, and taking a westerly direction. (4.) The climate. Winter lasts from October to May, and is succeeded by a brief spring and summer of intense heat. In April the Armenian plains are still covered with snow; and in the early part of September it freezes keenly at night. (5.) The vegetation. Grass grows luxuriantly on the plateau, and furnishes abundant pasture during the summer months to the flocks of the nomad Kurds. Wheat, barley, and vines ripen at far higher altitudes than on the Alps and the Pyrenees; and the harvest is brought to maturity with wonderful speed. The general result of these observations would be to show that, while the elevation of the Armenian plateau constituted it the natural resting-place of the ark after the Deluge, its geographical position and its physical character secured an impartial distribution of the families of mankind to the various quarters of the world. The climate furnished a powerful inducement to seek the more tempting regions on all sides of it. At the same time the character of the vegetation was remarkably adapted to the nomad state in which we may conceive the early generations of Noah's descendants to have lived.

Ar'arath (Tob. i. 21). [ARARAT.]

Arau'nah, a Jebusite who sold his threshing-floor on Mount Moriah to David as a site for an altar to Jehovah, together with his oxen (2 Sam. xxiv. 18-24; 1 Chr. xxi. 25). From the expression (2 Sam. xxiv. 23) "these things did Araunah, the king, give unto the king," it has been inferred that he was one of the royal race of the Jebusites. His name is variously written in various places (2 Sam. xxiv. 16, 18; 1 Chr. xxi.; 2 Chr. iii.). [ORNAN.]

Ar'ba, the progenitor of the ANAKIM, or sons of Anak, from whom their chief city HEBRON received its name of Kirjath-Arba (Josh. xiv. 15, xv. 13, xxi. 11).

Ar'bah. Hebron, or Kirjath-Arba, as "the city of Arbah" is always rendered elsewhere (Gen. xxxv. 27). [HEBRON.]

Ar'bathite, the, i. e. a native of the Arabah or Ghor. [ARABAH.] Abialbon the A. was one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii. 31; 1 Chr. xi. 32).

Arbat'is, a district of Palestine named in 1 Macc. v. 23 only, perhaps a corruption of Acriabatine, the province or toparchy which lay between Neapolis and Jericho. [ARABATTINE.]

Arbela, mentioned in the Bible only in 1 Macc. ix. 2, and there only as defining the situation of Masaloth, a place besieged and taken by Bacchides and Alcimus at the opening of the campaign in which Judas Maccabeus was killed. According to Josephus this was at Arbela of Galilee, a place which he elsewhere states to be near Sepphoris, on the lake of Gennesareth, and remarkable for certain impregnable caves, the resort of robbers and insurgents, and the scene of more than one desperate encounter. These topographical requirements are fully met by the existing Irbid, a site with a few ruins, west of Medjel, on the south-east side of the Wady Hamam, in a small plain at the foot of the hill of Kuran Hattin. The caverns are in the opposite face of the ravine, and bear the name of Kul'at Ibn Maan. Arbela may be the Beth-arbel of Hos. x. 14, but there is nothing to ensure it.

Ar'bite, the. Paara! the Arbite was one of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 35). The word signifies a native of ARAB. In the parallel list of Chronicles it is given as Ben-Ezbai. [EZBAI.]

Arbona'i (Jud. ii. 24). [ABRONAS.]

Archela'us, son of Herod the Great, by a Samaritan woman, Malthaké, and, with his brother Antipas, brought up at Rome. At the death of Herod (B.C. 4) his kingdom was divided between his three sons, Herod Antipas, Archelaus, and Philip. Archelaus received the half, containing Idumaea, Judaea, Samaria, and the cities on the coast, with 600 talents' income. He never properly bore the title of king (Matt. ii. 22), but only that of ethnarch, so that the former word must be taken as loosely used. In the tenth year of his reign, or the ninth, according to Dion Cassius, i. c. A.D. 6, a complaint was preferred against him by his brothers and his subjects on the ground of his tyranny, in consequence of which he was banished to Vienne in Gaul, where he is generally said to have died. But Jerome relates that he was shown the sepulchre of Archelaus near Bethlehem. He seems to have been guilty of great cruelty and oppression (comp. Matt. ii. 22). Josephus relates that he put to death 3000 Jews in the Temple not long after his accession. Archelaus wedded illegally Glaphyra, once the wife of his brother Alexander, who had had children by her.

Archery. [ARMS.]

Ar'chevites, perhaps the inhabitants of ERECH, some of whom had been placed as colonists in Samaria (Ezr. iv. 9).

Ar'chi (Josh. xvi. 2). [ARCHITE.]

Archippus, a Christian teacher in Colossae (Col. iv. 17), called by St. Paul his "fellow-soldier," (Philem. 2). As the last-quoted epistle is addressed to him jointly with Philemon and Apphia, it seems necessary to infer that he was a member of Philemon's family. Jerome, Theodoret, and Occumenius, suppose him to have been overseer of the church at Colossae. Others believe him to have been a teacher at Laodicea. There is a legend that he was of the number of the Seventy disciples, and suffered martyrdom at Chonae, near Laodicea.

Archite, the (as if from a place named Erech), the usual designation of David's friend Hushai (2 Sam. xv. 32, xvii. 5, 14; 1 Chr. xxvii. 33). The word also appears in Josh. xvi. 2, where "the borders of Archi" (i. e. "the Archite") are named as somewhere in the neighbourhood of Bethel.

Architecture. The book of Genesis (iv. 17, 20, 22) appears to divide mankind into great characteristic sections, viz., the "dwellers in tents" and the "dwellers in cities." To the race of Shem is attributed (Gen. x. 11, 12, 22, xi. 2-9) the foundation of those cities in the plain of Shinar, Babylon, Nineveh, and others; of one of which, Resen, the epithet "great" sufficiently marks its importance in the time of the writer. From the same book we learn the account of the earliest recorded building, and of the materials employed in its construction (Gen. xi. 3, 9); and though a doubt rests on the precise spot of the tower of Belus, so long identified with the Birs Nimroud, yet the nature of the soil, and the bricks found there in such abundance, though bearing mostly the name of Nebuchadnezzar, agree perfectly with the supposition of a city previously existing on the same or a closely neighbouring site. In Esth. i. 2 mention is made of the palace at Susa, the spring residence of the kings of Persia (Esth. iii. 15); and in the books of Tobit and Judith, of Ecbatana, to which they retired during the heat of summer (Tob. iii. 7, xiv. 14; Jud. i. 14). It is in connexion with Egypt that the Israelites appear first as builders of cities, compelled to labour at the buildings of the Egyptian monarchs. Pithom and Raamses are said to have been built by them (Ex. i. 11). The Israelites were by occupation shepherds, and by habit dwellers in tents (Gen. xlvii. 3). They had therefore originally, speaking properly, no architecture. Even Hebron, a city of higher antiquity than the Egyptian Zoan (Tunis), was called originally from its founder, perhaps a Canaanite of the race of Anak, Kirjath-Arba, the city of Arba (Num. xiii. 22; Josh. xiv. 15). From the time of the occupation of Canaan they became dwellers in towns and in houses of stone (Lev. xiv. 34, 45; 1 K. vii. 10); but these were not all, nor indeed in most cases, built by themselves (Deut. vi. 10; Num. xiii. 19). The peaceful reign and vast wealth of Solomon gave great impulse to architecture; for besides the Temple and his other great works, he built fortresses and cities in various places, among which Balaath and Tadmor are in all probability represented by Baalbec and Palmyra (1 K. ix. 15, 24). Among the succeeding kings of Israel and of Judah, more than one is recorded as a builder: Asa (1 K. xv. 23), Baasha (xv. 17), Omri (xvi. 24), Ahab (xvi. 32, xxii. 39), Hezekiah (2 K. xx. 20; 2 Chr. xxxiii. 27-30), Jehoash, and Josiah (2 K. xii. 11, 12, xxii. 6); and, lastly, Jehoiakim, whose winter palace is mentioned (Jer. xli. 14, xxxvi. 22; see also Am. iii.

15). On the return from captivity the chief care of the rulers was to rebuild the Temple and the walls of Jerusalem in a substantial manner, with stone, and with timber from Lebanon (Ezr. iii. 8, v. 8; Neh. ii. 8, iii.). But the reigns of Herod and his successors were especially remarkable for their great architectural works. Not only was the Temple restored but the fortifications and other public buildings of Jerusalem were enlarged and embellished (Luke xxi. 5). The town of Caesarea was built on the site of Strato's Tower; Samaria was enlarged, and received the name of Sebaste. Of the original splendour of these great works no doubt can be entertained; but of their style and appearance we can only conjecture that they were formed on Greek and Roman models. The connexion of Solomon with Egypt and with Tyre, and the influence of the Captivity, must necessarily have affected the style of the palatial edifices of that monarch, and of the first and second temples. The enormous stones employed in the Assyrian, Persian, and Egyptian buildings, find a parallel in the substructions of Baalbec and in the huge blocks which still remain at Jerusalem, relics of the buildings either of Solomon or of Herod. But few monuments are known to exist in Palestine by which we can form an accurate idea of its buildings, and even of those which do remain no trustworthy examination has yet been made. It is probable, however, that the reservoirs known under the names of the Pools of Solomon and Hezekiah contain some portions at least of the original fabrics. The domestic architecture of the Jews, so far as it can be understood, is treated under HOUSE.

Arcturus. The Hebrew words 'Ash and 'Aish, rendered "Arcturus" in the A. V. of Job ix. 9, xxxviii. 32, in conformity with the Vulg. of the former passage, are now generally believed to be identical, and to represent the constellation Ursa Major, known commonly as the Great Bear, or Charles's Wain. Niebuhr (Desc. de l'Arab. p. 101) relates that he met with a Jew at Samà, who identified the Hebrew 'Ash with the constellation known to the Arabs by the name Om en-nash, or Nash simply, as a Jew of Bagdad informed him. The four stars in the body of the Bear are named En-nash in the tables of Ulugh Beigh, those in the tail being called el Benât, "the daughters" (comp. Job xxxviii. 32). The ancient versions differ greatly in their renderings. The LXX. render 'Ash by the "Pleiades" in Job ix. 9 (unless the text which they had before them had the words in a different order), and 'Aish by "Hesperus," the evening star, in Job xxxviii. 32. In the former they are followed or supported by the Chaldee, in the latter by the Vulgate. R. David Kimchi and the Talmudists understood by 'Ash the tail of the Ram or the head of the Bull, by which they are supposed to indicate the bright star Aldebaran in the Bull's eye. But the greatest difficulty exists in the rendering of the Syriac translators, who give as the equivalent of both 'Ash and 'Aish the word 'Iyutho, which is interpreted to signify the bright star Capella in the constellation Auriga, and is so rendered in the Arabic translation of Job. On this point, however, great difference of opinion exists. 'Bar Ali conjectured that 'Iyutho was either Capella or the constellation Orion; while Bar Bahlul hesitated between Capella, Aldebaran, and a cluster of three stars in the face of Orion. Following the rendering of the Arabic, Hyde was induced to consider 'Ash and 'Aish distinct; the former being the Great Bear, and the latter the bright star Capella, or the α of the constellation Auriga.

Ard, the son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin (Gen. xlii. 21; Num. xxvi. 40), there being no reason to suppose that in these passages two different persons are intended. In 1 Chr. viii. 3, he is called ADDAR.

Ardath—"the field called Ardath"—2 Esdr. ix. 26.

Ardites, the descendants of Ard or Addar the grandson of Benjamin (Num. xxvi. 40).

Ardon, a son of Caleb, the son of Hezron, by his wife Azubah (1 Chr. ii. 18.).

Areli, a son of Gad (Gen. xlii. 16; Num. xxvi. 17). His descendants are called THE ARELITES (Num. xxvi. 17).

Areopagite, a member of the court of Areopagus (Acts xvii. 34). [MARS' HILL.]

Areopagus. [MARS' HILL.]

Ares (1 Esdr. v. 10). [ARAH 2.]

Aretas, a common appellation of many of the Arabian kings or chiefs. Two are mentioned in the Bible.—1. A contemporary of Antiochus Epiphanes (B.C. 170) and Jason (2 Macc. v. 8).—2. The Aretas alluded to by St. Paul (2 Cor. xi. 32) was father-in-law of Herod Antipas. [HEROD.] There is a somewhat difficult chronological question respecting the subordination of Damascus to this Aretas. Under Augustus and Tiberius the city was attached to the province of Syria; and it is probable that a change in the rulership took place after the death of Tiberius. There had been war for some time between Aretas, king of Arabia Nabataea, and Antipas. A battle was fought, and the army of Antipas entirely destroyed. Vitellius, governor of Syria, was sent to his aid; but while on his march he heard of the death of Tiberius (A.D. 37), and remained at Antioch. By this change of affairs at Rome a complete reversal took place in the situation of Antipas and his enemy. The former was ere long (A.D. 39) banished to Lyons, and his kingdom given to Agrippa. It would be natural that Aretas should be received into favour; and the more so as Vitellius had an old grudge against Antipas. Now in the year 38 Caligula made several changes in the East; and these facts, coupled with that of no Damascene coins of Caligula or Claudius existing, make it probable that about this time Damascus, which belonged to the predecessor of Aretas, was granted to him by Caligula. The other hypotheses, that the ethnarch was only visiting the city, or that Aretas had seized Damascus on Vitellius giving up the expedition against him are very improbable.

Areus, a king of the Lacedaemonians, whose letter to the high priest Onias is given in 1 Macc. xi. 20-28. There were two Spartan kings of the name of Areus, of whom the first reigned B.C. 309-265. The first high priest of the name of Onias held the office B.C. 323-300, and must therefore have written the letter to Areus I. in some interval between 309 and 300. [ONIAS.]

Argob, a tract of country on the east of the Jordan, in Bashan, the kingdom of Og, containing 60 great and fortified cities. Argob was in the portion allotted to the half-tribe of Manasseh, and was taken possession of by Jair, a chief man in that tribe. It afterwards formed one of Solomon's commissariat districts, under the charge of an officer whose residence was at Ramoth-Gilead (Deut. iii. 4, 13, 14; 1 K. iv. 13). In later times Argob was called Trachonitis, apparently a mere translation of the older name; and it is now apparently identified with the Lejah, a very remarkable district south of Damascus, and east of the Sea of Galilee. This extraordinary region—about 22 miles from N. to S. by 14 from W. to E., and of a regular, almost oval, shape—has been described as an ocean of basaltic rocks and boulders, tossed about in the wildest confusion, and intermingled with fissures and crevices in every direction. Strange as it may seem, this forbidding region is thickly studded with deserted cities and villages, all solidly built and of remote antiquity. A strong presumption in favour of the identification of the Lejah with Argob arises from the peculiar Hebrew word constantly attached to Argob. This word is Chebel, literally "a rope," and it designates with charming accuracy the remarkably defined boundary line of the district of the Lejah, which is spoken of repeatedly by its latest explorer as "a rocky shore;" "sweeping round in a circle clearly defined as a rocky shore line;" "resembling a Cyclopean wall in ruins."

Argob, perhaps a Gileadite officer, who was governor of Argob. According to some interpreters, an accomplice of Pekah in the murder of Pekahiah. But Sebastian Schmid explained that both Argob and Arieah were two princes of Pekahiah, whose influence Pekah feared, and whom he therefore slew with the king. Jarchi understands by Argob the royal palace, near which was the castle in which the murder took place (2 K. xv. 25).

Ariarathes, properly Mithridates IV., Philopator, king of Cappadocia B.C. 163-130. He was educated at Rome, and his subservience to the wishes of the Romans (B.C. 158) cost him his kingdom; but he was shortly afterwards restored to a share in the government; and on the capture of his rival Olophernes by Demetrius Soter, regained the supreme power. He fell in B.C. 130, in the war of the Romans against Aristonicus. Letters were addressed to him from Rome in favour of the Jews (1 Macc. xv. 22), who, in after times, seem to have been numerous in his kingdom (Acts ii. 9; comp. 1 Pet. i. 1).

Arida'i, ninth son of Haman (Esth. ix. 9).

Aridatha, sixth son of Haman (Esth. ix. 8).

Arieah, "the Lion," so called probably from his daring as a warrior: either one of the accomplices of Pekah in his conspiracy against Pekahiah, king of Israel; or, as Sebastian Schmid understands the passage, one of the princes of Pekahiah, who was put to death with him (2 K. xv. 25). Jarchi explains it literally of a golden lion which stood in the castle.

Ariel 1. One of the "chief men" who under Ezra directed the caravan which he led back from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezr. viii. 16).—The word occurs also in reference to two Moabites slain by Benaiah (2 Sam. xxii. 20; 1 Chr. xi. 22). Many regard the word as an epithet, "lion-like;" but it seems better to look upon it as a proper name, and translate "two [sons] of Ariel."—2. A designation given by Isaiah to the city of Jerusalem (Is. xxix. 1, 2, 7). Its meaning is obscure. We must understand by it either "Lion of God," or "Hearth of God." The latter meaning is suggested by the use of the word in Ez. xliii. 15, 16, as a synonym for the altar of burnt-offering. On the whole it seems most probable that, as a name given to Jerusalem, Ariel means "Lion of God," whilst the word used by Ezekiel means "Hearth of God."

Arimathæa's (Matt. xxvii. 57; Luke xxiii. 51 John xix. 38). St. Luke calls it "a city of Judæa;" but this presents no objection to its identification with the prophet Samuel's birth-place, the Ramah of 1 Sam. i. 1, 19, which is named in the LXX. Armathaim, and by Josephus, Armatha. The Ramathem of the Apocrypha is probably the same place. It is identified by many with the modern Ramlah. [RAMAH.]

Arioch. 1. The king of Ellasar, one of the allies of Chedorlaomer in his expedition against his rebellious tributaries (Gen. xiv. 1). The name according to Gesenius is Assyro-Chaldean, but First refers it to a Sanskrit root.—2. The captain of Nebuchadnezzar's body-guard (Dan. ii. 14, &c.).—3. Properly Erioch, or Krioch, mentioned in Jud. i. 7 as king of the Elymaeans. Junius and Tremellius identify him with Deioces, king of part of Media.

Arisa'i, eighth son of Haman (Esth. ix. 9).

Aristarchus, a Thessalonian (Acts xx. 4; xxvii. 2), who accompanied St. Paul on his third missionary journey (Acts xix. 29). He was with the apostle on his return to Asia (Acts xx. 4); and again (xxvii. 2) on his voyage to Rome. We trace him afterwards as St. Paul's fellow-prisoner in Col. iv. 10, and Philen. 24. Tradition makes him bishop of Abamea.

Aristobulus. 1. A Jewish priest (2 Macc. i. 10), who resided in Egypt in the reign of Ptolemaeus VI., Philometor. In a letter of Judas Maccabæus he is addressed (165 B.C.) as the representative of the Egyptian Jews, and is further styled "the master" (i. e. counsellor?) of the king. There can be little doubt that he is identical with the peripatetic philosopher of that name, who dedicated to Ptol. Philometor his allegoric exposition of the Pentateuch. Considerable fragments of this work have been preserved by Clement and Eusebius, but the authenticity of the quotations has been vigorously contested. The object of Aristobulus was to prove that the peripatetic doctrines were based on the Law and the Prophets.—2. A resident at Rome, some of whose household are greeted in Rom. xvi. 10. Tradition makes him one of the 70 Disciples, and reports that he preached the Gospel in Britain.

Ark, Noah's. [NOAH.]

Ark of the Covenant. The first piece of the tabernacle's furniture, for which precise directions were delivered (Ex. xxv.).—1. It appears to have been an oblong chest of shittim (acacia) wood, 2½ cubits long, by 1½ broad and deep. Within and without gold was overlaid on the wood, and on the upper side or lid, which was edged round about with gold, the mercy seat was placed. The ark was fitted with rings, one at each of the four corners, and through these were passed staves of the same wood similarly overlaid, by which it was carried by the Kohathites (Num. vii. 9, x. 21). The ends of the staves were visible without the veil in the holy place of the temple of Solomon (1 K. viii. 8). The ark, when transported, was enveloped in the "veil" of the dismantled tabernacle, in the curtain of badgers' skins, and in a blue cloth over all, and was therefore not seen (Num. iv. 5, 20).—II. Its purpose or object was to contain inviolate the Divine autograph of the two tables, that "covenant" from which it derived its title. It was also probably a reliquary for the pot of manna and the rod of Aaron. We read in 1 K. viii. 9, that "there was nothing in the ark save the two tables of stone which Moses put there at Horeb." Yet in Heb. ix. 4, it is asserted that, besides the two tables of stone, the "pot of manna" and "Aaron's rod that budded" were inside the ark; probably by Solomon's time these relics had disappeared. The words of the A. V. in 1 Chr. xiii. 3, seem to imply a use of the ark for the purpose of an oracle; but this is probably erroneous, and "we sought it not" the meaning.—Occupying the most holy spot of the sanctuary, it tended to exclude any idol from the centre of worship. It was also the support of the mercy seat, materially symbolising, perhaps, the "covenant" as that on which "mercy" rested.—III. The chief facts in the earlier history of the ark (see Josh. iii. and vi.) need not be recited. In the decline of religion in a later period a superstitious security was attached to its presence in battle. Yet—though this was rebuked by its permitted capture—when captured, its sanctity was vindicated by miracles, as seen in its avenging progress through the Philistine cities. From this period till David's time its abode was frequently shifted. It sojourned among several, probably Levitical, families (1 Sam. vii. 1; 2 Sam. vi. 3, 11; 1 Chr. xiii. 13, xv. 24, 25) in the border villages of Eastern Judah, and did not take its place in the tabernacle, but dwelt in curtains, i. e. in a separate tent pitched for it in Jerusalem by David. Its bringing up by David thither was a national festival. Subsequently the Temple, when completed, received, in the installation of the ark in its shrine, the signal of its inauguration by the effulgence of Divine glory instantly manifested. Several of the Psalms contain allusions to these events (e. g. xxiv., xvii., cxxii.) and Ps. cv. appears to have been composed on the occasion of the first of them.—When idolatry became more shameless in the kingdom of Judah, Manasseh placed "carved image" in the "house of God," and probably removed the ark to make way for it. This may account for the subsequent statement that it was reinstated by Josiah (2 Chr. xxxiii. 7, xxxv. 3). It was probably taken captive or destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Esdr. x. 22). Prideaux's argument that there must have been an ark in the second temple is of no weight against express testimony, such as that of Josephus.

Egyptian Ark. (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt.)

Arkite, The, one of the families of the Canaanites (Gen. x. 17; 1 Chr. i. 15), and from the context evidently located in the north of Phœnicia. The name is found in Pliny and Ptolemy, and from Aelius Lampridius we learn that the Urbs Arcana contained a temple dedicated to Alexander the Great.

ARIMATHÆA (RAMLAH)

To face p. 65.

It was the birthplace of Alexander Severus, and was thence called Caesarea Libani. The site which now bears the name of Arka lies on the coast, 2 to 2½ hours from the shore, about 12 miles north Tripoli, and 5 south of the Nahr el-Khebir. rocky tell rises to the height of 100 feet close above the Nahr Arka; on the top of this is an area of about two acres, on which and on a plateau to the north the ruins of the former town are scattered.

Armageddon, "the hill, or city of Megiddo (Rev. xvi. 16). The locality implied in the Hebrew term here employed is the great battle-field of the Old Testament. In a similar passage in the book of Joel (iii. 2, 12), the scene of the Divine judgments is spoken of as the "valley of Jehoshaphat," the fact underlying the image being Jehoshaphat's great victory (2 Chr. xx. 26). So here the scene of the struggle of good and evil is suggested by that battle-field, the plain of Esdraelon which was famous for two great victories, of Barak over the Canaanites (Judg. iv., v.), and of Gideon over the Midianites (Judg. vii.); and for two great disasters, the deaths of Saul (1 Sam. xxxi. 8), and of Josiah (2 K. xxiii. 29, 30; 2 Chr. xxxv. 22) The same figurative language is used by one of the Jewish prophets (Zech. xii. 11).

Armenia is nowhere mentioned under that name in the original Hebrew, though it occurs in the English version (2 K. xix. 37) for Ararat (comp. marginal reading). Armenia is that lofty plateau whence the rivers Euphrates, Tigris, Araxes, and Acampsis, pour down their waters in different directions; the two first to the Persian Gulf, the last two respectively to the Caspian and Euxine seas. It may be termed the nucleus of the mountain system of western Asia: from the centre of the plateau rise two lofty chains of mountains, which run from E. to W., converging towards the Caspian sea, but parallel to each other towards the W. The climate is severe, varying with the altitude of different localities, the valleys being sufficiently warm to ripen the grape, while the high lands are only adapted for pasture. The latter supported vast numbers of mules and horses, on which the wealth of the inhabitants chiefly depends (comp. Ex. xxvii. 14). The slight acquaintance which the Hebrews had with this country was probably derived from the Phoenicians. There are signs of their knowledge having been progressive. Isaiah, in his prophecies regarding Babylon, speaks of the hosts as coming from the "mountains" (xiii. 4), while Jeremiah employs the specific names Ararat and Minni (li. 27). Ezekiel, apparently better acquainted with the country, uses a name which was familiar to its own inhabitants, Togarmah. (1.) ARARAT is mentioned as the place whither the sons of Sennacherib fled (Is. xxxvii. 38). It was the central district surrounding the mountain of that name. (2.) MINNI only occurs in Jer. li. 27. It is probably identical with the district Minyas, in the upper valley of the Murad-su branch of the Euphrates. (3.) TOGARMAH is noticed in two passages of Ezekiel, both of which are in favour of its identity with Armenia. In xxvii. 14 he speaks of Togarmah in connexion with Meshech and Tubal; in xxxviii. 6, it is described as "of the north quarters" in connexion with Gomer. Coupling with these particulars the relationship between Togarmah, Ashkenaz, and Riphath (Gen. x. 3), we cannot fail in coming to the conclusion that Togarmah represents Armenia.

especially among women; used by princes as one of the insignia of royalty, and by distinguished persons in general. The word is not used in the A. V., as even in 2 Sam. i. 10, they render it "by the bracelet on his arm." Sometimes only one was worn, on the right arm (Ecclus. xxi. 21). From Cant. viii. 6, it appears that the signet sometimes consisted of a jewel on the armlet. These ornaments were worn by most ancient princes. They are frequent on the sculptures of Persepolis and Nineveh, and were worn by the kings of Persia. In the Leyden Museum is an Egyptian armlet bearing the name of the third Thothmes. Finally, they are still worn among the most splendid regalia of modern Oriental sovereigns, and it is even said that those of the king of Persia are worth a million sterling. Now, as in ancient times, they are sometimes made plain, sometimes enchased; sometimes with the ends not joined, and sometimes a complete circle. Their enormous weight may be conjectured from Gen. xxiv. 22.

Armo'ni, son of Saul by Rizpah (2 Sam. xxi. 8).

Arms, Armour. The subject naturally divides itself into—

I. Offensive weapons: Arms.

II. Defensive weapons: Armour.

I. Offensive weapons.—1. Apparently the earliest known, and most widely used, was the Chereb, or "SWORD." Very little can be gathered as to its shape, size, material, or mode of use. Perhaps if anything is to be inferred it is that the Chereb was neither a heavy nor a long weapon. That of Ehud was only a cubit, i. e. 18 inches long, so as to have been concealed under his garment, and a consideration of the narratives in 2 Sam. ii. 16, and x. 8-10, and also of the ease with which David used the sword of a man so much larger than himself as Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 51; xxi. 9), goes to show that the Chereb was both a lighter and a shorter weapon than the modern sword. It was carried in a sheath (1 Sam. xvii. 51; 2 Sam. xx. 8; 1 Chr. xxi. 27), slung by a girdle (1 Sam. xxv. 13) and resting upon the thigh (Ps. xlv. 3; Judg. iii. 16), or upon the hips (2 Sam. xx. 8). "Girding on the sword" was a symbolical expression for commencing war; and a similar expression occurs to denote those able to serve (Judg. viii. 10; 1 Chr. xxi. 5). Swords with two edges are occasionally referred to (Judg. iii. 16; Ps. cxlix. 6), Persian sword, or scimitar.

and allusions are found to "whetting" the sword (Deut. xxxii. 41; 1's. lxiv. 3; Ezek. xxi. 9). Doubtless it was of metal, from the allusions to its brightness and "glittering;" but from Josh. v. 2, 3, we may perhaps infer that in early times the material was flint.—2. Next to the sword was the SPEAR; and of this weapon we meet with at least three distinct kinds. a. The Chanth, a "spear," and that of the largest kind. It was the weapon of Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 7, 45; 2 Sam. xxi. 19; 1 Chr. xx. 5), and also of other giants (2 Sam. xxiii. 21; 1 Chr. xi. 23) and mighty warriors (2 Sam. ii. 23, xxiii. 18; 1 Chr. xi. 11, 20). The Chanth was the habitual companion of King Saul, and it was this heavy weapon and not the lighter "javelin" that he cast at David (1 Sam. xviii. 10, 11, xix. 9, 10), and at Jonathan (xx. 33). b. Apparently lighter than the preceding was the Chadon, or "Javelin." When not in action the Chadon was carried on the back of the warrior (1 Sam. xvii. 6, A. V. "target"). c. Another kind of spear was the Rimach. In the historical books it occurs in Num. xxv. 7, and 1 K. xviii. 28, and frequently in the later books, as in 1 Chr. xii. 8 ("buckler"), 2 Chr. xi. 12. d. The Shalach was probably a lighter missile or "dart." See 2 Chr. xviii. 10, xxxii. 5 ("darts"); Neh. iv. 17, 23 (see margin); Job xxxiii. 18, xxxvi. 12; Joel ii. 8. e. Shebet, a rod or staff, is used once only to denote a weapon (2 Sam. xviii. 14).—3. Of missile weapons of offence the chief was undoubtedly the Bow, Kasheth; it is met with in the earliest stages of the history, in use both for the chase (Gen. xxi. 20, xxvii. 3) and war (xlviii. 22). In later times archers accompanied the armies of the Philistines (1 Sam. xxxi. 3; 1 Chr. x. 3) and of the Syrians (1 K. xxii. 34). Among the Hebrews, captains high in rank (2 K. ix. 24), and even kings' sons (1 Sam. xviii. 4), carried the bow, and were expert in its use (2 Sam. i. 22). The tribe of Benjamin seems to have been especially addicted to archery (1 Chr. viii. 40, xii. 2; 2 Chr. xiv. 8, xvii. 17); but there were also bowmen among Reuben, Gad, Manassah (1 Chr. v. 18), and Ephraim (Ps. lxxviii. 9). Of the form of the bow we can gather almost nothing. It seems to have been bent by the aid of the foot (1 Chr. v. 18, viii. 40; 2 Chr. xiv. 8; 1's. v. 28; Ps. vii. 12, &c.). Bows of steel, or rather brass, are mentioned as if specially strong (2 Sam. xxii. 35; Job xx. 24). It is possible that in 1 Chr. xii. 2, a kind of bow for shooting bullets or stones is alluded to (Wisd. v. 22, "stone-bow"). The ARROWS, Chitzim, were carried in a quiver, Thell (Gen. xxvii. 3), or Ashpdh (Is. xlii. 6, xlix. 2; Ps. cxxvii. 5). From an allusion in Job vi. 4, they would seem to have been sometimes poisoned; and Ps. cxx. 4, may point to a practice of using arrows with some burning material attached to them. 4. The SLING, Ke'a, is first mentioned in Judg. x. 16. This simple weapon with which David killed the giant Philistine was the natural attendant of a shepherd, and therefore the bold metaphor of Abigail has a natural propriety in the mouth of the wife of a man whose possessions in flocks were so great as those of Nabal (1 Sam. xxv. 29). Later in the monarchy, slingers formed part of the regular army (2 K. iii. 25).

II. Armour.—1. The Shiryôn, or BREASTPLATE, enumerated in the description of the arms of Goliath, a "coat of mail," literally a "breastplate of scales" (1 Sam. xvii. 5), and further (38), where Shiryôn alone is rendered "coat of mail." It may be noticed in passing that this passage contains the most complete inventory of the furniture of a warrior to be found in the whole of the sacred history. Shiryôn also occurs in 1 K. xii. 34, and 2 Chr. xviii. 33. The last passage is very obscure; the real meaning is probably "between the joints and the breastplate." This word has furnished one of the names of Mount Hermon (see Deut. iii. 9).—2. The Tuchadâ, is mentioned but twice—in reference to the gown of the high-priest (Ex. xxvii. 32, xxxix. 23). Like the English "habergeon," it was probably a quilted shirt or doublet put on over the head.—3. The Côb'a, or HELMET is referred to in 1 Sam. xvii. 5; 2 Chr. xxvi. 14; Ezek. xxvii. 10).—

Assyrian helmets.

4. Mitzchâh, GREAVES, or defences for the feet made of brass, are named in 1 Sam. xvii. 6, only. Of the defensive arms borne by the warrior the notices are hardly less scanty than those just examined.—5. Two kinds of SHIELD are distinguishable. a. The Tzinndâh, or large shield, encompassing (Ps. v. 12) the whole person. When not in actual conflict, it was carried before the warrior (1 Sam. xvii. 7, 41).

Assyrian shield.

Egyptian shield.

6. Of smaller dimensions was the Mâgên, a buckler or target, probably for use in hand-to-hand fight. The difference in size between this and the Tzinndâh is evident from 1 K. x. 16, 17; 2 Chr. ix. 15, 16, where twice as much gold is named as being used for the latter as for the former. 6. What kind of arm was the Shelet it is impossible to determine. By some translators it is rendered a "quiver," by some "weapons" generally, by others a "shield." It denoted certain special weapons of gold taken by David from Hadadezer king of Zobah (2 Sam. viii. 7; 1 Chr. xviii. 7), and dedicated in the Temple (2 K. xi. 10; 2 Chr. xxiii. 9; Cant. iv. 4). In Jer. li. 11; Ezek. xxvii. 11, the word has the force of a foreign arm.

Army. 1. JEWISH ARMY.—The military organization of the Jews commenced with their departure from the land of Egypt, and was adapted to the nature of the expedition on which they ther entered. Every man above 20 years of age was a soldier (Num. i. 3); each tribe formed a regiment with its own banner and its own leader (Num. ii. 2, x. 14); their positions in the camp or on the march were accurately fixed (Num. ii.); the whole army started and stopped at a given signal (Num. x. 5, 6); thus they came up out of Egypt ready for the fight (Ex. xiii. 18). On the approach of an enemy, a conscription was made from the general body under the direction of a muster-master (Deut. xx. 5, 2 K. xxv. 19), by whom also the officers were appointed (Deut. xx. 9). The army was then divided into thousands and hundreds under their respective captains (Num. xxxi. 14), and still further into families (Num. ii. 34; 2 Chr. xxv. 5, xxvi. 12)—the family being regarded as the unit in the Jewish polity. From the time the Israelites entered the land of Canaan until the establishment of the kingdom, little progress was made in military affairs: their wars resembled border forays. No general muster was made at this period; but the combatants were summoned on the spur of the moment.—With the kings arose the custom of maintaining a body-guard, which formed the nucleus of a standing army. Thus Saul had a band of 3000 select warriors (1 Sam. xiii. 2, xiv. 52, xxiv. 2), and David, before his accession to the throne, 600 (1 Sam. xxiii. 13, xxv. 13). This band he retained after he became king, and added the CHERETHITES and PELETHITES (2 Sam. xv. 18, xx. 7), together with another class Shalishim, officers of high rank, the chief of whom (2 K. vii. 2; 1 Chr. xii. 18) was immediately about the king's person. David further organized a national militia, divided into twelve regiments under their respective officers, each of which was called out for one month in the year (1 Chr. xxvii. 1); at the head of the army when in active service he appointed a commander-in-chief (1 Sam. xiv. 50).—Hitherto the army had consisted entirely of infantry (1 Sam. iv. 10, xv. 4), the use of horses having been restrained by divine command (Deut. xvii. 16); but we find that as the foreign relations of the kingdoms extended, much importance was attached to them. David had reserved a hundred chariots from the spoil of the Syrians (2 Sam. viii. 4): these probably served as the foundation of the force which Solomon afterwards enlarged through his alliance with Egypt (1 K. x. 26, 28, 29). It does not appear that the system established by David was maintained by the kings of Judah; but in Israel the proximity of the hostile kingdom of Syria necessitated the maintenance of a standing army. The militia was occasionally called out in time of peace (2 Chr. xiv. 8, xxv. 5, xxvi. 11); but such cases were exceptional. On the other hand the body-guard appears to have been regularly kept up (1 K. x. 28; 2 K. xi. 4, 11). Occasional reference is made to war-chariots (2 K. viii. 21), but in Hezekiah's reign no force of the kind could be maintained, and the Jews were obliged to seek the aid of Egypt for horses and chariots (2 K. xviii. 23, 24; Is. xxxi. 1).—With regard to the arrangement and manoeuvring of the army in the field, we know but little. A division into three bodies is frequently mentioned (Judg. vii. 16, ix. 43; 1 Sam. xi. 11; 2 Sam. xviii. 2). Jehoshaphat divided his army into five bodies, apparently retaining, however, the threefold principle of division, the heavy-armed troops of Judah being considered as the proper army, and the two divisions of light-armed of the tribe of Benjamin as an appendage (2 Chr. xvii. 14-18). The maintenance and equipment of the soldiers at the public expense dates from the establishment of a standing army. It is doubtful whether the soldier ever received pay even under the kings (the only instance of pay being mentioned applies to mercenaries, 2 Chr. xxv. 6): but that he was maintained, while on active service, and provided with arms, appears from 1 K. iv. 27, x. 16, 17; 2 Chr. xxvi. 14. The numerical strength of the Jewish army cannot be ascertained with any degree of accuracy: the numbers, as given in the text are manifestly incorrect, and the discrepancies in the various statements irreconcilable. The system adopted by Judas Maccabaeus was in strict conformity with the Mosaic law (1 Macc. iii. 55): and though he maintained a standing army (1 Macc. iv. 6; 2 Macc. viii. 16), yet the custom of paying the soldiers appears to have been still unknown, and to have originated with Simon (1 Macc. xiv. 32). The introduction of mercenaries commenced with John Hyrcanus; the intestine commotions in the reign of Alexander Jannaeus obliged him to increase the number to 6200 men; and the same policy was followed by Alexandria and by Herod the Great, who had in his pay Thracian, German, and Gallic troops. The discipline and arrangement of the army was gradually assimilated to that of the Romans, and the titles of the officers borrowed from it.

II. ROMAN ARMY.—The Roman army was divided into legions, the number of which varied considerably, each under six tribuni ("chief captain," Acts xxi. 31), who commanded by turns. The legion was subdivided into ten cohorts ("band," Acts x. 1), the cohort into three maniples, and the maniples into two centuries, containing originally 100 men, as the name implies, but subsequently from 50 to 100 men, according to the strength of the legion. There were thus 60 centuries in a legion, each under the command of a centurion (Acts x. 1, 22; Matt. viii. 5, xxvii. 54). In addition to the legionary cohorts, independent cohorts of volunteers served under the Roman standards. One of these cohorts was named the Italian (Acts x. 1), as consisting of volunteers from Italy. The cohort named "Augustus" (Acts xxvii. 1) may have consisted of the volunteers from Sebaste. Others, however, think that it was a cohors Augusta, similar to the Legio Augusta. The headquarters of the Roman forces in Judaea were at Caesarea.

Ar'na, one of the forefathers of Ezra (2 Esd. i. 2), occupying the place of Zeriahah or Zaraias in his genealogy.

Ar'nan. In the received Hebrew text "the sons of Arnan" are mentioned in the genealogy of Zerubbabel (1 Chr. iii. 21). But according to the reading of the LXX., Vulgate, and Syriac versions, which Houbigant adopts, Arnan was the son of Hephaiah.

Ar'mon, the river or torrent which formed the boundary between Moab and the Amorites, on the north of Moab (Num. xxi. 13, 14, 24, 26; Judg. xi. 22), and afterwards between Moab and Israel (Reuben) (Deut. ii. 24, 36, iii. 8, 12, 16, iv. 48; Josh. xii. 1, 2, xiii. 9, 16; Judg. xi. 13, 26). From Judg. xi. 18 it would seem to have been also the east border of Moab. By Josephus it is described as rising in the mountains of Arabia and flowing through all the wilderness till it falls into the Dead Sea. There can be no doubt that the Wady el-Mojeb of the present day is the Armon. Its principal source is near Katrane, on the Hay route. On the south edge of the ravine through which it flows are some ruins called Mehatet el Haj, and on the north edge, directly opposite, those still bearing the name of 'Ar'dir. [ARON.] The width across between these two spots seemed to Burckhardt to be about two miles: the descent on the south side to the water is extremely steep and almost impassable. The stream runs through a level strip of grass some 40 yards in width, with a few oleanders and willows on the margin.

Ar'od, a son of Gad (Num. xxvi. 17), called ARODI in Gen. xlvii. 16.

Ar'odi. [AROD.]

Ar'odites. [AROD.]

Ar'oer, the name of several towns of Eastern and Western Palestine. 1. A city "by the brink," or "on the bank of," or "by" the torrent Armon, the southern point of the territory of Sihou king of the Amorites, and afterwards of the tribe of Reuben (Deut. ii. 36, iii. 12, iv. 48; Josh. xii. 2, xiii. 9, 16; Judg. xi. 26; 2 K. x. 33; 1 Chr. v. 8), but later again in possession of Moab (Jer. xlviii. 19). Burckhardt found ruins with the name 'Ar'dir on the old Roman road, upon the very edge of the precipitous north bank of the Wady Mojeb. [ARNON.] —2. Aroer "that is 'facing' Rabbah" (Rabbah of Ammon), a town built by and belonging to Gad (Num. xxxii. 34; Josh. xiii. 25; 2 Sam. xxiv. 5). This is probably the place mentioned in Judg. xi. 33, which was shown in Jerome's time. —3. Aroer, in Is. xvii. 2, if a place at all, must be still further north than either of the two already named. Gesenius, however, takes it to be Aroer of Gad. —4. A town in Judah, named only in 1 Sam. xxx. 28. Robinson (ii. 199) believes that he has identified its site in Wady 'Ar'arah, on the road from Petra to Gaza.

Ar'oerite. Hothan the Aroerite was the father of two of David's captains (1 Chr. ii. 44).

Ar'om, the "sons of Arom," to the number of 32, are enumerated in 1 Esd. v. 16 among those who returned with Zorobabel. Unless it is a mistake for Arom and represents Hashum in Esr. ii. 19, it has no parallel in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah.

Ar'pad or Ar'phad (Is. xxxvi. 19, xxxvii. 13), a city or district in Syria, apparently dependent on Damascus (Jer. xlix. 23). It is invariably named with Hamath, but no trace of its existence has yet been discovered, nor has any mention of the place been found except in the Bible (2 K. xviii. 34, xix. 13; Is. x. 9).

Ar'phad. [ARPAD.]

Arphax'ad, the son of Shem and ancestor of Eber (Gen. x. 22, 24, xi. 10). Bochart supposed that the name was preserved in that of the province Arrapachitis in Northern Assyria. Ewald interprets it the stronghold of the Chaldees. —2. ARPHAXAD, a king "who reigned over the Medes in Ecbatana, and strengthened the city by vast fortifications" (Jud. i. 1-4). He has been frequently identified with Deioces, the founder of Ecbatana; but it seems better to look for the original of Arphaxad in his son Phraortes, who fell in a battle with the Assyrians, 633 B.C. Niebuhr endeavours to identify the name with Astyages.

Arrows. [ARMS.]

Arasaces VI., a king of Parthia, who assumed the royal title Arsaces in addition to his proper name, MITHRIDATES I. His general defeated the great army of Demetrius Nicator, and took the king prisoner, B.C. 138 (1 Macc. xiv. 1-3). Mithridates treated his prisoner with respect, but kept him in confinement till his own death, cir. B.C. 130.

Ar'sareth, a region beyond Euphrates, apparently of great extent (2 Esd. xiii. 45).

Artaxerxes, the name probably of two different kings of Persia mentioned in the O. T. 1. The first Artaxerxes is mentioned in Ezr. iv. 7, and appears identical with Smerdis, the Magian impostor, and pretended brother of Cambyses, who usurped the throne B.C. 522, and reigned eight months. The name Artaxerxes may have been adopted or conferred on him as a title.—2. In Neh. ii. 1 we have another Artaxerxes, who permits Nehemiah to spend twelve years at Jerusalem, in order to settle the affairs of the colony there, which had fallen into great confusion. We may safely identify him with Artaxerxes Macrocheir or Longimanus, the son of Xerxes, who reigned B.C. 464-425. And we believe that this is the same king who had previously allowed Ezra to go to Jerusalem for a similar purpose (Ezr. vii. 1).

Ar'temas, a companion of St. Paul (Tit. iii. 12). According to tradition he was bishop of Lystra.

Ar'uboth, the third of Solomon's commissariat districts (1 K. iv. 10). It included Sochoh, and was therefore probably a name for the rich corn-growing lowland country.

Arumah, a place apparently in the neighbourhood of Shechem, at which Abimelech resided (Judg. ix. 41). Arumah is possibly the same place as Ruma, under which name it is given by Eusebius and Jerome. According to them it was then called Arimathaea (see also ARIMA).

Arvad, a place in Phoenicia, the men of which are named in close connexion with those of Zidon as the navigators and defenders of the ships of Tyre in Ez. xxvii. 8, 11. In agreement with this is the mention of "the Arvadite" in Gen. x. 18, and 1 Chr. i. 16, as a son of Canaan, with Zidon, Hamath, and other northern localities. There is thus no doubt that Arvad is the island of Road, which lies off Tortosa (Tartus), 2 or 3 miles from the Phoenician coast, some distance above the mouth of the river Eleutherus, now the Nahr el-Kebir. The island is high and rocky, but very small, hardly a mile in circumference.

Ar'vadite. [ARVAD.]

Ar'sa, prefect of the palace at Tirzah to Elah king of Israel, who was assassinated at a banquet in his house by Zimri (1 K. xvi. 9). In the Targum of Jonathan the word is taken as the name of an idol, and in the Arabic version in the London Polyglot the last clause is rendered "which belongs to the idol of Beth-Arza."

A'sa, son of Abijah, and third king of Judah (B.C. 958-916), was conspicuous for his earnestness in supporting the worship of God. In his zeal against heathenism he did not spare his grandmother Maachah, who occupied the special dignity of "King's Mother," to which great importance was attached in the Jewish court. A'sa burnt the symbol of her religion (1 K. xv. 13), and threw its ashes into the brook Kidron, and then deposed Maachah from her dignity. He also placed in the Temple certain gifts which his father had dedicated, and renewed the great altar which the idolatrous priests apparently had desecrated (2 Chr. xv. 8). Besides this, he fortified cities on his frontiers, and raised an army, amounting, according to 2 Chr. xiv. 8, to 580,000 men, a number probably exaggerated by an error of the copyist. Thus A'sa's reign marks the return of Judah to a consciousness of the high destiny to which God had called her. The good effects of this were visible in the enthusiastic resistance offered by the people to Zerah, an invader, who is called a Cushite or Ethiopian. [ZERAH.] At the head of an enormous host (a million of men, we read in 2 Chr. xiv. 9) he attacked Marashah or Marissa in the S.W. of the country, near the later Eleutheropolis. There he was utterly defeated, and driven back with immense loss to Gerar. The peace which followed this victory was broken by the attempt of Baasha of Israel to fortify Ramah, "that he might not suffer any to go out or to come in unto A'sa king of Judah." To stop this A'sa purchased the help of Benhadad I. king of Damascus, by a large payment of treasure, forced Baasha to abandon his purpose, and destroyed the works which he had begun at Ramah. The wells which he sunk at Mizpeh were famous in Jeremiah's time (xli. 9). The means by which he obtained this success were censured by the prophet Hanani, who seems even to have excited some discontent in Jerusalem, in consequence of which he was imprisoned, and suffered other punishments (2 Chr. xvi. 10). In his old age A'sa suffered from the gout, and it is mentioned that "he sought not to the Lord, but to the physicians." He died greatly loved and honoured in the 41st year of his reign.—2. Ancestor of Berechiah, a Levite who resided in one of the villages of the Netophathites after the return from Babylon (1 Chr. ix. 16).

Asadi'as, son of Chelcias, or Hilkiah, and one of the ancestors of Baruch (Bar. i. 1). The name is probably the same as that elsewhere represented by Hasadiah (1 Chr. iii. 20).

A'sael, an ancestor of Tobit (Tob. i. 1), and perhaps the same as JAHEEL or JAHZIEL, one of the four sons of Naphtali.

A'sahel, nephew of David, being the youngest son of his sister Zeruiah. He was celebrated for his swiftness of foot, a gift much valued in ancient times. When fighting under the command of his brother Joab against Ishbosheth's army at Gibeon, he pursued Abner, who, after vainly warning him to desist, was obliged to kill him in self-defence (2 Sam. ii. 18 ff.). [ABNER].—3. One of the Levites in the reign of Jehoshaphat, who went throughout the cities of Judah to instruct the people in the knowledge of the law, at the time of the revival of the true worship (2 Chr. xvii. 8).—4. A Levite in the reign of Hezekiah, who had charge of the tithes and dedicated things in the Temple under Cononiah and Shimei (2 Chr. xxxi. 13).—5. A priest, father of Jonathan in the time of Ezra (Ezr. x. 15). He is called AZAEL in 1 Esd. ix. 14.

Asah'ah, a servant of king Josiah, sent by him.

together with others, to seek information of Jehovah respecting the book of the law which Hilkiah found in the Temple (2 K. xxii. 12, 14; also called ASALAH, 2 Chr. xxxiv. 20).

Asai'ah, 1. A prince of one of the families of the Simeonites in the reign of Hezekiah, who drove out the Hamite shepherds from Gedor (1 Chr. iv. 36).—2. A Levite in the reign of David, chief of the family of Merari (1 Chr. vi. 30). With 120 of his brethren he took part in the solemn service of bringing the ark from the house of Obed-edom to the city of David (1 Chr. xv. 6, 11).—3. The firstborn of "the Shilonite," according to 1 Chr. ix. 5, who with his family dwelt in Jerusalem after the return from Babylon. In Neh. xi. 5 he is called MAASEIAH, and his descent is there traced from Shiloni, which is explained by the Targum of R. Joseph on 1 Chr. as a patronymic from Shelah the son of Judah, by others as "the native or inhabitant of Shiloh."—4. 2 Chr. xxxiv. 20. [ASAHIAH.]

Asana, 1 Esd. v. 31. [ASNAH.]

Asaph, 1. A Levite, son of Berechiah, one of the leaders of David's choir (1 Chr. vi. 39). Psalms l. and lxxiii.—lxxxiii. are attributed to him; and he was in after times celebrated as a seer as well as a musical composer (2 Chr. xxix. 30; Neh. xii. 46). The office appears to have remained hereditary in his family, unless he was the founder of a school of poets and musical composers, who were called after him "the sons of Asaph," as the Homeridae from Homer (1 Chr. xxv. 1; 2 Chr. xx. 14; Ezr. ii. 41).—2. The father or ancestor of Joah, the recorder or chronicler to the kingdom of Judah in the reign of Hezekiah (2 K. xviii. 18, 37; Is. xxxvi. 3, 22). It is not improbable that this Asaph is the same as the preceding, and that Joah was one of his numerous descendants known as the Bene-Asaph.—3. The keeper of the royal forest or "paradise" of Artaxerxes (Neh. ii. 8). His name would seem to indicate that he was a Jew, who like Nehemiah was in high office at the court of Persia.—4. Ancestor of Mattaniah, the conductor of the temple-choir after the return from Babylon (1 Chr. ix. 15; Neh. xi. 17). Most probably the same as 1 and 2.

Asareel, a son of Jehaleleel, whose name is abruptly introduced into the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 16).

Asarelah, one of the sons of Asaph, set apart by David to "prophesy with harps and with psalteries and with cymbals" (1 Chr. xxv. 2); called JESHARELAH in ver. 14.

As'alon, [ASHKELON.]

As'as, 1 Esd. ix. 32. [ISHIAH.]

Asebeia, a Levite (1 Esd. viii. 47). [SHEREIAH.]

Asobi'a, 1 Esd. viii. 48. [HSHABIAH.]

Asenath, daughter of Potipherah, priest, or possibly prince, of On [POTIPHERAH], wife of Joseph (Gen. xli. 45), and mother of Manasseh and Ephraim (xli. 50, xlii. 20). Her name has been considered to be necessarily Egyptian, and Egyptian etymologies have therefore been proposed, but these must be regarded as doubtful. If we are guided by the custom of the Hebrews, and the only parallel case, that of Bithiah [BITILAH], we must suppose that his Egyptian wife received a Hebrew name from Joseph. If Hebrew, Asenath may be compared to the male proper name Asnah (Ezr. ii. 50).

A'ser, Tob. i. 2; Luke ii. 36; Rev. vii. 6. [ASHER.]

A'serer = SISERA (1 Esd. v. 32; comp. Ezr. ii. 53).

Ash (Heb. ōren) occurs only in Is. xlv. 14, as one of the trees out of the wood of which idols were carved: "He heweth him down cedars, and taketh the cypress and the oak, which he strengtheneth for himself among the trees of the forest; he planteth an ash, and the rain doth nourish it." It is impossible to determine what is the tree denoted by the Hebrew word ōren; the LXX. and the Vulg. understand some species of pine-tree. Perhaps the larix (Larix Europaea) may be intended.

Ashan, a city in the low country of Judah (Josh. xv. 42). In Josh. xix. 7, and 1 Chr. iv. 32, it is mentioned again as belonging to Simeon; and in 1 Chr. vi. 59, it is given as a priests' city, occupying the same place as the somewhat similar word AIN in Josh. xxi. 16. It has not yet been identified, unless it be the same as Ain; in which case Robinson found it at Al Ghuweir.

Ashbe'a, a proper name, but whether of a person or place is uncertain (1 Chr. iv. 21). If ubiquitous would understand it of the latter, and would render "the house of Ashbea" by Beth-ashbea. The whole clause is obscure. The Targum of R. Joseph paraphrases it, "and the family of the house of manufacture of the fine linen for the garments of the kings and priests, delivered to the house of Esaba."

Ash'bel, 2nd son of Benjamin and ancestor of the ASHBELETHES (Gen. xlii. 21; Num. xxvi. 38; 1 Chr. viii. 1).

Ash'chenaz (1 Chr. i. 6; Jer. li. 27). [ASHKENAZ.]

Ash'dod, or Aso'tus (Acts viii. 40), one of the five confederate cities of the Philistines, situated about 30 miles from the southern frontier of Palestine, 3 from the Mediterranean Sea, and nearly midway between Gaza and Joppa. It was assigned to the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 47), but was never subdued by the Israelites; and even down to Nehemiah's age it preserved its distinctiveness of race and language (Neh. xiii. 23, 24). But its chief importance arose from its position on the high-road from Palestine to Egypt: it was on this account besieged by Tartan, the general of the Assyrian king Sargon, about B.C. 716, apparently to frustrate the league formed between Hezekiah and Egypt (Is. xx. 1). The effects of its siege by Psammetichus (B.C. 630) are incidentally referred to in Jer. xxv. 20. It was destroyed by the Maccabees (1 Macc. v. 68, x. 84), and lay in ruins until the Roman conquest of Judaea, when it was restored by Gabinius (B.C. 55). It is now an insignificant village, with no memorials of its ancient importance, but is still called Esdud.

Ash'dodites, the inhabitants of Ashdod (Neh. iv. 7); called ASHDODITES in Josh. xiii. 3.

Ash'doth Pis'gah, a curious and probably a very ancient term, found only in Deut. iii. 17; Josh. xii. 3, xiii. 20; and in Deut. iv. 49, A. V. "springs of Pisgah." In the two passages from Deuteronomy the words form part of a formula, by which apparently the mountains which enclose the Dead Sea on the east side are defined; but whether it be the springs poured forth at the base of the mountains of Moab, or the roots or spurs of those mountains, or the mountains themselves, it is useless at present to conjecture.

Ash'dothites, Josh. xiii. 3. [ASHDODITES.]

A'sher, Apoc. and N. T. A'ser, the 8th son of Jacob, by Zilpah, Leah's handmaid (Gen. xxx. 13). Of the tribe descended from Asher no action is recorded during the whole course of the sacred history. The general position of the tribe was on the sea-shore from Carmel northwards, with Manasseh on the south, Zebulun and Issachar on the south-east, and Naphtali on the north-east. The boundaries and towns are given in Josh. xix. 24-31, xxv. 10, 11; and Judg. i. 31, 32. The southern boundary was probably one of the streams which enter the Mediterranean south of that place—either Nahr el-Defneh or Nahr Zurka. The tribe then possessed the maritime portion of the rich plain of Esdraelon, probably for a distance of 8 or 10 miles from the shore. The boundary would then appear to have run northwards, possibly bending to the east to embrace Ahlab, and reaching Zidon by Kanah, whence it turned and came down by Tyre to Achzib (now es-Zib). This territory contained some of the richest soil in all Palestine; and to this fact, as well as to their proximity to the Phœnicians, the degeneracy of the tribe may be attributed (Judg. i. 31, v. 17). At the numbering of Israel at Sinai, Asher was more numerous than either Ephraim, Manasseh, or Benjamin (Num. i. 32-41); but in the reign of David, so insignificant had the tribe become, that its name is altogether omitted from the list of the chief rulers (1 Chr. xxvii. 16-22). "One name alone shines out of the general obscurity—the aged widow 'Anna the daughter of Phanuel of the tribe of Aser,' who in the very close of the history departed not from the Temple, but 'served God with fastings and prayers night and day.'" (Stanley, Sin. & Pal. 265).

Asher, a place which formed one boundary of the tribe of Manasseh on the south (Josh. xvii. 7). It is placed by Eusebius on the road from Shechem to Bethshan or Scythopolis, about 15 miles from the former. Three quarters of an hour from Tebbis, the ancient Thebez, is the hamlet of Teydsb, which

Mr. Porter suggests may be the Asher of Manasseh (Handb. p. 348).

Ash'erah, the name of a Phœnician goddess, or rather of the idol itself. Our translators, following the rendering of the LXX. and of the Vulg., translate the word by "grove." Asherah is so closely connected with ASHTORETH and her worship (Judg. iii. 7, comp. ii. 3; Judg. vi. 25; 1 K. xviii. 19), that many critics have regarded them as identical. The view maintained by Bertheau appears to be the more correct one, that Ashtoreth is the proper name of the goddess, whilst Asherah is the name of her image or symbol. This symbol seems in all cases to have been of wood (see Judg. vi. 25-20; 2 K. xxiii. 14). [ASHTORETH.]

Ash'erites, descendants of Asher, and members of his tribe (Judg. i. 32).

Ashes. The ashes on the altar of burnt-offering were gathered into a cavity in its surface. On the days of the three solemn festivals the ashes were not removed, but the accumulation was taken away afterwards in the morning, the priests casting lots for the office. "The ashes of a red heifer burnt entire, according to regulations prescribed in Num. xix., had the ceremonial efficacy of purifying the unclean (Heb. ix. 13), but of polluting the clean. [SACRIFICE.] Ashes about the person, especially on the head, were used as a sign of sorrow. [MOURNING.]

Ash'ima, a god whose worship was introduced into Samaria by the Hamathite colonists whom Shalmanezzer settled in that land (2 K. xvii. 30). Ashima has been regarded as identical with the Mendesian god of the Egyptians, the Pan of the Greeks. It has also been identified with the Phœnician god Esmûn, to whom belong the characteristics both of Pan and of Aesculapius.

Ash'kelon, As'kelon, Apoc. As'calon, one of the five cities of the lords of the Philistines (Josh. xiii. 3; 1 Sam. vi. 17), but less often mentioned and apparently less known to the Jews than the other four. The site, which retains its ancient name, fully bears out this inference. Samson went down from Timnath to Ashkelon (Judg. xiv. 19), as if to a remote place whence his exploit was not likely to be heard of; and the only other mention of it in the historical books is in the formulistic passages, Josh. xiii. 3, and 1 Sam. vi. 17, and in the casual notices of Jud. ii. 28; 1 Macc. x. 86, xi. 80, xii. 33. In the poetical books it occurs 2 Sam. i. 20; Jer. xxv. 20, xlvii. 5, 7; Am. i. 8; Zeph. ii. 4, 7; Zech. ix. 5. In the post-biblical times Ashkelon rose to considerable importance. Near the town were the temple and sacred lake of Derceto, the Syrian Venus. The soil around was remarkable for its fertility. Ascalon played a memorable part in the struggles of the Crusades, and within the walls and towers now standing Richard held his court. By the Mohammedan geographers it was called "the bride of Syria." Its position is naturally very strong, and a small harbour towards the east advances a little way into the town.

Ash'kenaz, one of the three sons of Gomer, son of Japhet (Gen. x. 3), that is, one of the peoples or tribes belonging to the great Japhetic division of the human race, and springing immediately from that part of it which bears the name of GOMER. The original seat of the people of Ashkenaz was undoubtedly in the neighbourhood of Armenia, since they are mentioned by Jeremiah (li. 27) in connexion with the kingdoms of Ararat and Minni. We may probably recognise the tribe of Ashkenaz on the northern shore of Asia Minor, in the name of Lake Ascanius, and in Europe in the name Scand-ia, Scand-inavia. Knobel considers that Ashkenaz is to be identified with the German race.

Ash'nah, the name of two cities, both in the Lowland of Judah: (1) named between Zoreah and Zanoah, and therefore probably N.W. of Jerusalem (Josh. xv. 33); and (2) between Jiphtah and Nezi, and therefore to the S.W. of Jerusalem (Josh. xv. 43). Each, according to Robinson's Map (1857), would be about 16 miles from Jerusalem.

Ash'penaz, the master of the eunuchs of Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. i. 3).

Ash'riel, properly As'riel (1 Chr. vii. 14).

Ash'taroth, and once As'taroth, a city on the E. of Jordan, in Bashan, in the kingdom of Og, doubtless so called from being a seat of the worship of the goddess of the same name. [ASH-TARETH.] It is generally mentioned as a description or definition of Og (Deut. i. 4; Josh. ix. 10, xii. 4, xiii. 12). It fell into possession of the half tribe of Manasseh (Josh. xiii. 31), and was given with its suburbs or surrounding pasture-lands to the Gershonites (1 Chr. vi. 71 [56]). Jerome states that in his time it lay 6 miles from Adra, which again was 25 from Bostra. The only trace of the name yet recovered in these interesting districts is Tell-Ashterah, or Asherah, and of this nothing more than the name is known.

Ash'tarathite, a native or inhabitant of Ashtaroth (1 Chr. xi. 44) beyond Jordan. Uziah the Ashtarathite was one of David's mighty.

Ash'taroth Karnai'im = "Ashtaroth of the two horns or peaks," a place of very great antiquity, the abode of the Rephaim at the time of the incursion of Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv. 5), while the cities of the plain were still standing in their oasis. The name reappears but once, and that in the later history of the Jews, as Carusim, or Carnion (1 Macc. v. 26, 43, 44; 2 Macc. xii. 21, 26), in "the land of Galaad." It is usually assumed to be the same place as the preceding [ASH-TARETH], but the few facts that can be ascertained are all against such an identification. Es-Sanamein, by which the word is rendered in the Arabic version of Saadia, can hardly be other than the still important place of the same name, on the Haj route, about 25 miles S. of Damascus, and to the N.W. of the Lejah. There we are disposed to fix the site of Ashtaroth-Karnaim in the absence of further evidence.

Ash'toreth, the principal female divinity of the Phœnicians. From the connexion of this goddess with BAAL or BEL we should naturally conclude that she would be found in the Assyrian pantheon, and in fact the name Ishtar appears to be clearly identified in the list of the great gods of Assyria. There is no reason to doubt that this Assyrian goddess is the Ashtoreth of the Old Testament and the Astarte of the Greeks and Romans. The worship of Astarte seems to have extended wherever Phœnician colonies were founded. But if we seek to ascertain the character and attributes of this goddess we find ourselves involved in considerable perplexity. There can be no doubt that the general notion symbolized is that of productive power, as Baal symbolizes that of generative power; and it would be natural to conclude that as the sun is the great symbol of the latter, and therefore to be identified with Baal, so the moon is the symbol of the former and must be identified with Astarte. That this goddess was so typified can scarcely be doubted. At any rate it is certain that she was by some ancient writers identified with the moon. On the other hand it appears to be now ascertained that the Assyrian Ishtar was not the moon-goddess, but the planet Venus; and it is certain that Astarte was by many ancient writers identified with the goddess Venus (or Aphrodite) as well as also with the planet of that name. The inquiry as to the worship paid to the goddess is not less perplexed than that of the heavenly body in which she was symbolized. It is certain that the worship of Astarte became identified with that of Venus, and that this worship was connected with the most impure rites is apparent from the close connexion of this goddess with ASHERAH (1 K. xi. 5, 33; 2 K. xxiii. 13).

Ash'ur, the posthumous son of Hezron by his wife Abiah (1 Chr. ii. 24, iv. 5). He became "father" or founder of the town of Tekoa.

Ash'urites, the. This name occurs only in the enumeration of those over whom Ishbosheth was made king (2 Sam. ii. 9). By some of the old interpreters the name is taken as meaning the Geshurites, the members of a small kingdom to the S. or S.E. of Damascus. It would therefore be perhaps safer to follow the Targum of Jonathan, which has Beth-Asher, "the house of Asher," a reading supported by several MSS. of the original text. "The Asherites" will then denote the inhabitants of the whole of the country W. of the Jordan above Jezreel.

Ash'vath, one of the sons of Japhlet, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 33).

Asia. The passages in the N. T., where this word occurs, are the following: Acts ii. 9, vi. 9, xvi. 6, xix. 10, 22, 26, 27, xx. 4, 16, 18, xxi. 27, xxvii. 2; Rom. xvi. 5; 1 Cor. xvi. 19; 2 Cor. i. 8; 2 Tim. i. 15; 1 Pet. i. 1; Rev. i. 4, 11. [CHIEF OF ASIA: see ASIARCHÆ.] In all these passages it may be confidently stated that the word is used not for "the continent of Asia," nor for what we commonly understand by "Asia Minor," but for a Roman province which embraced the western part of the peninsula of Asia Minor, and of which Ephesus was the capital. This province originated in the bequest of Attalus, king of Pergamus, or king of Asia, who left by will to the Roman Republic his hereditary dominions in the west of the peninsula (B.C. 133). In the division made by Augustus of senatorial and imperial provinces, it was placed in the former class, and was governed by a proconsul. It contained many important cities, among which were the seven churches of the Apocalypse, and was divided into assize districts for judicial business (Acts xix. 38). It included the territory anciently subdivided into Aeolis, Ionia, and Doris, and afterwards into Mysia, Lydia, and Caria. The title "King of Asia" was used by the Seleucid monarchs of Antioch, 1 Macc. xi. 13.

Asiarchae (chief of Asia, A. V.; Acts xix. 31), officers chosen annually by the cities of that part of the province of Asia, of which Ephesus was, under Roman government, the metropolis. They had charge of the public games and religious theatrical spectacles, the expenses of which they bore. Their office was thus, in great measure at least, religious. The office of Asiarch was annual, and subject to the approval of the proconsul, but might be renewed; and the title appears to have been continued to those who had at any time held the office.

Asib'as, one of the sons of Phoros or Farosh in 1 Esd. ix. 26, whose name occupies the place of MALCHIJAH in Ezr. x. 25.

Asiel. 1. A Simeonite whose descendant Jehu lived in the reign of Hezekiah (1 Chr. iv. 35).—2. One of the five swift writers whom Esdras was commanded to take to write the law and the history of the world (2 Esd. xiv. 24).

As'ipha, 1 Esd. v. 29. [HABUPHA.]

As'kelon. [ASHKELON.]

Asmode'us (Tob. iii. 8, 17), the same as Abaddon or Apollyon (Rev. ix. 11; comp. Wisd. xviii. 25). From the fact that the Talmud calls him "king of the demons," some assume him to be identical with Beelzebub, and others with Azrael. In the book of Tobit this evil spirit is represented as loving Sara, the daughter of Raguel, and causing the death of seven husbands.

As'nah. The children of Asnah were among the Nethinim who returned with Zerubabel (Ezr. ii. 50). In the parallel list of Neh. vii. 52 the name is omitted, and in 1 Esd. v. 31 it is written ASANA.

Asnap'per, mentioned in Ezr. iv. 10, with the epithets "great and noble," as the person who settled the Cuthaeans in the cities of Samaria. He has been variously identified with Shammaneser, Sennacherib, and Esar-baddon, but was more probably a general of the latter king.

As'om, 1 Esd. ix. 33. [HASHUM.]

Asp (pethen). The Hebrew word occurs in the six following passages:—Deut. xxxii. 33; Job xx. 14, 16; Ps. lviii. 5, xci. 13; Is. xi. 8. It is expressed in the passages from the Psalms by adder in the text of the A. V., and by asp in the margin: elsewhere the text of the A. V. has asp as the representative of the original word pethen. That some kind of poisonous serpent is denoted by the Hebrew word is clear from the passages quoted above. We further learn from Ps. lviii. 5, that the pethen was a snake upon which the serpent-charmers practised their art. In this passage the wicked are compared to "the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear, which will not hearken to the voice of charmers, charming never so wisely;" and from Is. xi. 8, "the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp," it would appear that the pethen was a dweller in holes of walls, &c. The true explanation of Ps. lviii. 5, is that there are some serpents which defy all the attempts of the charmer: in the language of Scripture such individuals may be termed deaf. The point of the rebuke consists in the fact that the pethen was capable of hearing the charmer's song, but refused to do so. The individual case in question was an exception to the rule. Serpents, though comparatively speaking deaf to ordinary sounds, are no doubt capable of hearing the sharp, shrill sounds which the charmer produces either by his voice or by an instrument; and this comparative deafness is, it appears to us, the very reason why such sounds as the charmer makes produce the desired effect in the subject under treatment. [SERPENT-CHARMING.] As the Egyptian cobra is more frequently than any other species the subject upon which the serpent-charmers of the Bible lands practise their science, and as it is fond of concealing itself in walls and in holes (Is. xi. 8), it appears to have the best claim to represent the pethen.

Egyptian cobra. (Naja haje.)

Aspal'athus, the name of some sweet perfume mentioned in Eccles. xxiv. 15. Theophrastus enumerates it with cinnamon, cassia, and many other articles which were used for ointments. The Lignum Rhodianum is by some supposed to be the substance indicated by the aspalathus; the plant which yields it is the Convolvulus scoparius of Linnaeus.

Aspa'tha, third son of Haman (Esth. ix. 7).

As'phar, the pool in the "wilderness of Thecoe" (1 Macc. ix. 33). Is it possible that the name is a corruption of lacus Asphaltites?

Aspha'tarus, 1 Esd. v. 8. [MISPERETH, MIZPAR.]

As'riel, the son of Gilead, and great-grandson of Manasseh (Num. xvi. 31; Josh. xvii. 2). He was the founder of the family of the ASRIELITES. The name is erroneously written ASHRIEL in the A. V. of 1 Chr. vii. 14. According to the rendering of the latter passage by the LXX., Asriel was the son of Manasseh by his Syrian concubine.

As'rielites Num. xvi. 31. [ASRIEL.]

Ass. Five Hebrew names of the genus Asinus occur in the O. T. 1. Chamdr denotes the male domestic ass, though the word was no doubt used in a general sense to express any ass whether male or female. The ass is frequently mentioned in the Bible: it was used for carrying burdens, for riding, for ploughing, for grinding at the mill, and for carrying baggage in wars. The ass in eastern countries is a very different animal from what he is in western Europe. The most noble and honourable amongst the Jews were wont to be mounted on asses, and in this manner our Lord himself made his triumphant entry into Jerusalem (Matt. xxi. 2). He came indeed "meek and lowly," but it is a mistake to suppose that the fact of his riding on the ass had ought to do with his meekness; although thereby, doubtless, he meant to show the peaceable nature of his kingdom, as horses were used only for war purposes. In illustration of the passage in Judg. v. 10, "Speak ye that ride on white asses," it may be mentioned that Buckingham tells us that one of the peculiarities of Bagdad is its race of white asses, which are saddled and bridled for the conveyance of passengers . . . that they are large and spirited, and have an easy and steady pace. In Deut. xxii. 10 "plowing with an ox and an ass together" was forbidden by the law of Moses, probably because they could not pull pleasantly together on account of the difference in size and strength; perhaps also this prohibition may have some reference to the law given in Lev. xix. 19. The ass was not used for food. The Mosaic law considered it unclean, as "not dividing the hoof and chewing the cud." In extreme cases, however, as in the great famine of Samaria, when "an ass's head was sold for eighty pieces of silver" (2 K. vi. 25), the flesh was eaten.—2. Athón, the common domestic she-ass. Balaam rode on a she-ass. The asses of Kish which Saul sought were she-asses. The Shunammite (2 K. iv. 22, 24) rode on one when she went to seek Elisha. They were she-asses which formed the special care of one of David's officers (1 Chr. xxvii. 30).—3. 'Áir the name of a young ass, which occurs Gen. xxxii. 16, xlix. 11; Judg. x. 4, xii. 14; Job xi. 12; Is. xxx. 6, 24; Zech. ix. 9. Sometimes the 'Áir is spoken of as being old enough for riding upon, for carrying burdens, and for tilling the ground.—4. Pere, a species of wild ass mentioned Gen. xvi. 12; Ps. civ. 11; Job vi. 5, xi. 12, xxiv. 5, xxxix. 5; Hos. viii. 9; Jer. ii. 24, xiv. 6; Is. xxxii. 14. Hosea compares Israel to a wild ass of the desert, and Job (xxxix. 5) gives an animated description of this animal, and one which is amply confirmed by both ancient and modern writers.—5. 'Aród occurs only in Job xxxix. 5; but in what respect it differs from the Pere is uncertain.—The species known to the ancient Jews are Asinus hemippus, which inhabits the deserts of Syria, Mesopotamia, and the northern parts of Arabia; the Asinus vulgaris of the N.E. of Africa, the true onager or aboriginal wild ass, whence the domesticated breed has sprung; and probably the Asinus onager, the Koulaú or Ghorkhur, which is found in Western Asia from 48° N. latitude southward to Persia, Beluchistan, and Western India. Mr. Layard remarks that in fleetness the wild ass (Asinus hemippus) equals the gazelle, and to overtake them is a feat which only one or two of the most celebrated mares have been known to accomplish.

Assabi'as, 1 Esd. i. 9. [HASHABIAH 6.]

Assal'imoth, 1 Esd. viii. 36. [SHELOMITH.]

Assani'as, 1 Esd. viii. 54. [HASIABAH 8.]

Asshur. [ASSYRIA.]

Asshurim, a tribe descended from Dedan, the grandson of Abraham (Gen. xxv. 3). Like the other descendants of Keturah, they have not been identified with any degree of certainty. Knobel considers them the same with the Asshur of Ez. xxvii. 23, and connected with southern Arabia.

Asside'ans, i. e. the pious, "puritans," the name assumed by a section of the orthodox Jews (1 Macc. ii. 42, vii. 13; 2 Macc. xiv. 6) as distinguished from the Hellenizing faction. They appear to have existed as a party before the Maccabean rising, and were probably bound by some peculiar vow to the external observance of the Law.

As'sir. 1. Son of Korah (Ex. vi. 24; 1 Chr. vi. 22).—2. Son of Ebinsaph, and a forefather of Samuel (1 Chr. vi. 23, 37).—3. Son of Jeconiah (1 Chr. iii. 17), unless "Jecoonah the captive" be the true rendering.

As'sos or As'sus, a seaport of the Roman province of ASIA, in the district anciently called Mysia. It was situated on the northern shore of the gulf of ADRIAMYTUM, and was only about seven miles from the opposite coast of Lesbos, near Methymna. A good Roman road, connecting the towns of the central parts of the province with Alexandria Troas [TROAS] passed through As'sos, the distance between the two latter places being about 20 miles. These geographical points illustrate St. Paul's rapid passage through the town (Acts xx. 13, 14). The ship in which he was to accomplish his voyage from Troas to Caesarea went round Cape Lectum, while he took the much shorter journey by land. Thus he was able to join the ship without difficulty, and in sufficient time for her to anchor off Mitylene at the close of the day on which Troas had been left.

Assuerus, Tob. xiv. 15. [AHASUERUS.]

Assyr'ia, Asshur, was a great and powerful country lying on the Tigris (Gen. ii. 14), the capital of which was Nineveh (Gen. x. 11, &c.). It derived its name apparently from Asshur, the son of Shem (Gen. x. 22), who in later times was worshipped by the Assyrians as their chief god. The boundaries of Assyria differed greatly at different periods. Probably in the earliest times it was confined to a small tract of low country, lying chiefly on the left bank of the Tigris. Gradually its limits were extended, until it came to be regarded as comprising the whole region between the Armenian mountains (lat. 37° 30') upon the north, and upon the south:

the country about Baghdad (lat. $33^{\circ} 30'$). Eastward its boundary was the high range of Zagros, or mountains of Kurdistan; westward, it was, according to the views of some, bounded by the Mesopotamian desert, while, according to others, it reached the Euphrates.—1. General character of the country. On the N. and E. the high mountain-chains of Armenia and Kurdistan are succeeded by low ranges of limestone-hills of a somewhat arid aspect, which detach themselves from the principal ridges, running parallel to them, and occasionally inclosing, between their northern or north-eastern flank and the main mountain-line, rich plains and fertile valleys. To these ridges there succeeds at first an undulating zone of country, well watered and fairly productive, which finally sinks down with some suddenness upon the great Mesopotamian plain, the modern district of El-Jezireh. This vast flat, which extends in length for 250 miles, is interrupted only by a single limestone-range. Above and below this barrier is an immense level tract, now for the most part a wilderness, scantily watered on the right bank of the Tigris, but abundantly supplied on the left, which bears marks of having been in early times well cultivated and thickly peopled throughout. All over this vast flat, on both sides of the Tigris, rise “grass-covered heaps, marking the site of ancient habitations” which serve to mark the extent of the real Assyrian dominion. They are numerous on the left bank of the Tigris, and on the right they thickly stud the entire country.—2. Provinces of Assyria.—The classical geographers divided Assyria into a number of regions, which appear to be chiefly named from cities, as Arbelitis from Arbela; Calacene (or Calachine) from Calah or Halah (Gen. x. 11; 2 K. xvii. 6); Apolloniatis from Apollonia; Sittacene from Sittace, &c. Adiabene, however, the richest region of all, derived its appellation from the Zab (Diab) river on which it lay.—3. Chief cities.—The chief cities of Assyria in the time of its greatness appear to have been the following:—Nineveh, which is marked by the mounds opposite Mosul (Nebi-Yunus and Kouyunjik); Calah or Halah, now Nimrud; Asshur, now Kileh Sherghat; Sargina, or Dur-Sargina, now Khorsabad; Arbela, still Arbil; Opis at the junction of the Diyaleh with the Tigris; and Sittace, a little further down the latter river, if this place should not rather be reckoned to Babylonia.—4. History of Assyria—original peopling.—Scripture informs us that Assyria was peopled from Babylon (Gen. x. 11), and both classical tradition and the monuments of the country agree in this representation. In Herodotus (i. 7), Ninus, the mythic founder of Nineveh, is the son (descendant) of Belus, the mythic founder of Babylon—a tradition in which the derivation of Assyria from Babylon, and the greater antiquity and superior position of the latter in early times are shadowed forth sufficiently. The researches recently carried on in the two countries clearly show that Babylonian greatness and civilization was earlier than Assyrian, and that while the former was of native growth, the latter was derived from the neighbouring country.—5. Date of the foundation of the kingdom.—As a country, Assyria was evidently known to Moses (Gen. ii. 14, xxv. 18; Num. xxiv. 22, 24); but it does not appear in Jewish history as a kingdom till the reign of Menahem (about B.C. 770). Herodotus relates that the Assyrians were “lords of Asia” for 520 years, till the Median kingdom was formed, B.C. 708. He would thus, it appears, have assigned to the foundation of the Assyrian empire a date not very greatly anterior to B.C. 1228. Berosus, who made the empire last 526 years to the reign of Pul, must have agreed nearly with this view; at least he would certainly have placed the rise of the kingdom within the 13th century. This is, perhaps, the utmost that can be determined with any approach to certainty.—6. Early kings, from the foundation of the kingdom to Pul.—The Mesopotamian researches have rendered it apparent that the original seat of government was not at Nineveh. The oldest Assyrian remains have been found at Kileh-Sherghat, on the right bank of the Tigris, 60 miles south of the later capital; and this place the monuments show to have been the residence of the earliest kings. The kings proved to have reigned there are fourteen in number, divisible into three groups; and their reigns are thought to have covered a space of nearly 350 years, from B.C. 1273 to B.C. 930. The most remarkable monarch of the series was called Tiglath-pileser. He appears to have been king towards the close of the twelfth century, and thus to have been contemporary with Samuel. The other monarchs of the Kileh-Sherghat series, both before and after Tiglath-pileser, are comparatively insignificant. The later kings of the series are only known to us as the ancestors of two great monarchs. Sardanapalus the first, who appears to have been the warlike Sardanapalus of the Greeks, transferred the seat of government from Kileh-Sherghat to Nimrud (probably the Calah of Scripture), where he built the first of those magnificent palaces which have recently been exhumed by our countrymen. His son, Shalmaneser or Shalmanubar, the monarch who set up the Black Obelisk, now in the British Museum, to commemorate his victories, was a still greater conqueror. His son and grandson followed in his steps, but scarcely equalled his glory. The latter is thought to be identical with the Biblical Pul, Phul, or Phaloch [PUL].—7. The kings from Pul to Esarhaddon.—The succession of the Assyrian kings from Pul almost to the close of the empire is rendered tolerably certain, not merely by the inscriptions, but also by the Jewish records. In the 2nd book of Kings we find the names of Pul, Tiglath-pileser, Shalmaneser, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon, following one another in rapid succession (2 K. xv. 19 and 29, xvii. 3, xviii. 13, xix. 37); and in Isaiah we have the name of "Sargon, king of Assyria" (xx. 1), who is a contemporary of the prophet, and who must evidently therefore belong to the same series. The inscriptions, by showing us that Sargon was the father of Sennacherib, fix his place in the list, and give us for the monarchs of the last half of the 8th and the first half of the 7th century B.C. the (probably) complete list of Tiglath-pileser II., Shalmaneser II., Sargon, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon.—8. Lower Dynasty.—It seems to be certain that at, or near, the accession of Pul, about B.C. 770, a great change of some kind or other occurred in Assyria. It was only 23 years later, that the Babylonians considered their independence to have commenced (B.C. 747). Tradition seems to show that about the middle of the eighth century B.C. there must have been a break in the line of Assyrian kings, and probably the Pul or Phaloch of Scripture was really the last king of the old monarchy, and Tiglath-pileser II., his successor, was the founder of what has been called the "Lower Empire."—9. Supposed loss of the empire at this period.—Many writers of repute have been inclined to accept the statement of Herodotus with respect to the breaking up of the whole empire at this period. It is evident, however, both from Scripture and from the monuments, that the shock sustained through the domestic revolution has been greatly exaggerated. It is plain, from Scripture, that in the reigns of Tiglath-pileser, Shalmaneser, Sargon, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon, Assyria was as great as at any former era. These kings all warred successfully in Palestine and its neighbourhood; some attacked Egypt (Is. xx. 4); one appears as master of Media (2 K. xvii. 6); while another has authority over Babylon, Susiana, and Elymais (2 K. xvii. 24; Ezr. iv. 9). The Assyrian annals for the period are in the most complete accordance with these representations, and the statements of the inscriptions are fully borne out by the indications of greatness to be traced in the architectural monuments. On every ground it seems necessary to conclude that the second Assyrian kingdom was really greater and more glorious than the first; that under it the limits of the empire reached their fullest extent, and the internal prosperity was at the highest. Even as regards Babylon, the Assyrian loss was not permanent. Sargon, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon, all exercised full authority over that country.—10. Successors of Esarhaddon.—By the end of the reign of Esarhaddon the triumph of the arms of Assyria had been so complete that scarcely an enemy was left who could cause her serious anxiety. In Scripture it is remarkable that we hear nothing of Assyria after the reign of Esarhaddon, and profane history is equally silent until the attacks begin which brought about her downfall.—11. Fall of Assyria.—The fall of Assyria, long previously prophesied by Isaiah (x. 5-19), was effected by the growing strength and boldness of the Medes. If we may trust Herodotus, the first Median attack on Nineveh took place about the year B.C. 633. For some time their efforts were unsuccessful; but after a while, having won over the Babylonians to their side, they became superior to the Assyrians in the field, and about B.C. 625, or a little earlier, laid final siege to the capital [MEDIA]. Sarcus, the last king—probably the grandson of Esarhaddon—made a stout and prolonged defence, but at length, finding resistance vain, he collected his wives and his treasures in his palace, and with his own hand setting fire to the building, perished in the flames.—12. Fulfillment of prophecy.—The prophecies of Nahum and Zephaniah (i. 13-15) against Assyria were probably delivered shortly before the catastrophe. Ezekiel, writing about B.C. 584, bears witness historically to the complete destruction which had come upon the Assyrians (ch. xxxi.). In accordance with Nahum's announcement (iii. 19) we find that Assyria never succeeded in maintaining a distinct nationality. Once only was revolt attempted, about a century after the Median conquest, but it failed signally, and appears never to have been repeated, the Assyrians remaining thenceforth submissive subjects of the Persian empire.—13. General character of the empire.—Like all the early monarchies which attained to any great extent, it was composed of a number of separate kingdoms. The Assyrian monarchs bore sway over a number of petty kings through the entire extent of their dominions. These native princes were feudatories of the Great Monarch, of whom they held their crown by the double tenure of homage and tribute. Menahem (2 K. xv. 19), Hoshea (ibid. xvii. 4), Ahaz (ibid. xvi. 8), Hezekiah (ibid. xviii. 4), and Manasseh (2 Chr. xxxiii. 11-13), were certainly in this position, as were many native kings of Babylon. It is not quite certain how far Assyria required a religious conformity from the subject people. Her religion was a gross and complex polytheism, comprising the worship of thirteen principal and numerous minor divinities, at the head of all of whom stood the chief god, Asshur, who seems to be the deified patriarch of the nation (Gen. x. 22). The inscriptions appear to state that in all countries over which the Assyrians established their supremacy, they set up "the laws of Asshur," and "altars to the Great Gods." It was probably in connexion with this Assyrian requirement that Ahaz, on his return from Damascus, where he had made his submission to Tiglath-pileser, incurred the guilt of idolatry (2 K. xvi. 10-16).—14. Its extent.—On the west, the Mediterranean and the river Halys appear to have been the boundaries; on the north, a fluctuating line, never reaching the Euxine nor extending beyond the northern frontier of Armenia; on the east, the Caspian Sea and the Great Salt Desert; on the south, the Persian Gulf and the Desert of Arabia. The countries included within these limits are the following:—Susiana, Chaldaea, Babylonia, Media, Matiene, Armenia, Assyria Proper, Mesopotamia, parts of Cappadocia and Cilicia, Syria, Phoenicia, Palestine, and Idumaea. Cyprus was also for a while a dependency of the Assyrian kings, and they may perhaps have held at one time certain portions of Lower Egypt.—15. Civilisation of the Assyrians.—The civilisation of the Assyrians, as has been already observed, was derived originally from the Babylonians. They were a Shemitic race, originally resident in Babylonia (which at that time was Cushite), and thus acquainted with the Babylonian inventions and discoveries, who ascended the valley of the Tigris and established in the tract immediately below the Armenian mountains a separate and distinct nationality. Their modes of writing and building, the form and size of their bricks, their architectural ornamentation, their religion and worship, in a great measure, were drawn from Babylon, which they always regarded as a sacred land—the original seat of their nation, and the true home of all their gods, with the one exception of Asshur. Still, as their civilisation developed, it became in many respects peculiar. Their art is of home growth. Their pictures of war, and of the chase, and even sometimes of the more peaceful incidents of human life, have a fidelity, a spirit, a boldness, and an appearance of life, which place them high among realistic schools. The advanced condition of the Assyrians in various other respects is abundantly evidenced alike by the representations on the sculptures and by the remains discovered among their buildings. They were still, however, in the most important points barbarians. Their government was rude and inartificial; their religion coarse and sensual; their conduct of war cruel; even their art materialistic and so debasing; they had served their purpose when they had prepared the East for centralised government, and been God's scourge to punish the people of Israel (Is. x. 5-6); they were, therefore, swept away to allow the rise of that Aryan race which, with less appreciation of art, was to introduce into Western Asia a more spiritual form of religion, a better treatment of captives, and a superior governmental organisation.

Astyages, the last king of the Medes, B.C. 595-560, or B.C. 592-568, who was conquered by Cyrus (Bel and Dragon, 1). The name is identified by Rawlinson and Niebuhr with Delaces⁹ = Ash-dahak, the emblem of the Median power. e

Asup'im, and House of, 1 Chr. xxvi. 15, 17, literally "house of the gatherings." Some understand it as a proper name of chambers on the south side of the Temple. Gesenius and Bertheau explain it of certain store-rooms, and Fürst, following the Vulgate, of the council-chambers in the outer court of the Temple in which the elders held their deliberations. The same word in A. V. of Neh. xii. 25, is rendered "thresholds," and is translated "lintels" in the Targum of R. Joseph on 1 Chr.

Asyn'critus, a Christian at Rome, saluted by St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 14).

A'tad, the threshing-floor of, a spot "beyond Jordan," at which Joseph and his brethren, on their way from Egypt to Hebron, made their seven days' "great and very sore mourning" over the body of Jacob; in consequence of which we are told it acquired from the Canaanites the new name of Abel-Mizraim (Gen. i. 10, 11). According to Jerome it was in his day called Bethgia or Bethacla (Beth-Hogla). Beth-Hogla is known to have lain between the Jordan and Jericho, therefore on the west side of Jordan. [BETH-HOGLA.]

A'tarah, a wife of Jerahmeel, and mother of Onam (1 Chr. ii. 26).

Atargatis, or DERCETO, a Syrian goddess, represented generally with the body of a woman and the tail of a fish (comp. DAGON). Her most famous temples were at Hierapolis (Mabug) and Ascalon. Herodotus identified her with Aphrodite Urania. Lucian compared her with Here, though he allowed that she combined traits of other deities. Plutarch says that some regarded her as "Aphrodite, others as Here, others as the cause and natural power which provides the principles and seeds for all things from moisture." This last view is probably an accurate description of the attributes of the goddess, and explains her fish-like form and popular identification with Aphrodite. There was a temple of Atargatis (2 Macc. xii. 26) at Karnion, which Atargatis was the tutelary goddess of the first Assyrian dynasty, and that the name appears in Tiglath or Tiglath-pileser.

At'aroth. 1. One of the towns in the "land of Jazer and land of Gilead" (Num. xxxii. 3), taken and built by the tribe of Gad (xxxii. 34). From its mention with places which have been identified on the N.E. of the Dead Sea near the mountain of Jebel Attarâs, a connexion has been assumed between Ataroth and that mountain. But some other identification is necessary.—2. A place on the (south?) boundary of Ephraim and Manassah (Josh. xvi. 2, 7). It is impossible to say whether Ataroth is or is not the same place as, 3. ATAROTH-ADAR, or -ADDAR on the west border of Benjamin, "near the 'mountain' that is on the south side of the nether Beth-horon" (Josh. xvi. 5, xviii. 13). In the Onomasticon mention is made of an Atharoth in Ephraim, in the mountains, 4 miles N. of Sebaste; as well as two places of the name not far from Jerusalem.—4. "ATAROTH, THE HOUSE OF JOAB," a place (?) occurring in the list of the descendants of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 54).

A'ter. 1. The children of Ater were among the porters or gate-keepers of the Temple who returned with Zerubabel (Ezr. ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45). They are called in 1 Esd. v. 28, "the sons of JATAL.—2. The children of ATER OF HEZEKIAH to the number of 98 returned with Zerubabel (Ezr. ii. 16; Neh. vii. 21), and were among the heads of the people who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (x. 17). The name appears in 1 Esd. v. 15 as ATEREZIAS.

Aterezias, a corruption of ATER OF HEZEKIAH (1 Esd. v. 15).

Athach, one of the places in the tribe of Judah, which David and his men frequented during the time of his residence at Ziklag (1 Sam. xxx. 30). As the name does not occur elsewhere, it has been suggested that it is an error of the transcriber for Ether, a town in the low country of Judah (Josh. xv. 42). In the Vat. LXX. it is written Nombe.

Athai'ah, a descendant of Pharez, the son of Judah, who dwelt at Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh. xi. 4), called UTHAI in 1 Chr. ix. 4.

Athali'ah, daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, married Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, and introduced into the S. kingdom the worship of Baal. After the great revolution by which Jehu seated himself on the throne of Samaria, she killed all the members of the royal family of Judah who had escaped his sword (2 K. xi. 1), availing herself probably of her position as King's Mother [ASA], to perpetrate the crime. From the slaughter of the royal house, one infant named Joash, the youngest son of Ahaziah, was rescued by his aunt Jehosheba, who had married Jehoiada (2 Chr. xxii. 11) the high-priest (2 Chr. xxiv. 6). The child was brought up under Jehoiada's care, and concealed in the Temple for six years, during which period Athaliah reigned over Judah. At length Jehoiada thought it time to produce the lawful king to the people, trusting to their zeal for the worship of God, and loyalty to the house of David, which had been so strenuously called out by Asa and Jehoshaphat. After communicating his design to five "captains of hundreds," whose names are given in 2 Chr. xxiii. 1, and securing the co-operation of the Levites and chief men in the country-towns in case of necessity, he brought the young Joash into the Temple to receive the allegiance of the soldiers of the guard. It was customary on the Sabbath for a third part of them to do duty at the palace, while two-thirds restrained the crowd of visitors and worshippers who thronged the Temple. On the day fixed for the outbreak there was to be no change in the arrangement at the palace, lest Athaliah, who did not worship in the Temple, should form any suspicions from missing her usual guard. She was first roused to a sense of her danger by the shouts and music which accompanied the inauguration of her grandson, and hurried into the Temple. She arrived, however, too late, and was immediately put to death by Jehoiada's commands, without the precincts. The only other recorded victim of this happy and almost bloodless revolution, was Mattan the priest of Baal.—2. A Benjamite, one of the sons of Jeroham who dwelt at Jerusalem (1 Chr. viii. 26).—3. One of the Bene-Elam, whose son Jeshaiiah with 70 males returned with Ezra in the second caravan from Babylon (Ezr. viii. 7).

Athari'as, a corruption of THE TIRSHATHA (1 Esd. v. 40).

Athenians, natives of Athens (Acts xvii. 21).

Atheno'bius, "the king's friend," an envoy sent by Antiochus VII., Sidetes, to Simon the Jewish high priest (1 Macc. xv. 28-36).

Athens, the capital of Attica, and the chief seat of Grecian learning and civilisation during the golden period of the history of Greece. An account of this city would be out of place in the present work. St. Paul visited it in his journey from Macedonia, and appears to have remained there some time (Acts xvii. 14-34; comp. 1 Thess. iii. 1). During his residence he delivered his memorable discourse on the Areopagus to the "men of Athens" (Acts xvii. 22-31). The Agora or "market," where St. Paul disputed daily, was situated in the valley between the Acropolis, the Areopagus, the Pnyx and the Museum, being bounded by the Acropolis on the N.E. and E., by the Areopagus on the N., by the Pnyx on the N.W. and W., and by the Museum on the S. The annexed plan shows the position of the Agora. The remark of the sacred historian respecting the inquisitive character of the Athenians (xvii. 21) is attested by the unanimous voice of antiquity. Demosthenes rebukes his countrymen for their love of constantly going about in the market, and asking one another What news? The remark of St. Paul upon the "superstitious" character of the Athenians (xvii. 22) is in like manner confirmed by the ancient writers. Thus Pausanias says that the Athenians surpassed all other states in the attention which they paid to the worship of the gods; and hence Atonement, the Day of, the great day of national humiliation, and the only one commanded in the Mosaic law. [FASTS.] The mode of its observance is described in Lev. xvi., and the conduct of the people is emphatically enjoined in Lev. xxiii. 26-32.—II. It was kept on the tenth day of Tisri, that is, from the evening of the ninth to the evening of the tenth of that month, five days before the Feast of Tabernacles. [FESTIVALS.]—III. The observances of the day, as described in the law, were as follow. It was kept by the people as a solemn sabbath. On this occasion only the high priest was permitted to enter into the Holy of Holies. Having bathed his person and dressed himself entirely in the holy white linen garments, he brought forward a young bullock for a sin-offering and a ram for a burnt-offering, purchased at his own cost, on account of himself and his family, and two young goats for a sin-offering with a ram for a burnt-offering, which were paid for out of the public treasury, on account of the people. He then presented the two goats before the Lord at the door of the tabernacle and cast lots upon them. On one lot "for Jehovah" was inscribed, and on the other "for Azazel." He next sacrificed the young bullock as a sin-offering for himself and his family. Taking with him some of the blood of the bullock, he filled a censer with burning coals from the brazen altar, took a handful of incense, and entered into the most holy place. He then threw the incense upon the coals and enveloped the mercy-seat in a cloud of smoke. Then, dipping his finger into the blood, he sprinkled it seven times before the mercy-seat eastward. The goat upon which the lot "for Jehovah" had fallen was then slain, and the high-priest sprinkled its blood before the mercy-seat in the same manner as he had done that of the bullock. Going out from the Holy of Holies he purified the holy place, sprinkling some of the blood of both the victims on the altar of incense. At this time no one besides the high priest was suffered to be present in the holy place. The purification of the Holy of Holies, and of the holy place, being thus completed, the high priest laid his hands upon the head of the goat on which the lot "for Azazel" had fallen, and confessed over it all the sins of the people. The goat was then led, by a man chosen for the purpose, into the wilderness, into "a land not inhabited," and was there let loose. The high-priest after this returned into the holy place, bathed himself again, put on his usual garments of office, and offered the two rams as burnt-offerings, one for himself and one for the people. He also burnt upon the altar the fat of the two sin-offerings, while their flesh was carried away and burned outside the camp. They who took away the flesh and the man who had led away the goat had to bathe their persons and wash their clothes as soon as their service was performed. The accessory burnt-offerings mentioned Num. xxix. 7-11, were a young bullock, a ram, seven lambs, and a young goat.—IV. A few particulars given by Josephus are worthy of notice.

He states that the high-priest sprinkled the blood with his finger seven times on the ceiling and seven times on the floor of the most holy place, and seven times towards it (as it would appear, outside the veil), and round the golden altar. Then going into the court he either sprinkled or poured the blood round the great altar.—V. The following details from the Mishna, appear either to be interesting in themselves or to illustrate the language of the Pentateuch. 1. The high priest himself dressed in his coloured official garments, used, on the Day of Atonement, to perform all the duties of the ordinary daily service, such as lighting the lamps, presenting the daily sacrifices, and offering the incense. After this he bathed himself, put on the white garments, and commenced the special rites of the day. 2. The high priest went into the Holy of Holies four times in the course of the day. Three of the entrances seem to be very distinctly implied in Lev. xvi. 12, 14, and 15. 3. It is said that the blood of the bullock and that of the goat were each sprinkled eight times, once towards the ceiling and seven times on the floor. 4. After he had gone into the most holy place the third time, and had returned into the holy place, the high priest sprinkled the blood of the bullock eight times towards the veil, and did the same with the blood of the goat. Having then mingled the blood of the two victims together and sprinkled the altar of incense with the mixture, he came into the court and poured out what remained at the foot of the altar of burnt-offering. 5. Most careful directions are given for the preparation of the high priest for the services of the day. For seven days previously he kept away from his own house, and dwelt in a chamber appointed for his use. This was to avoid the accidental causes of pollution which he might meet with in his domestic life. 6. Several curious particulars are stated regarding the scapegoat. The two goats of the sin-offering were to be of similar appearance, size, and value. The lots were put into a little box or urn, into which the high priest put both his hands and took out a lot in each, while the two goats stood before him, one at the right side and the other on the left. The lot in each hand belonged to the goat in the corresponding position. The high priest then tied a piece of scarlet cloth on the scapegoat's head, called "the scarlet tongue," from the shape in which it was cut. A prayer was then offered by the priest, and the goat was led away by the man appointed. As soon as it reached a certain spot, a signal was made to the high priest, who waited for it. The man who led the goat is said to have taken him to the top of a high precipice and thrown him down backwards, so as to dash him to pieces. 7. The high priest, as soon as he had received the signal that the goat had reached the wilderness, read some lessons from the law, and offered up some prayers. He then bathed himself, resumed his coloured garments, and offered either the whole, or a great part, of the accessory offering (mentioned Num. xxxix. 7-11), with the regular evening sacrifice. After this, he washed again, put on the white garments, and entered the most holy place for the fourth time, to fetch out the censer and the incense-plate. This terminated the special rites of the day. 8. The Mishna gives very strict rules for the fasting of the people. In the law itself no express mention is made of abstinence from food.—VI. There has been much discussion regarding the meaning of the word

Azazel! The opinions which seem most worthy of notice are the following:—1. It has been regarded as a designation of the goat itself. This view has been most favoured by the old interpreters. They in general supposed it to mean the goat sent away, or let loose. But the application of Azazel to the goat itself involves the Hebrew text in insuperable difficulties. If one expression is to be rendered for Jehovah, it would seem that the other must be for Azazel, with the preposition in the same sense. If this is admitted, taking Azazel for the goat itself, it does not seem possible to make sense out of Lev. xvi. 10 and 26. 2. Some have taken Azazel for the name of the place to which the goat was sent. 3. Others who have studied the subject most closely take Azazel for a personal being to whom the goat was sent. a) Gesenius supposes it to be some false deity who was to be appeased by such a sacrifice as that of the goat. b) But others, in the spirit of a simpler faith, have regarded him as an evil spirit, or the devil himself. Spencer supposes that the goat was given up to the devil. Hengstenberg affirms that Azazel cannot possibly be anything but another name for Satan. He does not doubt that the goat was sent away laden with the sins of God's people, now forgiven, in order to mock their spiritual enemy. Few, perhaps, will be satisfied with Hengstenberg's mode of meeting this difficulty. 4. An explanation of the word which seems less objectionable, if it is not wholly satisfactory, would render the designation of the lot "for complete sending away."—VII. As it might be supposed, the Talmudists miserably degraded the meaning of the Day of Atonement. They looked upon it as an opportunity afforded them of wiping off the score of their more heavy offences. Philo regarded the day in a far nobler light. He speaks of it as an occasion for the discipline of self-restraint in regard to bodily indulgence, and for bringing home to our minds the truth that man does not live by bread alone, but by whatever God is pleased to appoint. It cannot be doubted that what especially distinguished the symbolical expiation of this day from that of the other services of the law, was its broad and national character, with perhaps a deeper reference to the sin which belongs to the nature of man. In considering the meaning of the particular rites of the day, three points appear to be of a very distinctive character. 1. The white garments of the high priest. 2. His entrance into the Holy of Holies. 3. The scapegoat. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (ix. 7-25) teaches us to apply the first two particulars. The high priest himself, with his person cleansed and dressed in white garments, was the best outward type which a living man could present in his own person of that pure and holy One who was to purify His people and to cleanse them from their sins. But respecting the meaning of the scapegoat, we have no such light to guide us, and the subject is one of great doubt and difficulty. Of those who take Azazel for the Evil Spirit, some have supposed that the goat was a sort of bribe, or retaining fee, for the accuser of men. Spencer made it a symbol of the punishment of the wicked; while Hengstenberg considers it significant of the freedom of those who had become reconciled to God. Some few have supposed that the goat was taken into the wilderness to suffer there vicariously for the sins of the people. But it has been generally considered that it was dismissed to signify the carrying away of their sins, as it were, out of the sight of Jehovah. If we keep in view that the two goats are spoken of as parts of one and the same sin-offering, we shall not have much difficulty in seeing that they form together but one symbolical expression. This is implied in the reasoning of the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews on the office and sacrifice of Christ (Heb. ix.). Hence some, regarding each goat as a type of Christ, supposed that the one which was slain represented his death, and that the goat set free signified his resurrection. But we shall take a simpler, and perhaps a truer view, if we look upon the slain goat as setting forth the act of sacrifice, in giving up its own life for others "to Jehovah," in accordance with the requirements of the Divine law; and the goat which carried off its load of sin "for complete removal," as signifying the cleansing influence of faith in that sacrifice.

At'roth, a city of Gad (Num. xxii. 35.). No doubt the name should be taken with that following it, Shophan, to distinguish this place from At'roth in the same neighbourhood.

At'tal. 1. Grandson of Sheshan the Jerahmeelite through his daughter Ahlai, whom he gave in marriage to Jarha, his Egyptian slave (1 Chr. ii. 35, 36). His grandson Zabad was one of David's mighty men (1 Chr. xi. 41).—2. One of the lion-faced warriors of Gad, captains of the host, who forded the Jordan at the time of its overflow, and joined David in the wilderness (1 Chr. xii. 11).—3. Second son of King Rehoboam by Maachah the daughter of Absalom (2 Chr. xi. 20).

Attalia's, a coast-town of Pamphylia, mentioned (Acts xiv. 25), as the place from which Paul and Barnabas sailed on their return to Antioch from their missionary journey into the inland parts of Asia Minor. It was built by Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamus, and named after the monarch. All its remains are characteristic of the date of its foundation. Leake fixes Attalia at Adalia, on the S. coast of Asia Minor, N. of the Duden Su the ancient Catarrhactes.

At'talus, the name of three kings of Pergamus who reigned respectively B.C. 241-197, 159-138 (Philadelphus), 138-133 (Philometor). It is uncertain whether the letters sent from Rome in favour of the Jews (1 Macc. xv. 22) were addressed to Attalus II. or Attalus III., as their date falls in B.C. 139-8 [LUCIUS], about the time when the latter succeeded his uncle.

An'gia, the daughter of Berzelus, or Barzillai, according to 1 Esd. v. 38, whose descendants by Addus were among the priests whose genealogy could not be substantiated after the return from Babylon. The name does not occur either in Ezra or Nehemiah.

Augustus Caesar, the first Roman emperor. During his reign Christ was born (Luke ii. 1 ff.) He was born A.U.C. 691, B.C. 63. His father was Caius Octavius; his mother Atia, daughter of Julia the sister of C. Julius Caesar. He bore the same name as his father, Caius Octavius. He was principally educated by his great-uncle Julius Caesar, and was made his heir. After his murder, the young Octavius, then Caius Julius Caesar Octavianus, was taken into the Triumvirate with Antony and Lepidus, and, after the removal of the latter, divided the empire with Antony. The struggle for the supreme power was terminated in favour of Octavianus by the battle of Actium, B.C. 31. On this victory, he was saluted Imperator by the senate, who conferred on him the title Augustus (B.C. 27). The first link binding him to N. T. history is his treatment of Herod after the battle of Actium. That prince, who had espoused Antony's side, found himself pardoned, taken into favour and confirmed, nay even increased in his power. After Herod's death in A.D. 4, Augustus divided his dominions almost exactly according to his dying directions, among his sons. Augustus died at Nola in Campania, Aug. 19, A.U.C. 787, A.D. 14, in his 76th year; but long before his death he had associated Tiberius with him in the empire.

Augustus' Band (Acts xxvii. 1). [ARMY.]

Auratus, leader of a riot at Jerusalem (2 Mac. iv. 40).

Autas, name of a Levite (1 Esd. ix. 48). [HODJAH.]

Avā, a place in the empire of Assyria, apparently the same as Ivah (2 K. xvii. 24). [IVAH.]

Avāran, the surname of Eleazar, brother of Judas Maccabeus (1 Mac. ii. 5). Two distinct derivations from the Arabic have been proposed for it; both, however, tracing its origin to the feat of killing the royal elephant in the battle of Bethzacharias, by which Eleazar met his death (1 Mac. vi. 43-46). In the latter passage he is called SAVARAN, which is apparently an erroneous reading, as Josephus twice calls him AURAN (Ant. xii. 6 §1, 9 §4).

Aven. 1. The "plain of Aven" is mentioned by Amos (i. 5) in his denunciation of Syria and the country to the N. of Palestine. It has not been identified with certainty.—2. In Hos. x. 8, "the high places of Aven," the word is clearly an abbreviation of Beth-aven, that is Bethel (comp. iv. 15, &c.).—3. In this manner are pointed, in Ez. xxx. 17, the letters of the name which is elsewhere given as On, the sacred city of Heliopolis or On, in Egypt. [ON.]

Avim, Avims, or Avites, Heb. the Avvim.—1. A people among the early inhabitants of Palestine, whom we meet with in the S.W. corner of the sea-coast, whither they may have made their way northwards from the Desert. The only notice of them which has come down to us is contained in a remarkable fragment of primeval history preserved in Deut. ii. 23. Here we see them dwelling in the villages in the S. part of the Shefelah, or great western lowland, "as far as Gaza." In these rich possessions they were attacked by the invading Philistines, "the Caphtorim which came forth out of Caphtor," and who after "destroying" them and "dwelling in their stead," appear to have pushed them further north. Possibly a trace of their existence is to be found in the town "Avim" (or "the Avvim"), which occurs among the cities of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 23). It is a curious fact that both the LXX. and Jerome identified the Avvim with the Hivites, and also that the town of ha-Avvim was in the actual district of the Hivites (Josh. ix. 7, 17, compared with xviii. 22-27).—2. The people of Avva, among the colonists who were sent by the king of Assyria to re-inhabit the depopulated cities of Israel (2 K. xvii. 31). They were idolaters, worshipping gods called Nibhaz and Tartak. [AVA.]

Avith, the city of Hadad ben-Bedad, one of the kings of Edom before there were kings in Israel (Gen. xxxvi. 35; 1 Chr. i. 46). The name may be compared with el-Ghousseihah, a "chain of low hills," mentioned by Burckhardt as lying to the E. of the district of Kerek in Moab.

Awl, a tool of which we do not know the ancient form. The only notice of it is in connexion with the custom of boring the ear of the slave (Ex. xxi. 6; Deut. xv. 17).

Axe. Seven Hebrew words are rendered "ax" in the A. V.—1. Garzen, from a root signifying "to cut or sever," as "hatchet," from "hack," corresponds to the Lat. securis. It consisted of a head of iron (cf. Is. x. 34), fastened, with thongs or otherwise, upon a handle of wood, and so liable to slip off (Deut. xix. 5; 2 K. vi. 5). It was used for felling trees (Deut. x. 19), and also for shaping the wood when felled, perhaps like the modern adze (1 K. vi. 7).—2. Chereb, which is usually translated "sword," is used of other cutting instruments, as a "knife" (Josh. v. 2) or razor (Ez. v. 1), or a tool for hewing or dressing stones (Ex. xx. 25), and is once rendered "axe" (Ez. xxvi. 9), evidently denoting a weapon for destroying buildings, a pick-axe.—3. Cusshil occurs but once (Ps. lxxiv. 6), and is evidently a later word, denoting a large axe. It is also found in the Targum of Jer. xvi. 22.—4. Magzarah (2 Sam. xii. 31), and 5, Megérâh (1 Chr. xx. 3) are found in the description of the punishments inflicted by David upon the Ammonites of Rabbah. The latter word is properly "a saw," and is apparently an error of the transcriber for the former.—6. Ma'atsad, rendered "ax" in the margin of Is. xlv. 12, and Jer. x. 3, "was an instrument employed both by the iron-smith and the carpenter, and is supposed to be a curved knife or bill, smaller than—7. Kardôm, which was a large axe used for felling trees (Judg. ix. 48; 1 Sam. xiii. 20, 21; Ps. lxxiv. 5; Jer. xvi. 22). The words 1, 5, and 7 have an etymological affinity with each other, the idea of cutting being that which is expressed by their roots.—The "battle-ax" (map-pets, Jer. li. 20) was probably, as its root indicates, a heavy mace or maul, like that which gave his surname to Charles Martel.

Egyptian Axe. (British Museum.)

Az'ael = ASAHIEL 4 (1 Esd. ix. 14).

Azælus, an Israelite in the time of Esdras: the name is probably merely a repetition of that preceding it (1 Esd. ix. 34).

Azal, a name only occurring in Zech. i. 5. It mentioned as the limit to which the ravine of the Mount of Olives will extend when "Jehovah shall go forth to fight." Several commentators agree with Jerome in taking Azal as an appellative.

Avall'ah, the father of Shaphan the scribe in the reign of Josiah (2 K. xxii. 3; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 8).

Azani'ah, the father or immediate ancestor of Joshua the Levite in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. x. 9).

Aza'phion, 1 Esd. v. 33. Possibly a corruption of SOPHERETH.

Az'ara, one of the "servants of the Temple" (1 Esd. v. 31). No corresponding name can be traced in the parallel list in Ezra.

Azar'ael, a Levite-musician (Neh. xii. 36).

Azar'ael. 1. A Korhite who joined David in his retreat at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 6).—2. A Levite musician of the family of Heman in the time of David, 1 Chr. xrv. 18: called UZZIEL in xxv. 4.—3. Son of Jeroham, and prince of the tribe of Dan when David numbered the people (1 Chr. xxvii. 22).—4. One of the sons of Bani, who put away his foreign wife on the remonstrance of Ezra (Ezr. x. 41): apparently the same as ESRIL in 1 Esd. iv. 34.—5. Father or ancestor of Maasai, or Amashai, a priest who dwelt in Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh. xi. 13, comp. 1 Chr. ix. 12).

Azariah, a common name in Hebrew and especially in the families of the priests of the line of ELEAZAR, whose name has precisely the same meaning as AZARIAH. It is nearly identical, and is often confounded with Ezra as well as with Zerariah and Seraiah. The principal persons who bore this name were:—1. Son of Ahimaaz (1 Chr. vi. 9). He appears from 1 K. iv. 2, to have succeeded Zadok, his grandfather, in the high-priesthood, in the reign of Solomon, Ahimaaz having died before Zadok. [AHIMAAZ.] To him, it can scarcely be doubted, instead of to his grandson, Azariah the son of Johanan, belongs the notice in 1 Chr. vi. 10, "He it is that executed the priest's office in the temple that Solomon built at Jerusalem." Josephus merely mentions Azarias as the son and successor of Ahimaaz.—2. A chief officer of Solomon's, the son of Nathan, perhaps David's grandson (1 K. iv. 5).—3. Tenth king of Judah, more frequently called UZZIAH (2 K. xiv. 21, xv. 1, 6, 7, 8, 17, 23, 27; 1 Chr. iii. 12).—4. Son of Ethan, of the sons of Zerah, where, perhaps, Zerariah is the more probable reading (1 Chr. ii. 8).—5. Son of Jehu of the family of the Jerahmeelites, and descended from Jarha the Egyptian slave of Sheshan (1 Chr. ii. 38, 39). He was probably one of the captains of hundreds in the time of Athaliah mentioned in 2 Chr. xxiii. 1; and there called the son of Obed. This fact assigns the compilation of the genealogy in 1 Chr. ii. 36-41 to the reign of Hezekiah.—6. The son of Johanan (1 Chr. vi. 10). He must have been high-priest in the reigns of Abijah and Asa, as we know his son Amariah was in the days of Jehoshaphat, the son of Asa. His name is almost lost in Josephus's list of the high-priests.—7. Another Azariah is inserted between Hilkiah, in Josiah's reign, and Seraiah, who was put to death by Nebuchadnezzar, in 1 Chr. vi. 13, 14. It seems likely that he may have been inserted to assimilate the genealogy to that of Ezra vii. 1.—8. Son of Zephaniah, a Kohathite, and ancestor of Samuel the prophet (1 Chr. vi. 36). Apparently the same as UZZIAH in ver. 24.—9. Azarian, the son of Oded (2 Chr. xv. 1), called simply Oded in ver. 8, was a remarkable prophet in the days of king Asa, and a contemporary of Azariah the son of Johanan the high-priest, and of Hanani the seer.—10. Son of Jehoshaphat king of Judah (2 Chr. xxi. 2).—11. Another son of Jehoshaphat, and brother of the preceding (2 Chr. xxi. 2).—12. In 2 Chr. xxii. 6, Azariah is a clerical error for Ahaziah.—13. Son of Jeroham, one of the captains of Judah in the time of Athaliah (2 Chr. xxiii. 1).—14. The high-priest in the reign of Uzziah, king of Judah, whose name, perhaps from this circumstance, is often corrupted into Azariah (2 K. xiv. 21, xv. 1, 6, 7, 8, &c.). The most memorable event of his life is that which is recorded in 2 Chr. xxvi. 17-20. When king Uzziah, elated by his great prosperity and power, "transgressed against the Lord his God, and went into the Temple of the Lord to burn incense upon the altar of incense," Azariah the priest, accompanied by eighty of his brethren, went in boldly after him, and withstood him. Azariah was contemporary with Isaiah the prophet, and with Amos and Joel, and doubtless witnessed the great earthquake in Uzziah's reign (Am. i. 1; Zech. xiv. 5).—15. Son of Johanan, one of the captains of Ephraim in the reign of Ahaz (2 Chr. xxviii. 12), who sent back the captives and spoil that were taken in the invasion of Judah by Pekin.—16. A Kohathite, father of Joel in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxix. 12).—17. A Merarite, son of Jehalelel, in the time of Hezekiah, contemporary with the son of the preceding (2 Chr. xxix. 12).—18. The high-priest in the days of Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxx. 10, 13). He appears to have coöperated zealously with the king in that thorough purification of the Temple and restoration of the temple-services which was so conspicuous a feature in his reign. He succeeded Urijah, who was high-priest in the reign of Ahaz.—19. Son of Maaseiah, who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 23, 24).—20. One of the leaders of the children of the province who went up from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 7). Elsewhere called SERATAH (Ezr. ii. 2) and ZACHARIAS (1 Esd. v. 8).—21. One of the Levites who assisted Ezra in instructing the people in the knowledge of the law (Neh. vii. 7). Called AZARIAS in 1 Esd. ix. 43.—22. One of the priests who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 2), and probably the same with the Azariah who assisted in the dedication of the city wall (Neh. xii. 33).—23. Jer. xliii. 2 (JEZANIAH).—24. The original name of Abed-nego (Dan. i. 6, 7, 11, 19). He appears to have been of the seed-royal of Judah.

Azari'as. 1. (1 Esd. ix. 21) = UZZIAH, Ezr. x. 21.—2. (1 Esd. ix. 43) = URIJAH, Neh. viii. 4.—3. (1 Esd. ix. 48) = AZARIAH, Neh. viii. 7.—4. Priest in the line of Esdras (2 Esd. i. 1), elsewhere AZARIAH and EZERIAS.—5. Name assumed by the angel Raphael (Tob. v. 12, vi. 6, 13, vii. 8, ix. 2).—6. A captain in the army of Judas Maccabaeus (1 Mac. v. 18, 56, 60).

A'zaz, a Benbenite, father of Bela (1 Chr. v. 8).

Azazi'ah. 1. A Levite-musician in the reign of David, appointed to play the harp in the service which attended the procession by which the ark was brought up from the house of Obed-edom (1 Chr. xv. 21).—2. The father of Hoshen, prince of the tribe of Ephraim when David numbered the people (1 Chr. xxvii. 20).—3. One of the Levites in the reign of Hezekiah, who had charge of the tithes and dedicated things in the Temple under Cononiah and Shimei (2 Chr. xxxi. 13).

Azbas'areth, king of the Assyrians, probably a corruption of Esarhaddon (1 Esd. v. 69; comp. Ezr. iv. 2).

Az'buk, father or ancestor of Nehemiah the prince of part of Bethzur (Neh. iii. 16).

Az'ekah, a town of Judah, with dependent villages, lying in the Shefelah or rich agricultural plain. It is most clearly defined as being near Shochoh [SHOCHOH] (1 Sam. xvii. 1). Joshua's pursuit of the Canaanites after the battle of Beth-horon extended to Azekah (Josh. x. 10, 11). Between Azekah and Shochoh the Philistines encamped before the battle in which Goliath was killed (1 Sam. xvii. 1). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chr.

xi. 9), was still standing at the time of the Babylonian invasion (Jer. xxxiv. 7), and is mentioned as one of the places re-occupied by the Jews after their return from captivity (Neh. xi. 30). The position of Azekah has not yet been recognised.

A'zel, a descendant of Saul (1 Chr. viii. 37, 38, ix. 43, 44).

A'zem, a city in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 29), afterwards allotted to Simeon (ix. 3). Elsewhere it is EZEM.

Asephurith, or more properly ARSIPHURITH, a name which in the LXX. of 1 Esd. v. 16 occupies the place of Jorah in Ezr. ii. 18, and of Hariph in Neh. vii. 24. It is altogether omitted in the Vulgate. Buxton conjectures that it may have originated in a combination of these two names corrupted by the mistakes of transcribers. The second syllable in this case probably arose from a confusion of the uncial Σ with Θ .

Ase'tas. The name of a family which returned with Zerobabel according to 1 Esd. v. 15, but not mentioned in the catalogues of Ezra and Nehemiah.

As'gad. The children of Asgad, to the number of 1222 (2322 according to Neh. vii. 17) were among the laymen who returned with Zerobabel (Ezr. ii. 12). A second detachment of 110, with Johanan at their head, accompanied Ezra in the second caravan (Ezr. viii. 12). With the other heads of the people they joined in the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 15). The name appears as SADAS in 1 Esd. v. 13, and the number of the family is there given 3222. In 1 Esd. viii. 38, it is written ASTATH.

As'i'a, a "servant of the temple" (1 Esd. v. 31), elsewhere called UZZA.

Azi'ei (2 Esd. i. 2), one of the ancestors of Esdras, elsewhere called AZARIAH and EZIAS.

Aziel, a Levite (1 Chr. xv. 20). The name is a shortened form of Jaziel in ver. 18.

Az'iza, a layman of the family of Zattu, who had married a foreign wife after the return from Babylon (Ezr. x. 27): called SARDEUS in 1 Esd. ix. 28.

Azma'veth. 1. One of David's mighty men, a native of Bahurim (2 Sam. xxiii. 31; 1 Chr. xi. 33), and therefore probably a Benjamite.—2. A descendant of Mephibosheth, or Merib-baal (1 Chr. viii. 36, ix. 42).—3. The father of Jeziel and Pelet, two of the skilled Benjamite slingers and archers who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 3), perhaps identical with 1. It has been suggested that in this passage "sons of Azmaveth" may denote natives of the place of that name.—4. Overseer of the royal treasures in the reign of David (1 Chr. xxvii. 25).

Azma'veth, a place to all appearance in Benjamin, being named with Anathoth, Kirjath-Jearim and other towns belonging to that tribe. Forty-two of the Bene-Azmaveth returned from the captivity with Zerobabel (Ezr. ii. 24). The "sons of the singers" seemed to have settled round it (Neh. xii. 29). The name elsewhere occurs as BETH-AZMAVETH.

As'mon, a place named as being on the S. boundary of the Holy Land, apparently near the torrent of Egypt (Wadi el-Arish) (Num. xxxiv. 4, 5; Josh. xv. 4). It has not yet been identified.

As'noth-ta'bor, the ears (i. e. possibly the summits) of Tabor, one of the landmarks of the boundary of Naphtali (Josh. xi. 34). The town, if town it be, has hitherto escaped recognition.

Azor, son of Eliakim, in the line of our Lord (Matt. i. 13, 14).

Azo'tus. [ASHDOD.]

Azo'tus, Mount. In the fatal battle in which Judas Maccabeus fell, he broke the right wing of Bacchides' army, and pursued them to Mount Azotus (1 Mac. ix. 15). Josephus calls it Aza, or Azara, according to many MSS., which Ewald finds in a mountain west of Birzeit, under the form Atara, the Philistine Ashdod being out of the question.

As'riel. 1. The head of a house of the half-tribe of Manasseh beyond Jordan, a man of renown (1 Chr. v. 24).—2. A Naphtalite, ancestor of Jerimoth the head of the tribe at the time of David's census (1 Chr. xxvii. 19): called UZZIEL in two Heb. MSS., and apparently in the LXX.—3. The father of Seraiah, an officer of Jehoiakim (Jer. xxxvi. 26).

As'rikam. 1. A descendant of Zerubbabel, and son of Neariah of the royal line of Judah (1 Chr. iii. 23).—2. Eldest son of Azel, and descendant of Saul (1 Chr. viii. 38, ix. 44).—3. A Levite, ancestor of Shemaiah who lived in the time of Nehemiah (1 Chr. ix. 14; Neh. xi. 15).—4. Governor of the house, or prefect of the palace to king Ahaz, who was slain by Zichri, an Ephraimite hero, in the successful invasion of the southern kingdom by Pekah king of Israel (2 Chr. xxviii. 7).

As'rubah. 1. Wife of Caleb, son of Hezion (1 Chr. ii. 18, 19).—2. Mother of king Jehoshaphat (1 K. xxii. 42; 2 Chr. xx. 31).

As'sur, properly As'sur. 1. A Benjamite of Gibeon, and father of Hananiah the false prophet (Jer. xxviii. 1). Hitzig suggests that he may have been a priest, as Gibeon was one of the priestly cities.—2. Father of Jaazaniah, one of the princes of the people against whom Ezekiel was commanded to prophesy (Ez. xi. 1).

Azu'ran, the sons of Azurran are enumerated in 1 Esd. v. 15 among those who returned from Babylon with Zerobabel, but there is no corresponding name in the catalogues of Ezra and Nehemiah. Azurran may perhaps be identical with Azzur in Neh. x. 17.

As'sah. The more accurate rendering of the name of the well-known Philistine city, Gaza (Deut. ii. 23; 1 K. iv. 24; Jer. xxv. 20). [GAZA.]

Az'zan, the father of Paltiel, prince of the tribe of Issachar, who represented his tribe in the division of the promised land (Num. xxxiv. 26).

Azur, one of the heads of the people who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 17). The name is probably that of a family, and in Hebrew is the same as is elsewhere represented by AZUR.

BA'AL. 1. A Reubenite, whose son or descendant Beerah was carried off by the invading army of Assyria under Tiglath-Pileser (1 Chr. v. 5).—2. The son of Jehiel, father or founder of Gibeon, by his wife Maachah; brother of Kish, and grandfather of Saul (1 Chr. viii. 30, ix. 36).

Baal, the supreme male divinity of the Phœnician and Canaanitish nations, as ASHTORETH was their supreme female divinity. Both names have the peculiarity of being used in the plural, and it seems certain that these plurals designate not statues of the divinities, but different modifications of the divinities themselves. The plural BAALIM is found frequently alone (Judg. ii. 11, x. 10; 1 K. xviii. 18; Jer. ix. 14; Hos. ii. 17), as well as in connexion with Ashtoreth (Judg. x. 6; 1 Sam. vii. 4) and with Asherah, or, as our version renders it, "the groves" (Judg. iii. 7; 2 Chr. xxxiii. 3). The word is in Hebrew a common noun of frequent occurrence, having the meaning Lord, not so much, however, in the sense of Ruler as of Master, Owner, Possessor. There can be no doubt of the very high antiquity of the worship of Baal. We find it established amongst the Moabites and their allies the Midianites in the time of Moses (Num. xxii. 41), and through these nations the Israelites were seduced to the worship of this god under the particular form of Baal-Peor (Num. xxv. 3-18; Deut. iv. 3). Notwithstanding the fearful punishment which their idolatry brought upon them in this instance, the succeeding generation returned to the worship of Baal (Judg. ii. 10-13), and, with the exception of the period during which Gideon was judge (Judg. vi. 25, &c., viii. 33), this form of idolatry seems to have prevailed amongst them up to the time of Samuel (Judg. x. 10; 1 Sam. vii. 4), at whose rebuke the people renounced the worship of Baalim. In the times of the kings the worship of Baal spread greatly, and together with that of Asherah became the religion of the court and people of the ten tribes (1 K. xvi. 31-33, xviii. 19, 22). And though this idolatry was occasionally put down (2 K. iii. 2, x. 28) it appears never to have been permanently abolished among them (2 K. xvii. 16). In the kingdom of Judah also Baal-worship extensively prevailed. During the short reign of Ahaziah and the subsequent usurpation of his mother Athaliah, the sister of Ahab, it appears to have been the religion of the court (2 K. viii. 27; comp. xi. 18), as it was subsequently under Ahaz (2 K. xvi. 3; 2 Chr. xxviii. 2), and Manasseh (2 K. xxi. 3). The worship of Baal amongst the Jews seems to have been appointed with much pomp and ceremony. Temples were erected to him (1 K. xvi. 32; 2 K. xi. 18); his images were set up (2 K. x. 26); his altars were very numerous (Jer. xi. 13), were erected particularly on lofty eminences (1 K. xviii. 20), and on the roofs of houses (Jer. xxxii. 29); there were priests in great numbers (1 K. xviii. 19), and of various classes (2 K. x. 19); the worshippers appear to have been arrayed in appropriate robes (2 K. x. 22); the worship was performed by burning incense (Jer. vii. 9) and offering burnt-sacrifices, which occasionally consisted of human victims (Jer. xix. 5). The officiating priests danced with frantic shouts around the altar, and cut themselves with knives to excite the attention and compassion of the god (1 K. xviii. 26-28). Throughout all the Phœnician colonies we continually find traces of the worship of this god; nor need we hesitate to regard the Babylonian Bel (Is. xlvi. 1) or Belus, as essentially identical with Baal, though perhaps under some modified form. The same perplexity occurs respecting the connexion of this god with the heavenly bodies, as we have already noticed in regard to Ashtoreth. Creuzer and Movers declare Baal to be the Sun-god; on the other hand, the Babylonian god is identified with Zeus, by Herodotus, and there seems to be no doubt that Bel-Merodach is the planet Jupiter. It is quite likely that in the case of Baal, as well as of Ashtoreth, the symbol of the god varied at different times and in different localities. Among the compounds of Baal which appear in the O. T. are:—1. BA'AL-BE'RUTH. This form of Baal was worshipped at Shechem by the Israelites after the death of Gideon (Judg. viii. 33, ix. 4). The name signifies the Covenant-Baal, the god who comes into covenant with the worshippers.—2. BA'AL-ZE'BUB, worshipped at Ekron (2 K. i. 2, 3, 16). The meaning of the name is Baal or Lord of the fly. Similarly the Greeks gave the epithet Apomyios (from myia "a fly") to Zeus, and Pliny speaks of a Fly-god Myiodes. The name occurs in the N. T. in the well-known form BEELZEBUB.—3. BA'AL-HA'NAN. 1. The name of one of the early kings of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 38, 39; 1 Chr. i. 49, 50). 2. The name of one of David's officers, who had the superintendence of his olive and sycamore plantations (1 Chr. xxvii. 28). He was of the town of Gederah (Josh. xv. 36) or Beth-Gader (1 Chr. ii. 51), and from his name we may conjecture that he was of Canaanitish origin.—4. BA'AL-PE'OR. We have already referred to the worship of this god. The narrative (Num. xxv.) seems clearly to show that this form of Baal-worship was connected with licentious rites. Baal-Peor was identified by the Rabbins and early fathers with Priapus.

Baal, geographical. This word occurs as the prefix or suffix to the names of several places in Palestine. It never seems to have become a naturalized Hebrew word; and such places called by this name or its compounds as can be identified, were either near Phœnicia, or in proximity to some other acknowledged seat of heathen worship. The places in the names of which Baal forms a part are as follows:—1. BA'AL, a town of Simeon, named only in 1 Chr. iv. 33, and which form the parallel list in Josh. xix. seems to have been identical with BAALATH-BEER.—2. BA'ALAH. (a.) Another name for KIRJATH-JEARIM, or KIRJATH-BAAL, the well-known town, now Kuriet el Enab. It is mentioned in Josh. xv. 9, 10; 1 Chr. xiii. 6. In Josh. xv. 11, it is called Mount Baalah, and in xv. 60, and xviii. 14, Kirjath-Baal. It would seem as if Baalah were the earlier or Canaanite appellation of the place. In 2 Sam. vi. 2, the name occurs slightly altered as "Baale of Judah." (b.) A town in the south of Judah (Josh. xv. 29), which in xix. 3 is called BALAH, and in the parallel list (1 Chr. iv. 29) BILHAH.—3. BA'ALATH, a town of Dan named with Gibbethon, Gath-rimmon, and other Philistine places (Josh. xix. 44).—4. BA'ALATH-BE'ER = BAAL 1, a town among those in the south part of Judah, given to Simeon, which also bore the name of RAMATH-NEGER, or "the height of the South" (Josh. xix. 8).—5. BA'AL-GAD, used to denote the most northern (Josh. xi. 17, xii. 7), or perhaps north-western (xiii. 5), point to which Joshua's victories extended. It was in all probability a Phœnician or Canaanite sanctuary of Baal under the aspect of Gad, or Fortune. [GAD.] No trace of its site has yet been discovered. The conjecture of Schwarz is, that the modern representative of Baalgad is Banias. [CAESAREA PHILIPPI.]—6. BA'AL-HA'MON, a place at which Solomon had a vineyard, evidently of great extent (Cant. viii. 11). The only possible clue to its situation is the mention in Judith viii. 3, of a Belamôn or Balamôn (A. V. BALAMO) near Dothaim; and therefore in the mountains of Ephraim, not far north of Samaria.—7. BA'AL-HA'ZOR, a place "by Ephraim," where Absalom appears to have had a sheep-farm, and where Amnon was murdered (2 Sam. xiii. 23).—

8. MOUNT BA'AL-HER'MON (Judg. iii. 3), and simply Baal-hermon (1 Chr. v. 23). This is usually considered as a distinct place from Mount Hermon; but we know that this mountain had at least three names (Deut. iii. 9), and Baal-hermon may have been a fourth in use among the Phœnician worshippers of Baal.—9. BA'AL-ME'ON, one of the towns which were built by the Reubenites (Num. xxxii. 38), and to which they "gave other names." It also occurs in 1 Chr. v. 8, and on each occasion with Nebo. In the time of Ezekiel it was Moabite, one of the cities which were the "glory of the country" (Ez. xxv. 9). In the days of Eusebius and Jerome it was still called Balmano, 9 miles distant from Heshbon, and reputed to be the native place of Elisha.—10. BA'AL-PER'AZIM, the scene of a victory of David over the Philistines, and of a great destruction of their images (2 Sam. v. 20; 1 Chr. xiv. 11). The place and the circumstance appear to be again alluded to in Is. xxviii. 21, where it is called Mount P.—11. BA'AL-SHALI'SHA, a place named only in 2 K. iv. 42; apparently not far from Gilgal (comp. ver. 38). It was possibly situated in the district, or "land," of the same name. [SHALISHA].—12. BA'AL-TA'MAR, a place named only in Judg. xx. 33, as near Gibeath of Benjamin. The palm-tree (tāmār) of Deborah (iv. 5) was situated somewhere in the locality, and is possibly alluded to.—13. BA'AL-ZE'PHON, a place in Egypt near where the Israelites crossed the Red Sea (Ex. xiv. 2, 9; Num. xxxiii. 7). From the position of Goshen and the indications afforded by the narrative of the route of the Israelites, we place Baal-zephon on the western shore of the Gulf of Suez, a little below its head, which at that time was about 30 or 40 miles northward of the present head.

Ba'anah. 1. The son of Ahilud, Solomon's commissariat officer in Jezreel and the north of the Jordan valley (1 K. iv. 12).—2. Father of Zadok, who assisted in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 4).—3. = BAANAH, 4 (1 Esd. v. 8; see Ezr. ii. 2).

Ba'anah. 1. Son of Rimmon, a Benjamite, who with his brother Rechab murdered Ish-bosheth. For this they were killed by David, and their mutilated bodies hung up over the pool at Hebron (2 Sam. iv. 2, 5, 6, 9).—2. A Netophathite, father of Heleb or Heled, one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii. 29; 1 Chr. xi. 30).—3. Accurately Baana, son of Hushai, Solomon's commissariat officer in Asher (1 K. iv. 16).—4. A man who accompanied Zorobabel on his return from the captivity (Ezr. ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7). Possibly the same person is intended in Neh. x. 27. [BAANA, 3.]

Baasē'ah, a Gershonite Levite, one of the forefathers of Asaph the singer (1 Chr. vi. 40 [25]).

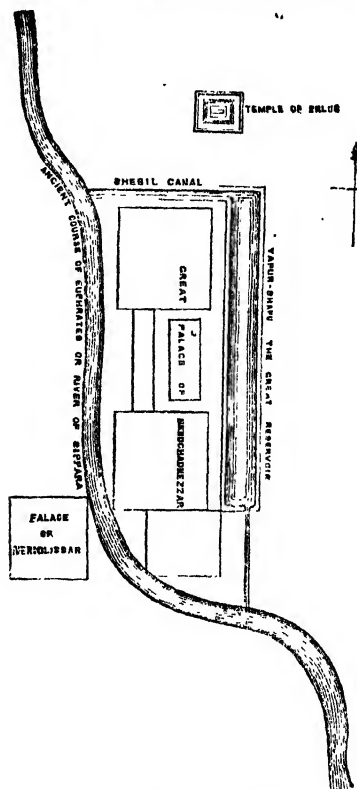

Ba'asha, B.C. 953-931, third sovereign of the separate kingdom of Israel, and the founder of its second dynasty. He was son of Ahijah of the tribe of Issachar, and conspired against King Nadab, son of Jeroboam, when he was besieging the Philistine town of Gibbethon (1 K. xv. 27), and killed him with his whole family. He appears to have been of humble origin (1 K. xvi. 2). It was probably in the 13th year of his reign that he made war on Asa, and began to fortify Ramah. He was defeated by the unexpected alliance of Asa with Benhadad I. of Damascus. Baasha died in the 24th year of his reign, and was honourably buried in the beautiful city of Tirzah (Cant. vi. 4), which he had made his capital (1 K. xvi. 6; 2 Chr. xvi. 1-6).

Ba'bel, Bab'ylon, is properly the capital city of the country, which is called in Genesis Shinar, and in the later Scriptures Chaldaea, or the land of the Chaldaeans. The architectural remains discovered in southern Babylonia, taken in conjunction with the monumental records, seem to indicate that it was not at first the capital, nor, indeed, a town of very great importance. Erech, Ur, and Ellasar, appear to have been all more ancient than Babylon, and were capital cities when Babūl was a provincial village. The first rise of the Chaldaean power was in the region close upon the Persian Gulf; thence the nation spread northwards up the course of the rivers, and the seat of government moved in the same direction, being finally fixed at Babylon, perhaps not earlier than B.C. 1700.—I. Topography of Babylon—Ancient descriptions of the city.—The descriptions of Babylon which have come down to us in classical writers are derived chiefly from two sources, the works of Herodotus and of Ctesias. According to the former, the city, which was built on both sides of the Euphrates, formed a vast square, enclosed within a double line of high walls, the extent of the outer circuit being 480 stades, or about 56 miles. The entire area included would thus have been about 200 square miles. The houses, which were frequently three or four stories high, were laid out in straight streets crossing each other at right angles. In each division of the town there was a fortress or stronghold, consisting in the one case of the royal palace, in the other of the great temple of Belus. The two portions of the city were united by a bridge, composed of a series of stone piers with moveable platforms of wood stretching from one pier to another. According to Ctesias the circuit of the city was not 480 but 360 stades—which is a little under 42 miles. It lay, he says, on both sides of the Euphrates, and the two parts were connected together by a stone bridge five stades (above 1000 yards) long, and 30 feet broad, of the kind described by Herodotus. At either extremity of the bridge was a royal palace, that in the eastern city being the more magnificent of the two. The two palaces were joined, not only by the bridge, but by a tunnel under the river! Ctesias's account of the temple of Belus has not come down to us. In examining the truth of these descriptions, we shall most conveniently commence from the outer circuit of the town. All the ancient writers appear to agree in the fact of a district of vast size, more or less inhabited, having been enclosed within lofty walls, and included under the name of Babylon. With respect to the exact extent of the circuit they differ. The estimate of Herodotus and of Pliny is 480 stades, of Strabo 385, of Q. Curtius 368, of Clitarchus 365, and of Ctesias 360 stades. It is evident that here we have merely the moderate variations to be expected in independent measurements, except in the first of the numbers. Perhaps the true explanation is that Herodotus spoke of the outer wall, which could be traced in his time, while the later writers, who never speak of an inner and an outer barrier, give the measurement of Herodotus' inner wall, which may have alone remained in their day. Taking the lowest estimate of the extent of the circuit, we shall have for the space within the rampart an area of above 100 square miles; nearly five times the size of London! It is evident that this vast space cannot have been entirely covered with houses. Diodorus confesses that but a small part of the enclosure was inhabited in his own day, and Q. Curtius says that as much as nine-tenths consisted, even in the most flourishing times, of gardens, parks, paradises, fields and orchards. With regard to the height and breadth of the walls there is nearly as much difference of statement as with regard to their extent. Herodotus makes the height 200 royal cubits, or 337½ feet; Ctesias 50 fathoms, or 300 feet; Pliny and Solinus 200 royal feet; Strabo 50 cubits, or 75 feet. We are forced to fall back on the earlier authorities, who are also the only eye-witnesses; and, surprising as it seems, perhaps we must believe the statement, that the vast enclosed space above mentioned was surrounded by walls which have well been termed "artificial mountains," being nearly the height of the dome of St. Paul's! The estimates for the thickness of the wall are the following:—Herodotus, 50 royal cubits, or nearly 85 feet; Pliny and Solinus, 50 royal, or about 60 common feet; and Strabo, 32 feet. The latter may belong properly to the inner wall, which was of less thickness than the outer. According to Ctesias the wall was strengthened with 250 towers, irregularly disposed, to guard the weakest parts; and according to Herodotus it was pierced with a hundred gates, which were made of brass, with brazen lintels and side-posts. The gates and walls are alike mentioned in Scripture; the height of the one and the breadth of the other being specially noticed (Jer. li. 58; comp. i. 15, and li. 53). Herodotus and Ctesias both relate that the banks of the river as it flowed through the city were on each side ornamented with quays. Some remains of a quay or embankment (E) on the eastern side of the stream still exist, upon the bricks of which is read the name of the last king. Perhaps a remarkable mound (K) which interrupts the long flat valley—evidently the ancient course of the river—may be a trace of the bridge which both these writers describe.—II. Present State of the Ruins.—About five miles above Hilah, on the opposite or left bank of the Euphrates, occurs a series of artificial mounds of enormous size. They consist chiefly of three great masses of building—the high pile (A) of unbaked brickwork called by Rich 'Mujellib,' but which is known to the Arabs as 'Babil'; the building denominated the 'Aasr' or palace (B); and a lofty mound (C), upon which stands the modern tomb of Amrām-ibn-'Alī. Besides these principal masses the most remarkable features are two parallel lines of rampart (FF) bounding the chief ruins on the east, some similar but inferior remains on the north and west (II and H), an embankment along the river-side (E), a remarkable isolated heap (K) in the middle of a long valley, which seems to have been the ancient bed of the stream, and two long lines of rampart (G G), meeting at a right angle, and with the river forming an irregular triangle, within which all the ruins on this side (except Babil) are enclosed. On the west, or right bank, the remains are very slight and scanty. Scattered over the country on both sides of the Euphrates, are a number of remarkable mounds, usually standing single, which are plainly of the same date with the great mass of ruins upon the river bank. Of these, by far the most striking is the vast ruin called the Birs-Nimrud, which many regard as the tower of Babel, situated about six miles to the S.W. of Hillah. [BABEL, TOWER OF.]—III. Identification of sites.—On comparing the existing ruins with the accounts of the ancient writers, the great difficulty which meets us is the position of the remains almost exclusively on the left bank of the river. All the old accounts agree in representing the Euphrates as running through the town, and the principal buildings as placed on the opposite sides of the stream. Perhaps the most probable solution is to be found in the fact, that a large canal (called Shebil) intervened in ancient times between the Kasr mound (B) and the ruin now called Babil (A), which may easily have been confounded by Herodotus with the main stream. If this explanation be accepted as probable, we may identify the principal ruins as follows:—1. The great mound of Babil will be the ancient temple of Belus. It formed the tower of the temple, and was surmounted by a chapel, but the main shrine, the altars, and no doubt the residences of the priests, were at the foot, in a sacred precinct. 2. The mound of the Kasr will mark the site of the great Palace of Nebuchadnezzar. It is an irregular square of about 700 yards each way, and may be regarded as chiefly formed of the old palace-platform. No plan of the palace is to be made out from the existing remains, which are tossed in apparent confusion on the highest point of the mound. 3. The mound of Amrām is thought by M. Oppert to represent the "hanging gardens" of Nebuchadnezzar; but this conjecture does not seem to be a very happy one. Most probably it represents the ancient palace, coeval with Babylon itself, of which Nebuchadnezzar speaks in his inscriptions as adjoining his own more magnificent residence. 4. The ruins marked DD on either side of the Euphrates, together with all the other remains on the right bank, may be considered to represent the lesser Palace of Ctesias, which is said to have been connected with the greater by a bridge across the river, as well as by a tunnel under the channel of the stream. 5. The two long parallel lines of embankment on the east (FF in the plan), may either be the lines of an outer and inner inclosure, of which Nebuchadnezzar speaks as defences of his palace; or they may represent the embankments of an enormous reservoir, which is often mentioned by that monarch as adjoining his palace towards the east. 6. The embankment (E) is composed of bricks marked with the name of Labynetos or Nabunit, and is undoubtedly a portion of the work which Berosus ascribes to the last king. The most remarkable fact connected with the magnificence of Babylon, is the poorness of the material with which such wonderful results were produced. With bricks made from the soil of the country, in many parts an excellent clay, and at first only "slime for mortar" (Gen. xi. 3), were constructed edifices of so vast a size that they still remain among the most enormous ruins in the world.—IV. History of Babylon.—Scripture represents the "beginning of the kingdom" as belonging to the time of Nimrod, the grandson of Ham (Gen. x. 6-10). The most ancient inscriptions appear to show that the primitive inhabitants of the country were really Cushite, i. e. identical in race with the early inhabitants of Southern Arabia and of Ethiopia.

The seat of government at this early time was, as has been stated, in lower Babylonia, Erech (Warka) and Ur (Mugheir) being the capitals. The country was called Shinar, and the people the Akkadim (comp. Acad of Gen. x. 10). Of the art of this period we have specimens in the ruins of Mugheir and Warka, the remains of which date from at least the 20th century before our era. The early annals of Babylon are filled by Berosus, the native historian, with three dynasties; one of 49 Chaldaean kings, who reigned 458 years; another of 9 Arab kings, who reigned 245 years; and a third of 49 Assyrian monarchs, who held dominion for 526 years. It would appear then as if Babylon, after having had a native Chaldaean dynasty, fell wholly under Semitic influence, becoming subject first to Arabia for two centuries and a half, and then to Assyria for above five centuries, and not regaining even a qualified independence till the time marked by the close of the Upper and the formation of the Lower Assyrian empire. But the statement is too broad to be exact; and the monuments show that Babylon was at no time absorbed into Assyria, or even for very many years together a submissive vassal. The line of Babylonian kings becomes exactly known to us from the year B.C. 747. The "Canon of Ptolemy" gives us the succession of Babylonian monarchs, with the exact length of the reign of each, from the year B.C. 747, when Nabonassar mounted the throne, to B.C. 331, when the last Persian king was dethroned by Alexander. Of the earlier kings of the Canon, the only one worthy of notice is Mardocempulus (B.C. 721), the MERODACH-BALADAN of Scripture, but it is not till we come to Nabopolassar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar, that a new era in the history of Babylon commences. He was appointed to the government of Babylon by the last Assyrian king, at the moment when the Medes were about to make their final attack: whereupon, betraying the trust reposed in him, he went over to the enemy, arranged a marriage between his son Nebuchadnezzar and the daughter of the Median leader, and joined in the last siege of the city. [NINEVEH.] On the success of the confederates (B.C. 625) Babylon became not only an independent kingdom, but an empire. At a later date hostilities broke out with Egypt. Necho, the son of Psamatik I., about the year B.C. 608, invaded the Babylonian dominions on the south-west (2 K. xxiii. 29, and xxiv. 7). Nabopolassar was now advanced in life; he therefore sent his son, Nebuchadnezzar, against the Egyptians, and the battle of Carchemish restored to Babylon the former limits of her territory (comp. 2 K. xxiv. 7 with Jer. xli. 2-12). Nebuchadnezzar upon his father's death was acknowledged king (B.C. 604). A complete account of the works and exploits of this great monarch—by far the most remarkable of all the Babylonian kings—is given under NEBUCHADNEZZAR. He died B.C. 561, having reigned for 43 years, and was succeeded by Evil-Merodach, his son, who is called in the Canon Ilisarudamus. This prince was murdered, after having held the crown for two years only, by Neriglissar, his brother-in-law. [EVIL-MERODACH.] Neriglissar—the Nerigassolassar of the canon—is (apparently) identical with the "Nergal-shar-ezer, Bab-Mag" of Jeremiah (xxxix. 3, 13). Neriglissar built the palace at Babylon, which seems to have been placed originally on the right bank of the river. He reigned but four years, and left the crown to his son, Laborosarchod. This prince, when he had reigned nine months, became the victim of a conspiracy. Nabonidus (or Labynetus), one of the conspirators, succeeded in the year B.C. 555, very shortly before the war broke out between Cyrus and Croesus. Having entered into alliance with the latter of these monarchs against the former, he provoked the hostility of Cyrus, who, in the year B.C. 539, advanced at the head of his irresistible hordes, but wintered upon the Diyaleh or Gyndes, making his final approaches in the ensuing spring. Nabonidus took the field in person at the head of his army, leaving his son Belshazzar to command in the city. He was defeated and forced to shut himself up in Borsippa (marked now by the Birs-Nimrud), till after the fall of Babylon, Belshazzar guarded the city, but allowed the enemy to enter the town by the channel of the river. Babylon was thus taken by a surprise, as Jeremiah had prophesied (li. 31)—by an army of Medes and Persians, as intimated 170 years earlier by Isaiah (xli. 1-9), and, as Jeremiah had also foretold (li. 39), during a festival. In the carnage which ensued upon the taking of the town, Belshazzar was slain (Dan. v. 30). According to the book of Daniel, it would seem as if Babylon was taken, not by Cyrus, king of Persia, but by a Median king, named Darius (v. 31). There is, however, sufficient indication that "Darius the Mede" was not the real conqueror, but a monarch with a certain delegated authority (see Dan. v. 31, and ix. 1). With the conquest by Cyrus commenced the decay and ruin of Babylon, though it continued a royal residence through the entire period of the Persian empire. The defences and public buildings suffered grievously from neglect during the long period of peace which followed the reign of Xerxes. After the death of Alexander the Great, the removal of the seat of empire to Antioch under the Seleucidae gave the finishing blow to the prosperity of the place. Since then Babylon has been a quarry from which all the tribes in the vicinity have derived the bricks with which they have built their cities. The "great city," "the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency," has thus emphatically "become heaps" (Jer. li. 37). Her walls have altogether disappeared—they have "fallen" (Jer. li. 44), been "thrown down" (l. 15), been "utterly broken" (li. 58). "A drought is upon her waters" (l. 39); for the system of irrigation, on which, in Babylonia, fertility altogether depends, has long been laid aside; "her cities" are everywhere "a desolation" (li. 43); her "land a wilderness;" "wild beasts of the desert" (jackals) "lie there;" and "owls dwell there" (comp. Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 484, with Is. xiii. 21, 22, and Jer. l. 39): the natives regard the whole site as haunted, and neither will the "Arab pitch tent, nor the shepherd fold sheep there" (Is. xiii. 20).

Babel, Tower of. The "tower of Babel" is only mentioned once in Scripture (Gen. xi. 4-5), and then as incomplete. It was built of bricks, and the "slime" used for mortar was probably bitumen. A Jewish tradition declared that fire fell from heaven, and split the tower through to its foundation; while Alexander Polyhistor and the other profane writers who noticed the tower, said that it had been blown down by the wind. Such authorities therefore as we possess, represent the building as destroyed soon after its erection. When the Jews, however, were carried captive into Babylonia, they were struck with the vast magnitude and peculiar character of certain of the Babylonian temples, in one or other of which they thought to recognise the very tower itself. The predominant opinion was in favour of the great temple of Nebo at Borsippa, the modern Birs-Nimrud, although the distance of that place from Babylon is an insuperable difficulty in the way of the identification. There are in reality no real grounds either for identifying the tower with the Temple of Belus, or for supposing that any remains of it long survived the check which the builders received (Gen. xi. 8). But the Birs-Nimrud, though it cannot be the tower of Babel itself, may well be taken to show the probable shape and character of the edifice. This building appears to have been a sort of oblique platform of crude brick, raised a few feet above the level of the alluvial plain, was built of burnt brick the first or basement stage—an exact square, 272 feet each way, and 26 feet in perpendicular height. Upon this stage was erected a second, 230 feet each way, and likewise 26 feet high; which, however, was not placed exactly in the middle of the first, but considerably nearer to the south-western end, which constituted the back of the building. The other stages were arranged similarly—the third being 188 feet, and again 26 feet high; the fourth 146 feet square, and 15 feet high; the fifth 104 feet square, and the same height as the fourth; the sixth 62 feet square, and again the same height, and the seventh 20 feet square and once more the same height. On the seventh stage there was probably placed the ark or tabernacle, which seems to have been again 15 feet high, and must have nearly, if not entirely, covered the top of the seventh story. The entire original height, allowing three feet for the platform, would thus have been 156 feet, or, without the platform, 153 feet. The whole formed a sort of oblique pyramid, the gentler slope facing the N.E., and the steeper inclining to the S.W. On the N.E. side was the grand entrance, and here stood the vestibule, a separate building, the debris from which having joined those from the temple itself, fill up the intermediate space, and very remarkably prolong the mound in this direction" (Rawlinson's Herodotus, vol. ii. pp. 582-3). The Birs temple, which was called the "Temple of the Seven Spheres," was ornamented with the planetary colours, but this was most likely a peculiarity. It is not necessary to suppose that any real idea of "scaling heaven" was present to the minds of those who raised either the Tower of Babel or any other of the Babylonian temple-towers. The expression used in Genesis (xi. 4) is a mere hyperbole for great height (comp. Deut. i. 28; Dan. iv. 11, &c.), and should not be taken literally. Military defence was probably the primary object of such edifices in early times: but with the wish for this may have been combined further secondary motives, which remained when such defence was otherwise provided for. Diodorus states that the great tower of the temple of Belus was used by the Chaldeans as an observatory (ii. 9), and the careful emplacement of the Babylonian temples with the angles facing the four cardinal points, would be a natural consequence, and may be regarded as a strong confirmation of the reality of this application.

Ba'bi, 1 Esd. viii. 37. [BEBAL.]

Babylon (Βαβυλών: Babylon). The occurrence of this name in 1 Pet. v. 13 has given rise to a variety of conjectures, which may be briefly enumerated.—1. That Babylon tropically denotes Rome. In support of this opinion is brought forward a tradition recorded by Eusebius (H. E. ii. 15), on the authority of Papias and Clement of Alexandria, to the effect that 1 Peter was composed at Rome. Oecumenius and Jerome both assert that Rome was figuratively denoted by Babylon. Although this opinion is held by Grotius, Lardner, Cave, Whitby, Macknight, Hales, and others, it may be rejected as improbable. There is nothing to indicate that the name is used figuratively, and the subscription to an epistle is the last place we should expect to find a mystical appellation.—2. Cappellus and others take Babylon, with as little reason, to mean Jerusalem.—3. Bar-Hebraeus understands by it the house in Jerusalem where the Apostles were assembled on the Day of Pentecost.—4. Others place it on the Tigris, and identify it with Seleucia or Ctesiphon, but for this there is no evidence. The two theories which remain are worthy of more consideration.—5. That by Babylon is intended the small fort of that name which formed the boundary between Upper and Lower Egypt. Its site is marked by the modern Babou in the Delta, a little north of Fostat, or old Cairo. According to Strabo it derived its name from some Babylonian deserters who had settled there. In his time it was the head-quarters of one of the three legions which garrisoned Egypt. Josephus (Ant. ii. 15 §1) says it was built on the site of Letopolis, when Cambyse subdued Egypt. That this is the Babylon of 1 Pet. is the tradition of the Coptic Church, and is maintained by Le Clerc, Mill, Pearson, and others. There is, however, no proof that the Apostle Peter was ever in Egypt, and a very slight degree of probability is created by the tradition that his companion Mark was bishop of Alexandria.—6. The most natural supposition of all is that by Babylon is intended the old Babylon of Assyria, which was largely inhabited by Jews at the time in question (Jos. Ant. xv. 3 §1; Philo, De Virt. p. 1023, ed. Turnebi, Franc. 1691). The only argument against this view is the negative evidence supplied by the silence of historians as to St. Peter's having visited the Assyrian Babylon, but this cannot be allowed to have much weight. Lightfoot's remarks are very suggestive. In a sermon preached at St. Mary's, Cambridge (Works, ii. 1144, Eng. folio ed.), he maintained that Babylon of Assyria is intended, because "it was one of the greatest knots of Jews in the world," and St. Peter was the minister of the circumcision. Again, he adds, "Bosor (2 Pet. ii. 15) speaks Peter in Babylon," it being the Chaldee or Syriac pronunciation of Pethor in Num. xxii. 5. This last argument has not, perhaps, much weight, as the same pronunciation may have characterized the dialect of Judea.

Babylon, in the Apocalypse, is the symbolic name by which Rome is denoted (Rev. xiv. 8, xvii., xviii.). The power of Rome was regarded by the later Jews as that of Babylon by their forefathers (comp. Jer. ii. 7 with Rev. xiv. 8), and hence, whatever the people of Israel be understood to symbolize, Babylon represents the antagonistic principle. [REVELATION.]

Babylonians, the inhabitants of Babylon, a race of Shemitic origin, who were among the colonists planted in the cities of Samaria by the conquering Assyrians (Ezr. iv. 9). At a later period, when the warlike Chaldeans acquired the predominance in the 7th cent. B.C., the names Chaldean and Babylonian became almost synonymous (Ez. xxiii. 14, 15; comp. Is. xlviii. 14, 20).

Babylonish Garment, literally 'robe of Shinar' (Josh. vii. 21). An ample robe, probably made of the skin or fur of an animal (comp. Gen. xxv. 25), and ornamented with embroidery, or perhaps a variegated garment with figures inwoven in the fashion for which the Babylonians were celebrated.

Ba'ca, the Valley of, a valley somewhere in Palestine, through which the exiled Psalms wades in vision the pilgrims passing in their march towards the sanctuary of Jehovah at Zion (Ps. lxxxiv. 6). That it was a real locality is most probable, from the use of the definite article before the name. A valley of the same name still exists in the Sinaitic district. The rendering of the Targum is Gehenna, i. e. the Ge-Hinnom or ravine below Mount Zion. This locality agrees well with the mention of Becaim (A.V. "mulberry") trees in 2 Sam. v. 23.

Bacchides, a friend of Antiochus Epiphanes and governor of Mesopotamia (1 Mac. vii. 8), who was commissioned by Demetrius Soter to investigate the charges which Alcimus preferred against Judas Maccabaeus. After the defeat and death of Nicanor, he led a second expedition into Judaea, defeated Judas Maccabaeus at Laish (B.C. 161), and reestablished the supremacy of the Syrian faction (1 Mac. ix. 25). He next attempted to surprise Jonathan, but he escaped across the Jordan. Having completed the pacification of the country, Bacchides returned to Demetrius (B.C. 160). After two years he came back at the request of the Syrian faction, but, meeting with ill success, he turned against those who had induced him to undertake the expedition, and sought an honourable retreat. When this was known by Jonathan he sent envoys to Bacchides and concluded a peace (B.C. 158) (1 Mac. vii. ix.).

Bac'chus. [DIONYSUS.]

Bace'nor, apparently a captain of horse in the army of Judas Maccabaeus (2 Mac. xii. 35).

Bach'rites, the, the family of BECHER, son of Ephraim (Num. xvi. 35).

Badger-skins. The Hebrew tachash, which the A. V. renders badger, occurs in connexion with 'ôr, 'ôrôth ("skin," "skins"), in Ex. xxv. 5, xxvi. 14, xxv. 7, 23, xxxvi. 19; Num. iv. 6, 8, 11, 12, 14, 25. In Ezek. xvi. 10 tachash occurs without 'ôrôth, and is mentioned as the substance out of which women's shoes were made; in the former passages the tachash skins are named in relation to the tabernacle, ark, &c., and appear to have formed the exterior covering of these sacred articles. There is much obscurity as to the meaning of the word tachash; the ancient versions seem nearly all agreed that it denotes not an animal, but a colour, either black or sky-blue. Some versions, as the German of Luther and the A. V., have supposed that the badger is denoted, but this is clearly an error, for the badger is not found in the Bible lands. It is difficult to understand why the ancient versions have interpreted the word tachash to mean a colour, an explanation which has no ground either in its etymology or in the cognate languages. Whatever is the substance indicated by tachash it is evident from Ex. xxv. 23 that it was some material in frequent use amongst the Israelites during the Exodus, and the construction of the sentences where the name occurs seems to imply that the skin of some animal and not a colour is denoted by it. The Arabic duhash or tuchash denotes a dolphin, but in all probability is not restricted in its application, but may refer to either a seal or a cetacean. The skin of the Halicore from its hardness would be well suited for making soles for shoes, and it is worthy of remark that the skins near Cape Mussendum employ the skins of animals for a similar purpose. The Halicore is found in the Red Sea, and was observed by Rüppell, who gave the animal the above name, on the coral banks of the Abyssinian coast. Or perhaps tachash may denote a seal, the skin of which animal would suit all the demands of the Scriptural allusions.

Bag is the rendering of several words in the Old and New Testaments. 1. Chāritim, the "bags" in which Naaman bound up the two talents of silver for Gehazi (2 K. v. 23), probably so called, according to Gesenius, from their long, cone-like shape. The word only occurs besides in Is. iii. 22 (A. V. "crisping-pins"), and there denotes the reticules carried by the Hebrew ladies. 2. Cis, a bag for carrying weights (Deut. xxv. 13; Prov. xvi. 11; Mic. vi. 11), also used as a purse (Prov. i. 14; Is. xlvi. 6). 3. Cēlā, translated "bag," in 1 Sam. xvii. 40, 49, is a word of most general meaning, and is generally rendered "vessel" or "instrument." In Gen. xlii. 25 it is the "sack" in which Jacob's sons carried the corn which they brought from Egypt, and in 1 Sam. ix. 7, xxi. 5, it denotes a bag, or wallet, for carrying food (A. V. "vessel"; comp. Jud. x. 5, xiii. 10, 15). The shepherd's "bag" which David had seems to have been worn by him as necessary to his calling, and was probably, from a comparison of Zech. xi. 15, 16 (where A. V. "instruments" is the same word), for the purpose of carrying the lambs which were unable to walk or were lost, and contained materials for healing such as were sick and binding up those that were broken (comp. Ez. xxiv. 4, 16). 4. Tsé'ôr, properly a "bundle" (Gen. xlii. 35; 1 Sam. xxv. 29), appears to have been used by travellers for carrying money during a long journey (Prov. vii. 20; Hag. i. 6; comp. Luke xii. 33; Tob. ix. 5). In such "bundles" the priests bound up the money which was contributed for the restoration of the Temple under Jehoiada (2 K. xii. 10, A. V. "put up in bags"). The "bag" which Judas carried was probably a small box or chest (John xii. 6, xiii. 29). The Greek word is the same as that used in the LXX. for "chest" in 2 Chr. xxiv. 8, 10, 11.

Bago's. The eunuch in attendance upon Holofernes, who had charge of all that he had, and was the first to discover his master's assassination. His name is said to signify eunuch in Persian (Jud. xii. 11, 13, 15, xiii. 1, 3, xiv. 14).

Ba'gol, 1 Esd. v. 14. [BIGVAI.]

Bahar'mite, the. [BAHURIM.]

Bahur'im, a village, the slight notices remaining of which connect it almost exclusively with the flight of David. It was apparently on, or close to the road leading up from the Jordan valley to Jerusalem. Shimei the son of Gera resided here (2 Sam. xvi. 5; 1 K. ii. 8). Here in the court of a house was the well in which Jonathan and Ahimaaz eluded their pursuers (xvii. 18). Here Phaltiel, the husband of Michal, bade farewell to his wife when on her return to King David at Hebron (2 Sam. iii. 16). Bahurim must have been very near the south boundary of Benjamin, and Dr. Barclay conjectures that the place lay where some ruins still exist close to a Wady Ruwaby, which runs in a straight course for 3 miles from Olivet directly towards Jordan. AZMAVETI, "the Barhumite" (2 Sam. xxiii. 31), or "the Baharumite" (1 Chr. xi. 33), one of the heroes of David's guard, is the only native of Bahurim that we hear of except Shimei.

Ba'jith ("the house"), referring to the "temple" of the false gods of Moab, as opposed to the "high places" in the same sentence (Is. xv. 2, and compare xvi. 12).

Bakbak'kar, a Levite, apparently a descendant of Asaph (1 Chr. ix. 15).

Bak'buk. "Children of Bakbuk" were among the Nethinim who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 51; Neh. vii. 53).

Bakbuk'ah. 1. A Levite in time of Nehemiah (Neh. xi. 17, xii. 9).—2. A Levite porter, apparently the same as the preceding (Neh. xii. 25).

Baking. [BREAD.]

Ba'laam, the son of Beor, a man endowed with the gift of prophecy (Num. xxii. 5). He belonged to the Midianites, and perhaps as the prophet of his people possessed the same authority that Moses did among the Israelites. At any rate he is mentioned in conjunction with the five kings of Midian, apparently as a person of the same rank (Num. xxxi. 8; cf. xxxi. 16). He seems to have lived at Pethor, which is said at Deut. xxxii. 4 to have been a city of Mesopotamia. He himself speaks of being "brought from Aram out of the mountains of the East" (Num. xxiii. 7). Balaam is one of those instances which meet us in Scripture of persons dwelling among heathens but possessing a certain knowledge of the one true God. At this time: the Israelites were encamped in the plains of Moab. Balak, the king of Moab, having witnessed the discomfort of his neighbours, the Amorites, by this people, entered into a league with the Midianites against them, and despatched messengers to Balaam with the rewards of divination in their hands. When the elders of Moab and Midian told him their message, he seems to have had some misgivings as to the lawfulness of their request, for he invited them to tarry the night with him that he might learn how the Lord would regard it. These misgivings were confirmed by the express prohibition of God upon his journey. Balaam reported the answer, and the messengers of Balak returned. The king of Moab, however, not deterred by this failure, sent again more and more honourable princes to Balaam. The prophet again refused, but notwithstanding invited the embassy to tarry the night with him, that he might know what the Lord would say unto him further; and thus by his importunity he extorted from God the permission he desired, but was warned at the same time that his actions would be overruled according to the Divine will. Balaam therefore proceeded on his journey with the messengers of Balak. But God's anger was kindled at this manifestation of determined self-will, and the angel of the Lord stood in the way for an adversary against him. "The dumb ass, speaking with man's voice, forbade the madness of the prophet" (2 Pet. ii. 16). It is evident that Balaam, although acquainted with God, was desirous of throwing an air of mystery round his wisdom, from the instructions he gave Balak to offer a bullock and a ram on the seven altars he everywhere prepared for him. His religion, therefore, was probably such as would be the natural result of a general acquaintance with God not confirmed by any covenant. There is an allusion to Balaam in the prophet Micah (vi. 5), where Bishop Butler thinks that a conversation is preserved which occurred between him and the king of Moab upon this occasion. But such an opinion is hardly tenable. "The doctrine of Balaam" is spoken of in Rev. ii. 14, where an allusion has been supposed to Nidolau, the founder of the sect of the Nicolaitans, the two names being probably similar in signification. Though the utterance of Balaam was overruled so that he could not curse the children of Israel, he nevertheless suggested to the Moabites the expedient of seducing them to commit fornication. The effect of this is recorded in ch. xxv. A battle was afterwards fought against the Midianites, in which Balaam sided with them and was slain by the sword of the people whom he had endeavoured to curse (Num. xxi. 8).

Balac, Rev. ii. 14. [BALAK.]

Bal'adan. [MERODACH-BALADAN.]

Balah, Josh. xix. 3. [BAAL, Geogr. No. 2, b.]

Balak, son of Zippor, king of the Moabites, at the time when the children of Israel were bringing their journeyings in the wilderness to a close. Balak entered into a league with Midian and hired Balaam to curse the Israelites; but his designs were frustrated in the manner recorded in Num. xxii.-xxiv. He is mentioned also at Josh. xiv. 9; Judg. xi. 25; Mic. vi. 5; Rev. ii. 14. [BALAAM.]

Balamo. [BAAL, Geogr. No. 6.]

Balas'amus, in 1 Esd. ix. 43. The corresponding name in the list in Ezra is MAASEIAH.

Baldness. There are two kinds of baldness, viz. artificial and natural. The latter seems to have been uncommon, since it exposed people to public derision, and is perpetually alluded to as a mark of squalor and misery (2 K. ii. 23; Is. iii. 24, "instead of well-set hair, baldness, and burning instead of beauty;" Is. xv. 2; Jer. xlvii. 5; Ez. vii. 18, &c.) For this reason it seems to have been included under the (Lev. xii. 23, LXX.) disqualifications for priesthood. In Lev. xiii. 29 &c., very careful directions are given to distinguish Bohak, "a plague upon the head and beard," from mere natural baldness which is pronounced to be clean, ver. 40. Artificial baldness marked the conclusion of a Nazarite's vow (Acts xviii. 18; Num. vi. 9), and was a sign of mourning. It is often alluded to in Scripture; as in Mic. i. 16; Am. viii. 10, &c.; and in Deut. xiv. 1, the reason for being forbidden to the Israelites is their being a holy and peculiar people." (See Lev. xix. 27, and Jer. ix. 26, marg.) The practices alluded to in the latter passages were adopted by heathen nations in honour of various gods.

Balm (Heb. tzōrî, tšōrî) occurs in Gen. xxxvii. 25 as one of the substances which the Ishmaelites were bringing from Gilead to take into Egypt; in Gen. xliii. 11, as one of the presents which Jacob sent to Joseph; in Jer. viii. 22, xlv. 11, li. 8, where it appears that the balm of Gilead had a medicinal value; in Ez. xxvii. 17 (margin, "rosin") as an article of commerce imported by Judah into Tyre. It is impossible to identify it with any certainty. Perhaps it does not refer to an exudation from any particular tree, but was intended to denote any kind of resinous substance which had a medicinal value. The tzōrî, then, may represent the gum of the Pistacia lentiscus, or that of the Balsamodendron opobalsamum. [SPICES; MASTICK.] Hasselquist has given a description of the true balsam-tree of Mecca. He says that the exudation from the plant "is of a yellow colour, and pellucid. It has a most fragrant smell, which is resinous, balsamick, and very agreeable. It is very tenacious or glutinous, sticking to the fingers, and may be drawn into long threads. . . I have seen it at a Turkish surgeon's, who had it immediately from Mecca, described it, and was informed of its virtues; which are, first, that it is the best stomachick they know, if taken to three grains, to strengthen a weak stomach; secondly, that it is a most excellent and capital remedy for curing wounds, for if a few drops are applied to the flesh wound, it cures it in a very short time" (Travels, 293).

Bal'thasar, Bar. i. 11, 12. [BELSHAZZAR.]

Bamah (lit. "high-place.") This word appears in its Hebrew form only in one passage (Ez. xx. 29), very obscure, and full of the paronomasia so dear to the Hebrew poets, so difficult for us to appreciate: "What is the high-place whereunto ye hie? and the name of it is called Bamah unto this day."

Ba'moth-Ba'al, a sanctuary of Baal in the country of Moab (Josh. xiii. 12), which is probably mentioned in Num. xxi. 19, under the shorter form of Bamoth, or Bamoth-in-the-ravine (20), and again in the enumeration of the towns of Moab in Is. xv. 2.

Ban, 1 Esd. v. 37; it stands for TOBIAH in the parallel lists in Ezra and Nehemiah.

Banai's, 1 Esd. ix. 35. [BENAI'AH.]

Ba'ni. 1. A Gadite, "one of David's mighty men" (2 Sam. xxiii. 36).—2. A Levite of the line of Merari, and forefather to Ethan (1 Chr. vi. 46).

—3. A man of Judah of the line of Pharez (1 Chr. ix. 4).
—4. "Children of Bani" returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 10; Neh. x. 14; Ezr. x. 29, 34; 1 E-d. v. 12). [BINNUI, MANI, and MAANI].
—5. An Israelite "of the sons of Bani" (Ezr. x. 38). [BANNUS].
—6. A Levite (Neh. iii. 17).
—7. A Levite (Neh. viii. 7; ix. 4, 5; x. 13). [ANUS].
—8. Another Levite, of the sons of Asaph (Neh. xi. 22). Possibly 6 and 7 may be the same, the name in each case being that of a family.

Ba'nid, 1 Esd. viii. 36. This represents a name which has apparently escaped from the present Hebrew text (see Ezr. viii. 10).

Bannai'a, 1 Esd. ix. 33. [ZABAD.]

Bannus, 1 Esd. ix. 34. [BANI, or BINNUI.]
Banquets, among the Hebrews, were not only a means of social enjoyment, but were a part of the observance of religious festivity. At the three solemn festivals, when all the males appeared before the Lord, the family also had its domestic feast (Deut. xvi. 11). Probably both males and females went up (1 Sam. i. 9) together, to hold the festival. Sacrifices, both ordinary and extraordinary, as amongst heathen nations (Ex. xxxiv. 15; Judg. xvi. 23), included a banquet, and Eli's sons made this latter the prominent part. Besides religious celebrations, such events as the weaning a son and heir, a marriage, the separation or reunion of friends, and sheepshearing, were customarily attended by a banquet or revel (Gen. xxi. 8, xxix. 22, xxii. 27, 54; 1 Sam. xxv. 2, 36; 2 Sam. xiii. 23). Birthday-banquets are only mentioned in the cases of Pharaoh and Herod (Gen. xl. 20; Matt. xiv. 6). The usual time of the banquet was the evening, and to begin early was a mark of excess (Is. v. 11; Eccl. x. 16). The most essential materials of the banqueting-room, next to the viands and wine, which last was often drugged with spices (Prov. ix. 2; Cant. viii. 2), were perfumed ointments, garlands or loose flowers, white or brilliant robes, after these, exhibitions of music, singers, and dancers, riddles, jesting and merriment (Is. xxviii. 1; Wisd. ii. 7; 2 Sam. xix. 35; Is. xxv. 6, v. 12; Judg. xiv. 12; Neh. viii. 10; Eccl. x. 19; Matt. xxii. 11; Am. vi. 5, 6; Luke xv. 25). Seven days was a not uncommon duration of a festival, especially for a wedding, but sometimes fourteen (Tob. viii. 19; Gen. xxix. 27; Judg. xiv. 12); but if the bride were a widow, three days formed the limit. There seems no doubt that the Jews of the O. T. period used a common table for all the guests. In Joseph's entertainment a ceremonial separation prevailed; but the common phrase to "sit at table," or "eat at any one's table," shows the originality of the opposite usage. The posture at table in early times was sitting (1 Sam. xvi. 11, xx. 5, 18), and the guests were ranged in order of dignity (Gen. xliii. 33; 1 Sam. ix. 22): the words which imply the recumbent posture belong to the N. T. The separation of the women's banquet was not a Jewish custom (Esth. i. 9). In religious banquets the wine was mixed, by rabbinical regulation, with three parts of water, and four short forms of benediction were pronounced over it. At the Passover four such cups were mixed, blessed, and passed round by the master of the feast.

Bannus. In 1 Esd. v. 26 Bannus and Sudias answer to Hodaviah in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah.

Baptism. I. It is well known that ablution or bathing was common in most ancient nations as a preparation for prayers and sacrifice or as expiatory of sin. There is a natural connexion in the mind between the thought of physical and that of spiritual pollution. In warm countries this connexion is probably even closer than in colder climates; and hence the frequency of ablution in the religious rites throughout the East.

—II. The history of Israel and the Law of Moses abound with such lustrations (Gen. xxxv. 2; Ex. xix. 10; Lev. xv. xvii. 15, xxii. 4, 6, xvi. 26, 28; Num. xix. 10). Before great religious observances such purifications were especially solemn (see John xi. 55); and in the later times of the Jewish republic there appear to have been public baths and buildings set apart for this purpose, one of which was probably the pool of Bethesda with its five porches mentioned in John v. 2. It was natural that, of all people, the priests most especially should be required to purify themselves in this manner. The consecration of the high-priest deserves especial notice. It was first by baptism, then by unction, and lastly by sacrifice (Ex. xxix. 4, xl. 12; Lev. viii.). The spiritual significance of all these ceremonial washings was well known to the devout Israelite. "I will wash my hands in innocency," says the Psalmist, "and so will I compass thine altar" (Ps. xvi. 6). The prophets constantly speak of pardon and conversion from sin under the same figure (Is. i. 16, iv. 4; Jer. iv. 14; Zech. xiii. 1). From the Gospel history we learn that at that time ceremonial washings had been greatly multiplied by traditions of the doctors and elders (see Mark vii. 3, 4), and the testimony of the Evangelist is fully borne out by that of the later writings of the Jews. The most important and probably one of the earliest of these traditional customs was the baptizing of proselytes. There is an universal agreement among later Jewish writers that all the Israelites were brought into covenant with God by circumcision, baptism, and sacrifice, and that the same ceremonies were necessary in admitting proselytes. —III. The baptism of John.—These usages of the Jews will account for the readiness with which all men flocked to the baptism of John the Baptist. Corresponding with the custom of cleansing by water from legal impurity and with the baptism of proselytes from heathenism to Judaism, it seemed to call upon them to come out from the unbelieving and sinful habits of their age and to enlist themselves into the company of those who were preparing for the manifestation of the deliverance of Israel. There has been some uncertainty and debate as to the nature of John's baptism and its spiritual significance. It appears to have been a kind of transition from the Jewish baptism to the Christian. All ceremonial ablutions under the Law pictured to the eye that inward cleansing of the heart which can come only from the grace of God, and which accompanies forgiveness of sins. So John's baptism was a "baptism of repentance for remission of sins" (Mark i. 4); it was accompanied with confession (Matt. iii. 6); it was a call to repentance; it conveyed a promise of pardon; and the whole was knit up with faith in Him ~~that~~ should come after, even Christ Jesus (Acts xix. 4). It was such that Jesus himself deigned to be baptized with it, and perhaps some of His disciples received no other baptism but John's until they received the special baptism of the Holy Ghost on the great day of Pentecost. Yet John himself speaks of it as a mere baptism with water unto repentance, pointing forward to Him who should baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire (Matt. iii. 11). And the distinction between John's baptism and Christian baptism appears in the case of Apollos (Acts xviii. 26, 27), and of the disciples at Ephesus, mentioned Acts xix. 1-6. We cannot but draw from this history the inference that there was a deeper spiritual significance in Christian baptism than in John's baptism, and that, as John was a greater prophet than any that before him had been born of women, and yet the least in the kingdom of heaven was greater than he, so his baptism surpassed in spiritual import all Jewish ceremony, but fell equally short of the sacrament ordained by Christ.—IV. The Baptism of Jesus.—Plainly the most important action of John as a baptist was his baptism of Jesus. No doubt it was the will of Christ in the first place, by so submitting to baptism, to set to His seal to the teaching and the ministry of John. Again, as He was to be the Head of His Church and the Captain of our salvation, He was pleased to undergo that rite which He afterwards enjoined on all His followers. And, once more, His baptism consecrated the baptism of Christians for ever; even as afterwards His own partaking of the Eucharist gave still further sanction to His injunction that His disciples ever after should continually partake of it. But, beyond all this, His baptism was His formal setting apart for His ministry, and was a most important portion of His consecration to be the High Priest of God. He was just entering on the age of thirty (Luke iii. 23), the age at which the Levites began their ministry and the rabbis their teaching. It has already been mentioned that the consecration of Aaron to the high-priesthood was by baptism, unction, and sacrifice (see Lev. viii.). All these were undergone by Jesus. First He was baptized by John. Then, just as the high-priest was anointed immediately after his baptism, so when Jesus had gone up out of the water, the heavens were opened unto Him, and the Spirit of God descended upon Him (Matt. iii. 16); and thus, as St. Peter tells us, "God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power" (Acts x. 38). The sacrifice indeed was not till the end of His earthly ministry, when He offered up the sacrifice of Himself; and then at His resurrection and ascension He fully took upon Him the office of priesthood, entering into the presence of God for us, pleading the efficacy of His sacrifice, and blessing those for whom that sacrifice was offered. Baptism, therefore, was the beginning of consecration; unction was the immediate consequent upon the baptism; and sacrifice was the completion of the initiation, so that He was thenceforth perfected, or fully consecrated as a Priest for evermore (Heb. vii. 28).—V. Baptism of the Disciples of Christ.—Whether our Lord ever baptized has been doubted. The only passage which may distinctly bear on the question is John iv. 1, 2, where it is said "that Jesus made and baptized more disciples than John, though Jesus Himself baptized not, but His disciples." We necessarily infer from it, that, as soon as our Lord began His ministry, and gathered to Him a company of disciples, He, like John the Baptist, admitted into that company by the administration of baptism. The making disciples and the baptizing them went together. After the resurrection, when the Church was to be spread and the Gospel preached, our Lord's own commission conjoins the making of disciples with their baptism (Matt. xxviii. 19). Baptism then was the initiatory rite of the Christian Church, as circumcision was the initiatory rite of Judaism. As circumcision admitted to the Jewish covenant—to the privileges and the responsibility attaching to that covenant,—so baptism, which succeeded it, was the mode of admission to the Christian covenant, to its graces and privileges, to its duties and service.—VI. The Types of Baptism.—1. St. Peter compares the deliverance of Noah in the Deluge to the deliverance of Christians in baptism (1 Pet. iii. 21). The connexion in this passage between baptism and "the resurrection of Jesus Christ" may be compared with Col. ii. 12.—2. In 1 Cor. the passage of the Red Sea and the shadow of the miraculous cloud are treated as types of baptism. It is sufficiently apparent how this may resemble the enlisting of a new convert into the body of the Christian Church.—3. Another type of, or rather a rite analogous to, baptism was circumcision (Col. ii. 11). The obvious reason for the comparison of the two rites is, that circumcision was the entrance to the Jewish Church and the ancient covenant, baptism to the Christian Church and to the new covenant.—4. In more than one instance death is called a baptism (Matt. xx. 22; Mark x. 39; Luke xii. 50). It is generally thought that baptism here means an inundation of sorrows, and that our Lord meant to indicate that He Himself had to pass through "the deep waters of affliction." Is it not probable that some deeper significance attaches to the comparison of death, especially of our Lord's death, to baptism, when we consider too that the connexion of baptism with the death and resurrection of Christ is so much insisted on by St. Paul?—VII. Names of Baptism.—From the types of baptism referred to in the New Testament, we pass to the various names by which baptism seems to be there designated.—1. "Baptism" (βάπτισμα: the word βαπτίζω occurs only four times, viz., Mar. vii. 4, 8; Heb. vi. 2, ix. 10). The verb βαπτίζω (from βάπτω, to dip), is the rendering of the Hebrew by the LXX. in 2 K. v. 14. The Latin Fathers render βαπτίζω by tingere, mergere, and mergitare. By the Greek Fathers, the word βαπτίζω is often used, frequently figuratively, for to immerse or overwhelm with sleep, sorrow, sin, &c. Hence βάπτισμα properly and literally means immersion.—2. "The Water" is a name of baptism which occurs in Acts x. 47. With this phrase, "the water," used of baptism, compare "the breaking of bread" as a title of the Eucharist, Acts ii. 42.—3. "Washing of Water" (lit. "the bath of the water"), is another Scriptural term, by which baptism is signified (Eph. v. 26). There appears clearly in these words a reference to the bridal bath; but the allusion to baptism is clearer still.—4. "The washing of regeneration" (lit. "the bath of regeneration") is a phrase naturally connected with the foregoing. It occurs Tit. iii. 5. All ancient and most modern commentators have interpreted it of baptism. There is so much resemblance, both in the phraseology and in the argument, between this passage in Titus and 1 Cor. vi. 11, that the latter ought by all means to be compared with the former. Another passage containing very similar thoughts, clothed in almost the same words, is Acts xii. 16.—5. "Illumination." It has been much questioned whether "enlightened," in Heb. vi. 4, x. 32, be used of baptism or not. Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, and almost all the Greek Fathers, use φωτισμός as a synonym for baptism. It will be remembered that φωταγωγία was a term for admission into the ancient mysteries. Baptism was without question the initiatory rite in reference to the Christian faith. Now, that Christian faith is more than once called by St. Paul the Christian "mystery" (Eph. i. 9, iii. 4, vi. 19; Col. iv. 3). Hence, as baptism is the initiatory Christian rite, admitting us to the service of God and to the knowledge of Christ, it may not improbably have been called φωτισμός, and afterwards φωταγωγία, as having reference, and as leading, to the mystery of the Gospel, and to self, who is the Mystery of God (Col. i. 27, ii. 2).—VIII. From the names of baptism we must now pass to a few of the more prominent passages, not already considered, in which baptism is referred to.—1. The passage in John iii. 5—"Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God"—has been a well-established battle-field from the time of Calvin. Stier quotes with entire approbation the words of Meyer (on John iii. 5):—"Jesus speaks here concerning a spiritual baptism, as in chap. vi. concerning a spiritual feeding; in both places, however, with reference to their visible auxiliary means."—2. The prophecy of John the Baptist, that our Lord should baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire (Matt. iii. 11), may more properly be interpreted by a ἐν διὰ δύοιν. The water of John's baptism could but wash the body; the Holy Ghost, with which Christ was to baptize, should purify the soul as with fire.—3. Gal. iii. 27: "For as many as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ." The contrast is between the Christian and the Jewish church: one bond, the other free; one infant, the other adult. And the transition-point is naturally that at which by baptism the service of Christ is undertaken and the promises of the Gospel are claimed. This is represented as putting on Christ and in Him assuming the position of full-grown men. In this more privileged condition there is the power of obtaining justification by faith, a justification which the Law had not to offer.—4. 1 Cor. xii. 13: "For by one Spirit (or, in one spirit) we were all baptized into one body, whether Jews or Greeks, whether bond or free, and were all made to drink of one Spirit." The resemblance of this passage to the last is very clear. Possibly there is an allusion to both sacraments. Both our baptism and our partaking of the cup in the communion are tokens and pledges of Christian unity.—5. Rom. vi. 4 and Col. ii. 12 are so closely parallel that we may notice them together. Probably, as in the former passages St. Paul had brought forward baptism as the symbol of Christian unity, so in these he refers to it as the token and pledge of the spiritual death to sin and resurrection to righteousness; and of the final victory over death in the last day, through the power of the resurrection of Christ.—IX. Recipients of Baptism.—The command to baptize was co-extensive with the command to preach the Gospel. All nations were to be evangelized; and they were to be made disciples, admitted into the fellowship of Christ's religion, by baptism (Matt. xxviii. 19).

Every one who was convinced by the teaching of the first preachers of the Gospel, and was willing to enrol himself in the company of the disciples, appears to have been admitted to baptism on a confession of his faith. There is no distinct evidence in the New Testament that there was in those early days a body of catechumens gradually preparing for baptism, such as existed in the age immediately succeeding the Apostles. The great question has been, whether the invitation extended, not to adults only, but to infants also. The universality of the invitation, Christ's declaration concerning the blessedness of infants and their fitness for His kingdom (Mar. x. 14), the admission of infants to circumcision and to the baptism of Jewish proselytes, the mention of whole households, and the subsequent practice of the Church, have been principally relied on by the advocates of infant baptism. The silence of the New Testament concerning the baptism of infants, the constant mention of faith as a pre-requisite or condition of baptism, the great spiritual blessings which seem attached to a right reception of it, and the responsibility entailed on those who have taken its obligations on themselves, seem the chief objections urged against paedobaptism. But here, once more, we must leave ground which has been so extensively occupied by controversialists.—X. The mode of Baptism.—The language of the New Testament and of the primitive fathers sufficiently points to immersion as the common mode of baptism. But in the case of the family of the jailor at Philippi (Acts xvi. 33), and of the three thousand converted at Pentecost (Acts ii.) it seems hardly likely that immersion should have been possible. Moreover the ancient Church, which mostly adopted immersion, was satisfied with effusion in case of clinical baptism—the baptism of the sick and dying.—Questions and answers.—In the earliest times of the Christian Church we find the catechumens required to renounce the Devil and to profess their faith in the Holy Trinity and in the principal articles of the Creed. It is generally supposed that St. Peter (1 Pet. iii. 21) refers to a custom of this kind as existing from the first.—XI. The formula of Baptism.—It should seem from our Lord's own direction (Matt. xxviii. 19) that the words made use of in the administration of baptism should be those which the Church has generally retained. The expressions in the book of Acts (ii. 38, viii. 16, x. 48, xix. 5) mean only that those who were baptized with Christian baptism were baptized into the faith of Christ, not that the form of words was different from that enjoined by our Lord in St. Matthew.—Sponsors.—There is no mention of sponsors in the N. T. In very early ages of the Church sponsors were in use both for children and adults.—XII. Baptism for the dead.—1 Cor. xv. 27. "Else what shall they do who are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? Why are they then baptized for the dead?" 1. Tertullian tells us of a custom of vicarious baptism as existing among the Marcionites; and St. Chrysostom relates of the same heretics, that, when one of their catechumens died without baptism, they used to put a living person under the dead man's bed, and asked whether he desired to be baptized; the living man answering that he did, they then baptized him in place of the departed (Chrys. Hom. xl. on 1 Cor. xv). Epiphanius relates a similar custom among the Cerinthians (Haeres. xxviii.), which, he said, prevailed from fear that in the resurrection they should suffer punishment who had not been baptized. The question naturally occurs. Did St. Paul allude to a custom of this kind, which even in his days had begun to prevail among heretics and ignorant persons? If so, he no doubt adduced it as an argumentum ad hominem. "If the dead rise not at all, what benefit do they expect who baptize vicariously for the dead?" The greater number of modern commentators have adopted this, as the simplest and most rational sense of the Apostle's words. It is, however, equally conceivable that the passage in St. Paul gave rise to the subsequent practice among the Marcionites and Cerinthians. 2. Chrysostom believes the Apostle to refer to the profession of faith in baptism, part of which was "I believe in the resurrection of the dead." The former of the two interpretations above mentioned commends itself to us by its simplicity; the latter by its antiquity. The following are some of the various other explanations which have been given. —3. "What shall they do, who are baptized when death is close at hand? (Epiphanius, Haeres. xxviii. 6). —4. "Over the graves of the martyrs." Vossius adopted this interpretation; but it is very unlikely that the custom should have prevailed in the days of St. Paul. —5. "On account of a dead saviour." —6. "What shall they gain, who are baptized for the sake of the dead in Christ?" —7. "What shall they do, who are baptized in the place of the dead?" i. e. who, as the ranks of the faithful are thinned by death, come forward to be baptized, that they may fill up the company of believers.

Barab'bas, a robber (John xviii. 40), who had committed murder in an insurrection (Mark xv. 7; Luke xxiii. 19) in Jerusalem, and was lying in prison at the time of the trial of Jesus before Pilate.

Bar'achel, "the Buzite," father of Elihu (Job xxii. 2, 6). [BUZ.]

Barach'ias, Matt. xxiii. 35. [ZACHARIAS.]

Barak, son of Abinoam of Kedesh, a refugee-city in Mount Naphtali, was incited by Deborah, a prophetess of Ephraim, to deliver Israel from the yoke of Jabin. Accompanied, at his own express desire, by Deborah, Barak led his rudely-armed force of 10,000 men from Naphtali and Zebulun to an encampment on the summit of Tabor, and utterly routed the unwieldy host of the Canaanites in the plain of Jezreel (Esdraelon), "the battle-field of Palestine." The victory was decisive, Harosheth taken (Judg. iv. 16), Sisera murdered, and Jabin ruined. The victors composed a splendid epinician ode in commemoration of their deliverance (Judg. v.). Lord A. Hervey supposes the narrative to be a repetition of Josh. xi. 1-12. A great deal may be said for this view, but it is fair to add that there are geographical difficulties in the way. [DEBORAH.]

Barbarian. "Every one not a Greek is a barbarian" is the common Greek definition, and in this strict sense the word is used in Rom. i. 14, "I am debtor both to Greeks and barbarians." "Hellenes and barbarians" is the constant division found in Greek literature, but Thucydides (i. 3) points out that this distinction is subsequent to Homer. It often retains this primitive meaning, as in 1 Cor. xiv. 11 (of one using an unknown tongue), and Acts xxvii. 2, 4 (of the Maltese, who spoke a Punic dialect). The ancient Egyptians, like the modern Chinese, had an analogous word (Herod. ii. 158). So completely was the term "barbarian" accepted, that even Josephus and Philo scruple as little to reckon the Jews among them, as the early Romans did to apply the term to themselves. Afterwards only the savage nations were called barbarians.

Barhu'mite, the. [BAHURIME.]

Bari'ah, one of the sons of Shemaiah, a descendant of the royal family of Judah (1 Chr. iii. 22).

Bar-Je'sus. [ELYMAS.]

Bar-Jo'na. [PETER.]

Bar'kos. "Children of Barkos" were among the Nethinim who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 53; Neh. vii. 55).

Barley (Heb. se'orah), the well-known cereal, which is mentioned in many passages of the Bible. It was grown by the Hebrews (Lev. Deut. viii. 8; Ruth ii. 17, &c.), who used it in bread, chiefly amongst the poor (Lev. vii. 13; 2 K. iv. 42; John vi. 9, 13); for making into bread by mixing it with wheat, beans, lentils, millet, &c. (Ez. iv. 9); for making into cakes (Ez. iv. 12); and as fodder for horses (1 K. iv. 28). The barley harvest is mentioned Ruth i. 22, ii. 23; 2 Sam. xxi. 9, 10. It takes place in Palestine in March and April, and in the hilly districts as late as May; but the period of course varies according to the localities where the corn grows. The barley harvest always precedes the wheat harvest, in some places by a week, in others by fully three weeks (Robinson, Bib. Res. ii. 99, 278). In Egypt the barley is about a month earlier than the wheat, whence its total destruction by the hail-storm (Ex. ix. 31). Barley was sown at any time between November and March, according to the season. Barley bread is even to this day little esteemed in Palestine. This fact is important, as serving to elucidate some passages in Scripture. Why, for instance, was barley meal, and not the ordinary meal-offering of wheat flour, to be the jealousy-offering (Num. v. 15)? Because thereby is denoted the low reputation in which the implicated parties were held. The homer and a half of barley, as part of the purchase-money of the adulteress (Hos. iii. 2), has doubtless a similar typical meaning. With this circumstance in remembrance, how forcible is the expression in Ezekiel (xiii. 19), "Will ye pollute me among my people for handfuls of barley?" The knowledge of this fact aids to point out the connexion between Gideon and the barley-cake, in the dream which the "man told to his fellow" (Judg. vii. 13). Gideon's "family was poor in Manasseh—and he was the least in his father's house;" and doubtless the Midianites knew it. On this passage Dr. Thomson remarks, "If the Midianites were accustomed in their extemporaneous songs to call Gideon and his band 'cakes of barley bread,' as their successors the haughty Bedawin often do to ridicule their enemies, the application would be all the more natural."

Barnabas, a name signifying, "son of prophecy," or "exhortation" (or, but not so probably, "consolation," as A. V.), given by the Apostle (Acts iv. 36) to JOSEPH (or Joses), a Levite of the island of Cyprus, who was early a disciple of Christ. In Acts ix. 27, we find him introducing the newly-converted Saul to the Apostles at Jerusalem, in a way which seems to imply previous acquaintance between the two. On tidings coming to the church at Jerusalem that men of Cyprus and Cyrene had been preaching to Gentiles at Antioch; Barnabas was sent thither (Acts xi. 19-26), and went to Tarsus to seek Saul, as one specially raised up to preach to the Gentiles (Acts xxvi. 17). Having brought Saul to Antioch, he was sent with him to Jerusalem with relief for the brethren in Judaea (Acts xi. 30). On their return to Antioch, they (Acts xiii. 2) were ordained by the church for the missionary work, and sent forth (A.D. 45). From this time Barnabas and Paul enjoy the title and dignity of Apostles. Their first missionary journey is related in Acts xiii. xiv.; it was confined to Cyprus and Asia Minor. Some time after their return to Antioch (A.D. 47 or 48), were sent (A.D. 50), with some others, to determine with the Apostles and a difficult question respecting the necessity of circumcision for the Gentile converts (Acts xv.

ff.). On that occasion Paul and Barnabas were recognized as the Apostles of the uncircumcision. After another stay in Antioch on their return, a variance took place between Barnabas and Paul on the question of taking with them, on a second missionary journey, John Mark, sister's son to Barnabas (Acts xv. 36 ff.). "The contention was so sharp, that they parted asunder," and Barnabas took Mark, and sailed to Cyprus, his native island. Here the Scripture notices of him cease. As to his further labours and death, traditions differ. Some say that he went to Milan, and became first bishop of the church there. There is extant an apocryphal work, probably of the fifth century, Acta et Passio Barnabae in Cypro; and a still later encomium of Barnabas, by a Cyprian monk Alexander. We have an Epistle in 21 chapters called by the name of Barnabas. Its authenticity has been defended by some great writers; but it is very generally given up now, and the Epistle is believed to have been written early in the second century.

Barodis, a name inserted in the list of those "servants of Solomon" who returned with Zorobabel (1 Esd. v. 34).

Barsabas. [JOSEPH BARSABAS; JUDAS BARSABAS.]

Barbacus, the father of Apame, the concubine of King Darius (1 Esd. iv. 29). "The admirable" was probably an official title belonging to his rank.

Bartholomew, one of the Twelve Apostles of Christ (Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 14; Acts i. 13). It has been not improbably conjectured that he is identical with Nathanael (John i. 45 ff.). If this may be assumed, he was born at Cana of Galilee; and is said to have preached the Gospel in India, that is, probably, Arabia Felix. Some allot Armenia to him as his mission-field, and report him to have been there flayed alive and then crucified with his head downwards.

Bartimaeus, a blind beggar of Jericho who (Mark x. 46 ff.) sat by the wayside begging as our Lord passed out of Jericho on His last journey to Jerusalem.

Baruch. 1. Son of Neriah, the friend (Jer. xxxii. 12), amanuensis (Jer. xxxvi. 4-32), and faithful attendant of Jeremiah (Jer. xxvi. 10 ff.; B.C. 603), in the discharge of his prophetic office. He was of a noble family (comp. Jer. li. 59; Bar. i. 1), and of distinguished acquirements; and his brother Seraiah held an honourable office in the court of Zedekiah (Jer. li. 59). His accused him of influencing Jeremiah in favour of the Chaldeans (Jer. xliii. 3; cf. xxvii. 13); and he was thrown into prison with that prophet, where he remained till the capture of Jerusalem, B.C. 586. By the permission of Nebuchadnezzar he remained with Jeremiah at Mizpeh (Jos. Ant. x. 9, §1); but was afterwards forced to go down to Egypt (Jer. xliii. 6). Nothing is known certainly of the close of his life.—2. The son of Zabbaï, who assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 20).—3. A priest, or family of priests, who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 6).—4. The son of Col-hozeh, a descendant of Perez, or Pharez, the son of Judah (Neh. xi. 5).

Baruch, the Book of, is remarkable as the only book in the Apocrypha which is formed on the model of the Prophets; and though it is wanting in originality, it presents a vivid reflection of the ancient prophetic fire. It may be divided into two main parts i.-iii. 8, and iii. 9-end.—1. The book at present exists in Greek, and in several translations which were made from the Greek. Of the two Old Latin versions which remain, that which is incorporated in the Vulgate is generally literal; the other is more free. The vulgar Syriac and Arabic follow the Greek text closely.—2. The assumed author is undoubtedly the companion of Jeremiah, but the details of the book are inconsistent with the assumption. It exhibits not only historical inaccuracies, but also evident traces of a later date than the beginning of the captivity (iii. 9 ff., iv. 22 ff.; i. 3 ff. Comp. 2 K. xxv. 27).—3. The book was held in little esteem among the Jews; though it is stated in the Greek text of the Apostolical Constitutions that it was read, together with the Lamentations, "on the tenth day of the month Gorpiaeus" (i.e. the Day of Atonement). From the time of Irenaeus it was frequently quoted both in the East and in the West, and generally as the work of Jeremiah. It was, however, "obelized" throughout in the LXX. as deficient in the Hebrew. At the Council of Trent Baruch was admitted into the Romish Canon; but the Protestant churches have unanimously placed it among the Apocryphal books.—4. Considerable discussion has been raised as to the original language of the book. Those who advocated its authenticity generally supposed that it was first written in Hebrew. Others again have maintained that the Greek is the original text. The truth appears to lie between these two extremes. The two divisions of the book are distinguished by marked peculiarities of style and language. The Hebraic character of the first part is such as to mark it as a translation and not as the work of a Hebraizing Greek. The second part, on the other hand, closely approaches the Alexandrine type.—5. The most probable explanation of this contrast is gained by supposing that some one thoroughly conversant with the Alexandrine translation of Jeremiah found the Hebrew fragment which forms the basis of the book already attached to the writings of that prophet, and wrought it up into its present form.—6. There are no certain data by which to fix the time of the composition of Baruch. The present book must be placed considerably later, probably about the time of the war of liberation (B.C. 16), or somewhat earlier.—7. The Epistle of Jeremiah, which, according to the authority of some Greek MSS., stands in the English version as the 6th chapter of Baruch, is the work of a later period. It may be assigned with probability to the first century B.C.—8. A Syriac first Epistle of Baruch "to the nine and a half tribes" is found in the London and Paris Polyglots. Fritzsche considers it to be the production of a Syrian monk.

Barzillai. 1. A wealthy Gileadite who showed hospitality to David when he fled from Absalom (2 Sam. xvii. 27). On the score of his age, and probably from a feeling of independence, he declined the king's offer of ending his days at court (2 Sam. xix. 32-39). The descendants of his daughter, who married into a priestly family, were unable, after the captivity, to prove their genealogy (Ezr. ii. 61; Neh. vii. 63.)—2. A Meholathite, whose son Adriel married Michal, Saul's daughter (2 Sam. xxi. 8).

Bas'aloah, 1 Esd. v. 31. [BAZLITH.]

Bas'cama, a place in Gilead where Jonathan Maccabæus was killed by Trypho (1 Macc. xiii. 23). No trace of the name has yet been discovered.

Ba'shan, a district on the east of Jordan. It not, like Argob and other districts of Palestine, distinguished by one constant designation, but is sometimes spoken of as the "land of Bashan," (1 Chr. v. 11; and comp. Num. xxi. 33, xxxii. 33), and sometimes as "all Bashan;" (Deut. iii. 10, 13; Josh. xii. 5, xiii. 12, 30), but most commonly without any addition. It was taken by the children of Israel after their conquest of the land of Sihon from Arnon to Jabbok. They "turned" from their road over Jordan and "went up by the way of Bashan" to Edrei on the western edge of the Lejah. [EURET.] Here they encountered Og king of Bashan, who "came out" probably from the natural fastnesses of Argob, only to meet the entire destruction of himself, his sons, and all his people (Num. xxi. 33-35; Deut. iii. 1-3). The limits of Bashan are very strictly defined. It extended from the "border of Gilead" on the south to Mount Hermon on the north (Deut. iii. 3, 10, 14; Josh. xii. 5; 1 Chr. v. 23), and from the Arabah or Jordan valley on the west to Salchah (Sukhad) and the border of the Geshurites, and the Maachathites on the east (Josh. xii. 3-5; Deut. iii. 10). This important district was bestowed on the half tribe of Manasseh (Josh. xiii. 29-31), together with "half Gilead." It is just named in the list of Solomon's commissariat districts (1 K. iv. 13). And here, with the exception of one more passing glimpse, closes the history of Bashan as far as the Bible is concerned. It vanishes from our view until we meet with it as being devastated by Hazael in the reign of Jehu (2 K. x. 33). After the captivity, Bashan is mentioned as divided into four provinces—Gaulanitis [GOLAN], Auranitis [HAURAN], Trachonitis [ARGOB], and Batanaea, or Ard-el-Bath-anyah, which lies on the east of the Lejah and the north of the range of Jebel Hauran or ed Druze.

Bashan-ha'voth-ja'ir, a name given to Argob after its conquest by Jair (Deut. iii. 14).

Bash'emath, daughter of Ishmael, the last married of the three wives of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 3, 4, 13), from whose son, Reuel, four tribes of the Edomites were descended. When first mentioned she is called Mahalath (Gen. xxviii. 9); whilst, on the other hand, the name Bashemath is in the narrative (Gen. xxvi. 34) given to another of Esau's wives, the daughter of Elon the Hittite. The Samaritan text seeks to remove this difficulty by reading Mahalath instead of Bashemath in the genealogy. We might with more probability suppose that this name (Bashemath) has been assigned to the wrong person in one or other of the passages; but if so it is impossible to determine which is erroneous.

Basin. Among the smaller vessels for the Tabernacle or Temple service, many must have been required to receive from the sacrificial victims the blood to be sprinkled for purification. Moses, on the occasion of the great ceremony of purification in the wilderness, put half the blood in "the basins" or bowls, and afterwards sprinkled it on the people (Ex. xxiv. 6, 8). Among the vessels cast in metal, whether gold, silver, or bra Hiram, for Solomon, besides the laver and grey mention is made of basins, bowls, and the first (marg. bowls) he is said to have 100 (2 Chr. iv. 8; 1 K. vii. 45, 46; comp. Ex. xxv. 29 and 1 Chr. xxviii. 14, 17). The form and material of these vessels can only be conjectured from the analogy of ancient Assyrian and Egyptian specimens of works of the same kind. The "basin" from which our Lord washed the disciples' feet, πύθρ, was probably deeper and larger than the hand-basin for sprinkling.

Basket. The Hebrew terms used in the description of this article are as follows: (1) Sal, so called from the twigs of which it was originally made, specially used for holding bread (Gen. xl. 16 ff. Ex. xxix. 3, 23; Lev. viii. 2, 26, 31; Num. vi. 15, 17, 19). The form of the Egyptian bread-basket is delineated in Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt. iii. 226, after the specimens represented in the tomb of Rameses III. We must assume that the term sal passed from its strict etymological meaning to any vessel applied to the purpose. In Judg. vi. 19, meat is served up in a sal, which could hardly have been of wickerwork. (2) Salsillôth, a word of kindred origin, applied to the basket used in gathering grapes (Jer. vi. 9). (3) Tene, in which the first-fruits of the harvest were presented (Deut. xvi. 2, 4). From its being coupled with the kneading-bowl (A. V. "store," Deut. xxviii. 5, 17), we may infer that it was also used for household purposes, perhaps to bring the corn to the mill. (4) Cellûb, so called from its similarity to a birdcage or trap, probably in regard to its having a lid: it was used for carrying fruit (Am. viii. 1, 2). (5) Dôd, used for carrying fruit (Jer. xxiv. 1, 2), as well as on a larger scale for carrying clay to the brickyard (Ps. lxxxi. 6; pots, A. V.), or for holding bulky articles (2 K. x. 7). In the N. T. baskets are described under the three following terms, κόφινον εσφίς, σφάδρυς. The last occurs only in 2 Cor. xi. 33, in describing St. Paul's escape from Damascus. With regard to the two former words, it may be remarked that the first is exclusively used in the description of the miracle of feeding the five thousand (Matt. xiv. 20, xvi. 9; Mark vi. 43; Luke ix. 17; John vi. 13), and the second, in that of the four thousand (Matt. xv. 37; Mark viii. 8): the distinction is most definitely brought out in Mark viii. 19, 20.

Bastard. Among those who were excluded from the congregation, even to the tenth generation, the mamzér (A. V. bastard), who was classed in this respect with the Ammonite and Moabite (Deut. xxiii. 2). The term is not, however, applied to any illegitimate offspring, born out of wedlock, but is restricted by the Rabbins to the issue of any connexion within the degrees prohibited by the Law. A mamzér, according to the Mishna (Yebamoth, iv. 13), is one, says R. Akiba, who is born of relations between whom marriage is forbidden. Simeon the Temanite says, it is every one whose parents are liable to the punishment of "cutting off" by the hands of Heaven; R. Joshua, every one whose parents are liable to death by the house of judgment, as, for instance, the offspring of adultery. The ancient versions (LXX., Vulg., Syr.), add another class, the children of a harlot, and in this sense the term manzér or manser survived in Pontifical law (Selden, de Succ. in bon. defunct., c. iii.):

"Manzeribus scortum, sed moecha nothis dedit ortum."

The child of a goi, or non-Israelite, and a mamzér was also reckoned by the Talmudists a mamzér, as was the issue of a slave and a mamzér, and of a mamzér and female proselyte. The term also occurs in Zech. ix. 6, "a bastard shall dwell in Ashdod," where it seems to denote a foreign race of mixed and spurious birth. Dr. Geiger infers from this passage that mamzér specially signifies the issue of such marriages between the Jews and the women of Ashdod as are alluded to in Neh. xiii. 23, 24, and applies it exclusively to the Philistine bastard.

Bat ('átalléph). There is no doubt whatever that the A. V. is correct in its rendering of this word. It is true that in the A. V. of Lev. xi. 19, and Deut. xiv. 18, the 'átalléph closes the lists of "fowls that shall not be eaten;" but it must be remembered that the ancients considered the bat to partake of the nature of a bird, and the Hebrew óph, "fowls," which literally means "a wing," might be applied to any winged creature. Besides the passages cited above, mention of the bat occurs in Is. ii. 20: "In that day a man shall cast his idols of silver and his idols of gold . . . to the moles and to the bats;" and in Baruch vi. 22, in the passage that so graphically sets forth the vanity of the Babylonish idols: "Their faces are blacked through the smoke that cometh out of the temple; upon their bodies and heads sit bats, swallows, and birds, and the cats also." Many travellers have noticed the immense numbers of bats that are found in caverns in the East, and Layard says that on the occasion of a visit to a cavern these noisome beasts compelled him to retreat.

Bath, Bathing. This was a prescribed part of the Jewish ritual of purification in cases of accidental, leprous, or ordinary uncleanness (Lev. xv. xvi. 28, xxii. 6; Num. xix. 7, 19; 2 Sam. xi. 2, 4; 2 K. v. 10); as also after mourning, which always implied defilement (Ruth iii. 3; 2 Sam. xii. 20.) The high-priest at his inauguration (Lev. xiii. 6) and on the day of atonement, once before each solemn act of propitiation (xvi. 4, 24), was also to bathe. A bathing-chamber was probably included in houses even of no great rank in cities from early times (2 Sam. xi. 2); much more in those of the wealthy in later times; often in gardens (Susan. 15). With bathing, anointing was customarily joined; the climate making both these essential alike to health and pleasure, to which luxury added the use of perfumes (Susan. 17; Jud. x. 3; Esth. ii. 12). The "pools," such as that of Siloam, and Hezekiah (Neh. iii. 15, 16; 2 K. xx. 20; Is. xxii. 11; John ix. 7), often sheltered by porticoes (John v. 2); are the first indications we have of public bathing accommodation.

Bath. [MEASURES.]

Bath-rab'bim, the gate of, one of the gates of the ancient city of Heshbon [Cant. vii. 4 [5]]. The "Gate of Bathrabbim" at Heshbon would, according to the Oriental custom, be the gate pointing to a town of that name. The only place in this neighbourhood at all resembling Bathrabbim in sound is Rabbah. Future investigations may settle this point.

Bathshe'ba (2 Sam. xi. 3, &c.; also called Bathshua in 1 Chr. iii. 5), the daughter of Eliam (2 Sam. xi. 3), or Ammiel (1 Chr. iii. 5), the son of Ahithophel (2 Sam. xxiii. 34), and wife of Uriah the Hittite. The child which was the fruit of her adulterous intercourse with David died; but after marriage she became the mother of four sons, Solomon (Matt. i. 6), Shimea, Shobab, and Nathan. When Adonijah attempted to set aside in his own favour the succession promised to Solomon, Bathsheba was employed by Nathan to inform the king of the conspiracy (1 K. i. 11, 15, 23). After the accession of Solomon, she, as queen-mother, requested permission of her son for Adonijah to take in marriage Abishag the Shunamite (1 K. ii. 21-25).

Bath-shu'a. [BATHSHEBA.]

Bath-zachari'as, a place, named only 1 Macc. vi. 32, 33, to which Judas Maccabeus marched from Jerusalem, and where he encamped for the relief of Bethsura. The two places were seventy stadia apart, and the approaches to Bathzacharias were atrocious and confined. This description is met in every respect by the modern Beit Sahârah, nine miles north of Beit sir. [BETHZUR.]

Battle-ax, Jer. li. 20 [MAUL].

Bay'ai, son of Henadad, ruler of the district of Keilah in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 18).

Bay-tree (ezrâch). It is difficult to see upon what grounds the translators of the A. V. have understood the Hebrew word of Ps. xxxvii. 35 to signify a "bay-tree." Most of the Jewish doctors understand by the term ezrâch "a tree which grows in its own soil"—one that has never been transplanted; which is the interpretation given in the margin of the A. V. The word ezrâch, literally signifies a "native," in contradistinction to "a stranger," or "a foreigner."

Baslith, "Children of B." were amongst the Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 54). In Ezr. ii. 52, the name is given as BAZLUTH, and in 1 Esd. v. 31 as BASALOTH.

Basluth [BAZLITH].

Bdellium (bedôlach), a precious substance, the name of which occurs in Gen. ii. 12, with "gold" and "onyx stone," as one of the productions of the land of Havilah, and in Num. xi. 7, where manna is in colour compared to bdellium. It is quite impossible to say whether bedôlach denotes a mineral, or an animal production, or a vegetable exudation. Bdellium is an odoriferous exudation from a tree which is perhaps the Borassus flabelliformis, Lin., of Arabia Felix.

Beali'ah, a Benjamite, who went over to David at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 5).

Be'aloth, a town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 24).

Be'an, Children of, a tribe, apparently of predatory Bedouin habits, who were destroyed by Judas Maccabaeus (1 Macc. v. 4). The name has been supposed to be identical with BEON.

(2 Sam. xvii. 28; Ezr. iv. 9). Beans are cultivated in Palestine, which produces many of the leguminous order of plants, such as lentils, kidney-beans, vetches, &c. Beans are in blossom in January; they have been noticed in flower at Lydda on the 23rd, and at Sidon and Acre even earlier; they continue in flower till March. In Egypt beans are sown in November and reaped in the middle of February, but in Syria the harvest is later.

Bear. The Syrian bear (Ursus Syriacus), which is without doubt the animal mentioned in the Bible, is still found on the higher mountains of Palestine. During the summer months these bears keep to the snowy parts of Lebanon, but descend in winter to the villages and gardens: it is probable also that at this period in former days they extended their visits to other parts of Palestine. We read in Scripture of bears being found in a wood between Jericho and Bethel (2 K. ii. 24); it is not improbable therefore that the destruction of the forty-two children who mocked Elisha took place some time in the winter, when these animals inhabited the lowlands of Palestine. The ferocity of the bear when deprived of its young is alluded to in 2 Sam. xvii. 8; Prov. xvii. 12; Hos. xiii. 8; its attacking flocks in 1 Sam. xvii. 34, &c.; its craftiness in ambush in Lam. iii. 10, and that it was a dangerous enemy to man we learn from Am. v. 19. The passage in Is. lix. 11 would be better translated, "we groan like bears," in allusion to the animal's plaintive groaning noise. The bear is mentioned also in Rev. xiii. 2; in Dan. vii. 5; Wisd. Ecclus. xvii. 3.

Beard. Western Asiatics have always cherished the beard as the badge of the dignity of manhood, and attached to it the importance of a feature. The Egyptians on the contrary, sedulously for the most part, shaved the hair of the face and head, and compelled their slaves to do the like. The enemies of the Egyptians, including probably many of the nations of Canaan, Syria, and Armenia, &c., are represented nearly always bearded. In the Ninevite monuments is a series of battle-views from the capture of Lachish by Sennacherib, in which the captives have beards very like some of those in the Egyptian monuments. There is, however, an appearance of conventionalism both in Egyptian and Assyrian treatment of the hair and beard on monuments, which prevents our accepting it as characteristic. Nor is it possible to decide with certainty the meaning of the precept (Lev. xix. 27, xxi. 5) regarding the "corners of the beard." Probably the Jews retained the hair on the sides of the face between the ear and the eye, which the Arabs and others shaved away. Size and fullness of beard are said to be regarded, at the present day, as a mark of respectability and trustworthiness. The beard is the object of an oath, and that on which blessings or shame are spoken of as resting. The custom was and is to shave or pluck it and the hair out in mourning (Is. i. 6, xv. 2; Jer. xli. 5, xlviii. 37; Ezr. ix. 3; Bar. vi. 31); to neglect it in seasons of permanent affliction (2 Sam. xix. 24), and to regard any insult to it as the last outrage which enmity can inflict (2 Sam. x. 4). The beard was the object of salutation (2 Sam. xx. 9). The dressing, trimming, anointing, &c. of the beard, was performed with much ceremony by persons of wealth and rank (Ps. cxxxiii. 2). The removal of the beard was a part of the ceremonial treatment proper to a leper (Lev. xiv. 9).

Beast. The representative in the A. V. of the following Hebrew words:—1. Behémâh, which is the general name for "domestic cattle" of any kind, is used also to denote "any large quadruped," as opposed to fowls and creeping things (Gen. vi. 7, 20, vii. 2; Ex. ix. 25; Lev. xi. 2; 1 K. iv. 33; Prov. xxx. 30, &c.); or for "beasts of burden," horses, mules, &c., as in 1 K. xviii. 5, Neh. ii. 12, 14, &c.; or the word may denote "wild beasts," as in Deut. xxxii. 24, Hab. ii. 17, 1 Sam. xvii. 44.

—2. Be'îr is used either collectively of "all kinds of cattle," like the Latin pecus (Ex. xxii. 5 [4]; Num. xx. 4, 8, 11; Ps. lxxviii. 48), or specially of "beasts of burden" (Gen. xiv. 17). This word has a more limited sense than the preceding.—Be'îr is used to denote any animal. It is very frequently used specially of "wild beast," when the meaning is often more fully expressed by the addition of the word hassâdâch, (wild beast) "of the field" (Ex. xxiii. 11; Lev. xxvi. 22; Deut. vii. 22; Hos. ii. 12 [14], xiii. 8; Jer. xii. 9, &c.).

Bebai. 1. "Sons of Bebai," 623 (Neh. 628) in number, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 11; Neh. vii. 16; 1 Esd. v. 13), and at a later period twenty-eight more, under Zechariah the son of Bebai, returned with Ezra (Ezr. vii. 11). Four of this family had taken foreign wives (Ezr. x. 28; 1 Esd. ix. 29). The name occurs also among those who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 15).—2. Father of Zechariah, who was the leader of the twenty-eight men of his tribe mentioned above (Ezr. vii. 11).

Bebai, a place named only in Jud. xv. 4.

Becher. 1. The second son of Benjamin, according to the list both in Gen. xli. 21, and 1 Chr. vii. 6; but omitted in 1 Chr. vii. 1. No one, however, can look at the Hebrew text of 1 Chr. vii. 1, without at least suspecting that becôr, his first-born, is a corruption of Becher, so that the genuine reading would be, Benjamin begat Bela, Becher, and Ashbel, in exact agreement with Gen. xli. 21. There is, however, another view which may be taken, viz., that 1 Chron. vii. 1 is right, and that in Gen. xli. 21, and 1 Chr. vii. 8, Becher, as a proper name, is a corruption of becôr, first-born, so that Benjamin had no son Becher. Notwithstanding all the arguments in favour of this, the first supposition is, it can scarcely be doubted, substantially the true one. Becher was one of Benjamin's three sons, Bela, Becher, Ashbel, and came down to Egypt with Jacob, being one of the fourteen descendants of Rachel who settled in Egypt. As regards the posterity of Becher, we have to notice the singular fact of there being no family named after him at the numbering of the Israelites in the plains of Moab, as related in Num. xxvi. But the no less singular circumstance of there being a Becher, and a family of Bachrites, among the sons of Ephraim (ver. 35), seems to supply the true explanation. The slaughter of the sons of Ephraim by the men of Gath, who came to steal their cattle out of the land of Goshen, in that border affray related in 1 Chr. vii. 21, had sadly thinned the house of Ephraim of its males. The daughters of Ephraim must therefore have sought husbands in other tribes, and in many cases must have been heiresses. It is therefore highly probable that Becher, or his heir and head of his house, married an Ephraimitish heiress, a daughter of Shuthelah (1 Chr. vii. 20, 21), and so that his house was reckoned in the tribe of Ephraim, just as Jair, the son of Segub, was reckoned in the tribe of Manasseh (1 Chr. ii. 22; Num. xxxii. 40, 41). The time when Becher first appears among the Ephraimites, viz., just before the entering into the promised land, when the people were numbered by genealogies for the express purpose of dividing the inheritance equitably among the tribes, is evidently highly favourable to this view. (See Num. xxvi. 52-56, xxvii.) The junior branches of Becher's family would of course continue in the tribe of Benjamin.—2. Son of Ephraim, Num. xvi. 35, called BERED 1 Chr. vii. 20. Same as the preceding.

Becho'rath, son of Aphiah, or Abiah, and grandson of Becher, according to 1 Sam. ix. 1, 1 Chr. vii. 8.

Be'etleth, the plain of, mentioned in Jud. ii. 21, as lying between Nineveh and Cilicia. The name has been compared with Bactraia, a town of Syria named by Ptolemy, Bactiali in the Peutinger Tables, which place it 21 miles from Antioch.

Bed and Bed-chamber. We may distinguish in the Jewish bed five principal parts:—1. the mattress; 2. the covering; 3. the pillow; 4. the bedstead or support for 1; 5. the ornamental portions.—1. This portion of the bed was limited to a mere mat, or one or more quilts.—2. A quilt finer than those used in 1. In summer a thin blanket or the outer garment worn by day (1 Sam. xix. 13) sufficed. Hence the law provided that it should not be kept in pledge after sunset, that the poor man might not lack his needful covering (Deut. xxiv. 13).—3. The only material mentioned for this is that which occurs 1 Sam. xix. 13, and the word used is of doubtful meaning, but seems to signify some fabric woven or plaited of goat's-hair. It is clear, however, that it was something hastily adopted to serve as a pillow, and is not decisive of the ordinary use. In Ez. xiii. 18, occurs the word ceseth, which seems to be the proper term. Such pillows are common to this day in the East, formed of sheep's fleece or goat's-skin, with a stuffing of cotton, &c.—4. The bedstead was not always necessary, the divan, or platform along the side or end of an Oriental room, sufficing as a support for the bedding. Yet some slight and portable frame seems implied among the senses of the word, which is used for a "bier" (2 Sam. iii. 31), and for the ordinary bed (2 K. iv. 10), for the litter on which a sick person might be carried (1 Sam. xix. 15), for Jacob's bed of sickness (Gen. xlvii. 31), and for the couch on which guests reclined at a banquet (Esth. i. 6).—5. The ornamental portions were pillars and a canopy (Jud xiii. 9), ivory carvings, gold and silver, and probably mosaic work, purple and fine linen (Esth. i. 6; Cant. iii. 9, 10). The ordinary furniture of a bedchamber in private life is given in 2 K. iv. 10.

Bed and Head-rest. (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians.)

The "bed-chamber" in the Temple where Joash was hidden, was, probably, a store-chamber for keeping beds (2 K. xi. 2; 2 Chr. xxii. 11). The position of the bed-chamber in the most remote and secret parts of the palace seems marked in the passages, Ex. viii. 3, 2 K. vi. 12.

Bedad, the father of Hadad king of Edom (Gen. xxxv. 35; 1 Chr. i. 46).

Bedan, 1. mentioned 1 Sam. xii. 11, as a Judge of Israel between Jerubbab (Gideon) and Jephthah. Some maintain him to be the Jair mentioned in Judg. x. 3. The Chaldee Paraphrast reads Samson for Bedan; the LXX., Syr., and Arab. all have Barak, a very probable correction except for the order of the names. Ewald suggests that it may be a false reading for Abdon.—2. Son of Ulam, the son of Gilead (1 Chr. vi. 17).

Bedai'ah, one of the sons of Bani, in the time of Ezra, who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 35).

Bees (debbô'ah), Deut. i. 44; Judg. xiv. 8; Ps. cxviii. 12; Is. vii. 18. That Palestine abounded in bees is evident from the description of that land by Moses, for it was a land "flowing with milk and honey;" nor is there any reason for supposing that this expression is to be understood otherwise than in its literal sense. Modern travellers occasionally allude to the bees of Palestine. Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, p. 299) speaks of immense swarms of bees which made their home in a gigantic cliff of Wady Kurn. "The people of Malia, several years ago," he says, "let a man down the face of the rock by ropes. He was entirely protected from the assaults of the bees, and extracted a large amount of honey; but he was so terrified by the prodigious swarms of bees that he could not be induced to repeat the exploit." This forcibly illustrates Deut. xxxii. 13, and Ps. lxxxi. 16, as to "honey out of the stony rock," and the two passages out of the Psalms and Judges quoted above, as to the fearful nature of the attacks of these insects when irritated. English naturalists know little of the species of bees that are found in Palestine. Mr. F. Smith, our best authority on the Hymenoptera, is inclined to believe that the honey-bee of Palestine is distinct from the honey-bee (A. mellifica) of this country. There can be no doubt that the attacks of bees in Eastern countries are more to be dreaded than they are in more temperate climates. Swarms in the East are far larger than they are with us, and, on account of the heat of the climate, one can readily imagine that their stings must give rise to very dangerous symptoms. We can well, therefore, understand the full force of the Psalmist's complaint, "They came about me like bees." The passage about the swarm of bees and honey in the lion's carcase (Judg. xiv. 8) admits of easy explanation. The lion which Samson slew had been dead some little time before the bees had taken up their abode in the carcase, for it is expressly stated that "after a time," Samson returned and saw the bees and honey in the lion's carcase, so that as has been well observed, "if any one here represents to himself a corrupt and putrid carcase, the occurrence ceases to have any true similitude, for it is well known that in these countries at certain seasons of the year, the heat will in the course of twenty-four hours so completely dry up the moisture of dead camels, and that without their undergoing position, that their bodies long remain, like mummies, unaltered and entirely free from odour." The passage in Is. vii. 18, "The Lord shall hiss for the bee that is in the land of Assyria," has been understood by some to refer to the practice of "calling out the bees from their hives by a hissing or whistling sound to their labour in the fields, and summoning them again to return" in the evening. In all probability, however, the expression in Isaiah has reference, as Mr. Denham says, "to the custom of the people in the East of calling the attention of any one by a significant hiss or rather hiss."

Beeli'ada, one of David's sons, born in Jerusalem (1 Chr. xiv. 7). In the lists in Samuel the name is ELIADA.

Beel'sarus, 1 Esd. v. 8. [BILSHAN.]

Beel'th'mus, an officer of Artaxerxes residing in Palestine (1 Esd. ii. 16, 25). The name is a corruption of the title of Rehun, A. V. "chancellor," the name immediately before it (Ezr. iv. 8).

Beël'zebul, the title of a heathen deity, to whom the Jews ascribed the sovereignty of the evil spirits (Matt. x. 25, xii. 24; Mark iii. 22; Luke xi. 15 ff.). The correct reading is without doubt Beelzebul, and not Beelzebub as given in the Syriac, the Vulg., and some other versions.—1. The explanations offered in reference to the change of the name may be ranged into two classes, according as they are based on the sound, or the meaning of the word. We should prefer the assumption, in connexion with the former view, that the change was purely of an accidental nature. The second class of explanations carries the greatest weight of authority with it: these proceed on the ground that the Jews intentionally changed the pronunciation of the word, so as either to give a significance to it adapted to their own ideas, or to cast ridicule upon the idolatry of the neighbouring nations, in which case we might compare the adoption of Sychar for Sychem, Beth-aven for Bethel. Some connect the term with zebul, habitation, thus making Beelzebul = ὁκὸς ἐπὶ τῶν τῶν (Matt. x. 25), the lord of the dwelling, whether as the "prince of the power of the air" (Eph. ii. 2), or as the prince of the lower world, or as inhabiting human bodies, or as occupying a mansion in the seventh heaven, like Saturn in Oriental mythology. Others derive it from zebul, dung, thus making Beelzebul, literally, the lord of dung, or the dunghill; and in a secondary sense, as zebul was used by the Talmudical writers as = idol or idolatry, the lord of idols, prince of false gods. It is generally held that the former of these two senses is more particularly referred to in the N. T.: the latter, however, is adopted by Lightfoot and Schleusner. We have lastly to notice the ingenious conjecture of Hug that the fly, under which Baalzebub was represented, was the Scarabæus pillularius or dunghill beetle, in which case Baalzebub and Beelzebub might be used indifferently.—2. The reference in Matt. x. 25 may have originated in a fancied resemblance between the application of Ahaziah to Baalzebub, and that of the Jews to our Lord for the ejection of the unclean spirits. The title, “prince of the devils,” may have special reference to the nature of the disease in question, or it may have been educed from the name itself by a fancied or real etymology. It is worthy of special observation that the notices of Beelzebub are exclusively connected with the subject of demoniacal possession, a circumstance which may account for want of disappearance of the name.

1. One of the latest halting-places of the Israelites lying beyond the Arnon, and so called because of the well which was there dug by the “princes” and “nobles” of the people, and is perpetuated in a fragment of poetry (Num. xxi. 16-18). This is possibly the BEER-ELIM referred to in Is. xv. 8.—2. A place to which Jotham, the son of Gideon, fled for fear of his brother Abimelech (Judg. ix. 21). There is nothing to indicate its position.

Be'era, son of Zophah, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 37).

Be'erah, prince of the Reubenites, carried away by Tiglath-pileser (1 Chr. v. 6).

Beer-elim, a spot named in Is. xv. 8 as on the “border of Moab,” apparently the south, Eglaim being at the north end of the Dead Sea. The name points to the well dug by the chiefs of Israel on their approach to the promised land, close by the “border of Moab,” (Num. xxi. 16; comp. 13).

Be'eri. 1. The father of Judith, one of the wives of Esau (Gen. xxvi. 34). [ANAH].—2. Father of the prophet Hosea (Hos. i. 1).

Beer-lahai-roi, a well, or rather a living spring, (A. V. fontain, comp. Jer. vi. 7) between Kadesh and Bered, in the wilderness, “in the way to Shur,” and therefore in the “south country” (Gen. xxiv. 62), which, according to the explanation of the text, was so named by Hagar, because God saw her there (Gen. xvi. 14). By this well Isaac dwelt both before and after the death of his father (Gen. xxiv. 62, xxv. 11). In both these passages the name is given in the A. V. as “the well Lahai-roi.” Mr. Rowland announces the discovery of the well Lahai-roi at Moyle or Molahi, a station on the road to Beersheba, 10 hours south of Ruheibeh; near which is a hole or cavern bearing the name of Beit Hagar (Ritter, Sinai, 1086, 7); but this requires confirmation.

Beeroth, one of the four cities of the Hivites who deluded Joshua into a treaty of peace with them; the other three being Gibeon, Chephirah, and Kirjath-Jearim (Josh. ix. 17). Beeroth was with the rest of these towns allotted to Benjamin (xviii. 25), in whose possession it continued at the time of David, the murderers of Ish-bosheth being named as belonging to it (2 Sam. iv. 2). It is once more named with Chephirah and K. Jearim in the list of those who returned from Babylon (Ezr. ii. 25; Neh. vii. 29; 1 Esdr. v. 19). [BEEROH.] Beeroth was known in the times of Eusebius, and his description of its position agrees perfectly with that of the modern el-Bireh, which stands at about 10 miles north of Jerusalem by the great road to Nâblus, just below a ridge which bounds the prospect northwards from the Holy city. Nahari—the Beerothite” (2 Sam. xxiii. 37), or “the Berothite” (1 Chr. xi. 39), was one of the “mighty men” of David’s guard.

Beeroth of the Children of Jaakan, the wells of the tribe of Bene-Jaakan, which formed one of the halting-places of the Israelites in the desert (Deut. x. 6). In Num. xxxiii., the name is given as BENE JAAKAN only.

Beer-she'ba, the name of one of the oldest places in Palestine, which formed the southern limit of the country. There are two accounts of the origin of the name.—1. According to the first, the well was dug by Abraham, and the name given, because there he and Abimelech the king of the Philistines “swore” both of them (Gen. xxi. 31). But the compact was ratified by the setting apart of “seven ewe lambs;” and as the Hebrew word for “seven” is Sheba, it is equally possible that this is the meaning of the name. Here, and in subsequent early notices of the place, it is spelt Beer-shaba.—2. The other narrative ascribes the origin of the name to an occurrence almost precisely similar, in which both Abimelech the king of the Philistines, and Phicol, his chief captain, are again concerned, with the difference that the person on the Hebrew side of the transaction is Isaac instead of Abraham (Gen. xxvi. 31-33). Here there is no reference to the “seven” lambs, and we are left to infer the derivation of Shibah (not “Shelah,” as in the A. V.) from the mention of the “swearing” in ver. 31. If we accept the statement of ver. 18 as referring to the same well as the former account, we shall be spared the necessity of enquiring whether these two narratives relate two separate occurrences, or refer to one and the same event, at one time ascribed to one, at another time to another of the early heroes and founders of the nation. There are at present on the spot two principal wells, and five smaller ones. The two principal wells are on or close to the northern bank of the Wady es-Seba. They lie just a hundred yards apart, and are so placed as to be visible from a considerable distance. The larger of the two, which lies to the east, is, according to the careful measurements of Dr. Robinson, 12½ feet diam., and at the time of his visit (Apr. 12) was 44½ feet to the surface of the water: the masonry which encloses the well reaches downwards for 28½ feet. The other well is 5 feet diam., and was 42 feet to the water. The curb-stones round the mouth of both wells are worn into deep grooves by the action of the ropes of so many centuries, and “look as if filled or fluted all round.” The five lesser wells are in a group in the bed of the wady. On some low hills north of the large wells are scattered the foundations and ruins of a town of moderate size. There are no trees or shrubs near the spot.—From the time of Jacob (Gen. xli. 1) till the conquest of the country we only catch a momentary glimpse of Beersheba in the lists of the cities in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 28) given to the tribe of Simeon (xix. 2; 1 Chr. iv. 28). Samuel’s sons were judges there (1 Sam. viii. 2). From Dan to Beersheba (Judg. xx. 1, &c.), or from Beersheba to Dan (1 Chr. xxi. 2; comp. 2 Sam. xxiv. 2), became the established formula for the whole of the promised land; just as “from Geba to B.” (2 K. xxiii. 8), or “from B. to Mount Ephraim” (2 Chr. xix. 4) was that for the southern kingdom after the disruption.

After the return from the Captivity the formula is narrowed still more, and becomes "from B. to the Valley of Hinnom" (Neh. xi. 30). From the incidental references of Amos, we find that, like Bethel and Gilgal, the place was in his time the seat of an idolatrous worship, apparently connected in some intimate manner with the northern kingdom (Am. v. 5, viii. 14). After this, with the mere mention that Beersheba and the villages round it were re-inhabited after the Captivity (Neh. xi. 30), the name dies entirely out of the Bible records. In the time of Jerome it was still a considerable place; and later it is mentioned as an episcopal city under the Bishop of Jerusalem. It only remains to notice that it retains its ancient name as nearly similar in sound as an Arabic signification will permit—Bir es-Sabâ—the "well of the lion," or "of seven."

Beesh terah, one of the two cities allotted to the sons of Gershon, out of the tribe of Manasseh beyond Jordan (Josh. xxi. 27). It appears to be identical with Ashtaroth (1 Chr. vi. 71).

Beetle. [LOCUST.]

Behheading. [PUNISHMENTS.]

Behemoth. There can be little or no doubt, that by this word (Job xl. 15-24) the hippopotamus is intended, since all the details descriptive of the behemoth accord entirely with the ascertained habits of that animal. Since in the first part of Jehovah's discourse (Job xxxviii., xxxix.) land animals and birds are mentioned, it suits the general purpose of that discourse better to suppose, that aquatic or amphibious creatures are spoken of in the last half of it; and since the leviathan, by almost universal consent, denotes the crocodile, the behemoth seems clearly to point to the hippopotamus, his associate in the Nile. The description of the animal's lying under "the shady trees," amongst the "reeds" and willows, is peculiarly applicable to the hippopotamus. It has been argued that such a description is equally applicable to the elephant; but this is hardly the case, for though the elephant is fond of frequent ablutions, and is frequently seen near water, yet the constant habit of the hippopotamus, as implied in verses 21, 22, seems to be especially made the subject to which the attention is directed.

Be'kah. [WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.]

Bel and Dragon. [DANIEL, APOCYPHAL ADDITIONS TO.]

Bela. 1. One of the five cities of the plain which was spared, at the intercession of Lot, and received the name of Zoar (Gen. xiv. 2, xix. 22). It lay on the southern extremity of the Dead Sea, on the frontier of Moab and Palestine (Jerome on Is. xv.), and on the route to Egypt; the connexion in which it is found, Is. xv. 5; Jer. xlviii. 34; Gen. xiii. 10. We first read of Bela in Gen. xiv. 2, 8. The king of Bela is the only one of the five confederates whose name is not given, and this suggests the probability of Bela having been his own name, as well as the name of his city, which may have been so called from him.—2. Son of Beor, who reigned over Edom in the city of Dinhabah, eight generations before Saul, king of Israel, or about the time of the Exodus. Bernard Hyde, following some Jewish commentators (Simon. Onomast. 142, note), identifies this Bela with Balaam the son of Beor; but the evidence from the name does not seem to prove more than identity of family and race. There is nothing which guide us as to the age of Beor, or Bosor, t of the house from which Bela and Balaam sprang. The name of Bela's ancestor Beor, is of a decidedly Chaldee or Aramean form; and we are expressly told that Balaam the son of Beor dwelt in Pethor, which is by the river of the land of the children of his people, i. e. the river Euphrates; and he himself describes his home as being in Aram (Num. xxii. 5, xxiii. 7). Hence it is not improbable that Bela the son of Beor, who reigned over Edom, was a Chaldean by birth, and reigned in Edom by conquest. He may have been contemporary with Moses and Balaam. The passage Gen. xxvi. 31-39. is given in duplicate 1 Chr. i. 43-51.—3. Eldest son of Benjamin, according to Gen. xli. 21 (A. V. "Belah"), Num. xxvi. 38, 40; 1 Chr. vii. 6, viii. 1, and head of the family of the BELAITES.—4. Son of Ahaz, a Reubenite (1 Chr. v. 8).

Belah. [BELA, 3.]

Bel'mus, 1 Esd. ii. 16. [BISHLAM.]

Belial. The translators of our A. V., following the Vulgate, have frequently treated this word as a proper name, and given it in the form Belial, in accordance with 2 Cor. vi. 15. This is particularly the case where it is connected with the expressions man of, or son of; in other instances it is translated wicked or some equivalent term (Deut. xv. 9; Ps. xli. 8, ci. 3; Prov. vi. 12, xvi. 27, xix. 28; Nah. i. 11, 15). There can be no question, however, that the word is not to be regarded as a proper name in the O. T.; its meaning is worthlessness, and hence recklessness, lawlessness. The expression son of man of Belial must be understood as meaning simply a worthless, lawless fellow: it occurs frequently in this sense in the historical books (Judg. xix. 22, xx. 13; 1 Sam. i. 16, ii. 12, x. 27, xxv. 17, 25, xxx. 22; 2 Sam. xvi. 7, xx. 1; 1 Chr. xii. 10; 2 Chr. xiii. 7), and only once in the earlier books (Deut. xiii. 13). In 2 Sam. xxiii. 6, and Job xxxiv. 18, Belial stands by itself, as a term of reproach. In the N. T. the term appears in the form Be'lal and not Be'lal, as given in the A. V. The term as used in 2 Cor. vi. 15 is generally understood as an appellative of Satan, as the personification of all that was bad: Bengel explains it of Antichrist, as more strictly the opposite of Christ.

Bellows. The word occurs only in Jer. vi. 29, "The bellows are burned;" where their use is to heat a smelting furnace. A picture of two different kinds of bellows, both of highly ingenious construction, may be found in Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. iii. 338. "They consisted," he says, "of a leather secured and fitted into a frame, from which a long pipe extended for carrying the wind to the fire. They were worked by the feet, the operator standing upon them, with one under each foot, and pressing them alternately while he pulled up each exhausted skin with a string he held in his hand. In one instance we observe from the painting, that when the man left the bellows, they were raised as if inflated with air; and this would imply a knowledge of the valve. The pipes even in the time of Thothmes II., [supposed to be] the contemporary of Moses, appear to have been simply of reed, tipped with a metal point to resist the action of the fire."

Bells. There are two words thus translated in the A. V., viz. pa'âmôn, Ex. xxviii. 33, and mëtsillôth, Zech. xiv. 20; A. V. marg. "bridles." In Ex. xxviii. 33 the bells alluded to were the golden ones, according to the Rabbis 72 in number, which alternated with the three-coloured pomegranates round the hem of the high-priest's ephod. The object of them was "that his sound might be heard when he went in unto the holy place, and when he came out, that he die not" (Ex. xxviii. 34; Eccles. xiv. 9). No doubt they answered the same purpose as the bells used by the Brahmîns in the Hindoo ceremonies, and by the Roman Catholics during the celebration of mass. To this day bells are frequently attached, for the sake of their pleasant sound, to the anklets of women. [ANKLET.] The little girls of Cairo wear strings of them round their feet. In Zech. xiv. 20 "bells of the horses" is probably a wrong rendering. It is more probable that they are not bells but concave or flat pieces of brass, which were sometimes attached to horses for the sake of ornament.

Bel'maim, a place which, from the terms of the passage, would appear to have been south of Dothan (Jud. vii. 3). Possibly it is the same as BELMEN.

Bel'men, a place named amongst the towns of Samaria, as lying between Bethhoron and Jericho (Jud. iv. 4).

Belshazzar, the last king of Babylon. According to the well-known narrative in Dan. v., he was slain during a splendid feast in his palace. Similarly Xenophon tells us that Babylon was taken by Cyrus in the night, while the inhabitants were engaged in feasting and revelry, and that the king was killed. On the other hand the narratives of Berosus in Josephus and of Herodotus differ from the above account in some important particulars. Berosus calls the last king of Babylon Nabonnedus or Nabonadius, and says that in the 17th year of his reign Cyrus took Babylon, the king having retired to the neighbouring city of Borsippus or Borsippa. Being blockaded in that city Nabonnedus surrendered, his life was spared, and a principality or estate given to him in Carmania, where he died. According to Herodotus the last king was called Labynetus, a name easy to reconcile with the Nabonnedus of Berosus, and the Nabonidochus of Megasthenes. Cyrus, after defeating Labynetus in the open field, appeared before Babylon, within which the besieged defied attack and even blockade. But he took the city by drawing off for a time the waters of the Euphrates, and then marching in with his whole army along its bed during a great Babylonian festival. These discrepancies have lately been cleared up by the discoveries of Sir Henry Rawlinson. From the inscriptions on some cylinders found at Um-Queer, it appears that the eldest son of Nabonnedus was called Bel-shar-azar, contracted into Belshazzar, and admitted by his father to a share in the government. In a communication to the Athenæum, No. 1377, Sir Henry Rawlinson says, "we can now understand how Belshazzar, as joint king with his father, may have been governor of Babylon, when the city was attacked by the combined forces of the Medes and Persians, and may have perished in the assault which followed; while Nabonnedus leading a force to the relief of the place was defeated, and obliged to take refuge in Borsippa, capitulating after a short resistance, and being subsequently assigned, according to Berosus, an honourable retirement in Carmania." In Dan. v. 2, Nebuchadnezzar is called the father of Belshazzar. This, of course, need only mean grandfather or ancestor. Rawlinson connects Belshazzar with Nebuchadnezzar through his mother, thinking it probable that Nabu-nahit would strengthen his position by marrying the daughter of that king, who would thus be Belshazzar's maternal grandfather. A totally different view is taken by Marcus Niebuhr, who considers Belshazzar to be another name for Evilmerodach, the son of Nebuchadnezzar. On Rawlinson's view, Belshazzar died B.C. 538; on Niebuhr's, B.C. 559.

Belteshazzar. [DANIEL.]

Ben, a Levite "of the second degree," one of the porters appointed by David for the ark (1 Chr. xv. 18).

Benaiah. 1. The son of Jehoiada the chief priest (1 Chr. xxvii. 5), and therefore of the tribe of Levi, though a native of Kabzeel (2 Sam. xxiii. 20; 1 Chr. xi. 22), in the south of Judah; set by David (1 Chr. xi. 25) over his bodyguard of Cherethites and Pelethites (2 Sam. viii. 18; 1 K. i. 38; 1 Chr. xvii. 17; 2 Sam. xx. 23) and occupying a middle rank between the first three of the "mighty men," and the thirty "valiant men of the armies" (2 Sam. xxiii. 22, 23; 1 Chr. xi. 25, xvii. 6). The exploits which gave him this rank are narrated in 2 Sam. xxiii. 20, 21; 1 Chr. xi. 22. He was captain of the host for the third month (1 Chr. xxvii. 5). Benaiah remained faithful to Solomon during Adonijah's attempt on the crown (1 K. i. 8, 10, 32, 38, 44); and was raised into the place of Joab as commander-in-chief of the whole army (ii. 35, iv. 4). He appears to have had a son, called after his grandfather, Jehoiada, who succeeded Ahithophel about the person of the king (1 Chr. xxvii. 34). But this is possibly a copyist's mistake for "Benaiah the son of Jehoiada."—2. BENAIAH the PIRATHONITE, an Ephraimite, one of David's thirty mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii. 30; 1 Chr.

xi. 31), and the captain of the eleventh monthly course (1 Chr. xxvii. 14).—3. A Levite in the time of David, who "played with a psaltery on Alamoth" (1 Chr. xv. 18, 20, xvi. 5).—4. A priest in the time of David, appointed to blow the trumpet before the ark (1 Chr. xv. 24, xvi. 6).—5. A Levite of the sons of Asaph (2 Chr. xx. 14).—6. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah, one of the "overseers of offerings" (2 Chr. xxxi. 13).—7. One of the "princes" of the families of Simeon (1 Chr. iv. 36).—8. Four laymen in the time of Ezra who had taken strange wives.—1 (Ezr. x. 25). [BANAIAS.]—2 (Ezr. x. 30). [NAIDUS.]—3 (x. 35) and 4 (x. 43). [BANAIAS.]—9. The father of Pelatiah, "a prince of the people" in the time of Ezekiel (xi. 1, 13).

Ben-am'mi, the son of the younger daughter of Lot, and progenitor of the Ammonites (Gen. xix. 38).

Bene-berak, one of the cities of the tribe of Dan, mentioned only in Josh. xix. 45. It is impossible to say whether the "sons of Berak" who gave their name to this place belonged to Dan, or were earlier settlers dispossessed by the tribe. No trace has been found of it.

Bene-ja'akan, a tribe who gave their name to certain wells in the desert which formed one of the halting-places of the Israelites on their journey to Canaan. [BEEROTH BENE-JAAKAN.] In Num. xxiii. 31, 32, the name is given in the shortened form of BENE-JAAKAN. The tribe doubtless derived its name from Jaakan, the son of Ezer son of Seir the Horite (1 Chr. i. 42), whose name is also given in Genesis (xxvi. 27) as AKAN.

Bene-ke'dem, "the children of the East," an appellation given to a people, or to peoples, dwelling to the east of Palestine. It occurs in Gen. xxix. 1; Job i. 3; Judg. vi. 3, 33, vii. 12, viii. 10. In the first three passages the Bene-kedem are mentioned together with the Midianites and the Amalekites; and in the fourth the latter peoples seem to be included in this common name. From Judg. vii. 11-15, it is to be inferred that they spoke a dialect intelligible to an Israelite: an inference bearing on an affinity of race, and thence on the growth of the Semitic languages. From 1 K. iv. 30 it is difficult to deduce an argument; but Is. xi. 14, Jer. xlix. 28, Ez. xxv. 4, 10, refer, apparently, to the habits of the wandering Arabs. From a consideration of these passages and of Gen. xxv. 6, we think that the term Bene-kedem primarily signified the peoples of the Arabian deserts, and chiefly the tribes of Ishmael and of Keturah, extending perhaps to Mesopotamia and Babylonia; and that it was sometimes applied to the Arabs and their country generally (Gen. x. 30).

Beneh'dad, the name of three kings of Damascus.—BENHADAD I. was either son or grandson to Rezon, and in his time Damascus was supreme in Syria. His alliance was courted both by Baasha of Israel and Asa of Judah. He finally closed with the latter on receiving a large amount of treasure, and conquered a great part of the N. of Israel, thereby enabling Asa to pursue his victorious operations in the S. From 1 K. xx. 34, it would appear that he continued to make war upon Israel in Omri's time, and forced him to make "streets" in Samaria for Syrian residents. [AHAB.] This date is B.C. 950.—BENHADAD II., son of the preceding, and also king of Damascus. Long wars with Israel characterised his reign, of which the earlier campaigns are described under AHAB. His power and the extent of his dominion are proved by the thirty-two vassal kings who accompanied him to his first siege of Samaria. Some time after the death of Ahab, Benhadad renewed the war with Israel, attacked Samaria a second time, and pressed the siege so closely that there was a terrible famine in the city. But the Syrians broke up in the night in consequence of a sudden panic. Soon after Benhadad fell sick, and sent Hazael to consult Elisha as to the issue of his malady. On the day after Hazael's return Benhadad was murdered, but not, as is commonly thought from a cursory reading of 2 K. viii. 15, by Hazael. Ewald thinks that one or more of Benhadad's own servants were the murderers. Benhadad's death was about B.C.

he must have reigned some 30 years.—BENHADAD III., son of Hazael, and his successor on the throne of Syria. His reign was d. Damascus, and the vast power wielded by him sank into insignificance. When he succeeded to the throne, Jehoash recovered the cities which Jehoahaz had lost to the Syrians, and beat him in Aphek (2 K. xiii. 17, 25). Jehoash gained two more victories, but did not restore the dominion of Israel on the E. of Jordan. This glory was reserved for his successor. The date of Benhadad III. is B.C. 840. His misfortunes in war are noticed by Amos i. 4.

Ben-ha'il, one of the princes whom king Jehoshaphat sent to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Chr. xvii. 7).

Ben-ha'nan, son of Shimon, in the line of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 20).

Beni'nu, a Levite; one of those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 13 [14]).

Benjamin. 1. The youngest of the children of Jacob, and the only one of the thirteen who was born in Palestine. His birth took place on the road between Bethel and Bethlehem, a short distance from the latter, and his mother Rachel died in the act of giving him birth, naming him with her last breath Ben-oni, "son of my sorrow." This was by Jacob changed into Benjamin (Gen. xxxv. 16-18). The name is worthy some attention. It has been interpreted to mean "Son of the right hand," i. e. fortunate, dexterous. On the other hand the Samaritan Codex gives the name in an altered form as בְּנִימִן, son of days, i. e. son of my old age (comp. Gen. xlv. 20), which is adopted by Philo, Aben-ezra, and others. In the adjectival forms of the word the first syllable is generally suppressed, as "sons of Yemini," for sons of Benjamin; "man of Yemini," for man of Benjamin (1 Sam. ix. 21; xxii. 7); "land of Yemini," for land of Benjamin (1 Sam. ix. 4); as if the patriarch's name had been originally Yamin (comp. Gen. xlv. 10), and that of the tribe Yeminites. Until the journeys of Jacob's sons and of Jacob himself into Egypt we hear nothing of Benjamin, and as far as he is concerned those well-known narratives disclose nothing beyond the very strong affection entertained towards him by his father and his whole-brother Joseph, and the relation in which he stood, as a mere darling child, to the whole of his family. Even the harsh nature of the elder patriarchs relaxed towards him. But Benjamin can hardly have been the "lad" which we commonly imagine him to be, for at the time that the patriarchs went down to reside in Egypt, when "every man with his house went with Jacob," ten sons are ascribed to Benjamin.—a larger number than to any of his brothers—and two of these, from the plural formation of their names, were themselves apparently families (Gen. xli. 21). Henceforward the history of Benjamin is the history of the tribe. And up to the time of the entrance on the Promised Land that history is as meagre as it is afterwards full and interesting. The proximity of Benjamin to Ephraim during the march to the Promised Land was maintained in the territories allotted to each. Benjamin lay immediately to the south of Ephraim and between him and Judah. The situation of this territory was highly favourable. It formed almost a parallelogram, of about 26 miles in length by 12 in breadth. Its eastern boundary was the Jordan, and from thence it extended to the wooded dis- of Kirjath-jearim, a point about eight miles from the valley of Hinnom, under the "Shoulder of the Jebusite" on the south, to Bethel on the north. Thus Dan intervened between Benjamin and the Philistines, while the communications with the valley of the Jordan were in their own power. On the south the territory ended abruptly with the steep slopes of the hill of Jerusalem,—on the north it melted imperceptibly into the possessions of the friendly Ephraim. The smallness of this district, hardly larger than the county of Middlesex, was, according to the testimony of Josephus, compensated for by the excellence of the land.—(1.) The general level of this part of Palestine is very high, not less than 2000 feet above the maritime plain of the Mediterranean on the one side, or than 3000 feet above the deep valley of the Jordan on the other, besides which this general level or plateau is surmounted, in the district now under consideration, by a large number of eminences, almost every one of which has borne some part in the history of the tribe.—(2.) No less important than these eminences are the torrent-beds and ravines by which the upper country breaks down into the deep tracts on each side of it. They formed then, as they do still, the only mode of access from either the plains of Philistia and of Sharon on the west, or the deep valley of the Jordan on the east.—The passes on the eastern side are of a much more difficult and intricate character than those on the western. The principal one, which, now unfrequented, was doubtless in ancient times the main ascent to the interior, leaves the Arabah behind the site of Jericho, and breaking through the barren hills with many a wild bend and steep slope, extends to and indeed beyond the very central ridge of the table-land of Benjamin, to the foot of the eminence on which stands the ruins of Bireh, the ancient Beeroh. Another of these passes is that which, since the time of our Saviour, has been the regular road between Jericho and Jerusalem, the scene of the parable of the Good Samaritan.—Such were the limits and such the character of the possession of Benjamin as fixed by those who originally divided the land. But it could not have been long before they extended their limits, since in the early lists of 1 Chr. viii. we find mention made of Benjamites who built Lod and Ono, and of others who were founders of Ajalon (12, 13), all which towns were beyond the spot named above as the westernmost point in their boundary. These places too were in their possession after the return from the Captivity (Neh. xi. 36).—The contrast between the warlike character of the tribe and the peaceful image of its progenitor comes out in many scattered notices. Benjamin was the only tribe which seems to have pursued archery to any purpose, and their skill in the bow (1 Sam. xx. 20, 36; 2 Sam. i. 22; 1 Chr. viii. 40, xii. 2; 2 Chr. xvii. 17) and the sling (Judg. xx. 16) are celebrated. Ehud the son of Gera accomplished his purpose on Eglon with less risk, owing to his proficiency in using his left hand, a practice apparently confined to Benjamites (Judg. iii. 15, and see xx. 16; 1 Chr. xii. 2). Baanah and Rechab, "the sons of Rimmon the Beerothite of the children of Benjamin," are the only Israelites west of the Jordan named in the whole history as captains of marauding predatory bands. The dreadful deed recorded in Judg. xix., though repelled by the whole country, was unhesitatingly adopted and defended by Benjamin with an obstinacy and spirit truly extraordinary. That frightful transaction was indeed a crisis in the history of the tribe: the six hundred who took refuge in the cliff Rimmon were the only survivors. A long interval must have elapsed since so abject a condition and the culminating point at which we next meet with the tribe. Several circumstances may have conduced to its restoration to that place which it was now to assume. The Tabernacle was at Shiloh in Ephraim during the time of the last Judge; but the Ark was in Benjamin at Kirjath-jearim. Ramah, the official residence of Samuel, and containing a sanctuary greatly frequented (1 Sam. ix. 12, &c.),—Mizpeh, where the great assemblies of "all Israel" were held (1 Sam. vii. 5),—Bethel, perhaps the most ancient of all the sanctuaries of Palestine, and Gibeon, specially noted as "the great high place" (1 K. iii. 4), were all in the land of Benjamin. The people who resorted to these various places must gradually have been accustomed to associate the tribe with power and sanctity. The struggles and contests which followed the death of Saul arose from the natural unwillingness of the tribe to relinquish its position at the head of the nation, especially in favour of Judah. Had it been Ephraim, the case might have been different, but Judah had as yet no connexion with the house of Joseph, and was besides the tribe of David, whom Saul had pursued with such unrelenting enmity. The tact and sound sense of Abner, however, succeeded in overcoming these difficulties. Still the insults of Shimei and the insurrection of Sheba are indications that the soreness still existed, and we do not hear of any cordial co-operation or firm union between the two tribes until the disruption of the kingdoms. The alliance was further strengthened by a covenant solemnly undertaken (2 Chr. xv. 9), and by the employment of Benjamites in high positions in the army of Judah (2 Chr. xvii. 17). But what above all must have contributed to strengthen the alliance was the fact that the Temple was the common property of both tribes. Henceforward the history of Benjamin becomes merged in that of the southern kingdom.—2. A man of the tribe of Benjamin, son of Bilhan, and the head of a family of warriors (1 Chr. vii. 10).—3. One of the "sons of Harim;" an Israelite in the time of Ezra, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 32).

Benjamin, high gate, or gate, of, Jer. xx. 2. xxxvii. 13, xxxviii. 7; Zech. xiv. 10. [JERU SALEM.]

Beno, a Levite of the sons of Merari (1 Chr. xiv. 26, 27).

Ben-oni, the name which the dying Rachel gave to her newly-born son, but which by his father was changed into BENJAMIN (Gen. xxxv. 18).

Ben-so'heth, a name occurring among the descendants of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 20).

Ben-on, a place on the east of Jordan (Num. xxxii. 3), doubtless a contraction of BAAL-MEON (comp. ver. 38).

Be-or. 1. The father of BELA, one of the early Edomite kings (Gen. xxvi. 32; 1 Chr. i. 43).—2. Father of Balaam (Num. xxii. 5, xxiv. 3, 15, xxxi. 8; Deut. xxiii. 4; Josh. xiii. 22, xxiv. 9; Mic. vi. 5). He is called BOSOR in the N. T.

Be-ra, king of Sodom at the time of the invasion of the five kings under Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv. 2; also 17 and 21).

Ber'achah, a Benjamite, who attached himself to David at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 3).

Ber'achah, Valley of, a valley in which Jehoshaphat and his people assembled to "bless" Jehovah after the overthrow of the hosts of Moabites, Ammonites, and Meunim, who had come against them, and which from that fact acquired its name of "the valley of blessing" (2 Chr. xx. 26). The name of Berekit still survives, attached to ruins in a valley of the same name lying between Tekoa and the main road from Bethlehem to Hebron.

Berachi'ah, a Gershonite Levite, father of Asaph the singer (1 Chr. vi. 39). [BERECHIAH.]

Berai'ah, son of Shimhi, a chief man of Benjamin (1 Chr. xlii. 21).

Bere'a. 1. A city of Macedonia, to which St. Paul retired with Silas and Timotheus, in the course of his first visit to Europe, on being persecuted in Thessalonica (Acts xvii. 10), and from which, on being again persecuted by emissaries from Thessalonica, he withdrew to the sea for the purpose of proceeding to Athens (ib. 14, 15). The community of Jews must have been considerable in Berea, and their character is described in very favourable terms (ib. 11). Sopater, one of St. Paul's missionary companions, was from this place (Acts xx. 4). Berea, now called Verria or Kara-Verria, is situated on the eastern slope of the Olympian mountain-range, commanding an extensive view of the plain of the Axios and Haliacmon, and has now 15,000 or 20,000 inhabitants. A few ancient remains, Greek, Roman, and Byzantine, still exist here.—2. The modern Aleppo, mentioned in 2 Macc. xiii. 4.—3. A place in Judea, apparently not very far from Jerusalem (1 Macc. ix. 4).

Berechi'ah. 1. One of the sons of Zerobabel, and a descendant of the royal family of Judah (1 Chr. iii. 20).—2. A man mentioned as the father of Meshullam who assisted in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 4, 30; vi. 18).—3. A Levite of the line of Elkanah (1 Chr. ix. 16).—4. A doorkeeper for the ark (1 Chr. xv. 23).—5. One of the chief men of the tribe of Ephraim in time of king Ahaz (2 Chr. xxviii. 12).—6. Father of Asaph the singer (1 Chr. xv. 17). [BERACHIAH].—7. Father of Zechariah the prophet (Zech. i. 1, 7).

Be-red. 1. A place in the south of Palestine, between which and Kadesh lay the well Lahai-roi (Gen. xvi. 14).—2. A son or descendant of Ephraim (1 Chr. vii. 20), possibly identical with Becher in Num. xxvi. 35, by a mere change of letters.

Berenice. [BERNICE.]

Be'ri, son of Zophah, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 36).

Beri'ah. 1. A son of Asher (Gen. xli. 17; Num. xxvi. 44, 45), from whom descended the "family of the Berites" (Num. xxvi. 44).—2. A son of Ephraim, so named on account of the state of his father's house when he was born (1 Chr. vii. 20-23). This short notice is of no slight historical importance; especially as it refers to a period of Hebrew history respecting which the Bible affords us no other like information. The event must be assigned to the time between Jacob's death and the beginning of the oppression. The indications that guide us are, that some of Ephraim's sons must have attained to manhood, and that the Hebrews were still free. There can be no doubt that the land in which the men of Gath were born is the eastern part of Lower Egypt, if not Goshen. At this time very many foreigners must have been settled in Egypt. Or else these men of Gath may have been mercenaries like the Cherethim (in Egyptian Shayratana) who were in the Egyptian service at a later time, as in David's, and to whom lands were probably allotted as to the native army.—3. A Benjamite. He and his brother Shema were ancestors of the inhabitants of Ajalon, and expelled the inhabitants of Gath (1 Chr. viii. 13, 16).—4. A Levite (1 Chr. xxiii. 10, 11).

Berites. [BERIAH, 1.]

Be'rites, the, a tribe or people who are named with Abel and Beth-maachah—and who were therefore doubtless situated in the north of Palestine—mentioned only as having been visited by Joab in his pursuit after Sheba the son of Bichri (2 Sam. xx. 14).

Be'rith, the god, Judg. ix. 46. [BAAL-BERITH.]

Bernice and Berenice, the eldest daughter of Herod Agrippa I. (Acts xii. 1, &c.). She was first married to her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis, and after his death (A.D. 48) she lived under circumstances of great suspicion with her own brother Agrippa II., in connexion with whom she is mentioned Acts xv. 13, 23, xvi. 30, as having visited Festus on his appointment as Procurator of Judaea. She was a second time married, to Polemon, king of Cilicia, but soon left him, and returned to her brother. She afterwards became the mistress of Vespasian, and of his son Titus.

Berodach-Bal'adan. 2 K. xx. 12. [MERO-DACH-BALADAN.]

Be'roth, 1 Esd. v. 19. [BEEROTH.]

Be'rothah, Be'rothai. The first of these two names, each of which occurs once only, is given by Ezekiel (xlvii. 16) in connexion with Hamath and Damascus as forming part of the northern boundary of the promised land. The second is mentioned (2 Sam. viii. 8) as the name of a city of Zobah taken by David, also in connexion with Hamath and Damascus. The well-known city Beirut (Berytus) naturally suggests itself as identical with one at least of the names; but in each instance the circumstances of the case seem to require a position further east. First regards Be'rothah and Be'rothm as distinct places, and identifies the first with Berytus.

Be'rothite, the (1 Chr. xi. 39). [BEEROTH.]

Beryl (tarshish), occurs in Ex. xxviii. 20, xxxix. 13; Cant. v. 14; Ez. i. 16, x. 9, xxviii. 13; Dan. x. 6. It is generally supposed that the tarshish derives its name from the place so called. There is little or nothing in the passages where the tarshish is mentioned to lead us to anything like a satisfactory conclusion as to its identity, excepting in Cant. v. 14, where we do seem to catch a glimmer of the stone denoted: "His hands are orbs of gold adorned with the tarshish stone." The orbs or rings of gold refer not to rings on the fingers, but to the fingers themselves, as they gently press upon the thumb and thus form the figure of an orb or a ring. The latter part of the verse is the causal expletive of the former. It is not only said in this passage that the hands are called orbs of gold, but the reason why they are thus called is immediately added—specially on account of the beautiful chrysolites with which the hands were adorned. Pliny says of the chrysolithos, "it is a transparent stone with a refugescence like that of gold." Since then golden stone, as the name imports, is admirably the above passage in Canticles, the ancient chrysolite or the modern yellow topaz appears to have a better claim than any other gem to represent the tarshish of the Hebrew Bible, certainly a better claim than the beryl of the A. V., a rendering which appears to be unsupported by any kind of evidence.

BETHANY.

To face p. 108

Berzelus, 1 Esd. v. 38. [BARZILLAI.]

Be'sai. "Children of Besai" were among the Nethinim who returned to Judaea with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 49; Neh. vii. 52). [BASTAI.]

Besodeiah, father of Meshullam, one of the repairers of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 6).

Be'sor, the brook, a torrent-bed or wady in the extreme south of Judah, of which mention occurs only in 1 Sam. xxx. 9, 10, 21. It must have been south of Ziklag, but hitherto the situation of neither town nor wady has been identified.

Be'tah, a city belonging to Hadadezer, king of Zobah, mentioned with Berothai (2 Sam. viii. 8). In the parallel account 1 Chr. xviii. 8, the name is called by an inversion of letters, Tibathath. Ewald pronounces the latter to be the correct reading, and compares it with Tebach (Gen. xxii. 24).

Betane, a place apparently south of Jerusalem (Jud. i. 9), and possibly identical with Bethanin of Eusebius, two miles from the Terebinth of Abraham and four from Hebron. This has been variously identified with Bethanath, Bethainun, and Betaneh or Ecbatana in Syria, placed by Pliny on Carmel.

Be'ten, one of the cities on the border of the tribe of Asher (Josh. xix. 25). By Eusebius it is said to have been then called Bebeten, and to have lain eight miles east of Ptolemais.

Beth, the most general word for a house or habitation. Strictly speaking it has the force of a settled dwelling, as in Gen. xxiii. 17, where the building of a "house" marks the termination of a stage of Jacob's wanderings; but it is also employed for a dwelling of any kind, even for a tent, as in Gen. xxiv. 32, Judg. xviii. 31, 1 Sam. i. 7. From this general force the transition was natural to a house in the sense of a family. Like Aedes in Latin, and Dom in German, Beth has the special meaning of a temple or house of worship.—Beth is more frequently employed in combination with other words to form the names of places than any other word. BETH-EKED, the "shearing house" (2 K. x. 12). It lay between Jezreel and Samaria, according to Jerome 15 miles from the town of Legio, and in the plain of Esdraelon. BETH-HAGGAN, "the garden-house" (2 K. ix. 27). It is doubtless the same place as ENGANNIN, "spring of gardens," the modern Jenin.

Beth-ab'ara, a place beyond Jordan, in which, according to the Received Text of the N. T., John was baptizing (John i. 28), apparently at the time that he baptized Christ (comp. ver. 29, 39, 35). If this reading be correct, Bethabara may be identical with Beth-barah, the ancient ford of Jordan, of which the men of Ephraim took possession after Gideon's defeat of the Midianites [BETH-BARAH]; or, which seems more likely, with Beth-nimrah, on the east of the river, nearly opposite Jericho. [BETH-NIMRAH.] But the oldest MSS. (A B) and the Vulgate have not Bethabara but Bethany.

Beth-anath, one of the "fenced cities" of Naphtali, named with Bethshemesh (Josh. xix. 38); from neither of them were the Canaanites expelled (Judg. i. 33). By Eusebius and Jerome it is spoken of as a village called Batanaea, 15 miles eastward of Caesarea.

Beth-anoth, a town in the mountainous district of Judah, named with Halhul, Bethzur, and others, in Josh. xv. 59 only. It is very probably the modern Beit-ainin.

Beth'any, a village which, scanty as are the notices of it contained in Scripture, is more intimately associated in our minds than perhaps any other place with the most familiar acts and scenes of the last days of the life of Christ. It was situated "at" (ἐν) the Mount of Olives (Mark xi. 1; Luke xix. 29), about fifteen stadia from Jerusalem (John xi. 18), on or near the usual road from Jericho to the city (Luke xix. 29, comp. i.; Mark xi. 1, comp. x. 46), and close by and west (?) of another village called BETHPHAGE, the two being several times mentioned together. Bethany is now known by a name derived from Lazarus—el-'Azariyeh or Lazarieh. It lies on the eastern slope of the Mount of Olives, fully a mile beyond the summit, and not very far from the point at which the road to Jericho begins its more sudden descent towards the Jordan valley. El-'Azariyeh is a ruinous and wretched village, a wild mountain hamlet of some twenty families. In the village are shown the traditional sites of the house and tomb of Lazarus. The house of Simon the leper is also exhibited. Beth-any has been commonly explained "House of Dates," but it more probably signifies "House of Misery."

Beth-arabah, one of the six cities of Judah which were situated down in the Arabah, the sunk valley of the Jordan and Dead Sea (Josh. xv. 61), on the north border of the tribe, and apparently between Beth-hoglar and the high land on the west of the Jordan valley (xv. 6). It is also included in the list of the towns of Benjamin (xviii. 22).

Beth-a'ram, accurately BETH-HARAM, one of the towns of Gad on the east of Jordan, described as in "the valley," Josh. xiii. 27, and no doubt the same place as that named BETH-HARAN in Num. xxxii. 36. Eusebius and Jerome report that in their day its appellation was Bethramphtha, and that, in honour of Augustus, Herod had named it Libias. Josephus's account is that Herod (Antipas), on taking possession of his tetrarchy, fortified Sephoris and the city of Betharamphtha, building a wall round the latter, and calling it Julias in honour of the wife of the emperor. Ptolemy gives the locality of Libias as 31° 26' lat. and 67° 10' long.

Beth-ar'bel, named only in Hos. x. 14, as the scene of a sack and massacre by Shalman. No clue is given to its position; it may be the ancient stronghold of Arbela in Galilee, or another place of the same name near Pella.

Beth-a-ven, a place on the mountains of Benjamin, east of Bethel (Josh. vii. 2, xviii. 12), and lying between that place and Michmash (1 Sam. xiii. 5, xiv. 23). In Hos. iv. 15, v. 8, x. 5, the name is transferred, with a play on the word very characteristic of this prophet, to the neighbouring Bethel—once the “house of God,” but then the house of idols, of “naught.”

Beth-arna-veth. Under this name is mentioned, in Neh. vii. 28 only, the town of Benjamin which is elsewhere called AZMAVETH, and BETH-SAMOS. Mr. Finn proposes to identify Azmaveth with Hizmah, a village on the hills of Benjamin to the S.E. of Jeba.

Beth-baal-me'on, a place in the possessions of Reuben, on the downs (A. V. “plain”) east of Jordan (Josh. xiii. 17). At the Israelites’ first approach its name was BAAL-MEON (Num. xxxii. 38, or in its contracted form, BEON, xxxii. 3), to which the Beth was possibly a Hebrew addition. Later it would seem to have come into possession of Moab, and to be known either as Beth-meon (Jer. xlviii. 23) or Baal-meon (Ez. xxv. 9). The name is still attached to a ruined place of considerable size, a short distance to the S.W. of Hesbān, and bearing the name of “the fortress of Mi’ūn,” or Maein, which appears to give its appellation to the Wadi Zerka Maein.

Beth-barah, named only in Judg. vii. 24, as a point apparently south of the scene of Gideon’s victory. Beth-barah derives its chief interest from the possibility that its more modern representative may have been Beth-abara where John baptized. It was probably the chief ford of the district.

Beth-ba’al, a town in which Jonathan and Simon Maccabaeus took refuge from Bacchides (1 Macc. ix. 62, 64). It was, probably, in the Jordan valley not far from Jericho.

Beth-bir’ei, a town of Simeon (1 Chr. iv. 31), which by comparison with the parallel list in Josh. xix. appears to have had also the name of BETH-LEBAOTH. It lay to the extreme south.

Beth-car, a place named as the point to which the Israelites pursued the Philistines (1 Sam. vii. 11), and therefore west of Mizpeh. From the expression “under Beth-car” it would seem that the place itself was on a height. Josephus says that the stone Ebenezer was set up here.

Beth-da’gon. 1. A city in the low country of Judah (Josh. xv. 41), and therefore not far from the Philistine territory, with which its name implies a connexion. Caphardagon existed as a very large village between Dio-polis (Lydda) and Jammaia in the time of Jerome.—2. A town apparently near the coast, named as one of the landmarks of the boundary of Asher (Josh. xix. 27). The name and the proximity to the coast, point to its being a Philistine colony.

Beth-diblatheim, a town of Moab (Jer. xlviii. 22), apparently the place elsewhere called ALMON-DIBLATHEIM.

Beth-el. 1. A well-known city and holy place of central Palestine. Of the origin of the name of Bethel there are two accounts extant. 1. It was bestowed on the spot by Jacob under the awe inspired by the nocturnal vision of God, when on his journey from his father’s house at Beersheba to seek his wife in Haran (Gen. xxviii. 19). The expression in the last paragraph of this account indicates a distinction between the early Canaanite “city” Luz, and the “place,” as yet a mere undistinguished spot, marked only by the “stone,” or the heap erected by Jacob to commemorate his vision.—2. But according, to the other account, Bethel received its name on the occasion of a blessing bestowed by God upon Jacob after his return from Padan-aram; at which time also (according to this narrative) the name of Israel was given him (Gen. xxxv. 14, 15).—Early as is the date involved in these narratives, yet, if we are to accept the precise definition of Gen. xii. 8, the name of Bethel would appear to have existed at this spot even before the arrival of Abram in Canaan: he removed from the oaks of Moreh to “the mountain on east of Bethel,” with “Bethel on the west; on the east.” Here he built an altar; and when he returned from Egypt with Lot before their separation (xiii. 3, 4).—In one thing, however, the above narratives all agree,—in omitting any mention of town or buildings at Bethel at that early period, and in drawing a marked distinction between the “city” of Luz and the consecrated “place” in its neighbourhood (comp. Gen. xxxv. 7). Even in the ancient chronicles of the conquest the two are still distinguished (Josh. xvi. 1, 2); and the appropriation of the name of Bethel to the city appears not to have been made till still later, when it was taken by the tribe of Ephraim; after which the name of Luz occurs no more (Judg. i. 22-26).—After the conquest Bethel is frequently heard of. In the troubled times when there was no king in Israel, it was to Bethel that the people went up in their distress to ask counsel of God (Judg. xx. 18, 26, 31, xxi. 2: A. V. “house of God”). Here was the ark of the covenant under the charge of Phinehas the grandson of Aaron (xx. 26-28, xxi. 4); and the mention of a regular road or causeway between it and the great town of Shechem is doubtless an indication that it was already in much repute. Later we find it named as one of the holy cities to which Samuel went in circuit (1 Sam. vii. 16). Here Jeroboam placed one of the two calves of gold, and built a “house of high places” and an altar of incense, by which he himself stood to burn; as we see him in the familiar picture of 1 K. xiii. Towards the end of Jeroboam’s life Bethel fell into the hands of Judah (2 Chr. xiii. 19). Elijah visited Bethel, and we hear of “sons of the prophets” as resident there (2 K. ii. 2, 3), two facts apparently incompatible with the active existence of the calf-worship. The mention of the bears so close to the town (iii. 23, 25), looks too as if the neighbourhood were not much frequented at that time. But, after the destruction of the Baal worship by Jehu, Bethel comes once more into view (2 K. x. 29). Under the descendants of this king the place and the worship must have greatly flourished; for by the time of Jeroboam II. the rude village was again a royal residence with a “king’s house” (Am. vii. 13).—How this prosperity came to its doom we are not told. After the desolation of the northern kingdom by the king of Assyria, Bethel still remained an abode of priests, who taught the wretched colonists “how to fear Jehovah,” “the God of the land” (2 K. xvii. 28, 27). In the account of Josiah’s iconoclasm we catch one more glimpse of the altar of Jeroboam, with its last loathsome fire of “dead men’s bones” burning upon it. It is curious that men of Bethel and Ai returned with Zerubabel

POOL OF BETHESDA.

(Ezr. ii. 28; Neh. vii. 32); and that they returned to their native place whilst continuing their relations with Nehemiah and the restored worship (Neh. xi. 31). In the Book of Esdras the name appears as BETOLUS. In later times Bethel is only named once, amongst the strong cities in Judaea which were repaired by Bacchides during the struggles of the times of the Maccabees (1 Macc. ix. 50).—Bethel receives a bare mention from Eusebius and Jerome in the Onomasticon, as 12 miles from Jerusalem on the right hand of the road to Sichem; and here its ruins still lie under the scarcely altered name of Boitha. They cover a space of three or four acres, upon the front of a low hill between the heads of two hollow ways which unite and run off into the main valley eastward. The round mount S.E. of Bethel must be "mountain" on which Abram built the altar (Gen. xii. 8).—2. A town in the south part of Judah, named in Josh. xii. 16, and 1 Sam. xxx. 27. By comparison of the lists of the towns of Judah and Simeon (Josh. xv. 30, xix. 4; 1 Chr. iv. 29, 30), the place appears under the names of CHESIL, BETHUL, and BETHUEL.—HIEL, THE BETHELITE, is recorded as the rebuilder of Jericho (1 K. xvi. 34).

Beth-emek, a place on or near the border of Asher, on the north side of which was the ravine of Jiphthah-el (Josh. xiv. 27). Robinson has discovered an 'Ankakh about 8 miles to the N. E. of Akha; but if his identification of Jefât with Jiphthah-el be tenable, the site of Beth-emek must be sought farther south than Ankakh.

Beth'er, the mountains of, Cant. ii. 17. There is no clue to guide us to what mountains are intended here.

Bethesda, the Hebrew name of a reservoir or tank, with five "porches," close upon the sheep-gate or "market" in Jerusalem (John v. 2). The porches—i. e. cloisters or colonnades—were extensive enough to accommodate a large number of sick and infirm people, whose custom it was to wait there for the "troubling of the water." Eusebius describes it as existing in his time as two pools, the one supplied by the periodical rains, while the water of the other was of a reddish colour, due, as the tradition then ran, to the fact that the flesh of the sacrifices was anciently washed there before offering. See, however, the comments of Lightfoot on this view, in his Exercit. on St. John v. 2. Eusebius's statement is partly confirmed by the Bourdeaux Pilgrim (A.D. 333). The large reservoir called the Birket Israel, within the walls of the city, close by St. Stephen's Gate, and under the north-east wall of the Haram area, is generally considered to be the modern representative of Bethesda. The little that can be said on the subject goes rather to confirm than to invalidate this tradition. One other proposed identification must be noticed, viz. that of Dr. Robinson (i. 342-3), who suggests the "fountain of the Virgin," in the valley of the Kedron, a short distance above the Pool of Siloam.

Beth-zel, a place named only in Mic. i. 11. From the context it was doubtless situated in the plain of Philistia.

Beth-gader, doubtless a place, though it occurs in the genealogies of Judah as if a person (1 Chr. ii. 51). Possibly the same as GEDER (Josh. xii. 13).

Beth-gamli, a town of Moab, in the downs east of Jordan (Jer. xlviii. 32, comp. 21); apparently a place of late date, since there is no trace of it in the earlier lists of Num. xxxii. 34-38, and Josh. xiii. 16-20. It has not been identified.

Beth-haccerem (Neh. iii. 14). From Jer. vi. 1, we find that it was used as a beacon-station, and that it was near Tekoa. In the time of Nehemiah (iii. 14) it had a ruler or prince. By Jerome a village named Bethacharna is said to have been on a mountain between Tekoa and Jerusalem, a position in which the eminence known as the Frank mountain (Herodium) stands conspicuous; and this has accordingly been suggested as Beth-haccerem.

Beth-ha-ran, one of the fenced cities on the east of Jordan, built by the Gadites (Num. xxxii. 36). It is no doubt the same place as BETH-ARAM, Josh. xii. 27.

Beth-hog'la, and hog'lah, a place on the border of Judah (Josh. xv. 6) and of Benjamin (xvii. 19, to which latter tribe it was reckoned to belong (xviii. 21). A magnificent spring and a ruin between Jericho and the Jordan still bear the names of Ain-hajla and K'asr Hajla, and are doubtless on or near the old site.

Beth-ho'ron, the name of two towns or villages, an "upper" and a "nether," (Josh. xvi. 3, 5; 1 Chr. vii. 24), on the road from Gibeon to Azekah (Josh. x. 10, 11) and the Philistine plain (1 Macc. iii. 24). Beth-horon lay on the boundary-line between Benjamin and Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 3, 5, and xviii. 13, 14), was counted to Ephraim (Josh. xxi. 22; 1 Chr. vii. 24), and given to the Kohathites (Josh. xxi. 22; 1 Chr. vi. 68 [53]). There is no room for doubt that the two Bethhorons still survive in the modern villages of Beit-ur, et-tahta and el-foka, which were first noticed by Dr. Clarke. Besides the similarity of the name, and the fact that the two places are still designated as "upper" and "lower," all the requirements of the narrative are fulfilled in this identification. The importance of the road on which the two Beth-horons are situated, the main approach to the interior of the country from the hostile districts on both sides of Palestine, at once explains and justifies the frequent fortification of these towns at different periods of the history (1 K. ix. 17; 2 Chr. viii. 5; 1 Macc. ix. 50; Jud. iv. 4, 5). From Gibeon to the upper Beth-horon is a distance of about 4 miles of broken ascent and descent. The ascent, however, predominates, and this therefore appears to be the "going up" to Beth-horon which formed the first stage of Joshua's pursuit. With the upper village the descent commences; the road rough and difficult even for the mountain-paths of Palestine. This rough descent from the upper to the lower Beitar is the "going down to Bethhoron" of the Bible narrative.

Beth-jesh'imoth, or -jes'imoth, a town or place east of Jordan, on the lower level at the south end of the Jordan valley (Num. xxxiii. 49); and named with Ashdodth-pisgah and Beth-peor. It was one of the limits of the encampment of Israel before crossing the Jordan. Later it was allotted to Reuben (Josh. xii. 8, xiii. 20), but came at last into the hands of Moab, and formed one of the cities which were "the glory of the country" (Ez. xxv. 9). Schwarz (228) quotes "a Beth-jisimuth as still known at the north-easternmost point of the Dead Sea, half a mile from the Jordan;" but this requires confirmation.

Beth-leb'aoth, a town in the lot of Simeon (Josh. xix. 6), and therefore in the extreme south.

of Judah (xv. 32, Lebaoth). In the parallel list in 1 Chr. iv. 31 the name is given BETH-BIREI.

Beth-lehem. 1. One of the oldest towns in Palestine, already in existence at the time of Jacob's return to the country. Its earliest name was EPHRATH or EPHRATAH (see Gen. xxxv. 16, 19, xlviii. 7; Josh. xv. 59, LXX.), and it is not till long after the occupation of the country by the Israelites that we meet with it under its new name of Bethlehem. The ancient name lingered in the mouths of the inhabitants of the place (Ruth i. 2, iv. 11; 1 Sam. xvii. 12), and in the poetry of the Psalmists and Prophets (Ps. cxxxii. 6; Mic. v. 2) to a late period. After the conquest Bethlehem appears under its own name Bethlehem-judah (Judg. xvii. 7; 1 Sam. xvii. 12; Ruth i. 1, 2), possibly, though hardly probably, to distinguish it from the small and remote place of the same name in Zebulun. Though not named as a Levitical city, it was apparently a residence of Levites, for from it came the young man Jonathan, the son of Gershom, who became the first priest of the Danites at their new northern settlement (Judg. xvii. 7, xviii. 30), and from it also came the concubine of the other Levite whose death at Gibeah caused the destruction of the tribe of Benjamin (xix. 1-9). The Book of Ruth is a page from the domestic history of Bethlehem: the names, almost the very persons, of the Bethlehemites are there brought before us; we are allowed to assist at their most peculiar customs, and to witness the very springs of those events which have conferred immortality on the name of the place. The elevation of David to the kingdom does not appear to have affected the fortunes of his native town.—The residence of Saul acquired a new title specially from him (2 Sam. xxi. 6), but David did nothing to dignify Bethlehem, or connect it with himself. The only touch of recollection which he manifests for it, is that recorded in the well-known story of his sudden longing for the water of the well by the gate of his childhood (2 Sam. xxiii. 15).—The few remaining casual notices of Bethlehem in the Old Testament may be quickly enumerated. It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chr. xi. 6). By the time of the captivity, the Inn of Chimham by Bethlehem appears to have become the recognised point of departure for travellers to Egypt (Jer. xli. 17)—a caravanserai or khan, perhaps the identical one which existed there at the time of our Lord, like those which still exist all over the East at the stations of travellers. Lastly, "Children of Bethlehem," to the number of 123, returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezr. ii. 21; Neh. vii. 26).—In the New Testament Bethlehem retains its distinctive title of Bethlehem-judah (Matt. ii. 1, 5), and once, in the announcement of the Angels, the "city of David" (Luke i. 4; comp. John vii. 42). The passages just quoted, and the few which follow, exhaust the references to it in the N. T. (Matt. ii. 6, 8, 16; Luke ii. 15). After this nothing is heard of it till near the middle of the 2nd century, when Justin Martyr speaks of our Lord's birth as having taken place "in a certain cave very close to the village." There is nothing in itself improbable in the supposition that the place in which Joseph and Mary took shelter, and where was the "manger" or "stall," was a cave in the limestone rock of which the eminence of Bethlehem is composed. But the step from the belief that the Nativity may have taken place in a cavern, to the belief that the present subterraneous vault or crypt is that cavern is a very wide one. The emperor Hadrian, amongst other desecrations, had actually planted a grove of Adonis at the spot. This grove remained at Bethlehem for no less than 180 years, viz., from A.D. 135 till 315. After this the place was purged of its abominations by Constantine, who, about A.D. 330, erected the present church. The modern town of Beit-lahm lies to the E. of the main road from Jerusalem to Hebron, 6 miles from the former. It covers the E. and N.E. parts of the ridge of a long grey hill of Jura limestone, which stands nearly due E. and W., and is about a mile in length. The hill has a deep valley on the N. and another on the S. On the top lies the village in a kind of irregular triangle, at about 150 yards from the apex of which and separated from it by a vacant space extreme eastern part of the ridge, spreads the Basilica of St. Helena, "half church, half fort," now embraced by its three convents, Greek, Latin, and Armenian. One fact, of great interest, is associated with a portion of the crypt of this church, namely, that here, "beside what he believed to be the cradle of the Christian faith," St. Jerome lived for more than 30 years, leaving a lasting monument of his sojourn in the Vulgate translation of the Bible.—The population of Beit-lahm is about 3000 souls, entirely Christians. All travellers remark the good looks of the women, the substantial clean appearance of the houses, and the general air of comfort (for an eastern town) which prevails.—2. A town in the portion of Zebulun named nowhere but in Josh. xix. 15. It has been recovered by Dr. Robinson at Beit Lahm, about six miles west of Nazareth, and lying between that town and the main road from Akka to Gaza.

Bethlo'mon, 1 Esd. v. 17. [BETHLEHEM, 1.] Beth-ma'achah, a place named only in 2 Sam. xx. 14, 15, and there occurring more as a definition of the position of ABEL than for itself. In the absence of more information, we can only conclude that it is identical with MAACHATH, or ARAM-MAACHATH, one of the petty Syrian kingdoms in the north of Palestine (comp. 2 K. xv. 29).

Beth-mar'caboth, "house of the chariots," one of the towns of Simeon, situated to the extreme south of Judah, with Ziklag and Hormah (Josh. xix. 5; 1 Chr. iv. 31). In the parallel list, Josh. xv. 30, 31, Madmannah occurs in place of Beth-marcaboth; possibly the latter was substituted for the former after the town had become the resort of chariots.

Beth-me'on, Jer. xlviii. 23. A contracted form of the name elsewhere given as BETH-BAAL-MEON.

Beth-nim'rah, one of the fenced cities on the East of the Jordan taken and built by the tribe of Gad (Num. xxxii. 36) and described as lying in the valley beside Beth-haran (Josh. xiii. 27). In Num. xxxii. 3 it is called simply NIMEAH. The name still survives in the Nahr Nimrin, the Arab appellation of the lower end of the Wady Shoab, where the waters of that valley discharge themselves into the Jordan close to one of the regular fords a few miles above Jericho.

Beth'oron, i. e. BETHORON (Jud. iv. 4).

Beth-pa'let, a town among those in the extreme south of Judah, named in Josh. xv. 27, and Neh. xi. 26, with Moladah and Beersheba. In the latter place it is BETHPIELET. Its remains have not yet been discovered.

Beth-paz'es, a town of Issachar, named with

BETHLEHEM.

To face p' 113.

En-Juddah (Josh. xix. 21), and of which nothing is known.

Beth-peor, a place, no doubt dedicated to the god Baal-peor, on the east of Jordan, opposite Jericho, and six miles above Libias or Beth-haran. It was in the possession of the tribe of Reuben (Josh. xiii. 20). One of the last halting-places of the children of Israel is designated—"the ravine over against Beth-peor" (Deut. xiii. 29, iv. 46).

Beth-phage, the name of a place on the mount of Olives, on the road between Jericho and Jerusalem. From the two being twice mentioned together, it was apparently close to BETHANY (Matt. xxi. 1; Mark xi. 1; Luke xix. 29), and from its being named first of the two in the narrative of a journey from east to west, it may be presumed that it lay, if anything, to the eastward of Bethany. No remains however which could answer to this position have been found, and the traditional site is above Bethany, halfway between that village and the top of the mount. Schwarz (263, 4), and Barclay, in his map, appear to agree in placing Bethphage on the southern shoulder of the "Mount of Offence," above the village of Siloam, and therefore west of Bethany.

Beth-phel'et, Neh. xi. 26. [BETH-PALET.]

Beth'-rapha, a name which occurs in the genealogy of Judah as the son of Esh-ton (1 Chr. iv. 12).

Beth-rehob, a place mentioned as having near it the valley in which lay the town of Laish or Dan (Judg. xviii. 28). It was one of the little kingdoms of Aram or Syria (2 Sam. x. 6). In ver. 8 the name occurs in the shorter form of Rehob, in which form it is doubtless again mentioned in Num. xiii. 21. The conjecture of Robinson (iii. 371) is that this ancient place is represented by the modern Hûnin, a fortress commanding the plain of the Hûleh, in which the city of Dan (Tell el-Kady) lay.

Beth-saïda. 1. "Bethsaida of Galilee" (John xii. 21), a city which was the native place of Andrew, Peter, and Philip (John i. 44, xii. 21) in the land of Gennesareth (Mark vi. 45; comp. 53), and therefore on the west side of the lake. It was evidently near to Capernaum, and Chorazin (Matt. xi. 21; Luke x. 13; and comp. Mark vi. 45, with John vi. 16), and, if the interpretation of the name is to be trusted, close to the water's edge. Dr. Robinson places Bethsaida at 'Ain et-Tubiyah, a short distance north of Khan Minyeh, which he identifies with Capernaum (iii. 359).—2. By comparing the narratives in Mark vi. 31-53, and Luke ix. 10-17, in the latter of which Bethsaida is named as the spot at which the miracle took place, while in the former the disciples are said to have crossed the water from the scene of the event "to Bethsaida in the land of Gennesareth," it appears certain that the Bethsaida at which the 5000 were fed must have been a second place of the same name on the east of the lake. Such a place there was at the north-eastern extremity, formerly a village, but rebuilt and adorned by Philip the Tetrarch, and raised to the dignity of a town under the name of Julias, after the daughter of the emperor. Here in a magnificent tomb Philip was buried. Of this Bethsaida we have certainly one and probably two mentions in the Gospels:—1. That named above, of the feeding of the 5000 (Luke ix. 10).—2. The other, most probably, in Mark viii. 22.

CON. D. B.

Beth'-samos, 1. Ed. v. 18. [BETH-SAM-VETH.]

Beth'san (1 Macc. v. 52; xii. 40, 41). [BETH-SHEAN.]

Beth'shan (1 Sam. xxxi. 10, 12; 2 Sam. xxi. 12). [BETHSHEAN.]

Beth'-shean, or in Samuel, BETHSHAN, a city, which, with its "daughter" towns, belonged to Manasseh (1 Chr. vii. 29), though within the limits of Issachar (Josh. xvii. 11), and therefore on the west of Jordan (comp. 1 Macc. v. 52)—but not mentioned in the lists of the latter tribe. The Canaanites were not driven out from the town (Judg. i. 27). In Solomon's time it seems to have given its name to a district extending from the town itself to Abel-meholah; and "all Bethshean" was under charge of one of his commissariat officers (1 K. iv. 12). The corpses of Saul and his sons were fastened up to the wall of Bethshean by the Philistines (1 Sam. xxxi. 10, 12) in the open "street" or space, which—then as now—fronted the gate of an eastern town (2 Sam. xxi. 12). In connexion with the exploits of the Maccabees it is mentioned more than once in a cursory manner (1 Macc. v. 52; comp. 1 Macc. xii. 40, 41). The name of Scythopolis appears for the first time in 2 Macc. xii. 29. [SCYTHOPOLIS.] This name has not survived to the present day; and the place is still called Beisân. It lies in the Ghôr or Jordan valley, about twelve miles south of the sea of Galilee, and four miles west of the Jordan.

Beth-shem'esh. 1. One of the towns which marked the north boundary of Judah (Josh. xv. 10), but not named in the lists of the cities of that tribe. It was in the neighbourhood of Kirjath-jearim and Timnah, and therefore in close proximity to the low-country of Philistia. Beth-shemesh was allotted to the priests (Josh. xxi. 16; 1 Chr. vi. 59); and it is named in one of Solomon's commissariat districts (1 K. iv. 9). By comparison of the lists in Josh. xv. 10, xix. 41, 43, and 1 K. iv. 9, it will be seen that IR-SHEMESHI, "city of the sun," must have been identical with Beth-shemesh, Ir being probably the older form of the name. Beth-shemesh is now 'Ain-Shems, about two miles from the great Philistine plain, and seven from Ekron.—2. A city on the border of Issachar (Josh. xix. 22).—3. One of the "fenced cities" of Naphtali, twice named (Josh. xix. 38; Judg. i. 33), and on both occasions with BETH-ANATH.—4. By this name is once mentioned (Jer. xliii. 13) an idolatrous temple or place in Egypt. In the middle ages Heliopolis was still called by the Arabs Ain Shems.

Beth'-shittah, one of the spots to which the flight of the host of the Midianites extended after their discomfiture by Gideon (Judg. vii. 22). Both the narrative and the name require its situation to be somewhere near the river.

Beth-su'ra, 1 Macc. iv. 29, 61; vi. 7, 26, 81, 49, 50; ix. 52; x. 14; xi. 65; xiv. 7; 2 Macc. xi. 5; xliii. 19, 22. [BETH-ZUR.]

Beth-tappu'ah, one of the towns of Judah, in the mountainous district, and near Hebron (Josh. xv. 53; comp. 1 Chr. ii. 43). Here it has actually been discovered by Robinson under the modern name of Tefûh, 1½ hour, or say 5 miles, W. of Hebron, on a ridge of high table-land.

Beth'uel, the son of Nahor by Milcah; nephew of Abraham, and father of Rebekah (Gen. xxii. 22, 23; xiv. 15, 24, 47; xxviii. 2). In xxv. 20, and xviii. 5, he is called "Bethuel the Syrian." Though often referred to as above in the narrative, Bethuel only appears in person once (xxiv. 50). Upon this an ingenious conjecture is raised by Prof. Blunt (Coincidences, I. §iv.) that he was the subject of some imbecility or other incapacity.

Beth'ual, 1 Chr. iv. 30. [BETHUEL.]

Beth'ul, a town of Simeon in the south, named with El-tolad and Hormah (Josh. xix. 4). In the parallel lists in Josh. xv. 30, and 1 Chr. iv. 29, the name appears under the forms of CHESIL and BETHUEL; and probably also under that of Bethel in Josh. xii. 16; since, for the reasons urged under BETHEL, and also on account of the position of the name in this list, the northern Bethel can hardly be intended.

Bethu'lia, the city which was the scene of the chief events of the Book of Judith, in which book only the name occurs. Its position is there described with very minute detail. It was near to Dothaim (iv. 6), on a hill which overlooked the plain of Esdraelon (vi. 11, 13, 14, vii. 7, 10, xiii. 10) and commanded the passes from that plain to the hill country of Manasseh (iv. 7, vii. 1), in a position so strong that Holofernes abandoned the idea of taking it by attack, and determined to reduce it by possessing himself of the two springs or wells which were "under the city," in the valley at the foot of the eminence on which it was built, and from which the inhabitants derived their chief supply of water (vi. 11, vii. 7, 13, 21). Notwithstanding this detail, however, the identification of the site of Bethulia has hitherto defied all attempts, and is one of the greatest puzzles of sacred geography. Von Raumer (Pal. 135, 6) suggests Sanûr, which is perhaps the nearest to probability. It is about three miles from Dothan, and some six or seven from Jenin (Engannim), which stand on the very edge of the great plain of Esdraelon.

Beth-zachari'as. [BATH-ZACHARIAS.]

Beth-zur, a town in the mountains of Judah, named between Halhul and Gedor (Josh. xv. 58). Bethzur would appear from 1 Chr. ii. 45 to have been founded by the people of Maon, and was probably fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chr. xi. 7). After the captivity the people of Beth-zur assisted Nehemiah in the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 16). In the wars of the Maccabees, Bethzur, or Bethsura, played an important part. The recovery of the site of Bethzur, under the almost identical name of Deit-sûr, explains its impregnability, and also the reason for the choice of its position, since it commands the road from Beersheba and Hebron, which has always been the main approach to Jerusalem from the south.

Bethu'lia, 1 Esd. v. 21. [BETHUEL.]

Betomes'tham and Betomas'them, a town "over against Esdraelon, facing the plain that is near Dothaim" (Jud. iv. 6, xv. 4). No attempt to identify it has been hitherto successful.

Bet'onim, a town in the inheritance of the children of Gad, apparently on their northern boundary (Josh. xiii. 26).

Betrothing. [MARRIAGE.]

Ben'lah, "married," the name which the land of Israel is to bear, when "the land shall be married." (Is. lxii. 4).

Be'sai, "Children of Bezaï," to the number of 323, returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 17; Neh. vii. 23). The name occurs again among those who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 18).

Bez'aleel. 1. The artificer to whom was confided by Jehovah the design and execution of the works of art required for the tabernacle in the wilderness (Ex. xxxi. 1-6). His charge was chiefly in all works of metal, wood, and stone. Bezaleel was of the tribe of Judah, the son of Uri the son of Hur.—2. One of the sons of Pahath-moab who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 30); called SESTHEL in 1 Esd.

Be'zek. 1. The residence of Adoni-bezek, i. e. the "lord of Bezek" (Judg. . . 5); in the lot of Judah (verse 3), and inhabited by Canaanites and Perizzites (verse 4). This must have been a distinct place from—2. Where Saul numbered the forces of Israel and Judah before going to the relief of Jabesh-Gilead (1 Sam. xi. 8). This cannot have been more than a day's march from Jabesh; and was therefore doubtless somewhere in the centre of the country, near the Jordan valley. No identification of either place has been made in modern times.

Be'zer in the wilderness, a city of the Reubenites, with suburbs, set apart by Moses as one of the three cities of refuge in the downs on the east of the Jordan, and allotted to the Merarites (Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xx. 8, xxi. 36; 1 Chr. vi. 78).

Be'zer, son of Zophai, one of the heads of the houses of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 37).

Be'zeth, a place at which Bacchides encamped after leaving Jerusalem (1 Macc. vi. 19). By Josephus the name is given as "the village Beth-zetho." The name may thus refer either to the main body of the Mount of Olives, or to that branch of it to the north of Jerusalem, which at a later period was called Bezetha.

Bi'atas, 1 Esd. ix. 48. [PELAIAS.]

Bible.—I. The application of this word to the collected books of the Old and New Testament is not to be traced further back than the 5th century. Greek writers enumerate τὰ βιβλία of the Old and New Testament; and as these were contrasted with the apocryphal books circulated by heretics, there was a natural tendency to the appropriation of the word as limited by the article to the whole collection of the canonical Scriptures. The liturgical use of the Scriptures, as the worship of the Church became organised, would naturally favour this application. The MSS. from which they were read would be emphatically the books of each church or monastery. And when this use of the word was established in the East, it was natural that it should pass gradually to the Western Church. It is however worthy of note, as bearing on the history of the word in our own language, and on that of its reception in the Western Church, that "Bible" is not found in Anglo-Saxon literature. In R. Brune (p. 290), Piers Ploughman (1916, 4271), and Chaucer (Prolog. 437), it appears in its distinctive sense. From that time the higher use prevailed to the exclusion of any lower; and the choice of it, rather than of any of its synonyms, by the great translators of the Scriptures, Wyclif, Luther, Coverdale, fixed it beyond all possibility of a change.

—II. The history of the growth of the collections known as the Old and New Testament respectively, will be found fully under CANON. It falls within the scope of the present article to indicate in what way and by what steps the two came to be looked on as co-ordinate authority, and therefore as parts of one whole—how, i. e. the idea of a completed Bible, even before the word came into use, presented itself to the minds of men. As regards a large portion of the writings of the New Testament it is not too much to say that they claim an authority not lower, nay even higher than the Old. That which had not been revealed to the "prophets" of the Old dispensation is revealed to the prophets of the new (Eph. iii. 5). The Apostles write as having the Spirit of Christ (1 Cor. vii. 40), as teaching and being taught "by the revelation of Jesus Christ" (Gal. i. 12). The writing of a man who spoke as inspired, could not fail to be regarded as participating in the inspiration. It is part of the development of the same feeling that the earliest records of the worship of the Christian Church indicate the liturgical use of some at least of the writings of the New, as well as of the Old Testament. Theophilus of Antioch, Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, all speak of the New Testament writings as making up with the Old the whole of Scripture.—III. The existence of a collection of sacred books recognised as authoritative, leads naturally to a more or less systematic arrangement. The Prologue to Ecclesiasticus mentions "the law and the prophets and the other Books." In the N. T. there is the same kind of recognition. "The Law and the Prophets" is the shorter (Matt. xi. 13, xxii. 40; Acts xiii. 15, &c.); "the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms" (Luke xxiv. 44), the fuller statement of the division popularly recognised. The arrangement of the books of the Heb. text under these three heads, requires however a further notice.—1. The Torah, νόμος, naturally continued to occupy the position which it must have held from the first as the most ancient and authoritative portion. The marked distinctness of the five portions which make up the Torah shows that they must have been designed as separate books, and when the Canon was completed, and the books in their present form made the object of study, names for each book were wanted and were found. In the Hebrew classification the titles were taken from the initial words, or prominent words in the initial verse; in that of the LXX. they were intended to be significant of the subject of each book.—2. The next group presents a more singular combination. The arrangement stands as follows:—

Elder.....	{	Joshua. Judges. 1 & 2 Samuel. 1 & 2 Kings.
Nebiim.
Prophets.	{	Greater.... { Isaiah. Jeremiah. Ezekiel.
Later.....
	{	Lesser..... { The twelve minor Prophets.

—the Hebrew titles of these books corresponding to those of the English bibles. The grounds on which books simply historical were classed under the same name as those which contained the teaching of the prophets, in the stricter sense of the word, are not at first sight obvious, but the O. T. presents some facts which may suggest an explanation. The Sons of the Prophets (1 Sam. x. 5; 2 K. v. 22, vi. 1) living together as a society, almost as a caste (Am. vii. 14), trained to a religious life, cultivating sacred minstrelsy, must have occupied a position as instructors of the people, even in the absence of the special calling which sent them as God's messengers to the people. A body of men so placed, become naturally, unless intellectual activity is absorbed in asceticism, historians and annalists.

The references in the historical books of the O. T. show that they actually were so. Nathan the prophet, Gad, the seer of David (1 Chr. xxix. 29), Ahijah and Iddo (2 Chr. ix. 29), Isaiah (2 Chr. xxvi. 22, xxxii. 32), are cited as chroniclers.—3. Last in order came the group known as Cethubim, γραφεία ἡγύγραφα, including the remaining books of the Hebrew Canon, arranged in the following order, and with subordinate divisions: (a) Psalms, Proverbs, Job. (b) The Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther—the five rolls. (c) Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, 1 and 2 Chronicles.—The history of the arrangement of the Books of the New Testament presents some variations, not without interest, as indicating differences of feeling or modes of thought. The four Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles uniformly stand first. They are so far to the New what the Pentateuch was to the Old Testament. The position of the Acts as an intermediate book, the sequel to the Gospels, the prelude to the Epistles, was obviously a natural one. After this we meet with some striking differences. The order in the Alexandrian, Vatican and Ephraem MSS. (A B C) gives precedence to the Catholic Epistles, and this would appear to have been characteristic of the Eastern Churches. The Western Church on the other hand, as represented by Jerome, Augustine, and their successors, gave priority of position to the Pauline Epistles. The Apocalypse, as might be expected from the peculiar character of its contents, occupied a position by itself. Its comparatively late recognition may have determined the position which it has uniformly held as the last of the Sacred Books.—IV. Division into Chapters and Verses.—The Hebrew of the Old Testament. It is hardly possible to conceive of the liturgical use of the books of the Old Testament, without some kinds of recognised division. The references however in Mark xii. 26 and Luke xv. 37, Rom. xi. 2 and Acts viii. 32, indicate a division which had become familiar, and show that some at least of the sections were known popularly by titles taken from their subjects. In like manner the existence of a cycle of lessons is indicated by Luke iv. 17; Acts xiii. 15, xv. 21; 2 Cor. iii. 14. The Talmudic division is on the following plan. The law was in the first instance divided into fifty-four Parshioth, or sections, so as to provide a lesson for each Sabbath in the Jewish intercalary year. Co-existing with this there was a subdivision into lesser Parshioth. The lesser Parshioth themselves were classed under two heads—the open (Pethuchoth) which served to indicate a change of subject analogous to that between two paragraphs in modern writing, and began accordingly a fresh line in the MSS., and the shut (Sethumoth), which corresponded to minor divisions, and were marked only by a space within the line. A different terminology was employed for the Prophetæ Priores and Posteriores, and the division was less uniform. The name of the sections in this case was Haphtaroth. They were intended to correspond with the larger Parshioth of the Law, but the traditions of the German and the Spanish Jews present a considerable diversity in the length of the divisions. Of the traditional divisions of the Hebrew Bible however that which has exercised most influence in the received arrangement of the text, was the subdivision of the larger sections into verses (Pesukim). These do not appear to have been used till the post-Talmudic revision of the text by the Masoretes of the 9th century. The chief facts that remain to be stated as to the verse divisions of the Old Testament are, that it was adopted by Stephens in his edition of the Vulgate, 1555, and by Frellon in that of 1566; that it appeared for the first time in an English translation, in the Geneva Bible of 1560, and was thence transferred to the Bishops' Bible of 1568, and the Authorised Version of 1611. In Coverdale's Bible we meet with the older notation, which was in familiar use for other books, and retained in some instances (e. g. in references to Plato), to the present times. The letters A B C D are placed at equal distances in the margin of each page, and the reference is made to the page (or, in the case of Scripture, to the chapter) and the letter accordingly. As regards the Old Testament, the present arrangement grows out of the union of Cardinal Hugo's caputular division and the Masoretic verses. The Apocryphal books, to which of course no Masoretic division was applicable, did not receive a versicular division till the Latin edition of Pagninus in 1528, nor the division now in use till Stephens's edition of the Vulgate in 1545. The history of the New Testament presents some additional facts of interest. Here, as in the case of the Old, the system of notation grew out of the necessities of study. The comparison of the Gospel narratives gave rise to attempts to exhibit the harmony between them. Of these, the first of which we have any record, was the Diutessaron of Tatian in the 2nd century. This was followed by a work of like character from Ammonius of Alexandria in the 3rd. The system adopted by Ammonius, however, was practically inconvenient. The search after a more convenient method of exhibiting the parallelisms of the Gospels led Eusebius of Caesarea to form the ten Canons which bear his name, and in which the sections of the Gospels are classed according as the fact narrated is found in one Evangelist only, or in two or more. The Epistles of St. Paul were first divided in a similar manner by the unknown Bishop to whom Euthalius assigns the credit of it (circa 396), and he himself, at the instigation of Athanasius, applied the method of division to the Acts and the Catholic Epistles. Andrew, bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, completed the work by dividing the Apocalypse (circa 500). With the New Testament, however, as with the Old, the division into chapters adopted by Hugh de St. Cher superseded those that had been in use previously, appeared in the early editions of the Vulgate, was transferred to the English Bible by Coverdale, and so became universal. The notation of the verses in each chapter naturally followed on the use of the Masoretic verses for the Old Testament. In the Preface to the Concordance, published by Henry Stephens, 1594, he gives an account of the origin of this division. The whole work was accomplished "inter equitandum" on his journey from Paris to Lyons. While it was in progress men doubted of its success. No sooner was it known than it met with universal acceptance. The edition in which this division was first adopted was published in 1551; another came from the same press in 1555. It was used for the Vulgate in the Antwerp edition of Hentenius in 1559, for the English version published in Geneva in 1560, and from that time, with slight variations in detail, has been universally recognised.

Bich'ri, ancestor of Sheba (2 Sam. xx. 1 &c.).

Bid'kar, Jehu's "captain," originally his fellow-officer (2 K. ix. 25); who completed the sentence on Jehoram son of Ahab.

Bier. [BURIAL, p. 124 b.]

Big'tha, one of the seven chamberlains or eunuchs of the harem of Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 10).

Big'than and Big'thana, a eunuch (chamberlain, A. V.) in the court of Ahasuerus, one of those "who kept the door" and conspired with Teresh against the king's life (Esth. ii. 21). The conspiracy was detected by Mordecai, and the eunuchs hung. Prudeaux supposes that these officers had been partially superseded by the degradation of Vashti, and sought revenge by the murder of Ahasuerus.

Big'vai. 1. "Children of Bigvai," 2056 (Neh. 2067) in number, returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 14; Neh. vii. 19), and 72 of them at a later date with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 14). [BAGOI; BAGO.]—2. Apparently one of the chiefs of Zerubbabel's expedition (Ezr. ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7), whose family afterwards signed the covenant (Neh. x. 16).

Bil'ath-A'ven, Amos i. 5 marg. [AVEN 1.]

Bil'dad, the second of Job's three friends. He is called "the Shuhite," which implies both his family and nation (Job ii. 11).

Bil'eam, a town in the western half of the tribe of Manasseh, named only in 1 Chr. vi. 70, as being given to the Kohathites. In the lists in Josh. xvii. and xxi. this name does not appear, and Ibleam and Gath-rimmon are substituted for it.

Bil'gah. 1. A priest in the time of David; the head of the fifteenth course for the temple service (1 Chr. xxiv. 14).—2. A priest or priestly family who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Neh. xii. 5, 18); probably the same who, under the slightly altered name BILGAI, sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 8).

Bil'gai, Neh. x. 8. [BILGAH, 2.]

Bil'hah. 1. Handmaid of Rachel (Gen. xxix. 29), and concubine of Jacob, to whom she bore Dan and Naphtali (Gen. xxx. 3-8, xxxv. 25, xli. 25; 1 Chr. vii. 13). Reuben afterwards lay with her (Gen. xxxv. 22).—2. A town of the Simeonites (1 Chr. iv. 29); also called BAALAH and BALAH.

Bil'han. 1. A Horite chief, son of Ezer, son of Seir, dwelling in Mount Seir, in the land of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 27; 1 Chr. i. 42).—2. A Benjamite, son of Jediael (1 Chr. vii. 10), and probably descended from Bela.

Bil'shan, one of Zerubbabel's companions on his expedition from Babylon (Ezr. ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7).

Bim'hal, one of the sons of Japhlet in the line of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 33).

Bin'ea, the son of Moza; one of the descendants of Saul (1 Chr. viii. 37; ix. 43).

Bin'ui. 1. A Levite, father of Nondiah, in Ezra's time (Ezr. viii. 33).—2. One of the sons of Pahath-moab, who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 30). [BALNUUS.]—3. Another Israelite, of the sons of Bani, who had also taken a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 38).—4. Altered from BAN in the corresponding list in Ezra (Neh. vii. 15).—5. A Levite, son of Henadad, who assisted at the reparation of the wall of Jerusalem, under Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 24, x. 9). He is possibly also the Binui in xii. 8.

Birds. [FOWLS.]

Bir'aha, king of Gomorrah at the time of the invasion of Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv. 2).

Birth-days. The custom of observing birthday is very ancient (Gen. xl. 20; Jer. xx. 15); and in Job i. 4, &c., we read that Job's sons "feasted every one his day." In Persia they were celebrated with peculiar honours and banquets, and in Egypt the kings' birthdays were kept with great pomp. It is very probable that in Matt. xiv. 6, the feast to commemorate Herod's accession is intended, for we know that such feasts were common, and were called "the day of the king" (Hos. vii. 5).

Birthright. The advantages accruing to the eldest son were not definitely fixed in patriarchal times. Great respect was paid to him in the household, and, as the family widened into a tribe, this grew into a sustained authority, undefined save by custom, in all matters of common interest. Thus the "princes" of the congregation had probably rights of primogeniture (Num. vii. 2, xxi. 18, xxv. 14). A "double portion" of the paternal property was allotted by the Mosaic law (Deut. xxi. 15-17). This seems to explain the request of Elisha for a "double portion" of Elijah's spirit (2 K. ii. 9). The first-born of the king was his successor by law (2 Chr. xxi. 3); David, however, by divine appointment, excluded Adonijah in favour of Solomon. The Jews attached a sacred import to the title, and thus "first-born" and "first-begotten" seem applied to the Messiah (Rom. viii. 29; Heb. i. 6).

Bir'zavith, a name occurring in the genealogies of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 31), and apparently, from the mode of its mention, the name of a place.

Bish'lam, apparently an officer or commissioner (1 Esd. ii. 16) of Artaxerxes in Palestine at the time of the return of Zerubbabel from captivity (Ezr. iv. 7); called BELEMUS in 1 Esd.

Bishop. This word, applied in the N. T. to the officers of the Church who were charged with certain functions of superintendence, had been in use before as a title of office. The inspectors or commissioners sent by Athens to her subject-states were ἐπισκοποι (Aristoph. Av. 1022). The title was still current and beginning to be used by the Romans in the later days of the republic (Cic. ad Att. vii. 11). The Hellenistic Jews found it employed in the LXX., though with no very definite value, for officers charged with certain functions (Num. iv. 16, xxxi. 14; Ps. cix. 8; Is. lx. 17). When the organisation of the Christian churches in Gentile cities involved the assignment of the work of pastoral superintendence to a distinct order, the title ἐπισκοπος presented itself as at once convenient and familiar, and was therefore adopted as readily as the word elder (πρεσβύτερος) had been in the mother church of Jerusalem. That the two titles were originally equivalent is clear from the following facts.—1. Bishops and elders are nowhere named together as being orders distinct from each other.—2. Bishops and deacons are named as apparently an exhaustive division of the officers of churches addressed by St. Paul as an apostle (Phil. i. 1; 1 Tim. iii. 1, 8).—3. The same persons are described by both names (Acts xv. 17, 18; Tit. i. 5, 8).—4. Elders discharge functions which are essentially episcopal, i. e. involving pastoral superintendence (1 Tim. v. 17; 1 Pet. v. 1, 2).—Assuming as proved the identity of the bishops and elders of the N. T. we have to inquire into—1. The relation which existed between the two titles. 2. The functions and mode of appointment of the men to whom both titles were applied. 3. Their relations to the general government and discipline of the Church.—I. The e can be no doubt that elders had the priority in order of time. The order itself is recognised in Acts xi. 30, and in Acts xv. 2. It is transferred by Paul and Barnabas to the Gentile churches in their first missionary journey (Acts xiv. 23). The earliest use of "bishops," on the other hand, is in the address of St. Paul to the elders of Miletus (Acts xx. 28), and there it is rather descriptive of functions than given as a title. The earliest epistle in which it is formally used as equivalent to "elders" is that to the Philippians, as late as the time of his first imprisonment at Rome.—II. Of the order in which the first elders were appointed, as of the occasion which led to the institution of the office, we have no record. Arguing from the analogy of the Seven in Acts vi. 5, 6, it would seem probable that they were chosen by the members of the Church collectively, and then set apart to their office by the laying on of the apostles' hands. In the case of Timothy (1 Tim. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6) the "presbyters," probably the body of the elders at Lystra, had taken part with the apostle in this act of ordination. The conditions which were to be observed in choosing these officers, as stated in the pastoral epistles, are, blameless life and reputation among those "that are without" as well as within the Church, fitness for the work of teaching, the wide kindness of temper which shows itself in hospitality, the being "the husband of one wife" (i. e. according to the most probable interpretation, not divorced and then married to another), showing powers of government in his own household as well as in self-control, not being a recent and, therefore, an untried convert. When appointed, the duties of the bishop-elders appear to have been as follows:—1. General superintendence over the spiritual well-being of the flock (1 Pet. v. 2). 2. The work of teaching, both publicly and privately (1 Thess. v. 12; Tit. i. 9; 1 Tim. v. 17). 3. The work of visiting the sick appears in Jam. v. 14, as assigned to the elders of the Church. 4. Among other acts of charity that of receiving strangers occupied a conspicuous place (1 Tim. iii. 2; Tit. i. 8). The mode in which these officers of the Church were supported or remunerated varied probably in different cities. At Miletus St. Paul exhorts the elders of the Church to follow his example and work for their own livelihood (Acts xx. 34). In 1 Cor. ix. 14, and Gal. vi. 6, he asserts the right of the ministers of the Church to be supported by it. In 1 Tim. v. 17, he gives a special application of the principle in the assignment of a double allowance to those who have been conspicuous for their activity. Collectively at Jerusalem, and probably in other churches, the body of bishop-elders took part in deliberations (Acts xv. 6-22, xxi. 18), addressed other churches (ibid. xv. 23), were joined with the apostles in the work of ordaining by the laying on of hands (2 Tim. i. 6). It lay in the necessities of any organised society that such a body of men should be subject to a power higher than their own, whether vested in one chosen by themselves or deriving its authority from some external source; and we find accordingly that it belonged to the delegate of an apostle, and a fortiori to the apostle himself, to receive accusations against them, to hear evidence, to admonish where there was the hope of amendment, to depose where this proved unavailing (1 Tim. v. 19, i. 1; Tit. iii. 10).—III. It is clear from what has been said that episcopal functions in the modern sense of the words, as implying a special superintendence over the ministers of the Church, belonged only to the apostles and those whom they invested with their authority. In the letters of Ignatius the name of apostle is looked on as belonging to the past, a title of honour which their successors could not claim. That of bishop rises in its significance, and takes the place left vacant. The dangers by which the Church was threatened made the exercise of the authority which was thus transmitted more necessary. The permanent superintendence of the bishop over a given district, as contrasted with the less settled rule of the travelling apostle, would tend to its development. In this, or in some similar way, the constitution of the Church assumed its later form; the bishops, presbyters, and deacons of the Ignatian Epistles, took the place of the apostles, bishops, elders, and deacons, of the New Testament.

Bithi'ah, daughter of a Pharaoh, and wife of Mered, a descendant of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 18). The Scriptures, as well as the Egyptian monuments, show that the Pharaohs intermarried with foreigners; but such alliances seem to have been contracted with royal families alone. It may be supposed that Bithiah was taken captive.

Bith'ron (more accurately "the Bithron"), a place—from the form of the expression, "all the Bithron," doubtless a district—in the Arabah or Jordan valley, on the east side of the river (2 Sam. ii. 29).

Bithyn'ia. This province of Asia Minor is mentioned only in Acts xvi. 7, and in 1 Pet. i. 1. Bithynia, considered as a Roman province, was on the west contiguous to ASIA. On the east its limits underwent great modifications. The province was originally inherited by the Roman republic (B.C. 74) as a legacy from Nicomedes III., the last of an independent line of monarchs, one of whom had invited into Asia Minor those Gauls who gave the name of GALATIA to the central district of the peninsula. On the death of Mithridates, king of Pontus, B.C. 63, the western part of the Pontic kingdom was added to the province of Bithynia, which again received further accessions on this side under Augustus A.D. 7. The chief town of Bithynia was Nicæa, celebrated for the general Council of the Church held there in A.D. 325 against the Arian heresy.

Bitter herbs. The Israelites were commanded to eat the Paschal lamb "with unleavened bread and with bitter herbs," Heb. merôrtim (Ex. xii. 8). According to Aben Ezra the ancient Egyptians always used to place different kinds of herbs upon the table with mustard, and dipped morsels of bread into this salad. That the Jews derived this custom of eating herbs with their meat from the Egyptians is extremely probable. The merôrtim may well be understood to denote various sorts of bitter plants, such particularly as belong to the cruciferae, as some of the bitter cresses, or to the chicory group of the compositae, the hawkweeds, and sow-thistles, and wild lettuces which grow abundantly in the Peninsula of Sinai, in Palestine, and in Egypt.

Bittern. The Hebrew word has been the subject of various interpretations, the old versions generally sanctioning the "hedgehog" or "porcupine;" the "tortoise," the "beaver," the "otter," the "owl," have also all been conjectured, but without the slightest show of reason. Philological arguments appear to be rather in favour of the "hedgehog" or "porcupine," for the Hebrew word kippôd appears to be identical with kunfud, the Arabic word for the hedgehog; but zoologically, the hedgehog or porcupine is quite out of the question. The word occurs in Is. xiv. 23, xxxiv. 11; Zeph. ii. 14. The former passage would seem to point to some solitude-loving aquatic bird, which might well be represented by the bittern, as the A. V. has it; and we are inclined to believe that the A. V. is correct. Col. H. Smith (Kitto's Cyclop. art. Kippôd) says, "though not building like the stork on the tops of houses, it resorts like the heron to ruined structures, and we have been informed that it has been seen on the summit of Tank Kisra at Otesiphon." The oottern (Botaurus stellaris) belongs to the Ardeidae, the heron family of birds; it has a wide range, being found in Russia and Siberia as far north as the river Lena, in Europe generally, in Barbary, S. Africa, Trebizond, and in the countries between the Black and Caspian Seas, &c.

Bizjoth'jah, a town in the south of Judah named with BEERSHEBA and BAALAH (Josh. xv. 28).

Bis'tha, the second of the seven eunuchs of king Ahasuerus' harem (Est. i. 10).

Black. [COLOURS.]

Blains, violent ulcerous inflammations. It was the sixth plague of Egypt (Ex. ix. 9, 10), and hence is called in Deut. xxviii. 27, 35, "the botch of Egypt." It seems to have been the black leprosy, a fearful kind of elephantiasis.

Blasphemy, in its technical English sense, signifies the speaking evil of God, and in this sense it is found Ps. lxxiy. 18; Is. lii. 5; Rom. ii. 24, &c. But according to its derivation it may mean any species of calumny and abuse (or even an unlucky word, Eurip. Ion. 1187): see 1 K. xxi. 10; Acts xviii. 6; Jude 9, &c. Blasphemy was punished with stoning, which was inflicted on the son of Shelomith (Lev. xxiv. 11). On this charge both our Lord and St. Stephen were condemned to death by the Jews. When a person heard blasphemy he laid his hand on the head of the offender, to symbolize his sole responsibility for the guilt, and rising on his feet, tore his robe, which might never again be mended. It only remains to speak of "the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost," which has been so fruitful a theme for speculation and controversy (Matt. xii. 32; Mark iii. 28). It consisted in attributing to the power of Satan those unquestionable miracles, which Jesus performed by "the finger of God," and the power of the Holy Spirit; nor have we any safe ground for extending it to include all sorts of wilful (as distinguished from unwilful) offences, besides this one limited and special sin.

Blas'tus, the chamberlain of Herod Agrippa I., mentioned Acts xii. 20, as having been made by the people of Tyre and Sidon a mediator between them and the king's anger.

Blinding. [PUNISHMENTS.]

Blindness is extremely common in the East from many causes. One traveller mentions 4000 blind men in Cairo, and Volney reckons that 1 in every 5 was blind, besides others with sore eyes. Jaffa is said to contain 500 blind out of a population of 5000 at most. Blind beggars figure repeatedly in the N. T. (Matt. xii. 22), and "opening the eyes of the blind" is mentioned in prophecy as a peculiar attribute of the Messiah (Is. xxix. 18, &c.). The Jews were specially charged to treat the blind with compassion and care (Lev. xix. 14; Deut. xxvii. 18). Penal and miraculous blindness is several times mentioned in the Bible (Gen. xix. 11; 2 K. vi. 18-22; Acts ix. 9). Blindness wilfully inflicted for political or other purposes was common in the East, and is alluded to in Scripture (1 Sam. xi. 2; Jer. xxxix. 7).

Blood. To blood is ascribed in Scripture the mysterious sacredness which belongs to life, and God reserves it to Himself when allowing man the dominion over and the use of the lower animals for food. Thus reserved, it acquires a double power: 1. that of sacrificial atonement; and 2. that of becoming a curse when wantonly shed, unless duly expiated (Gen. ix. 4; Lev. vii. 26, xvii. 11-13). As regards 1. the blood of sacrifices was caught by the Jewish priest from the neck of the victim in a bason, then sprinkled seven times (in case of birds at once squeezed out on the altar, but that of the passover on the lintel and door-posts, Exod. xii.; Lev. iv. 5-7, xvi. 14-19). In regard to 2. it sufficed to pour the animal's blood on the earth, or to bury it, as a solemn rendering of the life to God; in case of human bloodshed a mysterious connexion is observable between the curse of blood and the earth or land on which it is shed (Gen. iv. 10, ix. 4-6; Num. xxxv. 33; Ps. cvi. 38).

Blood, Issue of. The menstuous discharge or the fluxus uteri (Lev. xv. 19-30; Matt. ix. 20; Mark v. 25, and Luke viii. 43). The latter caused a permanent legal uncleanness, the former a temporary one, mostly for seven days; after which the woman was to be purified by the customary offering.

Blood, Revenger of. It was, and even still is, a common practice among nations of patriarchal habits, that the nearest of kin should, as a matter of duty, avenge the death of a murdered relative. Compensation for murder is allowed by the Koran. Among the Bedouins, and other Arab tribes, should the offer of blood-money be refused, the 'Thar,' or law of blood, comes into operation, and any person within the fifth degree of blood from the homicide may be legally killed by any one within the same degree of consanguinity to the victim. Frequently the homicide will wander from tent to tent over the Desert, or even rove through the towns and villages on its borders with a chain round his neck and in rags, begging contributions from the charitable to pay the apportioned blood-money. Three days and four hours are allowed to the persons included within the 'Thar,' for escape. The right to blood-revenge is never lost, except as annulled by compensation: it descends to the latest generation. Similar customs with local distinc-

Jons are found in Persia, Abyssinia, and among the Druses and Circassians. The law of Moses was very precise in its directions on the subject of Retaliation.—1. The wilful murderer was to be put to death without permission of compensation. The nearest relative of the deceased became the authorized avenger of blood (gôêl, Num. xxxv. 19) and was bound to execute retaliation himself if it lay in his power. The king, however, in later times appears to have had the power of restraining this licence. The shedder of blood was thus regarded as impious and polluted (Num. xxxv. 16-31. Deut. xix. 11; 2 Sam. xiv. 7, 11, xvi. 8, and iii. 29, with 1 K. ii. 31, 39; 1 Chr. xxiv. 22-25).—2. The law of retaliation was not to extend beyond the immediate offender (Deut. xxiv. 16; 2 K. xiv. 6; 2 Chr. xxv. 4; Jer. xxxi. 29, 30; Ezek. xviii. 20).—3. The involuntary shedder of blood was permitted to take flight to one of six Levitical cities, specially appointed out of the 48 as cities of refuge, three on each side of the Jordan (Num. xxxv. 22, 23; Deut. xix. 4-6).

Blue. [COLOURS.]

Boanerges, a name signifying "sons of thunder," given by our Lord to the two sons of Zebedee, James and John. Probably the name had respect to the fiery zeal of the brothers, signs of which we may see in Luke ix. 54; Mark ix. 38; comp. Matt. xx. 20, &c.

Boar. [SWINE.]

Boaz. 1. A wealthy Bethlehemite, kinsman to Elimelech, the husband of Naomi. Finding that the kinsman of Ruth, who stood in a still nearer relation than himself, was unwilling to perform the office of gôêl, he had those obligations publicly transferred with the usual ceremonies to his own discharge; and hence it became his duty by the "levirate law" to marry Ruth, and to redeem the estates of her deceased husband Mahlon (iv. 1 ff.). He gladly undertook these responsibilities, and their happy union was blessed by the birth of Obed, from whom in a direct line our Lord was descended. Boaz is mentioned in the genealogy (Matt. i. 5), but there is great difficulty in assigning his date. If Boaz be identical with the judge Ibozan [IBZAN], as is stated with some shadow of probability by the Jerusalem Talmud and various Rabbis, several generations must be inserted. Even if we shorten the period of the Judges to 240 years, we must suppose that Boaz was the youngest son of Salmon, and that he did not marry till the age of 65.—2. BOAZ, the name of one of Solomon's brazen pillars erected in the temple porch. [JACHIN.] It stood on the left, and was 18 cubits high (1 K. vii. 15, 21; 2 Chr. iii. 15; Jer. lii. 21).

Bo'cas, 1 Esd. viii. 2. [BUKKI; BORITH.]

Boch'era, son of Azel, according to the present Heb. text of 1 Chr. viii. 38.

Bo'chim, "the weepers," a place on the west of Jordan above Gilgal (Judg. ii. 1, 5).

Bo'hán, a Reubenite, after whom a stone was named. Its position was on the border of the territories of Benjamin and Judah between Bethanabab and Bethhogla on the E., and Adummim and Enshemesh on the W. (Josh. xv. 6, xviii. 17).

Boil. [MEDICINE.]

Boister. [PILLOW.]

Booths. [SUCCOTH; TABERNACLES, FEAST OF.]

Booty consisted of captives of both sexes, cattle, and whatever a captured city might contain, especially metallic treasures. Within the limits of Canaan no captives were to be made (Deut. xx. 14 and 16); beyond those limits, in case of warlike resistance, all the women and children were to be made captives, and the men put to death. The law of booty was that it should be divided equally between the army who won it and the people of Israel, but of the former half one head in every 500 was reserved to God, and appropriated to the priests, and of the latter one in every 50 was similarly reserved and appropriated to the Levites (Num. xxxi. 26-47). As regarded the army David added a regulation that the baggage-guard should share equally with the troops engaged (1 Sam. xxx. 24, 25).

Bo'ri'h, 2 Esd. i. 2. [BUKKI.]

Borrowing. [LOAN.]

Bos'cath, 2 K. xxii. 1. [BOZKATH.]

Bos'or. 1. A city both large and fortified, on the east of Jordan in the land of Gilead (1 Macc. v. 26, 36). It is probably BEZER.—2. The Aimaic mode of pronouncing the name of BEOR, the father of Balaam (2 Pet. ii. 15).

Bos'ora, a strong city in Gilead taken by Judas Maccabaeus (1 Macc. v. 26, 28), doubtless the same as BOZRAH.

Both. [BLAIN.]

Bottle. 1. The skin bottle; 2. The bottle of earthen or glass-ware, both of them capable of being closed from the air.—1. The Arabs, and all those that lead a wandering life, keep their water, milk, and other liquors, in leathern bottles. These are made of goatskins. When the animal is killed, they cut off its feet and its head, and they draw it in this manner out of the skin, without opening its belly. In Arabia they are tanned with acacia-bark and the hairy part left outside. They afterwards sew up the places where the legs were cut off and the tail, and when it is filled they tie it about the neck. The great leathern bottles are made of the skin of a he-goat, and the small ones, that serve instead of a bottle of water on the road, are made of a kid's skin. Bruce gives a description of a vessel of the same kind, but larger. Wine-bottles of skin are mentioned as used by Greeks,

Skin Bottles. (From the Museo Borbonico.)

Romans, and Egyptians, by Homer (Od. vi. 78; Il. iii. 247); by Herodotus, as used in Egypt (ii. 121); and by Virgil (Georg. ii. 384). Skins for wine or other liquids are in use to this day in Spain, where they are called borrachas. The effect of external heat upon a skin-bottle is indicated in Ps. cxix. 83, "a bottle in the smoke," and of expansion produced by fermentation in Matt. ix. 17, "new wine in old bottles."—2. Vessels of metal, earthen, or glass ware for liquids were in use among the Greeks, Egyptians, Etruscans, and Assyrians, and also no doubt among the Jews, especially in later times. Thus Jer. xix. 1, "a potter's earthen bottle." The Jews probably borrowed their manufactures in this particular from Egypt, which was celebrated for glass work, as remains and illustrations of Egyptian workmanship are extant at least as early as the 15th century B.C. (Wilkinson, ii. 59, 60).

Bow. [ARMS.]

Bowl. A like uncertainty prevails as to the precise form and material of these vessels as is noticed under BASIN. Bowls would probably be used at meals for liquids, or broth, or pottage (2 K. iv. 40). Modern Arabs are content with a few wooden bowls. In the Brit. Mus. are deposited several terra-cotta bowls with Chaldaean inscriptions of a superstitious character, expressing charms against sickness and evil spirits, which may possibly explain the "divining cup" of Joseph (Gen. xlv. 5). The bowl was filled with some liquid which was drunk off as a charm against evil.

Box-tree. The Heb. teasshûr occurs in Is. xli. 19, lx. 13. The Talmudical and Jewish writers generally are of opinion that the box-tree is intended. The Syriac and the Arabic version of Saadias understand by it a species of cedar called sherbin, which is distinguished by the small size of the cones and the upright growth of the branches. Although the claim which the box-tree has to represent the teasshûr of Isaiah and Ezekiel is far from being satisfactorily established, yet the evidence rests on a better foundation than that which supports the claims of the sherbin. Box-wood writing tablets are alluded to in 2 Esdr. xiv. 24.

Bo'zez, one of the two "sharp rocks" (Heb. "teeth of the cliff") "between the passages" by which Jonathan entered the Philistine garrison. It seems to have been that on the north (1 Sam. xiv. 4, 5).

Boz'kath, a city of Judah in the lowlands (Josh. xv. 39). It is mentioned once again (2 K. xxii. 1, A. V. "Boscath") as the native place of the mother of King Josiah.

Bozrah. 1. In Edom—the city of Jobab the son of Zerah, one of the early kings of that nation (Gen. xxxvi. 33; 1 Chr. i. 44). This is doubtless the place mentioned in later times by Isaiah (xxxiv. 6, lxiii. 1) in connexion with Edom, and by Jeremiah (xlix. 13, 22), Amos (i. 12), and Micah (ii. 12). There is no reason to doubt that the modern representative of Bozrah is el-Busaireh, which was first visited by Burckhardt, and lies on the mountain district to the S. E. of the Dead Sea, between Tüfleh and Petra, about half-way between the latter and the Dead Sea.—2. In his catalogue of the cities of the land of Moab, Jeremiah (xlviii. 24) mentions a Bozrah as in "the plain country" (ver. 21, i. e. the high level downs on the east of the Dead Sea). Here lay Heshbon, Nebo, Kirjathaim, Diblathaim, and the other towns named in this passage, and it is here that we presume Bozrah should be sought, and not, as has been lately suggested, at Bosra, the Roman city in Bashan full sixty miles from Heshbon.

Bracelet. Under ARMLET an account is given of these ornaments, the materials of which they were generally made, the manner in which they were worn, &c. Bracelets of fine twisted Venetian gold are still common in Egypt. In Gen. xxxviii. 18, 25, the word rendered "bracelet" means probably "a string by which a seal-ring was suspended." Men as well as women wore bracelets, as we see from Cant. v. 14. Layard says of the Assyrian kings: "The arms were encircled by armlets, and the wrists by bracelets."

Assyrian Bracelet Clasp. (Nimreh Marbles.)

Bramble. [THORNS.]

Brass. The word nechôsheth is improperly translated by "brass," since the Hebrews were not acquainted with the compound of copper and zinc known by that name. In most places of the O. T. the correct translation would be copper, although it may sometimes possibly mean bronze, a compound of copper and tin. Indeed a simple metal was obviously intended, as we see from Deut. viii. 9, xxxiii. 25, and Job xxviii. 2. Copper was known at a very early period, and the invention of working it is attributed to Tubal-cain (Gen. iv. 22). Its extreme ductility made its application almost universal among the ancients. The same word is used for money in both Testaments (Ezek. xvi. 36; Matt. x. 9, &c.). It often occurs in metaphors, e.g. Lev. xvi. 19; Deut. xxxiii. 23; Job vi. 12; Jer. vi. 28. It is often used as an emblem of strength, Zech. vi. 1; Jer. i. 18. The word χαλκός (halakos) in Rev. i. 15, ii. 18 (A. V. "fine brass"), has excited much difference of opinion. Some suppose it to have been orichalcum, which was so rare as to be more valuable than gold. It may perhaps be deep-coloured frankincense.

Brass-serpent. [SERPENT.]

Bread. The preparation of bread as an article of food dates from a very early period: it must not, however, be inferred from the use of the word lechem in Gen. iii. 19 ("bread," A. V.) that it was known at the time of the fall, the word there occurring in its general sense of food: the earliest undoubted instance of its use is found in Gen. xviii. 6. The corn or grain employed was of various sorts: the best bread was made of wheat, which after being ground produced the "flour" or "meal" (Judg. vi. 19; 1 Sam. i. 24; 1 K. iv. 22, xvii. 12, 14), and when sifted the "fine flour" (Ex. xxix. 2; Gen. xviii. 6) usually employed in the sacred offerings (Ex. xxix. 40; Lev. ii. 1; Ez. xvi. 14), and in the meals of the wealthy (1 K. iv. 22; 2 K. vii. 1; Ez. xvi. 13, 19; Rev. xviii. 13). "Barley" was used only by the very poor (John vi. 9, 13), or in times of scarcity (Ruth iii. 15, compared with i. 1; 2 K. iv. 38, 42; Rev. vi. 6). "Spelt" (rye, fitches, spelt, A. V.) was also used both in Egypt (Ex. ix. 32) and Palestine (Is. xxviii. 25; Ez. iv. 9; 1 K. xix. 6). Occasionally the grains above mentioned were mixed, and other ingredients, such as beans, lentiles, and millet, were added (Ez. iv. 9; cf. 2 Sam. xvii. 28); the bread so produced is called "barley cakes" (Ez. iv. 12, "as barley cakes," A. V.), inasmuch as barley was the main ingredient. The baking was done in primitive times by the mistress of the house (Gen. xviii. 6) or one of the daughters (2 Sam. xiii. 8): female servants were however employed in large households (1 Sam. viii. 13). Baking as a profession, was carried on by men (Hos. vii. 4, 6). In Jerusalem the bakers congregated in one quarter of the town, as we may infer from the names "bakers' street" (Jer. xxxvii. 21), and "tower of the ovens" (Neh. iii. 11, xii. 38, "furnaces," A. V.). The bread taken by persons on a journey (Gen. xlv. 23; Josh. ix. 12) was probably a kind of biscuit. The process of making bread was as follows:—the flour was first mixed with water, or perhaps milk; it was then kneaded with the hands (in Egypt with the feet also) in a small wooden bowl or "kneading-trough" until it became dough (Ex. xii. 34, 39; 2 Sam. xiii. 8; Jer. vii. 18; Hos. vii. 4). When the kneading was completed, leaven was generally added [LEAVEN]: but when the time for preparation was short, it was omitted, and unleavened cakes, hastily baked, were eaten, as is still the prevalent custom among the Bedouins (Gen. xviii. 6, xix. 3; Ex. xii. 39; Judg. vi. 19; 1 Sam. xxviii. 24). The leavened mass was allowed to stand for some time (Matt. xiii. 33; Luke xiii. 21). The dough was then divided into round cakes (Ex. xxix. 23; Judg. vii. 13, viii. 5; 1 Sam. x. 3; Prov. vi. 26), not unlike flat stones in shape and appearance (Matt. vii. 9; comp. iv. 3), about a span in diameter and a finger's breadth in thickness. The cakes were sometimes punctured, and hence called chal-lah (Ex. xxix. 2, 23; Lev. ii. 4, viii. 26, xxiv. 5; Num. xv. 20; 2 Sam. vi. 19), and mixed with oil. Sometimes they were rolled out into wafers (Ex. xxix. 2, 23; Lev. ii. 4; Num. vi. 15-19), and merely coated with oil. The cakes were now taken to the oven; having been first, according to the practice in Egypt, gathered into "white baskets" (Gen. xl.

An Egyptian carrying cakes to the oven. (Wilkinson.)

16), a doubtful expression. The baskets were placed on a tray and carried on the baker's head (Gen. xl. 16). In the towns, where professional bakers resided, there were no doubt fixed ovens, in shape and size resembling those in use among ourselves: but more usually each household possessed a portable oven, consisting of a stone or metal jar about three feet high, which was heated inwardly with wood (1 K. xvii. 12; Is. xlv. 15; Jer. vii. 18) or dried grass and flower-stalks (Matt. vi. 30). Other modes of baking were specially adapted to the migratory habits of the pastoral Jews, as of the modern Bedouins; the cakes were either spread upon heated stones, or they were thrown into the heated embers of the fire itself; or lastly, they were roasted by being placed between layers of dung, which burns slowly, and is therefore specially adapted for the purpose (Ez. iv. 12, 15). The cakes required to be carefully turned during the process (Hos. vii. 8). Other methods were used for other kinds of bread; some were baked on a pan; such cakes appeared to have been chiefly used as sacred offerings (Lev. ii. 5, vi. 15, vii. 9, 1 Chr. xxiii. 29). A similar cooking utensil was used by Tamar (2 Sam. xiii. 9). A different kind of bread, probably resembling the fitu of the Bedouins, a puffy substance, was prepared in a saucepan (frying-pan, A. V.); this was also reserved for sacred offerings (Lev. ii. 7; vii. 9).

Brick. Herodotus (i. 179), describing the mode of building the walls of Babylon, says that the clay dug out of the ditch was made into bricks as soon as it was carried up, and burnt in kilns. The bricks were cemented with hot bitumen, and at every thirtieth row crates of reeds were stuffed in. This account agrees with the history of the building of the Tower of Confusion, in which the builders used brick instead of stone, and slime for mortar (Gen. xi. 3). The Babylonian bricks were more commonly burnt in kilns than those used at Nineveh, which are chiefly sun-dried like the Egyptian. They are usually from 12 to 13 in. square, and $\frac{3}{4}$ in. thick, and most of them bear the name, inscribed in cuneiform character, of Nebuchadnezzar, whose buildings, no doubt, replaced those of an earlier age. They thus possess more of the character of tiles (Ex. iv. 1). They were sometimes glazed and enamelled with patterns of various colours. The Israelites, in common with other captives, were employed by the Egyptian monarchs in making bricks and in building (Ex. i. 14, v. 7). Egyptian bricks were not generally dried in kilns, but in the sun, and even without straw are as firm as when first put up in the reigns of the Amunophis and Thothmes whose names they bear. When made of the Nile mud, they required straw to prevent cracking; and crude brick walls had frequently the additional security of a layer of reeds and sticks, placed at intervals to act as binders. A brick-kiln is mentioned as in Egypt by the prophet Jeremiah (xliii. 9). A brick pyramid is mentioned by Herodotus (ii. 136) as the work of King Asychis. The Jews learned the art of brick-making in Egypt, and we find the use of the brick-kiln in David's time (2 Sam. xii. 31), and a complaint made by Isaiah that the people built altars of brick instead of unhewn stone as the law directed (Is. lxxv. 3; Ex. xx. 25). Bridge. The only mention of a bridge in the Canonical Scriptures is indirectly in the proper name Geshur, a district in Bashan, N.E. of the sea of Galilee. At this place a bridge still exists, called the bridge of the sons of Jacob. Judas Maccabaeus is said to have intended to make a bridge in order to besiege the town of Casphor or Caspis, situate near a lake (2 Mac. xii. 13). Though the arch was known and used in Egypt as early as the 15th century B.C., the Romans were the first constructors of arched bridges. They made bridges over the Jordan and other rivers of Syria, of which remains still exist. A stone bridge over the Jordan, called the bridge of the daughters of Jacob, is mentioned by B. de la Brocquière, A.D. 1432, and a portion of one by Arculf, A.D. 700. The bridge connecting the Temple with the upper city, of which Josephus speaks, seems to have been an arched viaduct.

Brier. [THORNS.]

Brigandine, Jer. xvi. 4; elsewhere "habergeon," or "coat of mail." [ARMS, p. 67 a.]

Brimstone. The Hebrew word is connected with gopher, "gopher-wood," A. V. Gen. vi. 14, and probably signified in the first instance the gun or resin that exuded from that tree; hence it was transferred to all inflammable substances, and especially to sulphur, which is found in considerable quantities on the shores of the Dead Sea (Gen. xix. 24).

Brother. The Hebrew word is used in various senses in the O. T. as 1. Any kinsman, and not a mere brother; e. g. nephew (Gen. xiv. 16, xiii. 8), husband (Cant. iv. 9). 2. One of the same tribe (2 Sam. xix. 13). 3. Of the same people (Ex. ii. 11), or even of a cognate people (Num. xx. 14). 4. An ally (Am. i. 9). 5. Any friend (Job v. 15). 6. One of the same office (1 K. ix. 13). 7. A fellow man (Lev. xix. 17). 8. Metaphorically of any similarity. It is a very favourite Oriental metaphor, as in Job xxx. 19, "I am become a brother to the jackals." The word ἀδελφός has a similar range of meanings in the N. T., and is also used for a disciple (Matt. xxv. 40, &c.); a fellow-worker, and especially a Christian. Indeed, we see from the Acts that it was by this name that Christians usually spoke of each other. The Jewish schools distinguish between "brother" and "neighbour"; "brother" meant an Israelite by blood, "neighbour" a proselyte. They allowed neither title to the Gentiles; but Christ and the Apostles extended the name "brother" to all Christians, and "neighbour" to all the world (1 Cor. v. 11; Luke x. 29, 30). The question as to who were "the brethren of the Lord," is discussed under JAMES.

Bubastis. [PIBSETH.]

Buk'ki. 1. Son of Abishua and father of Uzzi, fifth from Aaron in the line of the high-priests in 1 Chr. v. 31, vi. 36 (vi. 5, 51, A. V.), and in the genealogy of Ezra, Ezr. vii. 4, and 1 Esdr. vii. 2, where he is called BOCCAS, which is corrupted to BORITH, 2 Esdr. i. 2. Whether Bukki ever filled the office of high-priest, we are not informed in Scripture. Josephus mentions him as the first of those who lived a private life, while the pontifical dignity was in the house of Ithamar.—2. Son of Jogli, prince of the tribe of Dan, one of the ten men chosen to apportion the land of Canaan between the tribes (Num. xxxiv. 22).

Bukki'ah, a Kohathite Levite, of the sons of Heman, one of the musicians in the Temple (1 Chr. xiv. 4, 13).

Bull. [MONTHIS.]

Bull, Bullock, terms used synonymously with ox, oxen, in the A. V. as the representatives of several Hebrew words. Bākār is properly a generic name for horned cattle when of full age and fit for the plough. Accordingly it is variously rendered bullock (Is. lxxv. 25), cow (Ez. iv. 15), oxen (Gen. xii. 16). It is derived from an unused root, bākār, to clove, hence to plough, as in Latin armentum is armentum. Shōr almost always signifies one head of horned cattle, without distinction of age or sex. It is very seldom used collectively. The Chaldee form of the word, tōr, occurs in Ezr. vi. 9, 17, vii. 17; Dan. iv. 25, &c. Egel, eglah, a calf male or female, properly of the first year. The word is used of a trained heifer (Hos. x. 11), of one giving milk (Is. vii. 21, 22), of one used in ploughing (Judg. xiv. 18), and of one three years old (Gen. xv. 9). Pār signifies generally a young bull of two years old, though in one instance (Judg. vi. 25) possibly a bull of seven years old. There are four or five passages in which the word abbān is used for bulls (lit. "strong ones"). See Ps. xxii. 12, l. 13, lxxviii. 30; Is. xxxiv. 7; Jer. l. 11. In Is. li. 20, the word tō occurs, and is rendered "wild bull," but "wild ox" in Deut. xiv. 5. It was possibly one of the larger species of antelope, and took its name from its swiftness. Dr. Robinson mentions large herds of black and almost hairless buffaloes as still existing in Palestine, and these may be the animal indicated (iii. 396).

Bulrush. [RUSH.]

Bu'nah, a son of Jerahmeel, of the family of Pharez in Judah (1 Chr. ii. 25).

Bun'ni. 1. One of the Levites in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. ix. 4); possibly the same person is mentioned in x. 15.—2. Another Levite, but of earlier date than the preceding (Neh. xi. 15).

Burial, Sepulchres, Tombs. The Jews uniformly disposed of the corpse by entombment where possible, and failing that, by interment; extending this respect to the remains even of the slain enemy and malefactor (1 K. xi. 15; Deut. xxi. 23), in the latter case by express provision of law. On this subject we have to notice: 1. the place of burial, its site and shape; 2. the mode of burial; 3. the prevalent notions regarding this duty.—1. A natural cave enlarged and adapted by excavation, or an artificial imitation of one, was the standard type of sepulchre. This was what the structure of the Jewish soil supplied or suggested. Sepulchres, when the owner's means permitted it, were commonly prepared beforehand, and stood often in gardens, by roadsides, or even adjoining houses. Kings and prophets alone were probably buried within towns (1 K. ii. 10, xvi. 6, 28, 2 K. x. 35, xiii. 9; 2 Chr. xvi. 14, xxviii. 27; 1 Sam. xxv. 1, xxviii. 3). Sarah's tomb and Rachel's seem to have been chosen merely from the accident of the place of death; but the successive interments at the former (Gen. xlix. 31) are a chronicle of the strong family feeling among the Jews. Cities soon became populous and demanded cemeteries (Ez. xxxix. 15), which were placed without the walls; such an one seems intended by the expression in 2 K. xxiii. 6, situated in the valley of the Kedron or of Jehoshaphat. Jeremiah (vii. 32, xix. 11) threatens that the eastern valley called Tophet, the favourite haunt of idolatry, should be polluted by burying there (comp. 2 K. xxiii. 16). Such was also the "Potter's Field" (Matt. xxvii. 7), which had perhaps been wrought by digging for clay into holes serviceable for graves. Sepulchres were marked sometimes by pillars, as that of Rachel, or by pyramids as those of the Asmoneans at Modin, and had places of higher and lower honour. Such as were not otherwise noticeable were scrupulously "whited" (Matt. xxiii. 27) once a year, after the rains before the passover, to warn passers by of defilement.—2. With regard to the mode of burial, we should remember that our impressions, as derived from the O. T., are those of the burial of persons of rank or public eminence, whilst those gathered from the N. T. regard a private station. But in both cases "the manner of the Jews" included the use of spices, where they could command the means. Thus Asa lay in a "bed of spices" (2 Chr. xvi. 14). A portion of these were burnt in honour of the deceased, and to this use was probably destined part of the 100 pounds weight of "myrrh and aloes" in our Lord's case. On high state occasions the vessels, bed, and furniture used by the deceased were burnt also. Such was probably the "great burning" made for Asa. If a king was unpopular or died disgraced (2 Chr. xxxi. 19), this was not observed. In no case, save that of Saul and his sons, were the bodies burned; and even then the bones were interred, and re-exhumed for solemn entombment. It was the office of the next of kin to perform and preside over the whole funeral office; but a company of public buriers, originating in an exceptional necessity (Ez. xxxix. 12-14), had become, it seems, customary in the times of the N. T. (Acts v. 6, 10). Coffins were but seldom used, and if used were open; but fixed stone sarcophagi were common in tombs of rank. The bier, the word for which in the O. T. is the same as that rendered "bed," was borne by the nearest relatives, and followed by any who wished to do honour to the dead. The grave-clothes were probably of the fashion worn in life, but swathed and fastened with bandages, and the head covered separately. Previously to this, spices were applied to the corpse in the form of ointment, or between the folds of the linen; hence our Lord's remark, that the woman had anointed his body, "with a view to dressing it in these grave-clothes."—3. The precedent of Jacob's and Joseph's remains being returned to the land of Canaan was followed, in wish at least, by every pious Jew. Following a similar notion, some of the Rabbins taught that only in that land could those who were buried obtain a share in the resurrection which was to usher in Messiah's reign on earth. Tombs were, in popular belief, led by the same teaching, invested with traditions. The neighbourhood of Jerusalem is thickly studded with tombs, many of them of great antiquity. The celebrated "Tombs of the Kings" have received this name on account of their remarkable character; but they are supposed by Robinson and Porter to be the tomb of Helena, the widowed queen of Monobazus king of Adiabene. They are excavated out of the rock.

Burnt-offering. The word is applied to the offering, which was wholly consumed by fire on the altar, and the whole of which, except the refuse ashes, "ascended" in the smoke to God. Every sacrifice was in part "a burnt-offering," because, since fire was the chosen manifestation of God's presence, the portion of each sacrifice especially dedicated to Him was consumed by fire. But the term is generally restricted to that which is properly a "whole burnt-offering," the whole of which was so offered and so consumed. The burnt-offering is first named in Gen. viii. 20, as offered after the Flood. Throughout the whole of the Book of Genesis (see xv. 9, 17, xxii. 2, 7, 8, 13) it appears to be the only sacrifice referred to; afterwards it became distinguished as one of the regular classes of sacrifice under the Mosaic law. Now all sacrifices are divided (see Heb. v. 1) into "gifts" and "sacrifices-for-sin" (i. e. eucharistic and propitiatory sacrifices), and of the former of these the burnt-offering was the choicest specimen. The meaning of the whole burnt-offering was that which is the original idea of all sacrifice, the offering by the sacrificer of himself, soul and body, to God, the submission of his will to the Will of the Lord. It typified (see Heb. v. 1, 3, 7, 8) our Lord's offering (as especially in the temptation and the agony), the perfect sacrifice of His own human will to the Will of His Father. In accordance with this principle it was enacted that with the burnt-offering a "meat-offering" (of flour and oil) and "drink-offering" of wine should be offered, as showing that, with themselves, men dedicated also to God the chief earthly gifts with which He had blessed them. (Lev. viii. 18, 22, 26, ix. 16, xiv. 20; Ex. xxix. 40; Num. xxviii. 4, 5.) The ceremonial of the burnt-offering is given in detail in the Book of Leviticus. There were, as public burnt-offerings—1st. The daily burnt-offering (Ex. xxix. 38-42; Num. xxviii. 3-8). 2ndly. The Sabbath burnt-offering (Num. xxviii. 9, 10). 3rdly. The offering at the new moon, at the three great festi- vais, the great Day of Atonement, and feast of trumpets. (See Num. xxviii. 11-xxix. 39). Private burnt-offerings were appointed at the consecration of priests (Ex. xxix. 15; Lev. viii. 18, ix. 12), at the purification of women (Lev. xii. 6, 8), at the cleansing of the lepers (Lev. xiv. 19), and removal of other ceremonial uncleanness (xv. 15, 30), on any accidental breach of the Nazarite vow, or at its conclusion (Num. vi.; comp. Acts xxi. 26), &c. But freewill burnt-offerings were offered and accepted by God on any solemn occasions, as, for example, at the dedication of the tabernacle (Num. vii.) and of the temple (1 K. viii. 64), when they were offered in extraordinary abundance.

Bush. The Hebrew word sēneh occurs only in those passages which refer to Jehovah's appearance to Moses "in the flame of fire in the bush" (Ex. iii. 2, 3, 4; Deut. xxxii. 16). The Greek word is βῆθος both in the LXX. and in the N. T. (Luke xx. 37; Acts vii. 35; see also Luke vi. 44, where it is correctly rendered "bramble bush" by the A. V.). Celsius (Herob. ii. 58) has argued in favour of the Rubus vulgaris, i. e. R. fruticosus, the bramble or blackberry bush, representing the sēneh, and traces the etymology of Mt. "Sinai" to this name. Sprengel identifies the sēneh with what he terms the Rubus sanctus, and says it grows abundantly near Sinai. It is quite impossible to say what kind of thorn bush is intended by sēneh; but Sinai is almost beyond the range of the genus rubus.

Butter, curdled milk (Gen. xviii. 8; Deut. xxxii. 14; Judg. v. 25; Job xx. 17). Milk is generally offered to travellers in Palestine in a curdled or sour state, "lebben," thick, almost like butter. Hasselquist (Trav. p. 159, Eng. tr.) describes the method of making butter employed by the Arab women: "they made butter in a leather bag, hung on three poles erected for the purpose, in the form of a cone, and drawn to and fro by two women." Burckhardt (Travels in Arabia, i. p. 52) mentions the different uses of butter by the Arabs of the Hedjaz.

Buz, the second son of Milcah and Nahor (Gen. xxii. 21). Elihu is called "the Buzite" of the kindred of Ram, i. e. Aram. Elihu was therefore probably a descendant of Buz, whose family seems to have settled in Arabia Deserta or Petraea (Jer. xlv. 23).—2. A name occurring in the genealogies of the tribe of Gad (1 Chr. v. 14).

Cab'bon, a town in the low country of Judah (Josh. xv. 40).

Ca'bul, a place named as one of the landmarks on the boundary of Asher (Josh. xix. 27). It may fairly be considered as still existing in the modern Kabul, which was found by Dr. Smith and by Robinson 8 or 9 miles east of Akka, and about the same distance from Jefut. Being thus on the very borders of Galilee, it is more than probable that there is some connexion between this place and the district containing twenty cities, which was presented by Solomon to Hiram king of Tyre (1 K. ix. 11-14).

Caesar, always in the N. T. the Roman emperor, the sovereign of Judaea (John xix. 12, 13; Acts xvii. 7).

Caesarea (Acts viii. 40, ix. 30, x. 1, 24, xi. 11, xii. 19, xviii. 22, xxi. 8, 16; xxiii. 23, 33; xrv. 1, 4, 6, 13). The passages just enumerated show how important a place this city occupies in the Acts of the Apostles. Caesarea was situated on the coast of Palestine, on the line of the great road from Tyre to Egypt, and about half way between Joppa and Dora. The journey of St. Peter from Joppa (Acts x. 24) occupied rather more than a day. On the other hand St. Paul's journey from Ptolemais (Acts xxi. 8) was accomplished within the day. The distance from Jerusalem was about 70 miles; Josephus states it in round numbers as 600 stadia. It has been ascertained, however, that there was a shorter road by Antipatris than that which is given in the Itinerary,—a point of some importance in reference to the night-journey of Acts xxiii. [ANTIPATRIS.] In Strabo's time there was on this point of the coast merely a town called "Strato's tower" with a landing-place, whereas, in the time of Tacitus, Caesarea is spoken of as being the head of Judaea. It was in this interval that the city was built by Herod the Great. The work was in fact accomplished in ten years. The utmost care and expense were lavished on the building of Caesarea. It was the official residence of the Herodian kings, and of Festus, Felix, and the other Roman procurators of Judaea. Here also were the head-quarters of the military forces of the province. Caesarea continued to be a city of some importance even in the time of the Crusades. Now, though an Arabic corruption of the name still lingers on the site (Kaisariyeh), it is utterly desolate; and its ruins have for a long period been a quarry, from which other towns in this part of Syria have been built.

Caesarea Philippi is mentioned only in the two first Gospels (Matt. xvi. 13; Mark viii. 27) and in accounts of the same transactions. Caesarea Philippi was the northernmost point of our Lord's journeyings; and the passage in His life, which was connected with the place, was otherwise a very marked one. The place itself too is remarkable in its physical and picturesque characteristics, and also in its historical associations. It was at the easternmost and most important of the two recognised sources of the Jordan, the other being at Tel-el-Kadi. The spring rises, and the city was built, on a limestone terrace in a valley at the base of Mount Hermon. Caesarea Philippi has no O. T. history, though it has been not unreasonably identified with Baal-Gad. Its annals run back direct from Herod's time into heathenism. There is no difficulty in identifying it with the Panium of Josephus; and the inscriptions are not yet obliterated which show that the god Pan had once a sanctuary at this spot. Panium became part of the territory of Philip, tetrarch of Trachonitis, who enlarged and embellished the town, and called it Caesarea Philippi, partly after his own name, and partly after that of the emperor. Agrippa II. followed in the same course of flattery, and called the place Neronias. Coins of Caesarea Paneas continued through the reigns of many emperors. It is still called Banias, the first name having here, as in other cases, survived the second. The vast castle above the site of the city, built in Syro-Greek or even Phoenician times, is still the most remarkable fortress in the Holy Land.

more properly a trap, in which decoy birds were placed (comp. Eccles. xi. 30). In Rev. xviii. 2 the Greek term means a prison.

Caiaphas, in full JOSEPH CAIAPHAS, high-priest of the Jews under Tiberius during the years of our Lord's public ministry, and at the time of his condemnation and crucifixion (Matt. xxvi. 3, 57; John xi. 49, xviii. 13, 14, 24, 28; Acts iv. 6). The Procurator Valerius Gratus appointed him to the dignity. He held it during the whole procuratorship of Pontius Pilate, but was deposed by the Proconsul Vitellius (A.D. 36). He was son-in-law of Annas. [ANNAS.]

Cain. The historical facts in the life of Cain, as recorded in Gen. iv., are briefly these:—He was the eldest son of Adam and Eve; he followed the business of agriculture; in a fit of jealousy, roused by the rejection of his own sacrifice and the acceptance of Abel's, he committed the crime of murder, for which he was expelled from Eden, and led the life of an exile; he settled in the land of Nod, and built a city which he named after his son Enoch; his descendants are enumerated, together with the inventions for which they were remarkable. Occasional references to Cain are made in the N. T. (Heb. xi. 4; 1 John iii. 12; Jude 11). The following points deserve notice in connexion with the Biblical narrative:—1. The position of the land of Nod, which it seems vain to attempt to identify with any special locality. 2. The "mark set upon Cain" probably means that Jehovah gave a sign to Cain, very much as signs were afterwards given to Noah (Gen. ix. 13), Moses (Ex. iii. 2, 12), Elijah (1 K. xix. 11), and Ezekiel (Is. xxxviii. 7, 8). 3. The narrative implies the existence of a considerable population in Cain's time (iv. 14). 4. The descendants of Cain are enumerated to the sixth generation. Some commentators (Knobel, von Bohlen) have traced an artificial structure in this genealogy, by which it is rendered parallel to that of the Sethites. It must be observed, however, that the differences far exceed the points of similarity. 5. The social condition of the Canites is prominently brought forward in the history. Cain founded the first city; Lamech instituted polygamy; Jabel introduced the nomadic life; Jubal invented musical instruments; Tubal-cain was the first smith; Lamech's language takes the stately tone of poetry; and even the names of the women, Naamah (pleasantry), Zillah (shadow), Adah (ornamental), seem to bespeak an advanced state of civilization. But along with this, there was violence and godlessness; Cain and Lamech furnish proof of the former, while the concluding words of Gen. iv. 26 imply the latter. 6. The contrast established between the Canites and the Sethites appears to have reference solely to the social and religious condition of the two races.

Cain, one of the cities in the low country of Judah, named with Zanoah and Gibeah (Josh. xv. 57).

Cainan. 1. Son of Enos, aged 70 years when he begat Mahabuel his son. He lived 840 years afterwards, and died aged 910 (Gen. v. 9-14). The rabbinical tradition was that he first introduced idol-worship and astrology—a tradition which the Hellenists transferred to the post-diluvian Cainan.—2. Son of Arphaxad, and father of Sala, according to Luke iii. 35, 36, and usually called the second Canaan. He is also found in the present copies of the LXX. in the genealogy of Shem, Gen. x. 24, xi. 12, and 1 Chr. i. 18, but is nowhere named in the Hebrew MSS., nor in any of the versions made from the Hebrew. It seems certain that his name was introduced into the genealogies of the Greek O. T. in order to bring them into harmony with the genealogy of Christ in St. Luke's Gospel, where Cainan was found in the time of Jerome. Probably Canaan was not inserted by St. Luke himself, but was afterwards added, either by accident, or to make up the number of generations to 17, or from some other cause which cannot now be discovered.

Cakes. [BREAD.]

Calah, one of the most ancient cities of Assyria. Its foundation is ascribed to the patriarch Asshur (Gen. x. 11). According to the opinions of the best Oriental antiquaries, the site of Calah is marked by the Nimrod ruins, which have furnished so large a proportion of the Assyrian remains at present in England. If this be regarded as ascertained, Calah must be considered to have been at one time (about B.C. 930-720) the capital of the empire.

Calamulalus, 1 Esdr. v. 22, a corrupt name; apparently agglomerated of ELAM, LOD and HADID.

Calamus. [REED.]

Cal'ool, a man of Judah, son or descendant of Zeiah (1 Chr. ii. 6). Probably identical with CHALCOL.

Caldron, a vessel for boiling flesh, either for ceremonial or domestic use (2 Chr. xxxv. 14; 1 Sam. ii. 14; Mic. iii. 3; Job xli. 20).

Bronze caldron from Egyptian Thebes. (Brit. Mus.)

Caleb. 1. According to 1 Chr. ii. 9, 18, 19, 42, 50, the son of Hezion, the son of Pharez, the son of Judah, and the father of Hur by Ephrath or Ephratah, and consequently grandfather of Caleb the spy. His brothers, according to the same authority, were Jerahmeel and Ram; his wives Azubah, Jerioth, and Ephrath; and his concubines Ephah and Manchah (ver. 9, 18, 19, 46, 48).—2. Son of Jephunneh, by which patronymic the illustrious spy is usually designated (Num. xlii. 6, and ten other places), with the addition of that of "the Kenazite," or "son of Kenaz," in Num. xxiii. 12; Josh. xiv. 6, 14. Caleb is first mentioned in the list of the rulers or princes who were sent to search the land of Canaan in the second year of the Exodus. Caleb was a prince or chief in the tribe of Judah, perhaps as chief of the family of the Hezronites. He and Oshea or Joshua the son of Nun were the only two of the whole number who, on their return from Canaan to Kadesh-Barnea, encouraged the people to enter in boldly to the land, and take possession of it; for which act of faithfulness they narrowly escaped stoning at the hands of the infuriated people. In the plague that ensued, while the other ten spies perished, Caleb and Joshua alone were spared. Forty-five years afterwards, when some progress had been made in the conquest of the land, Caleb came to Joshua and claimed possession of the land of the Anakims, Kirjath-Arba, or Hebron, and the neighbouring hill country (Josh. xiv.). This was immediately granted to him, and the following chapter relates how he took possession of Hebron, driving out the three sons of Anak; and how he offered Achsah his daughter in marriage to whoever would take Kirjath-Sepher, i. e. Debir; and how when Othniel, his younger brother, had performed the feat, he not only gave him his daughter to wife, but with her the upper and nether springs of water which she asked for. After this we hear no more of Caleb, nor is the time of his death recorded. But a very interesting question arises as to the birth and parentage of Caleb. He is, as we have seen, styled "the son of Jephunneh the Kenazite," and his younger brother Othniel, afterwards the first Judge, is also called "the son of Kenaz" (Josh. xv. 17; Judg. i. 13, iii. 9, 11). On the other hand the genealogy in 1 Chr. ii. makes no mention whatever of either Jephunneh or Kenaz, but represents Caleb, though obscurely, as being a descendant of Hezron and a son of Hur (see too ch. iv.). Again in Josh. xv. 13 we have this singular expression, "Unto Caleb the son of Jephunneh he gave a part among the children of Judah;" and in xiv. 14, the no less significant one, "Hebron became the inheritance of Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenazite, because that he wholly followed Jehovah God of Israel." It becomes therefore quite possible that Caleb was a foreigner by birth; a proselyte, incorporated into the tribe of Judah.—

3. CALEB-EPHRATAH, according to the present text of 1 Chr. ii. 24, the name of a place where Hezron died. But no such place was ever heard of. The present text must therefore be corrupt, and the reading which Jerome's Hebrew Bible had, and which is preserved in the LXX., is probably the true one, "Caleb came in unto Ephratah."

Calf. In Ex. xxxii. 4, we are told that Aaron, constrained by the people in the absence of Moses, made a molten calf of the golden earrings of the people, to represent the Elohim which brought Israel out of Egypt. It does not seem likely that the earrings would have provided the enormous quantity of gold required for a solid figure. More probably it was a wooden figure laminated with gold, a process which is known to have existed in Egypt. "A gilded ox covered with a pall" was an emblem of Osiris (Wilkinson, iv. 835). To punish the apostasy Moses burnt the calf, and then grinding it to powder scattered it over the water, where, according to some, it produced in the drinkers effects similar to the water of jealousy (Num. v.) He probably adopted this course as the deadliest and most irreparable blow to their superstition, or as an allegorical act (Job xv. 16), or with reference to an Egyptian custom (Herod. i. 41; Pol. Syn. ad loc.). The process which he used is difficult of explanation. Bochart and Rosenmüller think that he merely cut, ground, and filed the gold to powder. It has always been a great dispute respecting this calf and those of Jeroboam, whether, I. the Jews intended them for some Egyptian God, or II. for a mere cherubic symbol of Jehovah. Of the various sacred cows of Egypt, those of Isis, of Athor, and of the three kinds of sacred bulls, Apis, Basis, and Mnevis, Sir G. Wilkinson fixes on the latter as the prototype of the golden calf; "the offerings, dancings, and rejoicings practised on that occasion were doubtless in imitation of a ceremony they had witnessed in honour of Mnevis" (Anc. Egypt., v. 197). It seems to us more likely that in this calf-worship the Jews merely or in other words, adopted a well-understood cherubic emblem. The prophet Hosea is full of denunciations against the calf-worship of Israel (Hos. viii. 5, 6, x. 6), and mentions the curious custom of kissing them (xiii. 2). His change of Bethel into Bethaven possibly arose from contempt of this idolatry. The calf at Dan was carried away by Tiglath-Pileser, and that of Bethel ten years after by his son Shalmaneser (Prideaux, Conn. i. 15). In the expression "the calves of our lips" (Hos. xiv. 2), the word "calves" is used metaphorically for victims or sacrifices, and the passage signifies either "we will render to thee sacrifices of our lips," that is, "the tribute of thanksgiving and praise," or "we will offer to thee the sacrifices which our lips have vowed."

"Likened their Maker to the gravid ox;"

Cal'tas, 1 Esdr. ix. 23, 48. [KELITA.]

Callisthenes, a partisan of Nicanor, who was burnt by the Jews on the defeat of that general in revenge for his guilt in setting fire to "the sacred portals" (2 Macc. viii. 33).

Cal'neh, or Cal'no, appears in Genesis (x. 10) among the cities of Nimrod. Probably the site is the modern Niffer, which was certainly one of the early capitals, and which, under the name of Nopher, the Talmud identifies with Calneh. We may gather from Scripture that in the 8th century B.C. Calneh was taken by one of the Assyrian kings, and never recovered its prosperity (Is. x. 9; Am. vi. 2).

Cal'no, Is. x. 9. [CALNEH.]

Cal'phi, father of Judas, one of the two captains of Jonathan's army who remained firm at the battle of Gennesar (1 Macc. xi. 70).

Cal'vary, a word occurring in the A. V. only in Luke xxiii. 33, and there no proper name, but arising from the translators having literally adopted the word calvaria, i. e. a bare skull, the Vulgate rendering of σκαλος, which again is nothing but the Greek for GOLGOTHA. Prof. Stanley has not omitted (S. & P. 460, note) to call attention to the fact that the popular expression "Mount Calvary" is not warranted by any statement in the accounts of the place of our Lord's crucifixion.

Camel. Under this head we shall consider the Hebrew words gāmāl, bācher, or bichrah, and cir-carōth. As to the achasheran in Esth. viii.

10, erroneously translated "camels" by the A. V., see MULE (note).—1. Gāmal is the common Hebrew term to express the genus "camel," irrespective of any difference of species, age, or breed. It is clear from Gen. xii. 16 that camels were early known to the Egyptians, though no representation of this animal has yet been discovered in the paintings or hieroglyphics. The Ethiopians had "camels in abundance" (2 Chr. xiv. 15); the queen of Sheba came to Jerusalem "with camels that bare spices and gold and precious stones" (1 K. x. 2); the men of Kedar and of Hazor possessed camels (Jer. xlix. 29, 32); David took away the camels from the Geshurites and the Amalekites (1 Sam. xxvii. 9, xxx. 17); forty camels' burden of good things were sent to Elisha by Benhadad king of Syria from Damascus (2 K. viii. 9); the Ishmaelites trafficked with Egypt in the precious gums of Gilead, carried on the backs of camels (Gen. xxxvii. 25); the Midianites and the Amalekites possessed camels "as the sand by the sea-side for multitude" (Judg. vii. 12); Job had three thousand camels before his affliction (Job i. 3), and six thousand afterwards (xlii. 12). The camel was used for riding (Gen. xxiv. 64; 1 Sam. xxx. 17); as a beast of burden generally (Gen. xxxvii. 25; 2 K. viii. 9, 1 K. x. 2, &c.); and for draught purposes (Is. xxi. 7). From 1 Sam. xxx. 17 we learn that camels were used in war. John the Baptist wore a garment made of camel's hair (Matt. iii. 4; Mark i. 6), and some have supposed that Elijah "was clad in a dress of the same stuff." Chardin (in Harmer's Observ. ii. 487) says the people in the East make vestments of camel's hair, which they pull off the animal at the time it is changing its coat. Camel's milk was much esteemed by Orientals, and was in all probability used by the Hebrews, though no distinct reference to it is made in the Bible. Camel's flesh, although much esteemed by the Arabs, was forbidden as food to the Israelites (Lev. xi. 4; Deut. xiv. 7), because, though the camel "cheweth the cud, it divideth not the hoof." Dr. Kitto (Phys. H. of Palest. p. 391) says "the Arabs adorn the necks of their camels with a band of cloth or leather, upon which are strung small shells called cowries in the form of half-moons," thus very aptly illustrates Judg. viii. 21, 26, with reference to the moon-shaped ornaments that were on the necks of the camels which Gideon took from Zebah and Zalmunna. From the temperate habits of the camel with regard to its requirements of food and water, and from its wonderful adaptation, both structurally and physiologically, to traverse the arid regions which for miles afford but a scanty herbage, we can readily give credence to the immense numbers which Scripture speaks of as the property either of tribes or individuals. The three thousand camels of Job may be illustrated to the very letter by a passage in Aristotle (H. A. ix. 37, §5): "Now some men in upper Asia possess as many as three thousand camels."—2. Bécher, bichrah (Is. lx. 6; Jer. ii. 23). The Hebrew words occur only in two passages above named, where the A. V. reads "dromedary."

Bochart (Hieroz. i. 15, sq.) contends that the Hebrew word is indicative only of a difference in age, and adduces the authority of the Arabic becra in support of his opinion that a young camel is signified by the term. Etymologically the Hebrew word is more in favour of the "dromedary." So too are the old versions.—3. As to the circārāth of Is. lvi. 20 (A. V. "swift beasts") there is some difference of opinion. The explanation is not satisfactory which is given by Bochart (Hieroz. i. 25), following some of the Rabbis, and adopted by Rosenmüller, Gesenius, Lee, and others, that "dro-medaries" are meant. We prefer, with Michaelis and Parkhurst, to understand the "panniers" or "baskets" carried on the backs of camels or mules, and to refer the word to its unreduplicated form in Gen. xxxi. 34. The species of camel which was in common use amongst the Jews and the heathen nations of Palestine was the Arabian or one-humped camel (Camelus Arabicus). The dromedary is a swifter animal than the baggage-camel, and is used chiefly for riding purposes, it is merely a finer breed than the other: the Arabs call it the Heir

The speed of the dromedary has been greatly exaggerated, the Arabs asserting that it is swifter than the horse; eight or nine miles an hour is the utmost it is able to perform; this pace, however, it is able to keep up for hours together. The camel, as may be readily conceived, is the subject amongst Orientals of many proverbial expressions; see many cited by Bochart (Hieroz. i. 30), and comp. Matt. xxiii. 24, and xix. 24, where there can be no doubt of the correctness of the A. V., notwithstanding the attempts which are made from time to time to explain away the expression; the very magnitude of the hyperbole is evidence in its favour: with the Talmuds "an elephant passing through a needle's eye" was a common figure to denote anything impossible. The camel belongs to the family Camelidae, order Ruminantia.

Camon, the place in which JAIR the Judge was buried (Judg. x. 5). Josephus says that it was a city of Gilead. In modern times, however, the name has not been recovered on the E. of Jordan.

Camp. [ENCAMPMENTS.]

Camphire (Heb. côpher). There can be no doubt that "camphire" is an incorrect rendering of the Hebrew term, which occurs in the sense of some aromatic substance only in Cant. i. 14, iv. 13: the margin in both passages has "cypress," giving the form but not the signification of the Greek word. Camphire, or, as it is now generally written, camphor, is the product of a tree largely cultivated in the island of Formosa, the Camphora officinarum, of the Nat. order Lauraceae. From the expression "cluster of côpher in the vineyards of Engedi," in Cant. i. 14, the Chakdee version reads "bunches of grapes." Several versions retain the Hebrew word. The substance really denoted by côpher is the Lawsonia alba of botanists, the henna of Arabian naturalists. The inhabitants of Nubia call the henna-plant Khofreh. Hasselquist (Trav. 246, Lond. 1766), speaking of this plant, says "the leaves are pulverised and made into a paste with water; the Egyptians bind this paste on the nails of their hands and feet, and keep it on all night: this gives them a deep yellow, which is greatly admired by Eastern nations. The colour lasts for three or four weeks before there is occasion to renew it. The custom is so ancient in Egypt that I have seen the nails of the mummies dyed in this manner." Sonnini (Voyage, i. p. 297) says the women are fond of decorating themselves with the flowers of the henna-plant; that they take them in their hand and perfume their bosoms with them. Compare with this Cant. i. 13.—The Lawsonia alba when young is without thorns, and when older is spinous, whence Linnaeus's names, L. inermis and L. spinosa; he regarding his specimens as two distinct species. The henna-plant grows in Egypt, Syria, Arabia, and N. India. The flowers are white and grow in clusters and are very fragrant. The whole shrub is from four to six feet high. The Lawsonia alba, the only known species, belongs to the natural order Lythraceae.

Ca'na of Galilee, once Cana in Galilee, a village or town not far from Capernaum, memorable as the scene of Christ's first miracle (John ii. 1, 11, iv. 46) as well as of a subsequent one (iv. 46, 54), and also as the native place of the Apostle Nathanael (xxi. 2). The traditional site is at Kefr Kenna, a small village about $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Nazareth. It now contains only the ruins of a church said to stand over the house in which the miracle was performed, and—doubtless much older—the fountain from which the water for the miracle was brought. The tradition identifying Kefr Kenna with Cana is certainly of considerable age. It existed in the time of Willibald (the latter half of the 8th cent.), who visited it in passing from Nazareth to Tabor, and again in that of Phocas (12th cent.). But the claims of another site have been lately brought forward by Dr. Robinson with much force. The rival site is a village situated further north, about 5 miles north of Seffurieh (Sephoris) and 9 of Nazareth, near the present Jefat, the Jotapata of the Jewish wars. This village still bears the name of Kana-el-jelû. The Gospel history will not be affected whichever site may be discovered to be the real one.

Ca'naan. 1. The fourth son of Ham (Gen. x. 6; 1 Chr. i. 8); the progenitor of the Phœnicians ("Zidon"), and of the various nations who before the Israelite conquest peopled the sea-coast of Palestine, and generally the whole of the country westward of the Jordan (Gen. x. 13; 1 Chr. i. 13).—2. The name "Canaan" is sometimes employed for the country itself—more generally styled "the land of C." It is so in Zeph. ii. 5; and we also find "Language of C." (Is. xix. 18): "Wars of C." (Judg. iii. 1): "Inhabitants of C." (Ex. xv. 15): "King of C." (Judg. iv. 2, 23, 24, v. 19): "Daughters of C." (Gen. xxviii. 1, 6, 8, xxxvi. 2): "Kingdoms of C." (Ps. cxxxv. 11). In addition to the above, the word occurs in several passages where it is concealed in the A. V. by being translated. These are: Is. xxiii. 8, "traffickers," and xxiii. 11, "the merchant city;" Hos. xii. 7, "He is a merchant;" Zeph. i. 11, "merchant-

Ca'naan, the Land of, lit. "Lowland," a name denoting the country west of the Jordan and Dead Sea, and between those waters and the Mediterranean; specially opposed to the "land of Gilead," that is the high table-land on the east of the Jordan. True, the district to which the name of "Jewland" is thus applied contained many very elevated spots; but high as the level of much of the country west of the Jordan undoubtedly is, there are several things which must always have prevented, as they still prevent it, from leaving an impression of elevation. These are, (1) that remarkable, wide, maritime plain over which the eye ranges for miles from the central hills; (2) the still deeper, and still more remarkable and impressive hollow of the Jordan valley; and, (3) there is the almost constant presence of the long high line of the mountains east of the Jordan. The word "Canaanite" was used in the O. T. in two senses, a broader and a narrower, which will be most conveniently examined under that head; but this does not appear to be the case with "Canaan," at least in the older cases of its occurrence. It is only in later notices, such as Zeph. ii. 5, and Matt. xv. 22, that we find it applied to the low maritime plains of Philistia and Phœnicia (comp. Mark vii. 26).

Canaanite, The, the designation of the Apostle SIMON, otherwise known as "Simon Zelotes." It occurs in Matt. x. 4; Mark iii. 18. The word does not signify a descendant of Canaan, nor a native of Cana, but it comes from a Chaldee or Syriac word, Kannedan or Knonoyo, by which the Jewish sect or faction of "the Zealots" was designated. This Syriac word is the reading of the Peshito version. The Greek equivalent is Zelotes, and this St. Luke (vi. 15; Acts i. 13) has correctly preserved.

Canaanites, The, a word used in two senses:—1. a tribe which inhabited a particular locality of the land west of the Jordan before the conquest; and 2. the people who inhabited generally the whole of that country.—1. For the tribe of "the Canaanites" only—the dwellers in the lowland. The whole of the country west of Jordan was a "lowland" as compared with the loftier and more extended tracts on the east; but there was a part of this western country which was still more emphatically a "lowland." a. There were the plains lying between the shore of the Mediterranean and the foot of the hills of Benjamin, Judah, and Ephraim. b. But separated entirely from these was the still lower region of the Jordan Valley or Arabah. "The Canaanite dwells by the sea, and by the side of Jordan" (Num. xiii. 29). In Gen. x. 18-20 the seats of the Canaanite tribe are given as on the sea-shore and in the Jordan Valley. In Josh. xi. 3 "the Canaanite on the east and the west" is carefully distinguished from the Amorite who held "the mountain" in the centre of the country.—2. Applied as a general name to the non-Israelite inhabitants of the land, as we have already seen was the case with "Canaan." Instances of this are, Gen. xii. 6; Num. xxi. 3; Judg. i. 10; and Gen. xiii. 12. See also Gen. xxiv. 3, 37, comp. xxviii. 2, 6; Ex. xiii. 11, comp. 5. Like the Phœnicians, the Canaanites were probably given to commerce; and thus the name became probably in later times an occasional synonym for a merchant (Job xli. 6; Prov. xxxi. 24; comp. Is. xxiii. 8, 11; Hos. xii. 7; Zeph. i. 11).—Of the language of the Canaanites little can be said. On the one hand, being—if the genealogy of Gen. x. be right—Hamites, there could be no affinity between their language and that of the Israelites, who were descendants of Shem. On the other is the fact that Abram and Jacob, shortly after their entrance to the country, seem able to hold converse with them, and also that the names of Canaanite persons and places which we possess are translatable into Hebrew. But we know that the Egyptian and Assyrian names have been materially altered in their adoption into Hebrew records. May not a similar process have taken place when the Hebrews took possession of the Canaanite towns, and "called the lands after their own names?"

Canda'ce, a queen of Ethiopia (Meroë), mentioned Acts viii. 27. The name was not a proper name of an individual, but that of a dynasty of Ethiopian queens.

Candlestick, which Moses was commanded to make for the tabernacle, is described Ex. xxv. 31-37. xxxvii. 17-24. It is called in Lev. xxiv. 4, "the pure," and in Eccles. xxvi. 17, "the holy candlestick." With its various appurtenances it required a talent of "pure gold," and it was not moulded, but "of beaten work." Josephus, however, says that it was of cast gold, and hollow. As the description given in Exodus is not very clear, we abbreviate Lightfoot's explanation of it. "The foot of it was gold, from which went up a shaft straight, which was the middle light. Near the foot was a golden dish wrought almondwise; and a little above that a golden knop, and above that a golden flower. Then two branches, one on each side, bowed, and coming up as high as the middle shaft. On each of them were three golden cups placed almondwise on sharp, scollop-shell fashion; above which was a golden knop, a golden flower, and the socket. Above the branches on the middle shaft was a golden boss, above which rose two shafts more; above the coming out of these was another boss, and two more shafts, and then on the shaft upwards were three golden scollop-cups, a knop, and a flower: so that the heads of the branches stood an equal height" (Works, ii. 399, ed. Pitman). The whole weight of the candlestick was 100 minae; its height was, according to the Rabbis, 5 feet, and the breadth, or distance between the exterior branches, 3½ feet. It has been calculated to have been worth 5076*l.* exclusive of workmanship. Generally it was "a type of preaching" or of "the light of the law" (Lightfoot, l. c.). Similarly candlesticks are made types of the Spirit, of the Church, of witnesses, &c. (comp. Zech. iv.; Rev. ii. 5, xi. 4, &c.). The candlestick was placed on the south side of the first apartment of the tabernacle, opposite the table of shew-bread (Ex. xxv. 37), and was lighted every evening and dressed every morning (Ex. xxvii. 20, 21, xxx. 8; comp.

Candlestick. (From Arch of Titus.)

1 Sam. iii. 2). Each lamp was supplied with cotton, and half a log of the purest olive-oil (about two wine-glasses), which was sufficient to keep them burning during a long night. When carried about, the candlestick was covered with a cloth of blue, and put with its appendages in badger-skin bags, which were supported on a bar (Num. iv. 9). In Solomon's Temple, instead of this candlestick, there were ten golden candlesticks similarly embossed, five on the right and five on the left (1 K. vii. 49; 2 Chr. iv. 7). They were taken to Babylon (Jer. lii. 19). In the Temple of Zerubbabel there was again a single candlestick (1 Macc. i. 23, v. 49). The description given of it by Josephus agrees only tolerably with the deeply interesting sculpture on the Arch of Titus; but he drops a hint that it was not identical with the one used in the Temple.

Can'neh (Ex. xxvii. 23), probably a contraction of Calneh, which is the reading of one MS.

Canon of Scripture, The, may be generally described as "the collection of books which form the original and authoritative written rule of the faith and practice of the Christian Church." Starting from this definition it will be the object of the present article to examine shortly—I. The original meaning of the term: II. The Jewish Canon of the Old Testament Scriptures as to (a) its formation, and (b) extent: III. The Christian Canon of the Old; and IV. of the New Testament.—I. The use of the word Canon.—The word Canon, in classical Greek, is (1) properly a straight rod, as the rod of a shield, or that used in weaving, or a carpenter's rule. (2) The last usage offers an easy transition to the metaphorical use of the word for a testing rule in ethics, or in art, or in language. (3) But in addition to these active meanings the word was also used passively for a measured space, and, in later times, for a fixed tax. The ecclesiastical usage of the word offers a complete parallel to the classical. In patristic writings the word is commonly used both as "a rule" in the widest sense, and especially in the phrases "the rule of the Church," "the rule of faith," "the rule of truth." This rule was regarded either as the abstract, ideal standard, embodied only in the life and action of the Church; or, again, as the concrete, definite creed, which set forth the facts from which that life sprang. As applied to Scripture the derivatives of kanón are used long before the simple word. The Latin translation of Origen speaks of Scripturae Canonicae (De Princ. iv. 33), libri regulares (Comm. in Matt. §17), and libri canonizati (id. §28). This circumstance seems to show that the title "Canonical" was first given to writings in the sense of "admitted by the rule," and not as "forming part of and giving the rule." The first direct application of the term kanón to the Scriptures seems to be in the verses of Amphilochius (c. 380 A.D.), where the word indicates the rule by which the contents of the Bible must be determined, and thus secondarily an index of the constituent books. Among Latin writers it is commonly found from the time of Jerome and Augustine, and their usage of the word, which is wider than that of Greek writers, is the source of its modern acceptance. The uncanonical books were described simply as "those without," or "those uncanonized." The Apocryphal books, which were supposed to occupy an intermediate position, were called "books read," or "ecclesiastical," though the latter title was also applied to the canonical Scriptures. The canonical books were also called "books of the Testament," and Jerome styled the whole collection by the striking name of "the holy library," which happily expresses the unity and variety of the Bible.—

II. (a) The formation of the Jewish Canon.—The history of the Jewish Canon in the earliest times is beset with the greatest difficulties. Before the period of the exile only faint traces occur of the solemn preservation and use of sacred books. According to the command of Moses the "book of the law" was "put in the side of the ark" (Deut. xxxi. 26), but not in it (1 K. viii. 9; comp. Joseph. Ant. iii. 1, §7, v. 1, §17), and thus in the reign of Josiah, Hilkiah is said to have "found the book of the law in the house of the Lord" (2 K. xxii. 8; comp. 2 Chr. xxxiv. 14). This "book of the law," which, in addition to the direct precepts (Ex. xxiv. 7), contained general exhortations (Deut. xxviii. 61) and historical narratives (Ex. xvii. 14), was further increased by the records of Joshua (Josh. xxiv. 26), and probably by other writings (1 Sam. x. 25). At a subsequent time collections of proverbs were made (Prov. xxv. 1), and the later prophets (especially Jeremiah) were familiar with the writings of their predecessors. It perhaps marks a further step in the formation of the Canon when "the book of the Lord" is mentioned by Isaiah as a general collection of sacred teaching (xxxiv. 16; comp. xxix. 18), at once familiar and authoritative; but it is unlikely that any definite collection either of "the psalms" or of "the prophets" existed before the captivity. At that time Zechariah speaks of "the law" and "the former prophets" as in some measure co-ordinate (Zech. vii. 12); and Daniel refers to "the books" (Dan. ix. 2) in a manner which seems to mark the prophetic writings as already collected into a whole. Even after the captivity the history of the Canon, like all Jewish history up to the date of the Maccabees, is wrapped in great obscurity. Popular belief assigned to Ezra and "the great synagogue" the task of collecting and promulgating the Scriptures as part of their work in organising the Jewish Church. Doubts have been thrown upon this belief, but it is in every way consistent with the history of Judaism and with the internal evidence of the books themselves. The account (2 Macc. ii. 13) which assigns a collection of books to Nehemiah is in itself a confirmation of the general truth of the gradual formation of the Canon during the Persian period. The persecution of Antiochus (B.C. 168) was for the Old Testament what the persecution of Diocletian was for the New, the final crisis which stamped the sacred writings with their peculiar character. The king sought out "the books of the law" (1 Macc. i. 56) and burnt them; and the possession of a "book of the covenant" was a capital crime (Joseph. Ant. xii. 5, §4). After the Maccabean persecution the history of the formation of the Canon is merged in the history of its contents. The Bible appears from that time as a whole, and it is of the utmost importance to notice that the collection was peculiar in character and circumscribed in contents. All the evidence which can be obtained, though it is confessedly scanty, tends to show that it is false, both in theory and fact, to describe the O. T. as "all the relics of the Hebrew-Chaldaeal literature up to a certain epoch," if the phrase is intended to refer to the time when the Canon was completed.—

(8) The contents of the Jewish Canon.—The first notice of the O. T. as consisting of distinct and definite parts occurs in the prologue to the Greek translation of the Wisdom of Sirach (Ecclesiasticus in which "the law, the prophecies, and the remainder of the books" are mentioned as integral sections of a completed whole. A like threefold classification is used for describing the entire O. T. in the Gospel of St. Luke (xxiv. 44; comp. Acts xxviii. 23). The general contents of these three classes still, however, remain to be determined. JOSEPHUS, the earliest direct witness on the subject, enumerates twenty books "which are justly believed to be divine:" five books of Moses, thirteen of the prophets, extending to the reign of Artaxerxes (i. e. Esther, according to Josephus), and four which contain hymns and directions for life (Joseph. c. Apion. i. 8). Still there is some ambiguity in this enumeration, for in order to make up the numbers it is necessary either to rank Job among the prophets, or to exclude one book, and in that case probably Ecclesiastes, from the Hagiographa. The former alternative is the more probable, for it is worthy of special notice that Josephus regarded primarily the historic character of the prophets. The popular belief that the Sadducees received only the books of Moses rests on no sufficient authority. The casual quotations of Josephus agree with his express Canon. The writings of the N. T. completely confirm the testimony of Josephus. Coincidences of language show that the Apostles were familiar with several of the Apocryphal books; but they do not contain one authoritative or direct quotation from them, while, with the exception of Judges, Eccl., Cant., Esther, Ezra, and Nehemiah, every other book in the Hebrew Canon is used either for illustration or proof. Several of the early fathers describe the contents of the Hebrew Canon in terms which generally agree with the results already obtained. MELITO of Sardis (c. 179 A.D.) in a journey to the East made the question of the exact number and order of "the books of the Old Testament" a subject of special inquiry. He gives the result in the following form: the books are, 5 Moses . . . Josh., Judg., Ruth, 4 K., 2 Chr., Ps., Prov., Eccl., Cant., Job, Is., Jer., xii. Proph., Dan., Ez., Esdr. ORIGEN, in enumerating the 22 books "which the Hebrews hand down as included in the Testament," omits the book of the 12 minor prophets, and adds "the letter" to the book of Jeremiah and Lamentations. The statement of JEROME is clear and complete. He gives the contents of the Law, the Prophets, and the Hagiographa, in exact accordance with the Hebrew authorities, placing Daniel in the last class; and adding that whatever is without the number of these must be placed among the Apocrypha. The statement of the Talmud is in many respects so remarkable that it must be transcribed entire. "But who wrote [the books of the Bible]? Moses wrote his own book, ? the Pentateuch, the section about Balaam, and Job. Joshua wrote his own book and the eight [last] verses of the Pentateuch. Samuel wrote his own book, the book of Judges, and Ruth. David wrote the book of Psalms [of which however some were composed] by the ten venerable elders, Adam, the first man, Melchizedek, Abraham, Moses, He-man, Jeduthun, Asaph, and the three sons of Korah. Jeremiah wrote his own book, the books of Kings and Lamentations. Hezekiah and his friends reduced to writing the books contained in the Memorial word laMSHaK, i. e. Isaiah, Proverbs, Canticles, Ecclesiastes. The men of the Great Synagogue reduced to writing the books contained in the memorial word KaNDaG, i. e. Ezekiel, the 12 lesser prophets, Daniel, and Esther. Ezra wrote his own book, and brought down the genealogies of the books of Chronicles to his own times. . . . Who brought the remainder of the books [of Chronicles] to a close? Nehemiah the son of Hachaliah." In spite of the comparatively late date (c. A.D. 500) from which this tradition is derived, it is evidently in essence the earliest description of the work of Ezra and the Great Synagogue which has been preserved. The details must be tested by other evidence, but the general description of the growth of the Jewish Canon bears every mark of probability. The later Jewish Catalogues throw little light upon the Canon. They generally reckon twenty-two books, equal in number to the letters of the Hebrew alphabet, five of the Law, eight of the Prophets (Josh., Judg. and Ruth, 1, 2 Sam., 1, 2 K., Is., Jer. and Lam., Ez., 12 Proph.), and nine of the Hagiographa. The last number was more commonly increased to eleven by the distinct enumeration of the books of Ruth and Lamentations ("the 24 Books"). In Hebrew MSS., and in the early editions of the O. T., the arrangement of the later books offers great variations, but they generally agree in reckoning all separately except the books of Ezra and Nehemiah. So far then it has been shown that the Hebrew Canon was uniform and coincident with our own; but while the Palestinian Jews combined to preserve the strict limits of the old prophetic writings, the Alexandrine Jews allowed themselves greater freedom. But so far as an authoritative Canon existed in Egypt, it is probable that it was the same as that of Palestine, and that at the beginning of the Christian era the Jews had only one Canon of the sacred writings, and that this Canon was recognised, as far as can be determined, by our Lord and His apostles.—III. The History of the Christian Canon of the Old Testament.—The history of the Old Testament Canon among Christian writers exhibits the natural issue of the currency of the LXX., enlarged as it had been by apocryphal additions. In proportion as the Fathers were more or less absolutely dependent on that version for their knowledge of the Old Testament Scriptures, they gradually lost in common practice the sense of the difference between the books of the Hebrew Canon and the Apocrypha. The custom of individuals grew into the custom of the Church; but the custom of the Church was not fixed in an absolute judgment. The history of the Christian Canon is to be sought in the first instance from definite catalogues, and not from isolated quotations. But even this evidence is incomplete and unsatisfactory, few of the catalogues being really independent, as will be seen by the subjoined table (No. 1.). They evidently fall into two great classes, Hebrew and Latin; and the former, again, exhibits three distinct varieties, which are to be traced to the three original sources from which the catalogues were derived. The first may be called the pure Hebrew Canon, which is that of the Church of England. The second differs from this by the omission of the book of Esther. The third differs by the addition of Baruch, or "the Letter." During the four first centuries this Hebrew Canon is the only one which is distinctly recognised, and it is supported by the combined authority of those Fathers whose critical judgment is entitled to the greatest weight. The real divergence as to the contents of the Old Testament Canon is to be traced to AUGUSTINE, whose wavering and uncertain language on the point furnishes abundant materials for controversy. In a famous passage (De Doctr. Christ. ii. 8 (13)) he enumerates the books which are contained in "the whole Canon of Scripture," and includes among them the apocryphal books without any clear mark of distinction. This general statement is further confirmed by two other passages, in which it is argued that he draws a distinction between the Jewish and Christian Canons, and refers the authority of the Apocryphal books to the judgment of the Christian Church. But in each case a distinction is drawn between the "Ecclesiastical" and properly "Canonical" books. The enlarged Canon of Augustine, which was, as it will be seen, wholly unsupported by any Greek authority, was adopted at the COUNCIL OF CARTHAGE (A.D. 397?), though with a reservation, and afterwards published in the decretals which bear the name of INNOCENT, DAMASUS, and GELASIUS; and it recurs in many later writers. But nevertheless a continuous succession of the more learned Fathers in the West maintained the distinctive authority of the Hebrew Canon up to the period of the Reformation. —Up to the date of the COUNCIL OF TRENT the Romanists allow that the question of the Canon was open, but one of the first labours of that assembly was to circumscribe a freedom which the growth of literature seemed to render perilous. The decree of the Council "on the Canonical Scriptures" pronounced the enlarged Canon, including the apocryphal books, to be deserving in all its parts of "equal veneration," and added a list of books "to prevent the possibility of doubt." This hasty and peremptory decree, unlike in its form to any catalogue before published, was closed by a solemn anathema against all who should "not receive the entire books with all their parts as sacred and canonical." This decree was not, however, passed without opposition; and in spite of the absolute terms in which it is expressed, later Romanists have sought to find a method of escaping from the definite equalization of the two classes of sacred writings by a forced interpretation of the subsidiary clauses. —The reformed churches unanimously agreed in confirming the Hebrew Canon of Jerome, and refused to allow any dogmatic authority to the apocryphal books; but the form in which this judgment was expressed varied considerably in the different confessions. The English Church (Art. 6) appeals directly to the opinion of St. Jerome, and concedes to the Apocryphal books (including [1571] 4 Esdras and The Prayer of Manasses) a use "for example of life and instruction of manners," but not for the establishment of doctrine. —The expressed opinion of the later Greek Church on the Canon of Scripture has been modified in some cases by the circumstances under which the declaration was made. The authorised Russian Catechism distinctly quotes and defends the Hebrew Canon on the authority of the Greek Fathers, and repeats the judgment of Athanasius on the usefulness of the Apocryphal books as a preparatory study in the Bible; and there can be no doubt but that the current of Greek opinion, in accordance with the unanimous agreement of the ancient Greek Catalogues, coincides with this judgment.—The history of the Syrian Canon of the O. T. is involved in great obscurity from the scantiness of the evidence which can be brought to bear upon it. The Peshito Version was made, in the first instance, directly from the Hebrew, and consequently adhered to the Hebrew Canon; but as the LXX. was used afterwards in revising the version, so many of the Apocryphal books were translated from the Greek at an early period, and added to the original collection. Yet this change was only made gradually. —The Armenian Canon, as far as it can be ascertained from editions, follows that of the LXX., but it is of no critical authority; and a similar remark applies to the Aethiopian Canon.—IV. The history of the Canon of the New Testament.—The history of the Canon of the N. T. presents a remarkable analogy to that of the Canon of the O. T. The chief difference lies in the general consent with which all the Churches of the West have joined in ratifying one Canon of the N. T., while they are divided as to the position of the O. T. Apocrypha. The history of the N. T. Canon may be conveniently divided into three periods. The first extends to the time of Hegesippus (c. A.D. 170) and includes the era of the separate circulation and gradual collection of the Apostolic writings. The second is closed by the persecution of Diocletian (A.D. 303), and marks the separation of the sacred writings from the remaining ecclesiastical literature. The third may be defined by the third Council of Carthage (A.D. 397), in which a catalogue of the books of Scripture was formally ratified by conciliar authority.—1. The history of the Canon of the New Testament to 170 A.D.—The writings of the N. T. themselves contain little more than faint, and perhaps unconscious, intimations of the position which they were destined to occupy. The mission of the Apostles was essentially one of preaching, and not of writing: of founding a present Church, and not of legislating for a future one. The prevailing method of interpreting the O. T., and the peculiar position which the first Christians occupied, as standing upon the verge of "the coming age," seemed to preclude the necessity and even the use of a "New Testament." Yet even thus, though there is nothing to indicate that the Apostles regarded their written remains as likely to preserve a perfect exhibition of the sum of Christian truth, co-ordinate with the Law and the Prophets, they claim for their writings a public use (1 Thess. v. 27; Col. iv. 16; Rev. xii. 18), and an authoritative power (1 Tim. iv. 1, &c.; 2 Thess. iii. 6; Rev. xii. 19); and, at the time when 2 Peter was written, which on any supposition is an extremely early writing, the Epistles of St. Paul were placed in significant connexion with "the other Scriptures." —The transition from the Apostolic to the sub-Apostolic age is essentially abrupt and striking. An age of conservatism succeeds an age of creation; but in feeling and general character the period which followed the working of the Apostles seems to have been a faithful reflection of that which they moulded. The writings of the APOSTOLIC FATHERS (c. 70-120 A.D.) are all occasional. They sprang out of peculiar circumstances, and offered little scope for quotation. At the same time they show that the Canonical books supply an adequate explanation of the belief of the next age, and must therefore represent completely the earlier teaching on which that was based. In three places, however, in which it was natural to look for a more distinct reference, Clement (Ep. 47), Ignatius (ad Eph. 12), and Polycarp (Ep. 3) refer to Apostolic Epistles written to those whom they were themselves addressing. The casual coincidences of the writings of the Apostolic Fathers with the language of the Epistles are much more extensive. With the exception of the Epistles of Jude, 2 Peter, and 2, 3 John, with which no coincidences occur, and 1, 2 Thessalonians, Colossians, Titus, and Philemon, with which the coincidences are very questionable, all the other Epistles were clearly known, and used by them; but still they are not quoted with the formulae which preface citations from the O. T., nor is the famous phrase of Ignatius (ad Philad. 5) sufficient to prove the existence of a collection of Apostolic records as distinct from the sum of Apostolic teaching. The coincidences with the Gospels, on the other hand, are numerous and interesting, but such as cannot be referred to the exclusive use of our present written Gospels. The details of the life of Christ were still too fresh to be sought for only in fixed records; and even where memory was less active, long habit interposed a barrier to the recognition of new Scriptures. The sense of the infinite depth and paramount authority of the O. T. was too powerful even among Gentile converts to require or to admit of the immediate addition of supplementary books. But the sense of the peculiar position which the Apostles occupied, as the original inspired teachers of the Christian Church, was already making itself felt in the sub-Apostolic age.—The next period (120-170 A.D.), which may be fitly termed the age of the Apologists, carries the history of the formation of the Canon one step further. The facts of the life of Christ acquired a fresh importance in controversy with Jew and Gentile. The oral tradition, which still remained in the former age, was dying away, and a variety of written documents claimed to occupy its place. Then it was that the Canonical Gospels were definitely separated from the mass of similar narratives in virtue of their outward claims, which had remained, as it were, in abeyance during the period of tradition. Other narratives remained current for some time, but where the question of authority was raised, the four Gospels were ratified by universal consent. The testimony of JUSTIN MARTYR († c. 146 A.D.) is in this respect most important. An impartial examination of his Evangelic references shows that they were derived certainly in the main, probably exclusively, from our Synoptic Gospels, and that each Gospel is distinctly recognised by him. The references of Justin to St. John are less decided; and of the other books of the N. T. he mentions the Apocalypse only by name (Dial. c. 81), and offers some coincidences of language with the Pauline Epistles.—The evidence of PARIAS (c. 140-150 A.D.) is nearly contemporary with that of Justin, but goes back to a still earlier generation. It seems on every account most reasonable to conclude that he was acquainted with our present Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Mark, the former of which he connected with an earlier Hebrew original; and probably also with the Gospel of St. John, the former Epistles of St. John and St. Peter, and the Apocalypse. Meanwhile the Apostolic writings were taken by various mystical teachers as the foundation of strange schemes of speculation, which are popularly confounded together under the general title of Gnosticism, whether Gentile or Jewish in their origin. The need of a definite Canon must have made itself felt during the course of the Gnostic controversy. The Canon of MARCON (c. 140 A.D.) contained both a Gospel ("The Gospel of Christ") which was a mutilated recension of St. Luke, and an "Apostle" or Apostolicon, which contained ten Epistles of St. Paul—the only true Apostle in Marcion's judgment—excluding the pastoral Epistles, and that to the Hebrews. The narrow limits of this Canon were a necessary consequence of Marcion's belief and position, but it offers a clear witness to the fact that Apostolic writings were thus early regarded as a complete original rule of doctrine.—The close of this period of the history of the N. T. Canon is marked by the existence of two important testimonies to the N. T. as a whole. Hitherto the evidence has been in the main fragmentary and occasional; but the MURATORIAN CANON in the West, and the PESHITO in the East, deal with the collection of Christian Scriptures as such. Up to this point 2 Peter is the only book of the N. T. which is not recognised as an Apostolic and authoritative writing; and in this result the evidence from casual quotations coincides exactly with the enumeration in the two express catalogues.—2. The history of the Canon of the N. T. from 170 A.D. to 303 A.D.—From the close of the second century Christian writers take the foremost place intellectually as well as morally; and the powerful influence of the Alexandrine Church widened the range of Catholic thought, and checked the spread of speculative heresies. From the first the common elements of the Roman and Syrian Canons form a Canon of acknowledged books, regarded as a whole, authoritative and inspired, and coordinate with the O. T. Each of these points is proved by the testimony of contemporary Fathers who represent the Churches of Asia Minor, Alexandria, and North Africa. IRENAEUS speaks of the Scriptures as a whole, without distinction of the Old or New Testaments, as "perfect, inasmuch as they were uttered by the Word of God and His Spirit." "There could not be," he elsewhere argues, "more than four Gospels or fewer." CLEMENT of ALEXANDRIA, again, marks "the Apostle" as a collection definite as "the Gospel," and combines them as "Scriptures of the Lord" with the Law and the Prophets. TERTULLIAN notices particularly the introduction of the word Testament for the earlier word Instrument, as applied to the dispensation and the record, and appeals to the New Testament, as made up of the "Gospels" and "Apostles." This comprehensive testimony extends to the four Gospels, the Acts, 1 Peter, 1 John, 13 Epistles of St. Paul, and the Apocalypse; and, with the exception of the Apocalypse, no one of these books was ever afterwards rejected or questioned till modern times. But this important agreement as to the principal contents of the Canon left several points still undecided. The East and West, as was seen in the last section, severally received some books which were not universally accepted. So far the error lay in defect; but in other cases apocryphal or unapostolic books obtained a partial sanction or a popular use before they finally passed into oblivion. Generally it may be said that of the "disputed" books of the N. T. the Apocalypse was universally received, with the single exception of Dionysius of Alexandria, by all the writers of the period; and the Epistle to the Hebrews, by the Churches of Alexandria, Asia (?), and Syria, but not by those of Africa and Rome. The Epistles of St. James and St. Jude, on the other hand, were little used, and the Second Ep. of St. Peter was barely known.—3. The history of the N. T. Canon from A.D. 303-397.—The persecution of Diocletian was directed in a great measure against the Christian writings. The plan of the emperor was in part successful. Some were found who obtained protection by the surrender of the sacred books, and at a later time the question of the readmission of these "traitors" (traditores), as they were emphatically called, created a schism in the Church. The Donatists, who maintained the sterner judgment on their crime, may be regarded as maintaining in its strictest integrity the popular judgment in Africa on the contents of the Canon of Scripture which was the occasion of the dissension; and Augustine allows that they held in common with the Catholics the same "Canonical Scriptures," and were alike "bound by the authority of both Testaments." The complete Canon of the N. T., as commonly received at present, was ratified at the third COUNCIL of CARTHAGE (A.D. 397), and from that time was accepted throughout the Latin Church, though occasional doubts as to the Epistle to the Hebrews still remained. Meanwhile the Syrian Churches, faithful to the conservative spirit of the East, still retained the Canon of the Peshito. CHRYSOSTOM (†407 A.D.), THEODORE of MOPSUESTIA (†429 A.D.), and THEODORET, who represent the Church of Antioch, furnish no evidence in support of the Epistles of Jude, 2 Peter, 2, 3 John, or the Apocalypse. JUNILIUS, in his account of the public teaching at Nisibis, places the Epistles of James, Jude, 2, 3 John, 2 Peter in a second class, and mentions the doubts which existed in the East as to the Apocalypse. And though EPHREM SYRUS was acquainted with the Apocalypse, yet his genuine Syrian works exhibit no habitual use of the books which were not contained in the Syrian Canon.—The Churches of Asia Minor seem to have occupied a mean position as to the Canon between the East and West. With the exception of the Apocalypse, they received generally all the books of the N. T. as contained in the African Canon. The well-known Festal Letter of ATHANASIUS (†373 A.D.) bears witness to the Alexandrine Canon. This contains a clear and positive list of the books of the N. T. as they are received at present; and the judgment of Athanasius is confirmed by the practice of his successor CYRIL.—One important Catalogue yet remains to be mentioned. After noticing in separate places the origin and use of the Gospels and Epistles, EUSEBIUS sums up in a famous passage the results of his inquiry into the evidence on the Apostolic books furnished by the writings of the three first centuries (H. E. iii. 25). In the first class of acknowledged books he places the four Gospels, the Epistles of St. Paul (i. e. fourteen), 1 John, 1 Peter, and, in case its authenticity is admitted (such seems to be his meaning), the Apocalypse. The second class of disputed books he subdivides into two parts, the first consisting of such as were generally known and recognised, including the Epistles of James, Jude, 2 Peter, 2, 3 John; and the second of those which he pronounces spurious, that is, which were either unauthentic or unapostolic, as the Acts of Paul, the Shepherd, the Apocalypse of Peter, the Apocalypse of John (if not a work of the Apostle), and according to some the Gospel according to the Hebrews. These two great classes contain all the books which had received ecclesiastical sanction, and were in common distinguished from a third class of heretical forgeries (e. g. the Gospels of Thomas, Peter, Mathias, &c.).—At the era of the Reformation the question of the N. T. Canon became again a subject of great though partial interest. The hasty decree of the Council of Trent, which affirmed the authority of all the books commonly received, called out the opposition of controversialists, who quoted and enforced the early doubts. ERASMUS denied the Apostolic origin of the Epistle to the Hebrews, 2 Peter, and the Apocalypse, but left their canonical authority unquestioned. LUTHER, on the other hand, created a purely subjective standard for the canonicity of the Scriptures, and while he placed the Gospel and first Epistle of St. John, the Epistles of St. Paul to the Romans, Galatians, Ephesians, and the first Epistle of St. Peter, in the first rank as containing the “kernel of Christianity,” he set aside the Epistle to the Hebrews, St. Jude, St. James, and the Apocalypse, at the end of his version, and spoke of them and the remaining Antilegomena with varying degrees of disrespect, though he did not separate 2 Peter and 2, 3 John from the other Epistles. The doubts which Luther rested mainly on internal evidence were variously extended by some of his followers; but their views received no direct sanction in any of the Lutheran symbolic books. The doubts as to the Antilegomena of the N. T. were not confined to the Lutherans. CARLSTADT placed the Antilegomena in a third class. CALVIN, while he denied the Pauline authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and at least questioned the authenticity of 2 Peter, did not set aside their canonicity, and he notices the doubts as to St. James and St. Jude only to dismiss them.—The language of the Articles of the Church of England with regard to the N. T. is remarkable. In the Articles of 1552 no list of the books of Scripture is given; but in the Elizabethan Articles (1562, 1571) a definition of Holy Scripture is given as “the Canonical books of the Old and New Testament, of whose authority was never any doubt in the Church” (Art. vi.). This definition is followed by an enumeration of the books of the O. T. and of the Apocrypha; and then it is said summarily, without a detailed catalogue, “all the books of the N. T., as they are commonly received, we do receive and account them for Canonical.” A distinction thus remains between the “Canonical” books, and such “Canonical books as have never been doubted in the Church;” and it seems impossible to avoid the conclusion that the framers of the Articles intended to leave a freedom of judgment on a point on which the greatest of the continental reformers, and even of Romish scholars, were divided.—The judgment of the Greek Church in the case of the O. T. was seen to be little more than a reflection of the opinions of the West. The confession of METROPHANES gives a complete list of the books. At present, as was already the case at the close of the 17th century, the Antilegomena are reckoned by the Greek Church as equal in Canonical authority in all respects with the remaining books.

Canopy (Jud. x. 21, xiii. 9, xvi. 19). The canopy of Holofernes is the only one mentioned, although, perhaps, from the “pillars” of the litter described in Cant. iii. 10, it may be argued that its equipeage would include a canopy. It probably retained the mosquito nets or curtains in which the name originated, although its description (Jud. x. 21) betrays luxury and display rather than such simple usefulness.

Canticles, Song of Songs, i. e. the most beautiful of songs, entitled in the A. V. THE SONG OF SOLOMON.—I. Author and date.—By the Hebrew title it is ascribed to Solomon; and so in all the versions, and by the majority of Jewish and Christian writers, ancient and modern. In fact, if we except a few of the Talmudical writers, who assigned it to the age of Hezekiah, there is scarcely a dissentient voice down to the close of the last century. More recent criticism, however, has called in question this deep-rooted, and well accredited tradition. Among English scholars Kennicott, among German Eichhorn and Rosenmüller, regard the poem as belonging to the age of Ezra and Nehemiah. The charge of Chaldaism has been vigorously pressed by Rosenmüller, and especially by Eichhorn. But Gesenius assigns the book to the golden age of Hebrew literature, and traces “the few solitary Chaldaisms” which occur in the writings of that age to the hands of Chaldee copyists. He has moreover suggested an important distinction between Chaldaisms, and dialectic varieties indigenous to N. Palestine, where he conjectures that Judges and Canticles were composed. Nor is this conjecture inconsistent with the opinion which places it among the “one thousand and five” songs of Solomon (1 K. iv. 32). It is probable that Solomon had at least a hunting-seat somewhere on the slopes of Lebanon (comp. Cant. iv. 9), and in such a retreat, and under the influence of its scenery, and the language of the surrounding peasantry, he may have written Canticles. On the whole it seems unnecessary to depart from the plain meaning of the Hebrew title. Supposing the date fixed to the reign of Solomon, there is great difficulty in determining at what period of that monarch’s life the poem was written.—II. Form.—This question is not determined by the Hebrew title. The non-continuity which many critics attribute to the poem is far from being a modern discovery. Ghislerius (16th cent.) considered it a drama in five acts. Down to the 18th cent., however, the Canticles were generally regarded as continuous. Gregory of Nazianzus calls it “a bridal drama and song.” According to Patrick, it is a “Pastoral Eclogue,” or a “Dramatic poem;” according to Lowth, “an epithalamium of a pastoral kind.” Michaelis and Rosenmüller, while differing as to its interpretation, agree in making it continuous. Bossuet divided the Song into 7 parts, or scenes of a pastoral drama, corresponding with the 7 days of the Jewish nuptial ceremony. His division is impugned by Taylor (Fragm. Culmet), who proposes one of 6 days; and considers the drama to be post-nuptial, not ante-nuptial, as it is explained by Bossuet. The entire nuptial theory has been severely handled by J. D. Michaelis, and the literal school of interpreters in general. Lowth makes it a drama, but only of the minor kind, i. e. dramatic as a dialogue; and therefore not more dramatic than an Idyll of Theocritus, or a Satire of Horace. The fact is, that he was unable to discover a plot; and evidently meant a good deal more by the term “pastoral” than by the term “drama.” Moreover, it seems clear, that if the only dramatic element in Cant. be the dialogue, the rich pastoral character of its scenery, and allusions, renders the arm drama less applicable than that of idyll. The idyllic form seems to have recommended itself to the allegorical school of translators as getting rid of that dramatic unity and plot which their system of interpretation reduced to a succession of events without any culminating issue. But the majority of recent translators belonging to the literal school have adopted the theory of Jacobi, since developed by Umbreit, Ewald, Meier, &c. Based as this theory is upon the dramatic evolution of a simple love-story, it supplies that essential movement and interest, the want of which was felt by Lowth; and justifies the application of the term drama, to a composition of which it manifests the vital principle and organic structure.—III. Meaning.—The schools of interpretation may be divided into three;—the mystical, or typical; the allegorical; and the literal.—1. The mystical interpretation is properly an offshoot of the allegorical, and probably owes its origin to the necessity which was felt of supplying a literal basis for the speculations of the allegorists. This basis is either the marriage of Solomon with Pharaoh's daughter, or his marriage with an Israelitish woman, the Shulamite. The mystical interpretation makes its first appearance in Origen, who wrote a voluminous commentary upon the Cant. It reappears in Abulpharagius (1226-1286), and was received by Grotius, approved of, and systematized by Bossuet, endorsed by Lowth, and used for the purpose of translation by Percy and Williams.—2. Allegorical.—Notwithstanding the attempts which have been made to discover the principle of interpretation in the LXX. (Cant. iv. 8); Jesus Sirachides (xlvi. 14-17; Wisd. viii. 2); and Joseph. (c. Apion. i. § 8); it is impossible to trace it with any certainty farther back than the Talmud. According to the Talmud the beloved is taken to be God, the loved one, or bride, is the congregation of Israel. This general relation is expanded into more particular detail by the Targum, or Chaldee Paraphrase, which treats the Song of songs as an allegorical history of the Jewish people from the Exodus to the coming of the Messiah, and the building of the third temple. Elaborate as it was, the interpretation of the Targum was still further developed by the mediæval Jews, who introduced it into their liturgical services. A new school of Jewish exegesis was originated by Mendelssohn (1729-1786); which, without actually denying the existence of an allegorical meaning, determined to keep it in abeyance, and meanwhile to devote itself to the literal interpretation. In the Christian Church, the Talmudical interpretation, imported by Origen, was all but universally received. It was called in question by Erasmus and Grotius, and was gradually superseded by the typical theory of Grotius, Bossuet, Lowth, &c. 'In the 18th century the allegorical theory was reasserted, and reconstructed by Puffendorf (1776), and the reactionary allegorists. Some of the more remarkable variations of the allegorical school are:—(a.) The extension of the Chaldee allegory to the Christian Church. (b.) Luther's theory limits the allegorical meaning to the contemporaneous history of the Jewish people under Solomon. (c.) According to Ghislerius, and Corn. a Lapide the Bride is the Virgin Mary. (d.) Puffendorf refers the spiritual sense to the circumstances of our Saviour's death and burial.—3. The Literal interpretation seems to have been connected with the general movement of Theodores Mopsuest. (360-429) and his followers, in opposition to the extra-vagances of the early Christian allegorists. Its scheme was nuptial, with Pharaoh's daughter as the bride. The nuptial theory was adopted by Grotius as the literal basis of a secondary and spiritual interpretation; and, after its dramatical development by Bossuet, long continued to be the standard scheme of the mystical school. In 1803 it was reconstructed by Good, with a Jewish instead of an Egyptian bride. Michaelis (1770) regarded the Song as an exponent of wedded love, innocent, and happy. The most generally received interpretation of the modern literalists is that which was originally proposed by Jacobi (1771), adopted by Herder, Ammon, Umbreit, Ewald, &c.; and more recently by Prof. Meier of Tübingen (1854), and in England by Mr. Ginsburg, in his very excellent translation (1857). According to the detailed application of this view as given by Mr. Ginsburg, the Song is intended to display the victory of humble and constant love over the temptations of wealth and royalty. The drama is divided into 5 sections, indicated by the thrice repeated formula of adjuration (ii. 7, iii. 5, viii. 4), and the use of another closing sentence (v. 1). It must not be supposed, however, that the supporters of the allegorical interpretation have been finally driven from the field. Even in Germany a strong band of reactionary Allegorists have maintained their ground. On the whole, their tendency is to return to the Chaldee Paraphrase; a tendency which is specially marked in Rosenmüller. The allegorical interpretation has been defended in America by Professors Stuart and Burrowes. The following are specimens of the internal arguments adduced by them:—(a.) Particulars not applicable to Solomon (v. 2): (b.) particulars not applicable to the wife of Solomon (i. 6, 8; v. 7; vii. 1, cf. i. 6): (c.) Solomon addressed in the second person (viii. 12): (d.) particulars inconsistent with the ordinary conditions of decent love (v. 2): (e.) date 20 years after Solomon's marriage with Pharaoh's daughter (comp. Cant. vii. 4, and 1 K. vii. 2). It will readily be observed that these arguments do not in any way affect the literal theory of Jacobi. For external arguments the allegorists depend principally upon Jewish tradition, and the analogy of Oriental poetry. The strongest argument on the side of the allegorists is the matrimonial metaphor so frequently employed in the Scriptures to describe the relation between Jehovah and Israel (Ex. xxxiv. 15, 16; Num. xv. 39; Ps. lxxiii. 27; Jer. iii. 1-11; Ex. xvi., xxiii., &c.).—IV. Canonicity.—The book was rejected from the Canon by Castellio and Whiston; but in no case has its rejection been defended on external grounds. It is found in the LXX. and in the translations of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion. It is contained in the catalogue given in the Talmud, and in the catalogue of Melito; and in short we have the same evidence for its canonicity as that which is commonly adduced for the canonicity of any book of the O. T.

Capernaum, a name with which all are familiar as that of a scene of many acts and incidents in the life of Christ. There is no mention of Capernaum in the O. T. or Apocrypha, but the passage Is. ix. 1 (in Hebrew, viii. 23) is applied to it by St. Matthew. The few notices of its situation in the N. T. are not sufficient to enable us to determine its exact position. It was on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee (Matt. iv. 13; comp. John vi. 24), and, if recent discoveries are to be trusted, was of sufficient importance to give to that Sea, in whole or in part the name of the "lake of Capernaum." It was in the "land of Gennesareth" (Matt. xiv. 34, compared with John vi. 17, 21, 24), that is, the rich, busy plain on the west shore of the lake, which we know from the descriptions of Josephus and from other sources to have been at that time one of the most prosperous and crowded districts in all Palestine. Being on the shore, Capernaum was lower than Nazareth and Cana of Galilee, from which the road to it was one of descent (John ii. 12; Luke iv. 31). It was of sufficient size to be always called a "city" (Matt. ix. 1; Mark i. 33); had its own synagogue, in which our Lord frequently taught (John vi. 59; Mark i. 21; Luke iv. 33, 38)—a synagogue built by the centurion of the detachment of Roman soldiers which appears to have been quartered in the place (Luke vii. 1, comp. 8; Matt. viii. 8). But besides the garrison there was also a customs station, where the dues were gathered both by stationary (Matt. ix. 9; Mark ii. 14; Luke v. 27) and by itinerant (Matt. xvii. 24) officers. The only interest attaching to Capernaum is as the residence of our Lord and his Apostles, the scene of so many miracles and "gracious words." At Nazareth He was "brought up," but Capernaum was emphatically His "own city;" it was when He returned thither that He is said to have been "at home" (Mark ii. 1). Here He chose the Evangelist Matthew or Levi (Matt. ix. 9). The brothers Simon Peter and Andrew belonged to Capernaum (Mark i. 29), and it is perhaps allowable to imagine that it was on the sea-beach that they heard the quiet call which was to make them forsake all and follow Him (Mark i. 16, 17, comp. 28). It was here that Christ worked the miracle on the centurion's servant (Matt. viii. 5; Luke vii. 1), on Simon's wife's mother (Matt. viii. 14; Mark i. 30; Luke iv. 38), the paralytic (Matt. ix. 1; Mark ii. 1; Luke v. 18), and the man afflicted with an unclean devil (Mark i. 32; Luke iv. 33). At Capernaum occurred the incident of the child (Mark ix. 33; Matt. xviii. 1; comp. xvii. 24); and in the synagogue there was spoken the wonderful discourse of John vi. (see verse 59). The doom which our Lord pronounced against Capernaum and the other unbelieving cities of the plain of Gennesareth has been remarkably fulfilled. The spots which lay claim to its site are 1. Khan Minyeh, a mound of ruins which takes its name from an old khan hard by. This mound is situated close upon the sea-shore at the north-western extremity of the plain (now El Ghuweir). 2. Three miles north of Khan Minyeh is the other claimant, Tell Hâm,—ruins of walls and foundations covering a space of "half a mile long by a quarter wide," on a point of the shore projecting into the lake and backed by a very gently rising ground. Khan Minyeh, Et-Tabighah, and Tell Hâm, are all, without doubt, ancient sites, but it is impossible to say which of them represents Capernaum, which Chorazin, or which Bethsaida.

Cap'har, one of the numerous words employed in the Bible to denote a village or collection of dwellings smaller than a city (Ir). Mr. Stanley proposes to render it by "hamlet." In names of places it occurs in CHEPHAR-HA-AMMONAI, CHEPHIRAH, CAPHAR-SALAMA. To us its chief interest arises from its forming a part of the name of CAPERNAUM, i. e. Capharnahum.

Cap'har-sal'ama, a place at which a battle was fought between Judas Maccabaeus and Nicanor (1 Macc. vii. 31). Ewald places it north of Ramla on the Samaritan boundary, but no certain traces of it seem to have been yet found.

Caphen'atha, a place apparently close to and on the east side of Jerusalem, which was repaired by Jonathan Maccabaeus (1 Macc. xii. 37).

Caph'ira, 1 Esd. v. 19. [CHEPHIRAH.]

Caph'tor; Caph'torim, thrice mentioned as the primitive seat of the Philistines (Deut. ii. 23; Jer. xlvii. 4; Am. ix. 7), who are once called Caph'torims (Deut. ii. 23), as of the same race as the Mizraite people of that name (Gen. x. 14; "Caph'thorim," 1 Chr. i. 12). The position of the country, since it was peopled by Mizraites, must be supposed to be in Egypt or near to it in Africa, for the idea of the south-west of Palestine is excluded by the migration of the Philistines. Mr. R. S. Poole has proposed to recognise Caphtor in the ancient Egyptian name of Coptos. We must not suppose, however, that Caphtor was Coptos: it must rather be compared to the Coptite nome, probably in primitive ages of greater extent than under the Ptolemies, for the number of nomes was in the course of time greatly increased. The Caphtorim stand last in the list of the Mizraite peoples in Gen. and Chr., probably as dwellers in Upper Egypt, the names next before them being of Egyptian, and the earliest names of Libyan peoples. The migration of the Philistines is mentioned or alluded to in all the passages speaking of Caphtor or the Caphtorim. The period of the migration must have been very remote, since the Philistines were already established in Palestine in Abraham's time (Gen. xxi. 32, 34). The evidence of the Egyptian monuments, which is indirect, tends to the same conclusion, but takes us yet further back in time. We find from the sculptures of Rameses III. at Medenet Haboo, that the Egyptians about 1200 B.C. were at war with the Philistines, the Tok-kari, and the Shaymatana of the Sea, and that other Shaymatana served them as mercenaries. This evidence points therefore to the spread of a seafaring race cognate to the Egyptians at a very remote time. It is probable that the Philistines left Caphtor not long after the first arrival of the Mizraite tribes, while they had not yet attained that attachment to the soil that afterwards so eminently characterized the descendants of those which formed the Egyptian nation.

Cappado'cia. This eastern district of Asia Minor is interesting in reference to New Testament history only from the mention of its Jewish residents among the hearers of St. Peter's first sermon (Acts ii. 9), and its Christian residents among the readers of St. Peter's first Epistle (1 Pet. i. 1). The Jewish community in this region, doubtless, formed the nucleus of the Christian: and the former may probably be traced to the first introduction of Jewish colonists into Asia Minor by Seleucus. The range of Mount Taurus and the upper course of the Euphrates may safely be mentioned, in general terms, as natural boundaries of Cappadocia on the south and east. Its geographical limits on the west and north were variable. In early times the name reached as far northwards as the Euxine Sea. Cappadocia is an elevated table-land intersected by mountain-chains. It seems always to have been deficient in wood; but it was a good grain country, and particularly famous for grazing. Its Roman metropolis was Caesarea. The native Cappadocians seem originally to have belonged to the Syrian stock: and since Ptolemy places the cities of Iconium and Derbe within the limits of this region, we may possibly obtain from this circumstance some light on "the speech of Lycaonia" (Acts xiv. 11).

Captain. (4.) As a purely military title, Captain answers to av in the Hebrew army, and χιλαρχος (tribunus) in the Roman. The "captain of the guard" in Acts xxviii. 16 was probably the praefectus praetorio. (2.) Kâstîn, occasionally rendered captain, applies sometimes to a military (Josh. x. 24; Judg. xi. 6, 11; Is. xxii. 3; Dan. xi. 18), sometimes to a civil command (e. g. Is. i. 10, iii. 6). (3.) The "captain of the temple" mentioned by St. Luke (xxii. 4; Acts iv. 1, v. 24) superintended the guard of priests and Levites, who kept watch by night in the Temple. The office appears to have existed from an early date. (4.) The term rendered "captain" (Heb. ii. 10), has no reference whatever to a military office.

Captivities of the Jews. The bondage of Israel in Egypt, and their subjugation at different times by the Philistines and other nations, are sometimes included under the above title; and the Jews themselves, perhaps with reference to Daniel's vision (ch. vii.), reckon their national captivities as four—the Babylonian, Median, Grecian, and Roman. But the present article is confined to the forcible deportation of the Jews from their native land, and their forcible detention, under the Assyrian or Babylonian kings. The kingdom of Israel was invaded by three or four successive kings of Assyria. Pul or Sardapalus, according to Rawlinson, imposed a tribute (B.C. 771 or 762 Bawl.) upon Menahem (1 Chr. v. 26, and 2 K. xv. 19). Tiglath-Pileser carried away (B.C. 740) the trans-Jordanic tribes (1 Chr. v. 26) and the inhabitants of Galilee (2 K. xv. 29, compare Is. ix. 1) to Assyria. Shalmaneser twice invaded (2 K. xvii. 3, 5) the kingdom which remained to Hoshea, took Samaria (B.C. 721) after a siege of three years, and carried Israel away into Assyria. Sennacherib (B.C. 713) is stated to have carried into Assyria 200,000 captives from the Jewish cities which he took (2 K. xviii. 13). Nebuchadnezzar, in the first half of his reign (B.C. 606-562), repeatedly invaded Judaea, besieged Jerusalem, carried away the inhabitants to Babylon, and destroyed the city and Temple. Two distinct deportations are mentioned in 2 K. xxiv. 14 (including 10,000 persons) and xxv. 11. One in 2 Chr. xxxvi. 20. Three in Jer. lii. 28-30, including 4600 persons, and one in Dan. i. 3. The two principal deportations were, (1) that which took place B.C. 598, when Jehoiachin with all the nobles, soldiers, and artificers was carried away; and (2) that which followed the destruction of the Temple and the capture of Zedekiah B.C. 588. The three which Jeremiah mentions may have been the contributions of a particular class or district to the general captivity; or they may have taken place under the orders of Nebuchadnezzar, before or after the two principal deportations. The captivity of certain selected children B.C. 607, mentioned by Daniel, who was one of them, may have occurred when Nebuchadnezzar was colleague or lieutenant of his father Nabopolassar, a year before he reigned alone. The 70 years of captivity predicted by Jeremiah (xxv. 12) are dated by Prideaux from B.C. 606. The captivity of Ezekiel dates from B.C. 598, when that prophet, like Mordecai the uncle of Esther (Esth. ii. 6), accompanied Jehoiachin. The captives were treated not as slaves but as colonists. There was nothing to hinder a Jew from rising to the highest eminence in the state (Dan. ii. 48), or holding the most confidential office near the person of the king (Neh. i. 11; Tob. i. 13, 22). The advice of Jeremiah (xxix. 5, &c.) was generally followed. The exiles increased in numbers and in wealth. They observed the Mosaic law (Esth. ii. 8; Tob. xiv. 9). They kept up distinctions of rank among themselves (Ez. xx. 1). Their genealogical tables were preserved, and they were at no loss to tell who was the rightful heir to David's throne. They had neither place nor time of national gathering, no Temple; and they offered no sacrifice. But the right of circumcision and their laws respecting food, &c., were observed; their priests were with them (Jer. xxix. 1); and possibly the practice of erecting synagogues in every city (Acts xv. 21) was begun by the Jews in the Babylonian captivity. The captivity is not without contemporaneous literature. In the book of Tobit we have a picture of the inner life of a family of the tribe of Naphtali, among the captives whom Shalmaneser brought to Nineveh. The book of Baruch seems, in Mr. Layard's opinion, to have been written by one whose eyes, like those of Ezekiel, were familiar with the gigantic forms of Assyrian sculpture. Several of the Psalms appear to express the sentiments of Jews who were either partakers or witnesses of the Assyrian captivity. But it is from the three great prophets, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, that we learn most of the condition of the children of the captivity. The Babylonian captivity was brought to a close by the decree (Ezr. i. 2) of Cyrus (B.C. 536), and the return of a portion of the nation under Sheshbazzar or Zerubbabel (B.C. 535), Ezra (B.C. 458), and Nehemiah (B.C. 445). The number who returned upon the decree of B.C. 536 was 42,360, besides servants. Among them about 30,000 are specified (compare Ezr. ii. and Neh. vii.) as belonging to the tribes of Judah, Benjamin, and Levi. It has been inferred that the remaining 12,000 belonged to the tribes of Israel (compare Ezr. vi. 17). Those who were left in Assyria (Esth. viii. 9, 11), and kept up their national distinctions, were known as The Dispersion (John vii. 35; 1 Pet. i. 1; James i. 1); and, in course of time, they served a great purpose in diffusing a knowledge of the true God, and in affording a point for the commencement of the efforts of the Evangelists of the Christian faith. Many attempts have been made to discover the ten tribes existing as a distinct community. Josephus believed that in his day they dwelt in large multitudes, somewhere beyond the Euphrates, in Arsareth, according to the author of 2 Esdr. xiii. 45. The imagination of Christian writers has sought them in the neighbourhood of their last recorded habitation. But though history bears no witness of their present distinct existence, it enables us to track the footsteps of the departing race in four directions after the time of the Captivity. (1.) Some returned and mixed with the Jews (Luke ii. 36; Phil. iii. 5, &c.). (2.) Some were left in Samaria, mingled with the Samaritans (Ezr. vi. 21; John iv. 12), and became bitter enemies of the Jews. (3.) Many remained in Assyria, and were recognised as an integral part of the Dispersion (see Acts ii. 9, xxvi. 7). (4.) Most, probably, apostatized in Assyria, adopted the usages and idolatry of the nations among whom they were planted, and became wholly swallowed up in them.

Carabastion, a corrupt name to which it is difficult to find anything corresponding in the Hebrew text (1 Esdr. ix. 34).

Carbuncle. The representative in the A. V. of the Hebrew words ‘chdakh and bārkhath or bārakheth.—1. ‘Ekdakh occurs only in Is. liv. 12 in the description of the beauties of the new Jerusalem. Perhaps the term may be a general one to denote any bright sparkling gem, but as it occurs only once, it is impossible to determine its real meaning.—2. Bārkhath, bārakheth, the third stone in the first row of the sacerdotal breastplate (Ex. xxviii. 17, xxxix. 10), also one of the mineral treasures of the king of Tyre (Ez. xxviii. 13). Braun supposes with much probability that the smaragdus or emerald is the precious stone signified. This view is supported by the LXX., the Vulgate, and Josephus.

Car’cas, the seventh of the seven “chamberlains” (i. e. eunuchs) of king Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 10).

Car’chemiah, 1 Esd. i. 25. [CARCHEMISH.]

Car’chemish is not, as has generally been supposed, the classical Circesium. It lay very much higher up the Euphrates, occupying nearly the site of the later Mabug, or Hierapolis. It seems to have commanded the ordinary passage of the Euphrates at Bir, or Birch-jih, and thus in the contentions between Egypt and Assyria its possession was of primary consequence (comp. 2 Chr. xxv. 20, with Jer. xli. 2). Carchemish appears to have been taken by Pharaoh-Necho shortly after the battle of Megiddo (c. B.C. 608), and retaken by Nebuchadnezzar after a battle three years later, B.C. 605 (Jer. xli. 2).

Car’ah, father of Johanan (2 K. xxv. 23), elsewhere in the A. V. spelt KAREAH.

Car’ia, the southern part of the region which in the N. T. is called ASIA, and the south-western part of the peninsula of Asia Minor. In the Roman times the name of Caria was probably less used than previously. At an earlier period we find it mentioned as a separate district (1 Macc. xv. 23). At this time (B.C. 139) it was in the enjoyment of the privilege of freedom, granted by the Romans. A little before it had been assigned by them to Rhodes, and a little later it was incorporated in the province of Asia.

Car’me, 1 Esdr. v. 25. [HARIM.]

Carmel. Nearly always with the definite article, “the park,” or “the well-wooded place.” 1. (In Kings, generally “Mount C.,” in the Prophets, “Carmel.”) A mountain which forms one of the most striking and characteristic features of the country of Palestine. As if to accentuate more distinctly the bay which forms the one indentation in the coast, this noble ridge, the only headland of lower and central Palestine, forms its southern boundary, running out with a bold bluff promontory all but into the very waves of the Mediterranean. From this point it stretches in a nearly straight line, bearing about S.S.E., for a little more than twelve miles, when it terminates suddenly in a bluff somewhat corresponding to its western end, breaking down abruptly into the hills of Jenin and Samaria, which form at that part the central mass of the country. Carmel thus stands as a wall between the maritime plain of Sharon on the south, and the more inland expanse of Esdraelon on the north. Its structure is in the main the Jura formation (upper oolite), which is prevalent in the centre of Western Palestine—a soft white limestone, with nodules and veins of flint. In form Carmel is a tolerably continuous ridge, at the W. end about 600, and E. about 1600 feet above the sea. It is still clothed with the same “excellency” of “wood,” which supplied the prophets of Israel and Judah alike with one of their most favourite illustrations (Is. xxxiii. 9; Mic. vii. 14). Modern travellers delight to describe its “rocky dells with deep jungles of copse”—its “shrubberies thicker than any others in central Palestine” (Stanley, MS.)—its “impenetrable brushwood of oaks and other evergreens, tenanted in the wilder parts by a profusion of game and wild animals” (Porter, Handb.), but in other places bright with “hollyhocks, jasmine, and various flowering creepers” (Van de Velde). Carmel fell within the lot of the tribe of Asher (Josh. xix. 26), which was extended as far south as Dor, probably to give the Asherites a share of the rich corn-growing plain of Sharon. The king of “Jokneam of Carmel” was one of the Canaanite chiefs who fell before the arms of Joshua (xii. 22). These are the earliest notices which we possess of the name. There is not in them a hint of any sanctity as attaching to the mount. But there seem to be grounds for believing that from very early times it was considered as a sacred spot. In later times we know that its reputation was not confined to Palestine. But that which has made the name of Carmel most familiar to the modern world is its intimate connexion with the history of the two great prophets of Israel—Elijah and Elisha. Here Elijah brought back Israel to allegiance to Jehovah, and slew the prophets of the foreign and false god; here at his entreaty were consumed the successive “fifties” of the royal guard; but here, on the other hand, Elisha received the visit of the bereaved mother whose son he was soon to restore to her arms (2 K. iv. 25, &c.). The first of these three events, without doubt, took place at the eastern end of the ridge, commanding the last view of the sea behind, and the first view of the great plain in front. Of this site an admirable description is given by Prof. Stanley (S. & P. pp. 353-356). There is good reason to believe that a later incident in the life of the same great prophet took place on Carmel. This was when he “caused fire to come down from heaven” and consume the two “fifties” of the guard which Ahaziah had despatched to take him prisoner, for having stopped his messengers to Baalzebub the god of Ekron (2 K. i. 9-15). The tradition in the present convent is, that Elijah and Elisha both resided on the mountain, and a cave is actually shown under the high-altar of the church as that of Elijah. After the ascent of Elijah, Elisha went to Mount Carmel (2 K. ii. 25), though only for a time; but he was again there at the Shunammite’s visit (iv. 25), and that at a time when no festival, no “new moon or sabbath” (v. 23), required his presence. This is the last mention of Carmel as the scene of any event in the sacred history. Carmel has derived its modern name from the great prophet; Mar Elyas is the common designation, Kürmel being occasionally, but only seldom, heard.—2. A town in the mountainous country of Judah (Josh. xv. 55), familiar to us as the residence of Nabal (1 Sam. xxv. 2, 5, 7, 40), and the native place of David’s favourite wife, “Abigail the Carmelitess” (1 Sam. xxvii. 3; 1 Chr. iii. 1). This was doubtless the Carmel at which Saul set up a “place,” literally a “hand;” after his victory over Amalek (1 Sam. xv. 12). And this Carmel, and not the northern mount, must have been the spot at which king Uziah had his vineyards (2 Chr. xxvi. 10). In the time of Eusebius and Jerome it was the seat of a Roman garrison. The ruins of the town, now Kurnul, still remain at ten miles below Hebron in a slightly S. E. direction, close to those of Man (Maon), Zif (Ziph), and other places named with Carmel in Josh. xv. 55.

Carmi. 1. The 4th son of Reuben the progenitor of the family of THE CARMITES (Gen. xli. 9; Ex. vi. 14; Num. xxvi. 6; 1 Chr. v. 3).—2. A man of the tribe of Judah, father of Achan, the "troubler of Israel" (Josh. vii. 1, 18; 1 Chr. ii. 7, iv. 1), according to the first two passages the son of Zabdi or Zimri.

Carna'im, a large and fortified city in the country east of Jordan—"the land of Galaad," containing a "temple." It was besieged and taken by Judas Maccabaeus (1 Macc. v. 26, 43, 44). Under the name of CARNION the same occurrence is related in 2 Macc. xii. 21, 26, the temple being called the ATARGATEION. This enables us to identify it with ASHTEROTH-KARNAIM.

Carni'on. [CARNAIM.]

Carpenter. [HANDICRAFT.]

Carpus, a Christian at Troas, with whom St. Paul states that he left a cloak (2 Tim. iv. 13). According to Hippolytus, Carpus was bishop of Berytus in Thrace.

Carriage. This word occurs only six times in the text of the A. V., and signifies what we now call "baggage." The Hebrew words so rendered are vessels. 1. Cēle, generally translated "stuff" or "vessels." It is like the Greek word σκεῦος. 2. Cēbādāh, "heavy matters," Judg. xviii. 21 only. 3. The word rendered "carriages" in Is. xli. 1 should, it would appear, be "your burdens." 4. In the N. T., Acts xxi. 15, the meaning is simply "baggage." 5. But in the margin of 1 Sam. xvii. 20, and xxvi. 5-7—and there only—"carriage" is employed in the sense of a wagon or cart. The allusion is to the circle of wagons which surrounded the encampment.

Carshena, one of the seven princes of Persia and Media (Esth. i. 14).

Cart, 'agādāh, Gen. xlv. 19, 27; Num. vii. 3, 7, 8, a vehicle drawn by cattle (2 Sam. vi. 6), to be distinguished from the chariot drawn by horses. Carts and wagons were either open or covered (Num. vii. 3), and were used for conveyance of persons (Gen. xlv. 19), burdens (1 Sam. vi. 7, 8), or produce (Am. ii. 13). As there are no roads in Syria and Palestine and the neighbouring countries, wheel-carriages for any purpose except conveyance of agricultural produce are all but unknown. The only cart used in Western Asia has two wheels of solid wood. But in the monuments of ancient Egypt representations are found of carts with two wheels, having four or six spokes, used for carrying produce, and of one used for religious purposes having four wheels with eight spokes. A bas-relief at Nineveh represents a cart having two wheels with eight spokes, drawn by oxen, conveying female captives.

Assyrian cart drawn by oxen. (Layard, ii. 396.)

Carving. The arts of carving and engraving were much in request in the construction both of the Tabernacle and the Temple (Ex. xxxi. 5, xxxv. 33; 1 K. vi. 18, 35; Ps. lxxiv. 6), as well as in the ornamentation of the priestly dresses (Ex. xxviii. 9-36; Zech. iii. 9; 2 Chr. ii. 6, 14).

Casiph'ia, a place of uncertain site on the road between Babylon and Jerusalem (Ezr. viii. 17).

Cas'leu, 1 Macc. i. 54, iv. 52, 59; 2 Macc. i. 9, 18, x. 5. [CHISLEU; MONTHS.]

Cas'luhim, a Mizraite people or tribe (Gen. x. 14; 1 Chr. i. 12). The only clue we have as yet to the position of the Casluhim is their place in the list of the sons of Mizraim between the Pathrusim and the Caphtorim, whence it is probable that they were seated in Upper Egypt. The LXX. seem to identify them with the Chashmannim of Ps. lxxviii. 31 (A. V. "princes"). This would place the Casluhim in the Heptanomis. Bochart suggests the identity of the Casluhim and the Colchians, who are said to have been an Egyptian colony. The supposition is improbable, though Gesenius gives it his support. Forster conjectures the Casluhim to be the inhabitants of Cassiotis, and Bunsen assumes this to be proved; but the nature of the ground is a serious difficulty in the way.

Cas'phon, 1 Macc. v. 36. [CASPHOR.]

Cas'phor, one of the fortified cities in the "land of Galaad" (1 Macc. v. 26), in which the Jews took refuge from the Ammonites under Timotheus (comp. ver. 6), and which with other cities was taken by Judas Maccabaeus (v. 36). In the latter passage the name is given as CASPHON, and in 2 Macc. xii. 13 as CASPIS, if indeed the same place is referred to, which is not quite clear.

Cas'pis, a strong fortified city—whether east or west of Jordan is not plain—having near it a lake two stadia in breadth. It was taken by Judas Maccabaeus with great slaughter (2 Macc. xii. 13, 16). [CASPHOR.]

Cassia. The representative in the A. V. of the Hebrew words kiddāh and ketzōth.—1. Kiddāh occurs in Ex. xxx. 24, as one of the ingredients in the composition of the "oil of holy ointment;" and in Ez. xxvii. 19. There can be no doubt that the A. V. is correct in the translation of the Hebrew word, though there is considerable variety of reading in the old versions. The accounts of cassia as given by ancient authors are confused; and the investigation of the subject is a difficult one. It is clear that the Latin writers by the term cassia understood both the Oriental product now under consideration, as well as some low sweet herbaceous plant; but the Greek word is limited to the Eastern product. Dioscorides mentions several kinds of cassia, and says they are produced in Spicy Arabia. One kind is known by the name of mosylos, or, according to Galen, of mosyllos, from the ancient city and promontory Mossyllon, on the coast of Africa and the sea of Bab el Mandeb. Will not this throw some light on Ez. xxvii. 19, "Dan and Javan and Meuzal traded in thy markets with cassia, calamus," &c. The cassia would be brought from India to Meuzal, and from thence exported to Tyre and other countries under the name of Mouzalitis, or Meuzal cassia. Cassia is not produced by any trees which are now found growing in Arabia. It is probable therefore that the Greek authors were mistaken on this subject, and that they occasionally have regarded products imported into Arabia, and thence exported northwards to other countries, as the natural productions of that country. The cassia-bark of commerce is yielded by various kinds of Cinnamomum, which grow in different parts of India.—2. Ketzioth, only in Ps. xlv. 8. This word is generally supposed to be another term for cassia: the old versions, as well as the etymology of the Hebrew word, are in favour of this interpretation.

Castle. [FORTIFICATIONS.]

Castor and Pollux, the Dioscuri (Acts xxviii. 11). These two heroes, the twin-sons of Jupiter and Leda, were regarded as the tutelary divinities of sailors. They appeared in heaven as the constellation Gemini. As the ship mentioned by St. Luke was from Alexandria, it may be worth while to notice that Castor and Pollux were specially honoured in the neighbouring district of Cyrenaica. In art these divinities were sometimes represented simply as stars hovering over a ship, but more frequently as young men on horseback, with conical caps and stars above them. Such figures were probably painted or sculptured at the bow of the ship, and Cyril of Alexandria says that such was always the Alexandrian method of ornamenting each side of the prow.

Cats occur only in Baruch vi. 22. The Greek word, as used by Aristotle, has more particular reference to the wild cat. Herodotus (ii. 66) applies it to denote the domestic animal. The context of the passage in Baruch appears to point to the domesticated animal. Perhaps the people of Babylon originally procured the cat from Egypt. The domestic cat of the ancient Egyptians is supposed by some to be identical with the Felis maniculata, Rüppell, of Nubia, and with our own domestic animal, but there is considerable doubt on this point. The Egyptians, it is well known, paid an absurd reverence to the cat; it accompanied them in their fowling expeditions; it was deemed a capital offence to kill one; and when a cat died it was embalmed and buried at Bubastis, the city sacred to the moon, of which divinity the cat was reckoned a symbol.

Caterpillar. The representative in the A. V. of the Hebrew words châsil and yelch.—1. Châsil occurs in 1 K. viii. 37; 2 Chr. vi. 28; Ps. lxxviii. 46; Is. xxxiii. 4; Joel i. 4; it is evident from the inconsistency of the two most important old versions in their renderings of this word, that nothing is to be learnt from them. The term now under notice seems to be applied to a locust, perhaps in its larva state.—2. Yelch. [LOCUST.]

Cath'a, 1 Esdr. v. 30, apparently answers to GIDDEL in the Hebrew text.

Cave. I. M'êrah. The chalky limestone of which the rocks of Syria and Palestine chiefly consist presents, as is the case in all limestone formations, a vast number of caverns and natural fissures, many of which have also been artificially enlarged and adapted to various purposes both of shelter and defence. This circumstance has also given occasion to the use of so large a number of words as are employed in the Scriptures to denote caves, holes, and fissures, some of them giving names to the towns and places and their neighbourhood. Out of them may be selected the following:—II. Chûr or Chôr, "a hole." From this come (a), the name of the Horites of Mount Seir, a Troglodyte race spoken of by Strabo. (Gen. xiv. 6, xxxvi. 21; Deut. ii. 12; Job xxx. 6.) (b.) Hawrân (Ez. xlvii. 16, 18). (c.) the two towns of Beth-horon (Josh. xvi. 3, 5). (d.) the town Horonaim (Is. xv. 5).—III. Chadôm, "places of refuge in rocks" for birds (Cant. 14; Obad. 3; A. V. "clefts").—IV. Minchârâh, A. V. "den;" a ravine through which water flows (Judg. vi. 2).—The most remarkable caves noticed in Scripture are:—1. That in which Lot dwelt after the destruction of Sodom (Gen. xix. 30).

2. The cave of Machpelah (xxiii. 17). 3. Cave of Makkedah (Josh. x. 16). 4. Cave of Adullam (1 Sam. xxii. 1). 5. Cave of Engedi (xii. 3). 6. Obadiah's cave (1 K. xviii. 4). 7. Elijah's cave in Horeb (xix. 9). 8, 9. The rock sepulchres of Lazarus, and of our Lord (John xi. 38; Matt. xxvii. 60). The existing caverns near the S. E. end of the Dead Sea serve fully to justify the mention of a cave as the place of Lot's retirement; as those on the W. side agree both in situation and in name with the caves of En-gedi. The cave of Machpelah undoubtedly lies beneath the mosque of Hebron. The cave in which Obadiah concealed the prophets was probably in the northern part of the country, in which abundant instances of caves fit for such a purpose might be pointed out. The site of the cave of Elijah, as well as of the "cliff" of Moses on Mount Horeb (Ex. xxxiii. 22), is also obviously indeterminate. Besides these special caves there is frequent mention in the O. T. of caves as places of refuge. Thus the Israelites are said to have taken refuge from the Philistines in "holes" (1 Sam. xiv. 11). So also in the time of Gideon they had taken refuge from the Midianites in dens and caves and strongholds, such as abound in the mountain region of Manasseh (Judges vi. 2). But Adullam is not the only cave, nor were its tenants the only instances of banditti making the caves of Palestine their accustomed haunt. Josephus speaks of the robber inhabitants of Trachonitis, who lived in large caverns, and annoyed much the trade with Damascus, but were put down by Herod. Lastly, it was the caves which lie beneath and around so many of the Jewish cities that formed the last hiding-places of the Jewish leaders in the war with the Romans. No use, however, of rock caverns more strikingly connects the modern usages of Palestine and the adjacent regions with their ancient history than the employment of them as burial-places. The rocky soil of so large a portion of the Holy Land almost forbids interment, excepting in cavities either natural or hewn from the rock. Accordingly numerous sites are shown in Palestine and adjacent lands of (so-called) sepulchres of saints and heroes of the Old and New Test., venerated both by Christians and Mohammedans.

Cedar. There can, we think, be little doubt that the Heb. word erez, invariably rendered "cedar" by the A. V., does stand for that tree in most of the passages where the word occurs. The erez, or "firmly rooted and strong tree," from an Arabic root which has this signification, is particularly the name of the cedar of Lebanon (Cedrus Libani); but that the word is used in a wider sense to denote other trees of the Coniferae, is clear from some Scriptural passages where it occurs. For instance, the "cedar wood" mentioned in Lev. xiv. 6 can hardly be the wood of the Lebanon cedars, seeing that the Cedrus Libani could never have grown in the peninsula of Sinai. There is another passage (Ex. xxvii. 5), in which perhaps erez denotes some fir; in all probability, as Dr. Hooker conjectures, the Pinus Halepensis, which grows in Lebanon, and is better fitted for furnishing ship-masts than the wood of the Cedrus Libani. The Cedrus Libani, Pinus Halepensis, and Juniperus excelsa, were probably all included under the term erez; though there can be no doubt that by this name is more especially denoted the cedar of Lebanon, as befit the firmest and grandest of the conifers. As to the "cedar wood" used in purifications, it is probable that one of the smaller Junipers is intended (J. Sabina ?), for it is doubtful whether the Juniperus excelsa exists at all in Arabia. As far as is at present known, the cedar of Lebanon is confined in Syria to one valley of the Lebanon range, viz., that of the Kedisha river, which flows from near the highest point of the range westward to the Mediterranean, and enters the sea at the port of Tripoli. The grove is at the very upper part of the valley, about 15 miles from the sea, 6500 feet above that level, and their position is moreover above that of all other arborescent vegetation. The valley here is very broad, open, and shallow, and the grove forms a mere speck on its flat floor. On nearer inspection, the cedars are found to be confined to a small portion of a range of low stony hills of rounded outlines, and perhaps 60 to 100 ft. above the plain, which sweep across the valley. These hills are believed by Dr. Hooker to be old moraines, deposited by glaciers that once debouched on to the plain from the surrounding tops of Lebanon.

Ce'dron. 1. A place fortified by Cenebæus under the orders of the king Antiochus (Sidetes), as a station from which to command the roads of Judæa (1 Macc. xv. 39, 41, xvi. 9). It was not far from Jamnia (Jabne), or from Azotus (Ashdod), and was probably the modern Katra or Kâtrah, which lies on the maritime plain below the river Rubin, and three miles south-west of Akir (Ekron).—2. In this form is given in the N. T. the name of the brook Kidron in the ravine below the eastern wall of Jerusalem (John xviii. 1, only). Beyond it was the garden of Gethsemane. [KIDRON.]

Ce'ilan. Sons of Ceilan and Azetas, according to 1 Esdr. v. 15, returned with Zerobabel from Babylon.

Ceiling. The descriptions of Scripture (1 K. vi. 9, 15, vii. 3; 2 Chr. iii. 5, 9; Jer. xxii. 14; Hag. i. 4), and of Josephus, show that the ceilings of the Temple and the palaces of the Jewish kings were formed of cedar planks applied to the beams or joints crossing from wall to wall, probably with sunk panels, edged and ornamented with gold, and carved with incised or other patterns, sometimes painted (Jer. xxii. 14). It is probable that both Egyptian and Assyrian models were followed, in this as in other branches of architectural construction, before the Roman period. Examples are extant, of Egyptian ceilings in stucco painted with devices, of a date much earlier than that of Solomon's Temple. Of these devices the principal are the guilloche, the chevron, and the scroll. The panel work in ceilings, which has been described, is found in Oriental and North African dwellings of late and modern times. Mr. Porter describes the ceilings of houses at Damascus as delicately painted. Many of the rooms in the Palace of the Moors at the Alhambra were ceiled and ornamented with the richest geometrical patterns.

Celosyria. [COELESYRIA.]

Cen'chrea (accurately Cenchreae), the eastern harbour of Corinth (i. e. its harbour on the Saronic Gulf) and the emporium of its trade with the Asiatic shores of the Mediterranean, as Lechaëum (Lutræki) on the Corinthian Gulf connected it with Italy and the west. St. Paul sailed from Cenchreae (Acts xviii. 18) on his return to Syria from his second missionary journey; and when he wrote his epistle to the Romans in the course of the third journey, an organised church seems to have been formed here (Rom. xvi. 1. See PHOEBE). The distance of Cenchræe from Corinth was 70 stadia or about nine miles. The modern village of Kiskræ retains the ancient name, which is conjectured by Dr. Sibthorpe to be derived from the millet (κέρχρη), which still grows there.

Colonial Coin of Corinth. On the obverse the head of Antoninus Pius; on the reverse the port of Cenchræe, with C. L. C., that is COLONIA LAYS JVLIA CORINTHOS.

Cendebeus (accurately Cendeabæus), a general left by Antiochus VII. in command of the sea-board of Palestine (1 Macc. xv. 38, &c.) after the defeat of Tryphon B.C. 138. He fortified Kedron and harassed the Jews for some time, but was afterwards defeated by Judas Maccabæus, with great loss (1 Macc. xvi. 1-10).

Censer (machlâh and miktereth). The former of the Hebrew words seems used generally for any instrument to seize or hold burning coals, or to receive ashes, &c., such as the appendages of the brazen altar and golden candlestick mentioned in Ex. xxv. 38, xxxvii. 23. It, however, generally bears the limited meaning which properly belongs to the second word, found only in the later books (e.g. 2 Chr. xxvi. 19; Ez. viii. 11), that, viz. of a small portable vessel of metal fitted to receive burning coals from the altar, and on which the incense for burning was sprinkled (2 Chr. xxvi. 18; Luke i. 9). The only distinct precepts regarding the use of the censer are found in Num. iv. 14, and in Lev. xvi. 12. Solomon prepared "censers of pure gold" as part of the same furniture (1 K. vii. 50; 2 Chr. iv. 22). Possibly their general use may have been to take up coals from the brazen altar, and convey the incense while burning to the "golden altar," or "altar of incense," on which it was to be offered morning and evening (Ex. xxx. 7, 8). So Uzziah, when he was intending "to burn incense upon the altar of incense," took "a censer in his hand" (2 Chr. xxvi. 16, 19). The word rendered "censer" in Hebr. ix. 4 probably means the "altar of incense."

Census. I. Moses laid down the law (Ex. xxx. 12, 13) that whenever the people were numbered, an offering of $\frac{1}{2}$ a shekel should be made by every man above 20 years of age, by way of atonement or propitiation. The instances of numbering recorded in the O. T. are as follows:—1. Under the express direction of God (Ex. xxxviii. 26), in the 3rd or 4th month after the Exodus during the encampment at Sinai, chiefly for the purpose of raising money for the Tabernacle. The numbers then taken amounted to 603,550 men. 2. Again, in the 2nd month of the 2nd year after the Exodus (Num. i. 2, 3). This census was taken for a double purpose. (a.) To ascertain the number of fighting men from the age of 20 to 50. (b.) To ascertain the amount of the redemption offering due on account of all the firstborn both of persons and cattle. The Levites, whose numbers amounted to 22,000, were taken in lieu of the firstborn males of the rest of Israel, whose numbers were 22,273, and for the surplus of 273 a money payment of 1365 shekels, or 5 shekels each, was made to Aaron and his sons (Num. iii. 39, 51). 3. Another numbering took place 38 years afterwards, previous to the entrance into Canaan, when the total number, excepting the Levites, amounted to 601,730 males, showing a decrease of 1870. 4. The next formal numbering of the whole people was in the reign of David. The men of Israel above 20 years of age were 800,000, and of Judah 500,000, total 1,300,000. The book of Chron. gives the numbers of Israel 1,100,000, and of Judah 470,000, total 1,570,000; but informs us that Levi and Benjamin were not numbered (1 Chr. xxi. 6, xxvii. 24). 5. The census of David was completed by Solomon, by causing the foreigners and remnants of the conquered nations resident within Palestine to be numbered. Their number amounted to 153,600, and they were employed in forced labour on his great architectural works (Josh. ix. 27; 1 K. v. 15, ix. 20, 21; 1 Chr. xxii. 2; 2 Chr. ii. 17, 18). Between this time and the Captivity, mention is made of the numbers of armies under successive kings of Israel and Judah, from which may be gathered with more or less probability, and with due consideration of the circumstances of the times as influencing the number of the levies, estimates of the population at the various times mentioned. 6. Rehoboam (B.C. 975-958) collected from Judah and Benjamin 180,000 men to fight against Jeroboam (1 K. xii. 21). 7. Abijam (958-955), with 400,000 men, made war on Jeroboam with 800,000, of whom 500,000 were slain (2 Chr. xiii. 3, 17). 8. Asa (955-914) had an army of 300,000 men from Judah, and 280,000 (Josephus says 250,000) from Benjamin, with which he defeated Zerah the Ethiopian, with an army of 1,000,000 (2 Chr. xiv. 8, 9). 9. Jehoshaphat (914-891), besides men in garrisons, had under arms 1,160,000 men, including perhaps subject foreigners (2 Chr. xvii. 14-19). 10. Amaziah (838-811) had from Judah and Benjamin 300,000, besides 100,000 mercenaries from Israel (2 Chr. xxv. 5, 6). 11. Uzziah (811-759) could bring into the field 307,500 men (307,000, Josephus), well armed, under 2600 officers (2 Chr. xxvi. 11-15). 12. The number of those who returned with Zerubbabel in the first caravan is reckoned at 42,360 (Ezr. ii. 64); but of these perhaps 12,542 belonged to other tribes than Judah and Benjamin. The purpose of this census was to settle with reference to the year of Jubilee the inheritances in the Holy Land, which had been disturbed by the Captivity, and also to ascertain the family genealogies, and ensure, as far as possible, the purity of the Jewish race (Ezr. ii. 59, x. 2, 8, 18, 44; Lev. xxv. 10). In the second caravan, B.C. 458, the number was 1496. Women and children are in neither case included (Ezr. viii. 1-14). Throughout all these accounts two points are clear. 1. That great pains were taken to ascertain and register the numbers of the Jewish people at various times for the reasons mentioned above. 2. That the numbers given in some cases can with difficulty be reconciled with other numbers of no very distant date, as well as with the presumed capacity of the country for supporting population. But while great doubt rests on the genuineness of numerical expressions in O. T. it must be considered that the readings on which our version is founded, give with trifling variations the same results as those presented by the LXX. and by Josephus. There are besides abundant traces throughout the whole of Palestine of a much higher rate of fertility in former as compared with present times, a fertility remarked by profane writers, and of which the present neglected state of cultivation affords no test. This combined with the positive divine promises of populousness, increases the probability of at least approximate correctness in the foregoing estimates of population.—II. In N. T., St. Luke, in his account of the "taxing," says, a decree went out from Augustus that all the world should be taxed, and in the Acts alludes to a disturbance raised by Judas of Galilee in the days of the "taxing" (Luke ii. 1; Acts v. 37). The Roman census under the Republic consisted, so far as the present purpose is concerned, in an enrolment of persons and property by tribes and households. The census was taken, more or less regularly, in the provinces, under the republic, by provincial censors, and the tribute regulated at their discretion, but no complete census was made before the time of Augustus, who carried out 3 general inspections of this kind, viz., (1.) B.C. 28; (2.) B.C. 8; (3.) A.D. 14; and a partial one, A.D. 4.

Ceras, 1 Esd. v. 29. [KEROS.]

Ce'tab, 1 Esd. v. 30. There is no name corresponding with this in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah.

Cha'bris, the son of Gothoniel, one of the three "rulers," or "ancients" of Bethulia, in the time of Judith (Jud. vi. 15, viii. 10, x. 6).

Cha'dias. "They of Chadias and Ammidoi," according to 1 Esd. v. 20, returned from Babylon with Zerobabel. There are no corresponding names in Ezra and Nehemiah.

Chaff. The Heb. words rendered chaff in A. V. do not seem to have precisely the same meaning: chāshush=dry grass, hay; and occurs twice only in O. T., viz., Is. v. 24, xxxiii. 11. Mōts is chaff separated by winnowing from the grain—the husk of the wheat. Teben, rendered straw in Ex. v. 7, 10, 11, &c., and stubble in Job xxi. 18, means straw cut into short portions, in which state it was mixed with the mud of which bricks were made to give it consistency. In 1 K. iv. 28, mention is made of a mixed fodder for horses and camels of barley and teben, such as the Arabs call tibn to this day. The Chaldaic word ūr occurs but once, in Dan. ii. 35.

Chain. Chains were used, 1. as badges of office; 2. for ornament; 3. for confining prisoners. 1. The gold chain placed about Joseph's neck (Gen. xli. 42), and that promised to Daniel (Dan. v. 7), are instances of the first use. In Egypt it was one of the insignia of a judge, who wore an image of truth attached to it; it was also worn by the prime minister. In Persia it was considered not only as a mark of royal favour, but a token of investiture. In Ez. xvi. 11, the chain is mentioned as the symbol of sovereignty. 2. Chains for ornamental purposes were worn by men as well as women in many countries both of Europe and Asia, and probably this was the case among the Hebrews (Prov. i. 9). The necklace consisted of pearls, corals, &c., threaded on a string. Besides the necklace, other chains were worn (Jud. x. 4) hanging down as far as the waist, or even lower. Some were adorned with pieces of metal, shaped in the form of the moon ("round tires like the moon," A. V.; Is. iii. 18). The Midianites adorned the necks of their camels with it (Judg. viii. 21, 26). To other chains were suspended various trinkets—as scent-bottles (Is. iii. 20) and mirrors (Is. iii. 28). Step-chains were attached to the ankle-rings, which shortened the step and produced a mincing gait (Is. iii. 16, 18). 3. The means adopted for confining prisoners among the Jews were fetters similar to our handcuffs (Judg. xvi. 21; 2 Sam. iii. 34; 2 K. xxv. 7; Jer. xxxix. 7). Among the Romans, the prisoner was handcuffed to one, and occasionally to two guards (Acts xii. 6, 7, xxi. 33).

Chalcedony, only in Rev. xxi. 19. The name is applied in modern mineralogy to one of the varieties of agate. There can, however, be little doubt that the stone to which Theophrastus (De Lapid. § 25) refers, as being found in the island opposite Chalcedon and used as a solder, must have been the green transparent carbonate of copper, or our copper emerald.

Chal'col, 1 K. iv. 31. [CALCOL.]

Chalde'a, more correctly Chaldæa's, is properly only the most southern portion of Babylonia. It is used, however, in our version for the Hebrew ethnic appellative Cœdim (or "Chaldaeans"), under which term the inhabitants of the entire country are designated; and it will therefore here be taken in this extended sense. The origin of the term is very doubtful.—1. Extent and boundaries.—The tract of country viewed in Scripture as the land of the Chaldaeans is that vast alluvial plain which has been formed by the deposits of the Euphrates and the Tigris—at least so far as it lies to the west of the latter stream. This extraordinary flat, unbroken except by the works of man, extends, in a direction nearly N.E. and S.W., a distance of 400 miles along the course of the rivers, and is on an average about 100 miles in width.—2. General character of the country.—The general aspect of the country is thus described by a modern traveller, who well contrasts its condition now with the appearance which it must have presented in ancient times. "In former days," he says, "the vast plains of Babylon were nourished by a complicated system of canals and watercourses, which spread over the surface of the country like a net-work. The wants of a teeming population were supplied by a rich soil, not less bountiful than that on the banks of the Egyptian Nile. Like islands rising from a golden sea of waving corn, stood frequent groves of palm-trees and pleasant gardens, affording to the idler or traveller their grateful and highly-valued shade. Crowds of passengers hurried along the dusty roads to and from the busy city. The land was rich in corn and wine. How changed is the aspect of that region at the present day! Long lines of mounds, it is true, mark the courses of those main arteries which formerly diffused life and vegetation along their banks, but their channels are now bereft of moisture and choked with drifted sand; the smaller offshoots are wholly effaced. 'A drought is upon her waters,' says the prophet, 'and they shall be dried up!' All that remains of that ancient civilisation—that 'glory of kingdoms,'—'the praise of the whole earth,'—is recognisable in the numerous mouldering heaps of brick and rubbish which overspread the surface of the plain. Instead of the luxurious fields, the groves and gardens, nothing now meets the eye but an arid waste—the dense population of former times is vanished, and no man dwells there." (Loftus's Chaldaea, pp. 14-5).—3. Divisions.—The true Chaldaea is always in the geographers a distinct region, being the most southern portion of Babylonia, lying chiefly (if not solely) on the right bank of the Euphrates. Babylonia above this, is separated into two districts, called respectively Amordacia and Auranitis. The former is the name of the central territory round Babylon itself; the latter is applied to the regions towards the north, where Babylonia borders on Assyria.—4. Cities.—Babylonia was celebrated at all times for the number and antiquity of its cities. The most important of those which have been identified are Borsippa (Birs-Nimrud), Sippara or Sepharvaim (Mosab), Cutha (Ibrahim), Calneh (Niffer), Eneh (Warka), Ur (Mugheir), Chilmad (Kadicadha), Larancha (Senherah), Is (Hit), Duraba (Akkerkuf); but besides these there were a multitude of others, the sites of which have not been determined.—5. Canals.—One of the most remarkable features of ancient Babylonia was its network of canals. Three principal canals carried off the waters of the Euphrates towards the Tigris, above Babylon. These were, 1. The original "Royal River," or Ar-Malcha of Berosus; 2. the Nahr Malcha of the Arabs; and 3. the Nahr Kutha. On the other side of the stream, a large canal, leaving the Euphrates at Hit, where the alluvial plain commences, skirted the deposit on the west along its entire extent, and fell into the Persian Gulf at the head of the Bubian creek; while a second main artery branched from the Euphrates nearly at Mosab, and ran into a great lake, in the neighbourhood of Borsippa, whence the lands to the south-west of Babylon were irrigated.—6. Sea of Nedjef, Chaldaean marshes, &c.—Chaldaea contains one natural feature deserving of special description—the "great inland freshwater sea of Nedjef" (Loftus, p. 45). This sheet of water is a permanent lake of considerable depth, and extends in a south-easterly direction a distance of 40 miles. Its greatest width is 35 miles. Above and below the Sea of Nedjef, from the Birs-Nimrud to Kufa, and from the south-eastern extremity of the Sea to Samava, extend the famous Chaldaean marshes, where Alexander was nearly lost.—7. Productions.—The extraordinary fertility of the Chaldaean soil has been noticed by various writers. It is said to be the only country in the world where wheat grows wild. Herodotus declared (i. 193) that grain commonly returned 200-fold to the sower, and occasionally 300-fold. The palm was undoubtedly one of the principal objects of cultivation. The soil is rich, but there is little cultivation, the inhabitants subsisting chiefly upon dates. More than half the country is left dry and waste from the want of a proper system of irrigation; while the remaining half is to a great extent covered with marshes owing to the same neglect.

Chaldeans, or Chal'dees, appear in Scripture, until the time of the Captivity, as the people of the country which has Babylon for its capital, and which is itself termed Shinar; but in the Book of Daniel, while this meaning is still found (v. 30, and ix. 1), a new sense shows itself. The Chaldeans are classed with the magicians and astrologers; and evidently form a sort of priest class, who have a peculiar "tongue" and "learning" (i. 4), and are consulted by the king on religious subjects. The same variety appears in profane writers. It appears that the Chaldeans (Kaldai or Kaldi) were in the earliest times merely one out of the many Cushite tribes inhabiting the great alluvial plain known afterwards as Chaldaea or Babylonia. Their special seat was probably that southern portion of the country which is found to have so late retained the name of Chaldaea. Here was Ur "of the Chaldees," the modern Mugheir, which lies south of the Euphrates, near its junction with the Shat-el-Hie. In process of time, as the Kaldi grew in power, their name gradually prevailed over those of the other tribes inhabiting the country; and by the era of the Jewish captivity it had begun to be used generally for all the inhabitants of Babylonia. It had come by this time to have two senses, both ethnic: in the one it was the special appellation of a particular race to whom it had belonged from the remotest times, in the other it designated the nation at large in which this race was predominant. It has been observed above that the Kaldi proper were a Cushite race. This is proved by the remains of their language, which closely resembles the Galla or ancient language of Ethiopia. Now it appears by the inscriptions that while both in Assyria and in later Babylonia, the Shemitic type of speech prevailed for civil purposes, the ancient Cushite dialect was retained, as a learned language for scientific and religious literature. This is no doubt the "learning" and the "tongue" to which reference is made in the Book of Daniel (i. 4). The Chaldeans were really the learned class; they were priests, magicians, or astronomers, and in the last of the three capacities, they probably effected discoveries of great importance. According to Strabo, there were two chief seats of Chaldaean learning, Borsippa, and Ur or Orchoë. To these we may add from Pliny Babylon, and Sippara or Sepharvaim. The Chaldeans (it would appear) congregated into bodies, forming what we may perhaps call universities, and pursuing the studies, in which they engaged, together. They probably mixed up to some extent astrology with their astronomy, even in the earlier times, but they certainly made great advances in astronomical science. In later times they seem to have degenerated into mere fortune-tellers.

Chamberlain. Erastus, "the chamberlain" of the city of Corinth, was one of those whose salutations to the Roman Christians are given at the end of the Ep. addressed to them (Rom. xvi. 23). The office which he held was apparently that of public treasurer, or arcarius, as the Vulgate renders his title. These arcarii were inferior magistrates, who had the charge of the public chest (arca publica), and were under the authority of the senate. They kept the accounts of the public revenues. The office held by Blastus, "the king's chamberlain," was entirely different from this (Acts xii. 20). It was a post of honour which involved great intimacy and influence with the king. The margin of our version gives "that was over the king's bedchamber." For CHAMBERLAIN as used in the O. T., see EUNUCH.

Chameleon. The Hebrew ôôch occurs in the sense of some kind of unclean animal in Lev. xi. 30; the A. V. follows the LXX. and Vulg. (Hieroz. ii. 493). Bochart accepts the Arabic reading of elcarlo, i. e. the lizard, known by the name of the "Monitor of the Nile" (Monitor Niloticus, Grey), a large strong reptile common in Egypt and other parts of Africa; but the evidence which supports this interpretation is far from conclusive.

Chamois (Heb. zemer). In the list of animals allowed for food (Deut. xiv. 5) mention is made of the zemer; the LXX., Vulg., and some other versions, give "camelopard" or "giraffe." The "chamois" of the A. V. can hardly be allowed to represent the zemer; for there is no evidence that it has ever been seen in Palestine or the Lebanon. Col. H. Smith suggests that some mountain sheep is intended, and figures the Kebsch (Ammotragus Tragelaphus), a wild sheep not uncommon, he says, in the Mokattam rocks near Cairo, and found also in Sinai; it is not improbable that this is the animal denoted.

Aoudad Sheep.

Cha'naan, the manner in which the word CANAAN is spelt in the A. V. of the Apocrypha and N. T. (Jud. v. 3, 9, 10; Bar. iii. 22; Sus. 56; 1 Macc. ix. 37; Acts vii. 11, xiii. 19).

Chananeite for CANAANITE, Jud. v. 18.

Chanunne'us, 1 Esd. viii. 48.

Chapter. The capital of a pillar; also possibly a roll moulding at the top of a building or work of art, as in the case (1) of the pillars of the Tabernacle and Temple, and of the two pillars called especially Jachin and Boaz; and (2) of the lavers belonging to the Temple (Ex. xxviii. 17; 1 K. vii. 27, 31, 38).

Charaath'alar, a corruption of "Cherub, Adan," in Ezr. ii. (1 Esd. v. 36).

Char'aca, a place mentioned only in 2 Mac. xii. 17, and there so obscurely that nothing can be certainly inferred as to its position. It was on the east of Jordan, and it was 750 stadia from the city Caspin. Ewald places it to the extreme east, and identifies it with RAPHON. The only name now known on the east of Jordan which recalls Charax is Kerak, the ancient Kir-Moab, on the S.E. of the Dead Sea.

Char'ashim, The Valley of ("ravine of craftsmen"), a place mentioned twice;—1 Chr. iv. 14, as having been founded or settled by Joab, a man of the tribe of Judah and family of Othniel; and Neh. xi. 35, as being reinhabited by Benjamites after the Captivity. In this passage it is rendered "valley of craftsmen."

Char'chamis, 1 Esd. i. 25. [CARCHEMISH.]

Char'chemish, 2 Chr. xxv. 20. [CARCHEMISH.]

Char'cus, 1 Esd. v. 32. Corrupted from BARKOS.

Char'ea, 1 Esd. v. 32. [HARSHIA.]

Charger. A shallow vessel for receiving water or blood, also for presenting offerings of fine flour with oil (Num. vii. 79). The "chargers" mentioned in Numbers are said to have been of silver, and to have weighed each 130 shekels, or 65 oz. The daughter of Herodias brought the head of St. John Baptist in a charger (Matt. xiv. 8): probably a trencher or platter. [BASIN.]

Chariot. 1. Receb, sometimes including the horses (2 Sam. viii. 4, x. 18).—2. Rêcûb, a chariot or horse (Ps. civ. 3).—3. Mercûb, from same root as (1) a chariot, litter, or seat (Lev. xv. 9; Cant. iii. 10).—4. Mercûbâh.—5. 'Agâlâh (Ps. xli. 9 [10]).—6. Aphiryôn (Cant. iii. 9; between 1-4 no difference of signification). A vehicle used either for warlike or peaceful purposes, but most commonly the former. Of the latter use the following only are probable instances as regards the Jews, 1 K. xviii. 44, and as regards other nations, Gen. xli. 43, xli. 29; 2 K. v. 9; Acts viii. 28. The earliest mention of chariots in Scripture is in Egypt, where Joseph, as a mark of distinction, was placed in Pharaoh's second chariot (Gen. xli. 43), and later when he went in his own chariot to meet his father on his entrance into Egypt from Canaan (xli. 29). In the funeral procession of Jacob chariots also formed a part, possibly by way of escort or as a guard of honour (l. 9). The next mention of Egyptian chariots is for a warlike purpose (Ex. xiv. 7). In this point of view chariots among some nations of antiquity, as elephants among others, may be regarded as filling the place of heavy artillery in modern times, so that the military power of a nation might be estimated by the number of its chariots. Thus Pharaoh in pursuing Israel took with him 600 chariots. The Canaanites of the valleys of Palestine were enabled to resist the Israelites successfully in consequence of the number of their chariots of iron, i. e. perhaps armed with iron scythes (Ges. s. v.; Josh. xvii. 18; Judg. i. 19). Jabin, king of Canaan, had 900 chariots (Judg. iv. 3). The Philistines in Saul's time had 30,000, a number which seems excessive (1 Sam. xiii. 5). David took from Hadadzezer king of Zobah 1000 chariots (2 Sam. viii. 4), and from the Syrians a little later 700 (x. 18), who in order to recover their ground collected 32,000 chariots (1 Chr. xix. 7). Up to this time the Israelites possessed few or no chariots, partly no doubt in consequence of the theocratic prohibition against multiplying horses, for fear of intercourse with Egypt, and the regal despotism implied in the possession of them (Deut. xvii. 16; 1 Sam. viii. 11, 12). But to some extent David (2 Sam. viii. 4), and in a much greater degree Solomon, broke through the prohibition. He raised, therefore, and maintained a force of 1400 chariots (1 K. x. 25) by taxation on certain cities agreeably to Eastern custom in such matters (1 K. ix. 19, x. 25; Xen.

Anab. i. 4, 9). The chariots themselves and also the horses were imported chiefly from Egypt, and the cost of each chariot was 600 shekels of silver, and of each horse 150 (1 K. x. 29). From this time chariots were regarded as among the most important arms of war, though the supplies of them and of horses appear to have been still mainly drawn from Egypt (1 K. xxii. 34; 2 K. ix. 16, 21, xiii. 7, 14, xviii. 24, xxiii. 30; Is. xxxi. 1). Most commonly 2 persons, and sometimes 3 rode in the chariot, of whom the third was employed to carry the state umbrella (2 K. ix. 20, 24; 1 K. xxii. 34; Acts viii. 38). A second chariot usually accompanied the king to battle to be used in case of necessity (2 Chr. xxv. 34). The prophets allude frequently to chariots as typical of power (Ps. xx. 7, civ. 3; Jer. li. 21; Zech. vi. 1). Chariots of other nations are mentioned, as of Assyria (2 K. xix. 23; Ez. xlii. 24), Syria (2 Sam. viii. and 2 K. vi. 14, 15), Persia (Is. xxii. 6), and lastly Antiochus Eupator is said to have had 300 chariots armed with scythes (2 Mac. xiii. 2). In the N. T., the only mention made of a chariot except in Rev. ix. 9, is in the case of the Ethiopian or Abyssinian eunuch of Queen Candace (Acts viii. 28, 29, 38). Jewish chariots were no doubt imitated from Egyptian models, if not actually imported from Egypt.

Assyrian chariot.

Chariots armed with scythes may perhaps be intended by the "chariots of iron" of the Canaanites; they are mentioned as part of the equipment of Antiochus (2 Mac. xiii. 2), and of Darius (Diod. Sic. xvii. 53; Appian, Syr. 32).

Char'mis, son of Melchiel, one of the three "ancients" or "rulers" of Bethulia (Jud. vi. 15, viii. 10, x. 6).

Char'ran, Acts vii. 2, 4. [HARAN.]

Chase. [HUNTING.]

Chas'eba, probably a mere corruption of GAZERA (1 Esd. v. 31).

Che'bar, a river in the "land of the Chaldeans" (Ez. i. 3), on the banks of which some of the Jews were located at the time of the captivity, and where Ezekiel saw his earlier visions (Ez. i. 1, iii. 15, 23, &c.). It is commonly regarded as identical with the Habor, or river of Gozan, to which some portion of the Israelites were removed by the Assyrians (2 K. xvii. 6). But this is a mere conjecture. The Chebar of Ezekiel must be looked for in Babylonia. It is a name which might properly have been given to any great stream. Perhaps the view that the Chebar of Ezekiel is the Nahr Malcha or Royal Canal of Nebuchadnezzar—the greatest of all the cuttings in Mesopotamia—may be regarded as best deserving acceptance.

Cheb'el, one of the singular topographical terms in which the ancient Hebrew language abounded, and which give so much force and precision to its records. The ordinary meaning of the word Cheb'el is a "rope" or "cord;" but in its topographical sense, as meaning a "tract" or "district," we find it always attached to the region of Argob, which is invariably designated by this, and by no other term (Deut. iii. 4, 13, 14; 1 K. iv. 13). It has been already shown how exactly applicable it is to the circumstances of the case. No clue is afforded us to the reason of this definite localization of the term Chelod.

Chedorla'omer, a king of Elam, in the time of Abraham, who with three other chiefs made war upon the kings of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Zoar, and reduced them to servitude (Gen. xiv. 17). The name of a king is found upon the bricks recently discovered in Chaldaea, which is read Kudur-mapula. This man has been supposed to be identical with Chedorlaomer, and the opinion is confirmed by the fact that he is further distinguished by a title which may be translated "Ravager of the west." "As however one type alone of his legends has been discovered," says Col. Rawlinson, "it is impossible to pronounce at present on the identification. Chedorlaomer may have been the leader of certain immigrant Chaldaean Elamites who founded the great Chaldaean empire of Berossus in the early part of the 20th century B.C."

Cheese is mentioned only three times in the Bible, and on each occasion under a different name in the Hebrew (Job x. 10; 1 Sam. xvii. 18; 2 Sam. xvii. 29). It is difficult to decide how far these terms correspond with our notion of cheese; for they simply express various degrees of coagulation. It may be observed that cheese is not at the present day common among the Bedouin Arabs, butter being decidedly preferred; but there is a substance, closely corresponding to those mentioned in 1 Sam. xvii.; 2 Sam. xvii., consisting of coagulated buttermilk, which is dried until it becomes quite hard, and is then ground: the Arabs eat it mixed with butter (Burckhardt, Notes on the Bedouins, i. 60).

Che'lal, Ezr. x. 30.

Chel'dias. 1. Ancestor of Baruch (Bar. i. 1).—2. Hilki'ah the high priest in the time of Isaiah (Bar. i. 7).—3. The father of Susanna (Hist. of Sus. 2, 29, 63). Tradition represents him as the brother of Jeremiah, and identical with Hilki'ah who found the copy of the law in the time of Josiah (2 K. xxii. 8).

Chel'lians, The (Jud. ii. 23). [CHELLUS.]

Chel'tuh, Ezr. x. 35.

Chel'us, named amongst the places beyond (i. e. on the west of) Jordan to which Nabuchodonosor sent his summons (Jud. i. 9). Except its mention with "Kades" there is no clue to its situation. Ireland conjectures that it may have been Elusa.

Chel'od. "Many nations of the sons of Chelod" were among those who obeyed the summons of Nabuchodonosor to his war with Arphaxad (Jud. i. 6). The word is apparently corrupt.

Chel'tub. 1. A man among the descendants of Judah, described as the brother of Shuah and the father of Mechir.—2. Ezri the son of Chelub was the overseer of those who "did the work of the field for tillage of the ground," one of David's officers (1 Chr. xxvii. 26).

Chel'ubal, the son of Hezon, of one of the chief families of Judah. The name occurs in 1 Chr. ii. 9 only, and from a comparison of this passage with ii. 18 and 42, it would appear to be but another form of the name Caleb.

Chem'arims, The. This word only occurs in the text of the A. V. in Zeph. i. 4. In 2 K. xxiii. 5 it is rendered "idolatrous priests," and in Hos. x. 5 "priests," and in both cases "chemarim" is given in the margin. So far as regards the Hebrew usage of the word it is exclusively applied to the priests of the false worship, and was in all probability a term of foreign origin. In Syriac the word amard is found without the same restriction of meaning, being used in Judg. xvii. 5, 12, of the priest of Micah, while in Is. lxi. 6 it denotes the priests of the true God, and in Heb. ii. 17 is applied to Christ himself. Kimchi derived it from a root signifying "to be black," because the idolatrous priests wore black garments; but this is without foundation.

Chemosh, the national deity of the Moabites (Num. xxi. 29; Jer. xlviii. 7, 13, 46). In Judg. xi. 24, he also appears as the god of the Ammonites. Solomon introduced, and Josiah abolished, the worship of Chemosh at Jerusalem (1 K. xi. 7; 2 K. xxiii. 13). Jerome identifies him with Bael-Peor; others with Bael-Zebub, on etymological grounds; others, as Gesenius, with Mars, and others with Saturn.

Chena'anah. 1. Son of Bilhan, son of Jediahel, son of Benjamin, head of a Benjamite house (1 Chr. vii. 10), probably of the family of the Belaites. [BELA].—2. Father, or ancestor of Zedekiah the false prophet (1 K. xxii. 11, 24; 2 Chr. xviii. 10, 23).

Chen'ani, one of the Levites who assisted at the solemn purification of the people under Ezra (Neh. ix. 4).

Chenani'ah, chief of the Levites, when David carried the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chr. xv. 22, xxvi. 29).

Che'phar-Haammons'i, "Hamlet of the Ammonites;" a place mentioned among the towns of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 24). No trace of it has yet been discovered.

Chephi'rah, "the hamlet;" one of the four cities of the Gibeonites (Josh. ix. 17), named afterwards among the towns of Benjamin, with Ramah, Beeroth, and Mizpeh (xviii. 26). The men of Chephirah returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezr. ii. 25; Neh. vii. 29). Dr. Robinson seems to have discovered it under the scarcely altered name of Heftir, about 2 miles west of Yalo (Ajalon). [CAPIHRA.]

Che'ran, one of the sons of Dishon the Horite "duke" (Gen. xxxvi. 26; 1 Chr. i. 41).

Che'reas, a brother of Timotheus (1 Macc. v. 6), who held Gazara (1 Macc. v. 8), where he was slain (2 Macc. x. 82, 87).

Cher'ethims, Ez. xxv. 16. The plural form of the word elsewhere rendered CHERETHITES; which see.

Cher'ethites and Pel'ethites, the life-guards of King David (2 Sam. viii. 18, xv. 18, xx. 7, 23; 1 K. i. 38, 44; 1 Chr. xviii. 17). These titles are commonly said to signify "executioners and couriers." It is plain that these royal guards were employed as executioners (2 K. xi. 4), and as couriers (1 K. xiv. 27). But it has been conjectured that they may have been foreign mercenaries. They are connected with the Gittites, a foreign tribe (2 Sam. xv. 21); and the Cherethites are mentioned as a nation (1 Sam. xxx. 14), dwelling apparently on the coast, and therefore probably Philistines, of which name Pelethites may be only another form.

Che'rith, The Brook, the torrent-bed or wady in which Elijah hid himself during the early part of the three years' drought (1 K. xvii. 3, 6). The position of the Cherith has been much disputed. Eusebius and Jerome place it beyond Jordan, where also Schwarz would identify it in a Wady Alias, opposite Bethshean. This is the Wady a Yabis (Jabesh). The only tradition on the subject is one mentioned by Marinus Sanutus in 1321; that it ran by Phasaelus, Herod's city in the Jordan valley. This would make it the Ain Fusa'il which falls from the mountains of Ephraim into the Ghór, south of Kurn Sártabeh, and about 15 miles above Jericho. This view is supported by Bachiene, and in our own time by Van de Velde (ii. 310). Dr. Robinson on the other hand would find the name in the Wady Kelt behind Jericho. The two names are however essentially unlike. The argument from probability is in favour of the Cherith being on the east of Jordan, and the name may possibly be discovered there.

Cher'ub, apparently a place in Babylonia from which some persons of doubtful extraction returned to Judaea with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 59; Neh. vii. 61).

Cher'ub, Cher'ubim. The symbolical figure so called was a composite creature-form, which finds a parallel in the religious insignia of Assyria, Egypt, and Persia, e. g. the sphinx, the winged bulls and lions of Nineveh, &c., a general prevalence which prevents the necessity of our regarding it as a mere adoption from the Egyptian ritual. In such forms every imaginative people has sought to embody its notions either of the attributes of Divine essence, or of the vast powers of nature which transcend that of man. The Hebrew idea seems to limit the number of the cherubim. A pair (Ex. xxv. 18, &c.) were placed on the mercy-seat of the ark: a pair of colossal size overshadowed it in Solomon's Temple with the canopy of their contiguously extended wings. Ezekiel, i. 4-14, speaks of four, and similarly the apocalyptic "beasts" (Rev. iv. 6) are four. So at the front or east of Eden were posted "the cherubim," as though the whole of some recognised number. They utter no voice, though one is "heard from above them," nor have dealings with men save to awe and repel. The cherubim are placed beneath the actual presence of Jehovah, whose moving throne they appear to draw (Gen. iii. 24; Ez. i. 5, 25, 26, x. 1, 2, 6, 7; Is. vi. 2, 3, 8). The glory symbolising that presence which eye cannot see rests or rides on them, or one of them, thence dismounts to the temple threshold, and then departs and mounts again (Ez. x. 4, 18; comp. ix. 3; Ps. xviii. 10). There is in them an entire absence of human sympathy, and even on the mercy-seat they probably appeared not merely as admiring and wondering (1 Pet. i. 12), but as guardians of the covenant and avengers of its breach. Those on the ark were to be placed with wings stretched forth, one at each end of the mercy-seat, and to be made "of the mercy-seat."

The winged female sphinx. (Wilkinson.)

Assyrian Gryphon. (Layard, ii. 456.)

They are called the cherubim of glory (Heb. ix. 5), as on them the glory, when visible, rested. They were anointed with the holy oil, like the ark itself, and the other sacred furniture. Their wings were to be stretched upwards, and their faces "towards each other and towards the mercy-seat." It is remarkable that with such precise directions as to their position, attitude, and material, nothing save that they were winged, is said concerning their shape. On the whole it seems likely that the word "cherub" meant not only the composite creature-form, of which the man, lion, ox, and eagle were the elements, but, further, some peculiar and mystical form, which Ezekiel, being a priest, would know and recognise as "the face of a CHERUB" (Ez. x. 14); but which was kept secret from all others; and such probably were those on the ark, though those on the hangings and panels might be of the popular device. What this peculiar cherubic form was is perhaps an impenetrable mystery. It might well be the symbol of Him whom none could behold and live. For as symbols of Divine attributes, e. g. omnipotence and omniscience, not as representations of actual beings, the cherubim should be regarded. Many etymological sources for the word cherub have been proposed. The two best worth noticing, and between which it is difficult to choose are, (1) the Syriac cerub, great, strong; (2) the Syriac cerab, to plough, i. e. to cut into; hence, "that which "=the ox, or, that which is carved=an image. Besides these two, wisdom or intelligence has been given by high authority as the true meaning of the name. Though the exact form of the cherubim is uncertain, they must have borne a general resemblance to the composite religious figures found upon the monuments of Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, and Persia. In the sacred boats or arks of the Egyptians, there are sometimes found two figures with extended wings, which remind us of the description of the cherubim "covering the mercy-seat with their wings, and their faces [looking] one to another" (Ex. xxv. 20).

Ches'alón, a place named as one of the landmarks on the west part of the north boundary of Judah, apparently situated on the shoulder of Mount Jearim (Josh. xv. 10). Dr. Robinson has observed a modern village named Kesla, about six miles to the N.E. of Ain-shems, on the western mountains of Judah. Eusebius and Jerome, in the Onomasticon, mention a Chaslon, but they differ as to its situation, the former placing it in Benjamin, the latter in Judah: both agree that it was a very large village in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem.

Ches'ed, fourth son of Nahor (Gen. xxii. 22).

Ches'il, a town in the extreme south of Palestine, named with Hormah and Ziklag (Josh. xv. 30). In Josh. xix. 4 the name BETHUL occurs in place of it, as if the one were identical with, or a corruption of, the other. This is confirmed by the reading of 1 Chr. iv. 30, BETHUEL. In this case we can only conclude that Chesil was an early variation of Bethul.

Chest. By this word are translated in the A. V. two distinct Hebrew terms: 1. árón; this is invariably used for the Ark of the Covenant, and with two exceptions, for that only. The two exceptions alluded to are (a) the "coffin" in which the bones of Joseph were carried from Egypt (Gen. l. 26); and (b) the "chest" in which Jehoiada the priest collected the alms for the repairs of the Temple (2 K. xii. 9, 10; 2 Chr. xxiv. 8-11). Of the former the accompanying wood-cut is probably a near representation.—2. gēdāzim, "chests" (Ez. xxvii. 24 only).

Chestnut-Tree (Heb. 'armón). Mention is made of the 'armón in Gen. xxx. 37, and in Ezek. xxxi. 8, it is spoken of as one of the glories of Assyria. The balance of authority is certainly in favour of the "plane-tree" being the tree denoted. The A. V. which follows the Rabbins is certainly to be rejected, for the context of the passages where the word occurs, indicates some tree which thrives best in low and rather moist situations, whereas the chestnut-tree is a tree which prefers dry and hilly ground. The plane-trees of Palestine in ancient days were probably more numerous than they are now; though modern travellers occasionally refer to them.

Chesul'loth (lit. "the loins"), one of the towns of Issachar, deriving its name, perhaps, from its situation on the slope of some mountain (Josh. xix. 18). From its position in the lists it appears to be between Jezreel and Shunem (Salam).

Chet'tiim, 1 Macc. i. 1. [CHITTIM.]

Ches'ib, a name which occurs but once (Gen. xxxviii. 5). In the absence of any specification of the position of Chesib, we may adopt the opinion of the interpreters, ancient and modern, who identify it with ACHIZIB.

Chid'on, the name which in 1 Chr. xiii. 9 is given to the threshing-floor at which the accident to the ark, on its transport from Kirjath-jearim to Jerusalem, took place, and the death of Uzzah. In the parallel account in 2 Sam. vi. the name is given as NACHON.

Children. The blessing of offspring, but especially, and sometimes exclusively, of the male sex is highly valued among all Eastern nations, while the absence is regarded as one of the severest punishments (Gen. xvi. 2; Deut. vii. 14; 1 Sam. i. 6; 2 Sam. vi. 23; 2 K. iv. 14; Is. xlvii. 9; Jer. xx. 15; Ps. cxxvii. 3, 5). Childbirth is in the East usually, but not always, attended with little difficulty, and accomplished with little or no assistance (Gen. xxxv. 17, xxxviii. 28; Ex. i. 19; 1 Sam. iv. 19, 20). As soon as the child was born, and the umbilical cord cut, it was washed in a bath, rubbed with salt, and wrapped in swaddling clothes. Arab mothers sometimes rub their children with earth or sand (Ez. xvi. 4; Job xxxviii. 9; Luke ii. 7). On the 8th day the rite of circumcision, in the case of a boy, was performed, and a name given, sometimes, but not usually, the same as that of the father, and generally conveying some special meaning. After the birth of a male child the mother was considered unclean for 7+33 days; if the child were a female, for double that period, 14+66 days. At the end of the time she was to make an offering of purification of a lamb as a burnt-offering, and a pigeon or turtle-dove as a sin-offering, or in case of poverty, two doves or pigeons, one as a burnt-offering, the other as a sin-offering (Lev. xii. 1-8; Luke ii. 22). The period of nursing appears to have been sometimes prolonged to 3 years (Is. xlix. 15; 2 Macc. vii. 27). Nurses were employed in cases of necessity (Ex. ii. 9; Gen. xxxiv. 59, xxxv. 8; 2 Sam. iv. 4; 2 K. xi. 2, 2 Chr.

xxii. 11). The time of weaning was an occasion of rejoicing (Gen. xxi. 8). Arab children wear little or no clothing for 4 or 5 years: the young of both sexes are usually carried by the mothers on the hip or the shoulder, a custom to which allusion is made by Isaiah (Is. xlix. 22, lxvi. 12). Both boys and girls in their early years were under the care of the women (Prov. xxxi. 1). Afterwards the boys were taken by the father under his charge. Those in wealthy families had tutors or governors, who were sometimes eunuchs (Num. xi. 12; 2 K. x. 1, 5; Is. xlix. 23; Gal. iii. 24; Esth. ii. 7). Daughters usually remained in the women's apartments till marriage, or, among the poorer classes, were employed in household work (Lev. xxi. 9; Num. xii. 14; 1 Sam. ix. 11; Prov. xxxi. 19, 23; Ecclus. vii. 25, xlii. 9; 2 Macc. iii. 19). The firstborn male children were regarded as devoted to God, and were to be redeemed by an offering (Ex. xiii. 13; Num. xviii. 15; Luke ii. 22). The authority of parents, especially of the father, over children was very great, as was also the reverence enjoined by the law to be paid to parents. The disobedient child, the striker or reviler of a parent, was liable to capital punishment, though not at the independent will of the parent. The inheritance was divided equally between all the sons except the eldest, who received a double portion (Deut. xxi. 17; Gen. xxv. 31, xlix. 3; 1 Chr. v. 1, 2; Judg. xi. 2, 7). Daughters had by right no portion in the inheritance; but if a man had no son, his inheritance passed to his daughters, who were forbidden to marry out of their father's tribe (Num. xxvii. 1, 8, xxxvi. 2, 8).

Chil'eah. [ABIGAIL; DANIEL.]

Chil'ion, the son of Elimelech and Naomi, and husband of Orpah (Ruth i. 2-5, iv. 9). He is described as "an Ephrathite of Bethlehem-judah."

Chil'mad, a place or country mentioned in conjunction with Sheba and Asshur (Ez. xxvii. 23). The only name bearing any similarity to it is Charmande, a town near the Euphrates between the Masas and the Babylonian frontier, but it is highly improbable that this place was of sufficient importance to rank with Sheba and Asshur.

Chim'ham, a follower, and probably a son of Barzillai the Gileadite, who returned from beyond Jordan with David (2 Sam. xix. 37, 38, 40). David appears to have bestowed on him a possession at Bethlehem, on which, in later times, an inn or Khan was standing (Jer. xli. 17). In 2 Sam. xix. 40, the name is in the Hebrew text CHIMHAN.

Chim'han. [CHIMHAM.]

Chin'nereth, accurately Cinnareth, a fortified city in the tribe of Naphtali (Josh. xii. 35 only), of which no trace is found in later writers, and no remains by travellers. By S. Jerome Chinnereth was identified with the later Tiberias. This may have been from some tradition then existing.

Chin'nereth, Sea of (Num. xxxiv. 11; Josh. xiii. 27), the inland sea, which is most familiarly known to us as the "Inke of Genesareth." This is evident from the mode in which it is mentioned as being at the end of Jordan opposite to the "Sea of the Arabah," i. e. the Dead Sea; as having the Arabah or Ghor below it, &c. (Deut. iii. 17; Josh. xi. 2, xii. 3). In the two latter of these passages it is in a plural form, CHINNEROTH. It seems likely that Cinnereth was an ancient Canaanite name existing long prior to the Israelite conquest.

Chin'nereth. [CHINNERETH.]

Chi'os. The position of this island in reference to the neighbouring islands and coasts could hardly be better described than in the detailed account of St. Paul's return voyage from Troas to Caesarea (Acts xx. xxi.). Having come from Assos to Mitylene in Lesbos (xx. 14), he arrived the next day over against Chios (v. 15), the next day at Samos and tarried at Trogyllium (ib.): and the following day at Miletus (ib.): thence he went by Cos and Rhodes to Patara (xxi. 1). At that time Chios enjoyed the privilege of freedom, and it is not certain that it ever was politically a part of the province of Asia, though it is separated from the mainland only by a strait of 5 miles. Its length is about 32 miles, and in breadth it varies from 8 to 18. Its outline is mountainous and bold; and it has always been celebrated for its beauty and fruitfulness. In recent times it has been too well known, under its modern name of Scio, for the dreadful sufferings of its inhabitants in the Greek war of independence.

Chis'len. [MONTHS.]

Chis'lon, father of Elidad, the prince of the tribe of Benjamin, chosen to assist in the division of the land of Canaan among the tribes (Num. xxxiv. 21).

Chis'loth-Ta'bor, a place to the border of which reached the border of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 12). It may be the village Iksal which is now standing about two miles and a half to the west of Mount Tabor.

Chitt'im, Kitt'im, a family or race descended from Javan (Gen. x. 4; 1 Chr. i. 7; A. V. KITTIM), closely related to the Dodanim, and remotely to the other descendants of Javan. Chittim is frequently noticed in Scripture: Balaam predicts that a fleet should thence proceed for the destruction of Assyria (Num. xxiv. 24); in Is. xxiii. 1, 12, it appears as the resort of the fleets of Tyre; in Jer. ii. 10, the "isles of Chittim" are to the far west, as Kedar to the east of Palestine: the Tyrians procured thence the cedar or box-wood, which they inlaid with ivory for the decks of their vessels (Ez. xxvii. 6); in Dan. xi. 30, "ships of Chittim" advance to the south to meet the king of the north. At a later period we find Alexander the Great described as coming from the land of CHETTILIM (1 Macc. i. 1), and Perseus as king of the CITIMS (1 Macc. viii. 5). Josephus considered Cyprus as the original seat of the Chittim, adducing as evidence the name of its principal town, Citium. Citium was without doubt a Phoenician town. From the town the name extended to the whole island of Cyprus, which was occupied by Phoenician colonies. The name Chittim, which in the first instance had applied to Phoenicians only, passed over to the islands which they had occupied, and thence to the people who succeeded the Phoenicians in the occupation of them. Thus in Macc., Chittim evidently = Macedonia. The "ships of Chittim" in Dan. have been explained as Macedonian; but the assumption on which this interpretation rests, is not borne out. In an ethnological point of view, Chittim must be regarded as applying, not to the original Phoenician settlers of Cyprus, but to the race which succeeded them, viz. the Carians. The Carians were connected with the Leleges, and must be considered as related to the Pelagie family though quite distinct from the Hellenic branch.

Chi'ua. [REMPHAN.]

Chlo'e, a woman mentioned in 1 Cor. i. 11.

Ch'e'ba, a place mentioned in Jud. iv. 4, apparently situated in the central part of Palestine. It is probably the same as Cho'bal, which occurs in Jud. xv. 4, 5. The name suggests Hebah, if the distance from the probable site of Bethulia were not too great.

Chor'ashan, one of the places in which "David and his men were wont to haunt," (1 Sam. xxx. 30). It may, perhaps, be identified with ASHAN of Simeon. This is, however, quite uncertain, and the name has not been discovered.

Chora'zin, one of the cities in which our Lord's mighty works were done, but named only in His denunciation (Matt. xi. 21; Luke x. 13). St. Jerome describes it as on the shore of the lake, two miles from Capernaum. Dr. Robinson's conclusion is that Khan Minyeh being Capernaum, Et-Tabighah is Bethsaida, and Tell Hâm Chorazin, but the question is enveloped in deep obscurity.

Cho'zeba. The "men of Chozeba" are named (1 Chr. iv. 22) amongst the descendants of Shelah the son of Judah. Chozib and Chozeba are, perhaps, the same as ACHZIB.

Christ. [JESUS.]

Christian. The disciples, we are told (Acts xi. 26), were first called Christians at Antioch on the Orontes, somewhere about A.D. 43. The name, and the place where it was conferred, are both significant. It is clear that the appellation "Christian" was one which could not have been assumed by the Christians themselves. They were known to each other as brethren of one family, as disciples of the same Master, as believers in the same faith, and as distinguished by the same endeavours after holiness and consecration of life; and so were called brethren (Acts xv. 1, 23; 1 Cor. vii. 12), disciples (Acts ix. 26, xi. 29), believers (Acts v. 14), saints (Rom. viii. 27, xv. 25). But the outer world could know nothing of the true force and significance of these terms. To the contemptuous Jew they were Nazarenes and Galileans, names which carried with them the infamy and turbulence of the places whence they sprung, and from whence nothing good and no prophet might come. The Jews could add nothing to the scorn which these names expressed, and had they endeavoured to do so they would not have defiled the glory of their Messiah by applying his title to those whom they could not but regard as the followers of a pretender. The name "Christian," then, which, in the only other cases where it appears in the N. T. (Acts xxvi. 28; 1 Pet. iv. 16; comp. Tac. Ann. xv. 44), is used contemptuously, could not have been applied by the early disciples to themselves, nor could it have come to them from their own nation the Jews; it must, therefore, have been imposed upon them by the Gentile world, and no place could have so appropriately given rise to it as Antioch, where the first Church was planted among the heathen. Its inhabitants were celebrated for their wit and a propensity for conferring nicknames. The Emperor Julian himself was not secure from their jests. Apollonius of Tyana was driven from the city by the insults of the inhabitants. Their wit, however, was often harmless enough; and there is no reason to suppose that the name "Christian" of itself was intended as a term of scurrility or abuse, though it would naturally be used with contempt. Suidas says the name was given in the reign of Claudius, when Peter appointed Evodius bishop of Antioch, and they who were formerly called Nazarenes and Galileans had their name changed to Christians.

Chronicles, First and Second Books of, the name originally given to the record made by the appointed historiographers in the kingdoms of Israel and Judah. In the LXX. these books are called Παραλειπομένων πρώτον and δεύτερον, which is understood, after Jerome's explanation, as meaning that they are supplementary to the books of Kings. The Vulgate retains both the Hebrew and Greek name in Latin characters, Dibre jammim, or hajamim, and Paralipomenon. The constant tradition of the Jews, in which they have been followed by the great mass of Christian commentators, is that these books were for the most part compiled by Ezra. In fact, the internal evidence as to the time when the book of Chronicles was compiled, seems to tally remarkably with the tradition concerning its authorship. Notwithstanding this agreement, however, the authenticity of Chronicles has been vehemently impugned by De Wette and other German critics, whose arguments have been successfully refuted by Dahler, Keil, Movers, and others. As regards the plan of the book, of which the book of Ezra is a continuation, forming one work, it becomes apparent immediately we consider it as the compilation of Ezra or some one nearly contemporary with him. One of the greatest difficulties connected with the captivity and the return must have been the maintenance of that genealogical distribution of the lands which yet was a vital point of the Jewish economy. Another difficulty intimately connected with the former was the maintenance of the temple services at Jerusalem. This could only be effected by the residence of the priests and Levites in Jerusalem in the order of their courses: and this residence was only practicable in case of the payment of the appointed tithes, first-fruits, and other offerings. But then again the registers of the Levitical genealogies were necessary, in order that it might be known who were entitled to such and such allowances, as porters, as singers, as priests, and so on; because all these offices went by families; and again the payment of the tithes, first-fruits, &c., was dependent upon the different families of Israel being established each in his inheritance. Obviously therefore one of the most pressing wants of the Jewish community after their return from Babylon would be trustworthy genealogical records. But further, not only had Zerubbabel, and after him Ezra and Nehemiah, laboured most earnestly to restore the temple and the public worship of God there to the condition it had been in under the kings of Judah; but it appears clearly from their policy, and from the language of the contemporary prophets, Haggai and Zechariah, that they had it much at heart to re-infuse something of national life and spirit into the heart of the people, and to make them feel that they were still the inheritors of God's covenanted mercies, and that the captivity had only temporarily interrupted, not dried up, the stream of God's favour to their nation. Now nothing could more effectually aid these pious and patriotic designs than setting before the people a compendious history of the kingdom of David, which should embrace a full account of its prosperity, should trace the sins which led to its overthrow, but should carry the thread through the period of the captivity, and continue it as it were unbroken on the other side; and those passages in their former history would be especially important which exhibited their greatest and best kings as engaged in building or restoring the temple, in reforming all corruptions in religion, and zealously regulating the services of the house of God. As regards the kingdom of Israel or Samaria, seeing it had utterly and hopelessly passed away, and that the existing inhabitants were among the bitterest "adversaries of Judah and Benjamin," it would naturally engage very little of the compiler's attention. These considerations explain exactly the plan and scope of that historical work which consists of the two books of Chronicles and the book of Ezra. Many Chaldaisms in the language of these books, the resemblance of the style of Chron. to that of Ezra, which is, in parts, avowedly Ezra's composition, the reckoning by Daries (1 Chr. xxix. 7), as well as the breaking off of the narrative in the lifetime of Ezra, are among other valid arguments by which the authorship, or rather compilation of 1 and 2 Chr. and Ezr. is vindicated to Ezra. As regards the materials used by him, and the sources of his information, they are not difficult to discover. The genealogies are obviously transcribed from some register, in which were preserved the genealogies of the tribes and families drawn up at different times. The same wide divergence in the age of other materials embodied in the books of Chronicles is also apparent. Thus the information in 1 Chr. i. concerning the kings of Edom before the reign of Saul, was obviously compiled from very ancient sources. The same may be said of the incident of the slaughter of the sons of Ephraim by the Gittites, 1 Chr. viii. 21, viii. 13, and of the account of the sons of Shela, and their dominion in Moab, 1 Chr. iv. 21, 22. The curious details concerning the Reubenites and Gadites in 1 Chr. v. must have been drawn from contemporary documents, embodied probably in the genealogical records of Jotham and Jeroboam, while other records used by the compiler are as late as after the return from Babylon, such as 1 Chr. ix. 2 sqq.; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 20 sqq.; and others, as Ezr. ii. and iv. 6-23, are as late as the time of Artaxerxes and Nehemiah. Hence it is further manifest that the books of Chronicles and Ezra, though put into their present form by one hand, contain in fact extracts from the writings of many different writers, which were extant at the time the compilation was made. For the full account of the reign of David, he made copious extracts from the books of Samuel the seer, Nathan the prophet, and Gad the seer (1 Chr. xix. 29). For the reign of Solomon he copied from "the book of Nathan," from "the prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite," and from "the visions of Iddo the seer" (2 Chr. ix. 29). Another work of Iddo called "the story" (or interpretation, Midrash) of the prophet Iddo, supplied an account of the acts, and the ways, and sayings, of king Abijah (xiii. 22): while yet another book of Iddo concerning genealogies, with the book of the prophet Shemaiah, contained the acts of king Rehoboam (xii. 15). For later times the "Book of the kings of Israel and Judah" is repeatedly cited (2 Chr. xxv. 26, xxvii. 7, xxxii. 32, xxxiii. 18, &c.), and "the sayings of the seers," or rather of Chozai (xxxiii. 19); and for the reigns of Uzziah and Hezekiah "the vision of the prophet Isaiah" (xxvi. 22, xxxii. 32). Besides the above named works, there was also the public national record mentioned in Neh. xii. 23. These "Chronicles of David," are probably the same as those above referred to, written by Samuel, Nathan, and Gad. From this time the affairs of each king's reign were regularly recorded in a book (1 K. xiv. 25; xv. 7, &c.); and it was doubtless from this common source that the passages in the Books of Samuel and Kings identical with the Books of Chronicles were derived. As regards the closing chapter of 2 Chr. subsequent to v. 8, and the first ch. of Ezra, a comparison of them with the narrative of 2 K. xiv. xxv., will lead to the conclusion that while the writer of the narrative in Kings lived in Judah, and died under the dynasty of Nebuchadnezzar, the writer of the chapter in Chronicles lived at Babylon, and survived till the commencement at least of the Persian dynasty. Moreover, he seems to speak as one who had long been a subject of Nebuchadnezzar, calling him simply "King Nebuchadnezzar." It seems highly probable that as Jeremiah wrote the closing portion of the Book of Kings, so did Daniel write the corresponding portion in Chronicles, and down to the end of Ezr. i. As regards the LANGUAGE of these books, as of Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, and the later prophets, it has a marked Chaldean colouring, and Gesenius says of them, that "as literary works, they are decidedly inferior to those of older date" (Introd. to Heb. Gramm.).

Chronology. The object of this article is to indicate the present state of biblical chronology. By this term we understand the technical and historical chronology of the Jews and their ancestors from the earliest time to the close of the New Testament Canon. The technical division must be discussed in some detail, the historical only as far as the return from Babylon, the disputed matters of the period following that event being separately treated in other articles.—I. TECHNICAL CHRONOLOGY.—The technical part of Hebrew chronology presents great difficulties. There is no evidence that the ancient Hebrews had any division smaller than an hour:—Hour.—The hour is supposed to be mentioned in Daniel (iii. 6, 15, iv. 16, 30 A. V. 19, 33, v. 5), but in no one of these cases is a definite period of time clearly intended by the word employed. The Egyptians divided the day and night into hours like ourselves from at least B.C. cir. 1200. It is therefore not improbable that the Israelites were acquainted with the hour from an early period. *The "sun-dial of Ahaz," whatever instrument, fixed or moveable, it may have been, implies a division of the kind. In the N. T. we find the same system as the modern, the hours being reckoned from the beginning of the Jewish night and day. [HOURS.] Day.—For the civil day of 24 hours we find in one place (Dan. iii. 14) the term "evening-morning" (also in 2 Cor. xi. 25 A. V. "a night and a day"). Whatever may be the proper meaning of this Hebrew term, it cannot be doubted here to signify "nights and days." The civil day was divided into night and natural day, the periods of darkness and light (Gen. i. 5). It commenced with night, which stands first in the special term given above. The night, and therefore the civil day, is generally held to have begun at sunset. The natural day probably was held to commence at sunrise, morning-twilight being included in the last watch of the night, according to the old as well as the later division; some, however, made the morning-watch part of the day. Four natural periods, smaller than the civil day, are mentioned. These are "evening," and "morning," "the two lights," as though "double light," noon, and "half the night," midnight. All these seem to designate periods, evening and morning being, however, much longer than noon and midnight. The night was divided into watches. In the O. T. but two are expressly mentioned, and we have to infer the existence of a third, the first watch of the night. The middle watch occurs in Judges vii. 19;—"And Gideon and the hundred men that [were] with him went down unto the extremity of the camp at the beginning of the middle watch;" and the morning-watch is mentioned in Ex. xiv. 24 and 1 Sam. xi. 11. In the N. T. four night-watches are mentioned, which were probably adopted from the Romans as a modification of the old system. All four occur together in Mark xiii. 35.—Week.—The Hebrew week was a period of seven days ending with the Sabbath; therefore it could not have been a division of the month, which was lunar, without intercalation. The week, whether a period of seven days, or a quarter of the month, was of common use in antiquity. The Egyptians, however, were without it, dividing their month of 30 days into decads as did the Athenians. The Hebrew week therefore cannot have been adopted from Egypt; probably both it and the Sabbath were used and observed by the patriarchs.—Month.—The months by which the time is measured in the account of the Flood would seem to be of 30 days each, probably forming a year of 360 days, for the 1st, 2nd, 7th, and 10th months are mentioned (Gen. viii. 13, vii. 11, viii. 14, 4, 5). The months from the giving of the Law until the time of the Second Temple, when we have certain knowledge of their character, were always lunar. These lunar months have been supposed to have been always alternately of 29 and 30 days. Their average length would of course be a lunation, or a little ($4\frac{1}{2}$) above $29\frac{1}{2}$ days, and therefore they would in general be alternately of 29 and 30 days, but it is possible that occasionally months might occur of 28 and 31 days, if, as is highly probable, the commencement of each was strictly determined by observation. The first day of the month is called "new moon." The new moon was kept as a sacred festival. In the Pentateuch and Josh., Judg., and Ruth, we find but one month mentioned by a special name, the rest being called according to their order. The month with a special name is the first, which is called "the month Abib," that is the month in which the ears of corn became full or ripe, and on the 16th day of which, the second day of the feast of unleavened bread, ripe ears, abib, were to be offered (Lev. ii. 14; comp. xxiii. 10, 11, 14). In 1 K. three other names of months occur, Zif the second, Ethanim the seventh, and Bul the eighth. These names appear, like that of Abib, to be connected with the phenomena of a tropical year. No other names are found in any book prior to the captivity.—Year.—It has been supposed, on account of the dates in the narrative of the Flood, as already mentioned, that in Noah's time there was a year of 360 days. These dates might indeed be explained in accordance with a year of 365 days. The evidence of the prophetic Scriptures is however conclusive as to the knowledge of a year of the former length. The characteristics of the year instituted at the Exodus can be clearly determined, though we cannot absolutely fix those of any single year. There can be no doubt that it was essentially tropical, since certain observances connected with the produce of the land were fixed to particular days. It is equally clear that the months were lunar, each commencing with a new moon. It would appear therefore that there must have been some mode of adjustment. To ascertain what this was, it is necessary first to decide when the year commenced. On the 16th day* of the month Abib, as already mentioned, ripe ears of corn were to be offered as first-fruits of the harvest (Lev. ii. 14, xxiii. 10, 11). The reaping of the barley commenced the harvest (2 Sam. xxi. 9), the wheat following (Ruth ii. 23). It is therefore necessary to find when the barley becomes ripe in Palestine. According to the observation of travellers the barley is ripe, in the warmest parts of the country, in the first days of April. The barley-harvest therefore commences about half a month after the vernal equinox, so that the year would begin at about that tropical point were it not divided into lunar months. We may conclude that the nearest new moon about or after the equinox, but not much before, was chosen as the commencement of the year. The method of intercalation can only have been that which obtained after the Captivity—the addition of a thirteenth month, whenever the twelfth ended too long before the equinox for the first-fruits of the harvest to be offered in the middle of the month following, and the similar offerings at the times appointed. The later Jews had two beginnings to the year. At the time of the Second Temple these two beginnings obtained, the seventh month of the civil reckoning being Abib, the first of the sacred. Hence it has been held that the institution at the time of the Exodus was merely a change of commencement, and not the introduction of a new year; and also that from this time there were the two beginnings. The former opinion is at present purely hypothetical, and has been too much mixed up with the latter, for which, on the contrary, there is some evidence. The strongest point in this evidence is the circumstance that the sabbatical and jubilee years commenced in the seventh month, and doubtless on its first day. It is perfectly clear that this would be the most convenient, if not the necessary, commencement of single years of total cessation from the labours of the field, since each year so commencing would comprise the whole round of these occupations in a regular order from seed-time to harvest, and from harvest to vintage and gathering of fruit. We can therefore come to no other conclusion but that for the purposes of agriculture the year was held to begin with the seventh month, while the months were still reckoned from the sacred commencement in Abib.—Seasons.—The ancient Hebrews do not appear to have divided their year into fixed seasons. We find mention of the natural seasons, "summer," and "winter," which are used for the whole year in Ps. lxxiv. 17; Zech. xiv. 8; and perhaps Gen. viii. 22. The former of these properly means the time of cutting fruits, and the latter, that of gathering fruits; the one referring to the early fruit season, the other to the late one. There are two agricultural seasons of a more special character than the preceding in their ordinary use. These are "seed-time" and "harvest."—Festivals and holy days.—Besides the Sabbaths and new moons, there were four great festivals and a fast in the ancient Hebrew year, the Feast of the Passover that of Weeks, that of Trumpets, the Day of Atonement, and the Feast of Tabernacles. The small number and simplicity of these primitive Hebrew festivals and holy days is especially worthy of note. It is also observable that they are not of an astronomical character; and that when they are connected with nature, it is as directing the gratitude of the people to Him who, in giving good things, leaves not Himself without Witness. In later times many holy days were added. Of these the most worthy of remark are the Feast of Purim, or "Lots," commemorating the deliverance of the Jews from Haman's plot, the Feast of the Dedication, recording the cleansing and re-dedication of the Temple by Judas Maccabaeus, and fasts on the anniversaries of great national misfortunes connected with the Babylonish Captivity.—Sabbatical and Jubilee Years.—The sabbatical year, "the fallow year" or possibly "year of remission," also called a "sabbath," and a "great sabbath," was an institution of strictly the same character as the sabbath,—a year of rest, like the day of rest. The sabbatical year must have commenced at the civil beginning of the year, with the 7th month, as we have already shown. Although doubtless held to commence with the 1st of the month, its beginning appears to have been kept at the Feast of Tabernacles (Deut. xxxi. 10), while that of the jubilee year was kept on the Day of Atonement. After the lapse of seven sabbatical periods, or forty-nine years, a year of jubilee was to be kept, immediately following the last sabbatical year. This was called "the year of the trumpet," or yôbél, the latter word meaning either the sound of the trumpet or the instrument itself, because the commencement of the year was announced on the Day of Atonement by sound of trumpet. It was similar to the sabbatical year in its character, although doubtless yet more important. [SABBATICAL YEAR; JUBILEE.]—Eras.—There are indications of several historical eras having been used by the ancient Hebrews, but our information is so scanty that we are generally unable to come to positive conclusions.—1. The Exodus is used as an era in 1 K. vi. 1, in giving the date of the foundation of Solomon's Temple.—2. The foundation of Solomon's temple is conjectured to have been an era (1 K. ix. 10; 2 Chr. viii. 1).—3. The era once used by Ezekiel, and commencing in Josiah's 18th year, was most probably connected with the sabbatical system (Ez. i. 2).—4. The era of Jehoiachin's captivity is constantly used by Ezekiel. The earliest date is the 5th year (i. 2), and the latest, the 27th (xxix. 17). The prophet generally gives the date without applying any distinctive term to the era. We have no proof that it was used except by those to whose captivity it referred. Its first year was current B.C. 596, commencing in the spring of that year.—5. The beginning of the seventy years' captivity does not appear to have been used as an era.—6. The return from Babylon does not appear to be employed as an era; it is, however, reckoned from in Ezra (iii. 1, 8), as is the Exodus in the Pentateuch.—7. The era of the Seleucidae is used in the first and second books of Maccabees.—8. The liberation of the Jews from the Syrian yoke in the 1st year of Simon the Maccabee is stated to have been commemorated by an era used in contracts and agreements (1 Macc. xiii. 41).—Regnal Years.—By the Hebrews regnal years appear to have been counted from the beginning of the year, not from the day of the king's accession. Thus, if a king came to the throne in the last month of one year, reigned for the whole of the next year, and died in the 1st month of the 3rd year, we might have dates in his 1st, 2nd, and 3rd yrs., although he governed for no more than 13 or 14 months.—ii. HISTORICAL CHRONOLOGY.—The historical part of Hebrew chronology is not less difficult than the technical. The information in the Bible is indeed direct rather than inferential, although there is very important evidence of the latter kind, but the present state of the numbers makes absolute certainty in many cases impossible. The frequent occurrence of round numbers is a matter of minor importance, for, although when we have no other evidence, it manifestly precludes our arriving at positive accuracy, the variation of a few years is not to be balanced against great differences apparently not to be positively resolved, as those of the primeval numbers in the Hebrew, LXX. and Samaritan Pentateuch.—Biblical data.—It will be best to examine the biblical information under the main periods into which it may be separated, beginning with the earliest. A. First Period, from Adam to Abram's departure from Haran.—All the numerical data in the Bible for the chronology of this interval are comprised in two genealogical lists in Genesis, the first from Adam to Noah and his sons (Gen. v. 3 ad fin.), and the second from Shem to Abram (xi. 10-26), and in certain passages in the same book (vii. 6, 11, viii. 13, ix. 28, 29, xi. 32, xii. 4). The Masoretic Hebrew text, the LXX., and the Samaritan Pentateuch greatly differ, as may be seen by the following table.

	Age of each when the next was born.			Years of each after the next was born.			Total length of the life of each.

The dots indicate numbers agreeing with the LXX. The number of generations in the LXX. is one in excess of the Heb. and Sam. on account of the "Second Cainan," whom the best chronologists are agreed in rejecting as spurious. The variations are the result of design not accident, as is evident from the years before the birth of a son and the residues agreeing in their sums in almost all cases in the antediluvian generations, the exceptions, save one, being apparently the result of necessity that lives should not overlap the date of the Flood. We have no clue to the date or dates of the alterations beyond that we can trace the LXX. form to the First century of the Christian era, if not higher, and the Heb. to the Fourth century: if the Sam. numbers be as old as the text, we can assign them a higher antiquity than what is known as to the Heb. The cause of the alterations is most uncertain. It has indeed been conjectured that the Jews shortened the chronology in order that an ancient prophecy that the Messiah should come in the sixth millenary of the world's age might not be known to be fulfilled in the advent of our Lord. The reason may be sufficient in itself, but it does not rest upon sufficient evidence. The different proportions of the generations and lives in the LXX. and Heb. have been asserted to afford an argument in favour of the former. But a stronger is found in the long period required from the Flood to the Dispersion and the establishment of kingdoms. With respect to probability of accuracy arising from the state of the text, the Heb. certainly has the advantage. If, however, we consider the Sam. form of the lists as sprung from the other two, the LXX. would seem to be earlier than the Heb., since it is more probable that the antediluvian generations would have been shortened to a general agreement with the Heb., than that the postdiluvian would have been lengthened to suit the LXX.; for it is obviously most likely that a sufficient number of years having been deducted from the earlier generations, the operation was not carried on with the later. On the whole we are inclined to prefer the LXX. numbers after the Deluge, and, as consistent with them, and probably of the same authority, those before the Deluge also. It remains for us to ascertain what appears to be the best form of each of the three versions, and to state the intervals thus obtained. In the LXX. antediluvian generations, that of Methuselah is 187 or 167 yrs.: the former seems to be undoubtedly the true number, since the latter would make this patriarch, if the subsequent generations be correct, to survive the Flood 14 years. In the postdiluvian numbers of the LXX. we must reject the Second Cainan. Of the two forms of Nahor's generation in the LXX. we must prefer 79, as more consistent with the numbers near it, and as also found in the Sam. In the case of Terah, we should rather suppose the number might have been changed by a copyist, and take the 145 yrs. of the Sam.—It has been generally supposed that the Dispersion took place in the days of Peleg, on account of what is said in Gen. x. 25. The event, whatever it was, must have happened at Peleg's birth, rather than, as some have supposed, at a later time in his life. We should therefore consider the following as the best forms of the numbers according to the three sources.

Flood (occupying chief part of this year)....	2363	1656	1307

B. Second Period, from Abram's departure from Haran to the Exodus.—The length of this period is stated by St. Paul as 430 years from the promise to Abraham to the giving of the Law (Gal. iii. 17), the first event being held to be that recorded in

Gen. xii. 1-5. The same number of years is given in Ex. xii. 40, 41. A third passage, occurring in the same essential form in both Testaments, and therefore especially satisfactory as to its textual accuracy, is the divine declaration to Abraham of the future history of his children:—"Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land [that is] not their's, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years; and also that nation, whom they shall serve, will I judge: and afterward shall they come out with great substance" (Gen. xv. 13, 14; comp. Acts vii. 6, 7). The four hundred years cannot be held to be the period of oppression without a denial of the historical character of the narrative of that time, but can only be supposed to mean the time from this declaration to the Exodus. This reading, which in the A. V. requires no more than a slight change in the punctuation, if it suppose an unusual construction in Hebrew, is perfectly admissible according to the principles of Shemitic grammar, and might be used in Arabic. We find no difficulty in accepting the statements as to the longevity of Abraham and certain of his descendants, and can go on to examine the details of the period under consideration as made out from evidence requiring this admission. The narrative affords the following data which we place under two periods—1. that from Abram's leaving Haran to Jacob's entering Egypt, and 2. that from Jacob's entering Egypt to the Exodus.

1. Age of Abram on leaving Haran	75 yrs.
----- at Isaac's birth	100
Age of Isaac at Jacob's birth	60
Age of Jacob on entering Egypt	130
	216 or 215 yrs.
2. Age of Levi on entering Egypt	cir. 45
Residue of his life	92
Oppression after the death of Jacob's sons (Ex. i. 6, 7, seqq.)
Age of Moses at Exodus	80
	172
Age of Joseph in the same year	31
Residue of his life	79
Age of Moses at Exodus	80

These data make up about 387 or 388 years, to which it is reasonable to make some addition, since it appears that all Joseph's generation died before the oppression commenced, and it is probable that it had begun some time before the birth of Moses. The sum we thus obtain cannot be far different from 430 years, a period for the whole sojourn that these data must thus be held to confirm.—C. Third Period, from the Exodus to the Foundation of Solomon's Temple.—There is but one passage from which we obtain the length of this period as a whole. It is that in which the Foundation of the Temple is dated in the 480th (Heb.), or 440th (LXX.) year after the Exodus, in the 4th yr. 2nd m. of Solomon's reign (1 K. vi. 1). Subtracting from 480 or 440 yrs. the first three yrs. of Solomon and the 40 of David, we obtain (480 - 43 =) 437 or (440 - 43 =) 397 yrs. These results we have first to compare with the detached numbers. These are as follows:—A. From Exodus to death of Moses, 40 yrs. B. Leadership of Joshua, 7 + x yrs. C. Interval between Joshua's death and the First Servitude, x yrs. D. Servitudes and rule of Judges until Eli's death, 430 yrs. E. Period from Eli's death to Saul's accession, 20 + x yrs. F. Saul's reign, 40 yrs.

G. David's reign, 40 yrs. H. Solomon's reign to Foundation of Temple, 3 yrs. Sum, $3x+580$ yrs. It is possible to obtain approximately the length of the three wanting numbers. Joshua's age at the Exodus was 20 or $20+x$ yrs. (Num. xiv. 29, 30), and at his death, 110: therefore the utmost length of his rule must be $(110-20-40=)$ 50 yrs. After Joshua there is the time of the Elders who overlived him, then a period of disobedience and idolatry, a servitude of 8 yrs., deliverance by Othniel the son of Kenaz, the nephew of Caleb, and rest for 40 yrs. until Othniel's death. The duration of Joshua's government is limited by the circumstance that Caleb's lot was apportioned to him in the 7th year of the occupation, and therefore of Joshua's rule, when he was 85 yrs. old, and that he conquered the lot after Joshua's death. If we suppose that Caleb set out to conquer his lot about 7 years after its apportionment, then Joshua's rule would be about 13 yrs., and he would have been a little older than Caleb. The interval between Joshua's death and the First Servitude is limited by the history of Othniel. He was already a warrior when Caleb conquered his lot; he lived to deliver Israel from the Mesopotamian oppressor, and died at the end of the subsequent 40 yrs. of rest. Supposing Othniel to have been 30 yrs. old when Caleb set out, and 110 yrs. at his death, 32 yrs. would remain for the interval in question. The rule of Joshua may be therefore reckoned to have been about 13 yrs., and the subsequent interval to the First Servitude about 32 yrs., altogether 47 yrs. These numbers cannot be considered exact; but they can hardly be far wrong, more especially the sum. The residue of Samuel's judgeship after the 20 yrs. from Eli's death until the solemn fast and victory at Mizpeh, can scarcely have much exceeded 20 yrs. Samuel must have been still young at the time of Eli's death, and he died very near the close of Saul's reign (1 Sam. xv. 1, xxviii. 3). If he were 10 yrs. old at the former date, and judged for 20 yrs. after the victory at Mizpeh, he would have been near 90 yrs. old ($10?+20+20?+38?$) at his death, which appears to have been a long period of life at that time. If we thus suppose the three uncertain intervals, the residue of Joshua's rule, the time after his death to the First Servitude, and Samuel's rule after the victory at Mizpeh to have been respectively 6, 32, and 20 yrs., the sum of the whole period will be $(580+58=)$ 638 yrs.—D. Fourth Period, from the Foundation of Solomon's Temple to its Destruction.—The dates of this period are more accurately given and can be more easily ascertained. It is true that if all the Biblical evidence is carefully collected and compared it will be found that some small and great inconsistencies necessitate certain changes of the numbers. The greater difficulties, and some of the smaller, cannot be resolved without the supposition that numbers have been altered by copyists. We must never take refuge in the idea of an interregnum, since it is a much more violent hypothesis, considering the facts of the history, than the conjectural change of a number. Two interregnums have however been supposed, one of 11 yrs. between Jeroboam II. and Zachariah, and the other, of 9 yrs. between Pekah and Hoshea. We prefer in both cases to suppose a longer reign of the earlier of the two kings between whom the interregnums are conjectured. With the exception of these two interregnums, we would accept the computation of the interval we are now considering given in the margin of the A. V. It must be added, that the date of the conclusion of this period, there given B.C. 588, must be corrected to 586. The whole period may therefore be held to be of about 425 yrs., that of the undivided kingdom 120 yrs., that of the kingdom of Judah about 388 yrs., and that of the kingdom of Israel about 255 yrs.—E. Fifth Period, from the Destruction of Solomon's Temple to the Return from the Babylonish Captivity.—The determination of the length of this period depends upon the date of the return to Palestine. The decree of Cyrus leading to that event was made in the 1st year of his reign, doubtless at Babylon (Ezr. i. 1), B.C. 538, but it does not seem certain that the Jews at once returned. Two numbers, held by some to be identical, must here be considered. One is the period of 70 yrs., during which the tyranny of Babylon over Palestine and the East generally was to last, prophesied by Jeremiah (xxv.), and the other, the 70 yrs.' captivity (xxix. 10; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 21; Dan. ix. 2). The commencement of the former period is plainly the 1st year of Nebuchadnezzar and 4th of Jehoiakim (Jer. xxv. 1), when the successes of the king of Babylon began (xvi. 2), and the miseries of Jerusalem (xxv. 29), and the conclusion, the fall of Babylon (ver. 26). The famous 70 years of captivity would seem to be the same period as this, since it was to terminate with the return of the captives (Jer. xxix. 10). This period we consider to be of $48+x$ yrs., the doubtful number being the time of the reign of Cyrus before the return to Jerusalem, probably a space of about two or three years.—Principal Systems of Biblical Chronology.—Upon the data we have considered three principal systems of Biblical Chronology have been founded, which may be termed the Long System, the Short, and the Rabbinical. There is a fourth, which, although an offshoot in part of the last, can scarcely be termed biblical, inasmuch as it depends for the most part upon theories, not only independent of, but repugnant to the Bible: this last is at present peculiar to Baron Bunsen. The principal advocates of the Long Chronology are Jackson, Hales, and Des-Vignoles. They take the LXX. for the patriarchal generations, and adopt the long interval from the Exodus to the Foundation of Solomon's Temple. Of the Short Chronology Ussher may be considered as the most able advocate. He follows the Heb. in the patriarchal generations, and takes the 480 yrs. from the Exodus to the Foundation of Solomon's Temple. The Rabbinical Chronology accepts the biblical numbers, but makes the most arbitrary corrections. For the date of the Exodus it has been virtually accepted by Bunsen, Lepsius, and Lord A. Hervey.

Creation	5411	5428	4004	3983	chr. 80,000
Flood	3185	3170	2348	2327	chr. 10,000

Foundation of Solomon's temple	1027	1014	1012	1019	1004
Destruction of Solomon's temple	586	586	589	589	588

The principal disagreements of these chronologers, besides those already indicated, must be noticed. In the post-diluvian period Hales rejects the Second Cainan and reckons Terah's age at Abram's birth

130 instead of 70 years; Jackson accepts the Second Cainan and does not make any change in the second case; Ussher and Petavius follow the Heb., but the former alters the generation of Terah, while the latter does not. The period of the kings, from the Foundation of Solomon's Temple, is very nearly the same in the computations of Jackson, Ussher, and Petavius; Hales lengthens it by supposing an interregnum of 11 yrs. after the death of Amaziah; Bunsen shortens it by reducing the reign of Manasseh from 55 to 45 yrs.—Probable determination of dates and intervals.—Having thus gone over the Biblical data, it only remains for us to state what we believe to be the most satisfactory scheme of chronology, derived from a comparison of these with foreign data.—1. Date of the Destruction of Solomon's Temple.—The Temple was destroyed in the 19th year of Nebuchadnezzar, in the 5th month of the Jewish year (Jer. lli. 12, 13; 2 K. xxv. 8, 9). In Ptolemy's Canon this year is current in the proleptic Julian year, B.C. 586, and the 5th month may be considered as about equal to August of that year.—2. Synchronism of Josiah and Pharaoh Necho.—The death of Josiah can be clearly shown on Biblical evidence to have taken place in the 22nd year before that in which the Temple was destroyed, that is, in the Jewish year from the spring of B.C. 608 to the spring of 607. Necho's 1st year is proved by the Apis-tablets to have been most probably the Egyptian vague year, Jan. B.C. 609-8, but possibly B.C. 610-9. The expedition in opposing which Josiah fell cannot be reasonably dated earlier than Necho's 2nd year, B.C. 609-8 or 608-7. It is important to notice that no earlier date of the destruction of the Temple than B.C. 586 can be reconciled with the chronology of Necho's reign. We have thus B.C. 608-7 for the last year of Josiah, and 638-7 for that of his accession, the former date falling within the time indicated by the chronology of Necho's reign.—3. Synchronism of Hezekiah and Tirhakah.—Tirhakah is mentioned as an opponent of Sennacherib shortly before the miraculous destruction of his army in the 14th year of Hezekiah. It has been lately proved from the Apis-tablets that the 1st year of Tirhakah's reign over Egypt was the vague year current in B.C. 689. The 14th year of Hezekiah, according to the received chronology, is B.C. 713, and, if we correct it 2 yrs. on account of the lowering of the date of the destruction of the Temple, B.C. 711. If we hold that the expedition dated in Hezekiah's 14th year was different from that which ended in the destruction of the Assyrian army, we must still place the latter event before B.C. 695. There is, therefore, a prima facie discrepancy of at least 6 yrs. An examination of the facts of the history has afforded Dr. Hincks what we believe to be the true explanation. Tirhakah, he observes, is not explicitly termed Pharaoh or king of Egypt in the Bible, but king of Cush or Ethiopia, from which it might be inferred that at the time of Sennacherib's disastrous invasion he had not assumed the crown of Egypt. We hold, therefore, as most probable, that, at the time of Sennacherib's disastrous expedition, Tirhakah was king of Ethiopia in alliance with the king or kings of Egypt.—4. Synchronism of Rehoboam and Shishak.—The Biblical evidence for this synchronism is as follows: Rehoboam appears to have come to the throne about 249 yrs. before the accession of Hezekiah, and therefore B.C. cir. 973. The invasion of Shishak took place in his 5th year, by this computation, B.C. 969. He appears to have come to the throne at least 21 or 22 yrs. before his expedition against Rehoboam. An inscription at the quarries of Silsilis in Upper Egypt records the cutting of stone in the 22nd year of Sheshonk I., or Shishak, for constructions in the chief temple of Thebes, where we now find a record of his conquest of Judah. On these grounds we may place the accession of Shishak B.C. cir. 990.—5. Exodus.—Arguments founded on independent evidence afford the best means of deciding which is the most probable computation from Biblical evidence of the date of the Exodus. A comparison of the Hebrew calendar with the Egyptian has led the writer to the following result:—The civil commencement of the Hebrew year was with the new-moon nearest to the autumnal equinox; and at the approximative date of the Exodus obtained by the long reckoning, we find that the Egyptian vague year commenced at or about that point of time. This approximative date, therefore, falls about the time at which the vague year and the Hebrew year, as dated from the autumnal equinox, nearly or exactly coincided in their commencements. It may be reasonably supposed that the Israelites in the time of the oppression had made use of the vague year as the common year of the country, which indeed is rendered highly probable by the circumstance that they had mostly adopted the Egyptian religion (Josh. xxiv. 14; Ez. xx. 7, 8), the celebrations of which were kept according to this year. When, therefore, the festivals of the Law rendered a year virtually tropical necessary, of the kind either restored or instituted at the Exodus, it seems most probable that the current vague year was fixed under Moses. If this supposition be correct, we should expect to find that the 14th day of Abib, on which fell the full-moon of the Passover of the Exodus, corresponded to the 14th day of a Phamenoth, in a vague year commencing about the autumnal equinox. It has been ascertained by computation that a full-moon fell on the 14th day of Phamenoth, on Thursday, April 21st, in the year B.C. 1652. A full-moon would not fall on the same day of the vague year at a shorter interval than 25 yrs. before or after this date, while the triple coincidence of the new-moon, vague year, and autumnal equinox could not recur in less than 1500 vague years (Enc. Brit. 8th ed. art. 'Egypt,' p. 458). The date thus obtained is but 4 yrs. earlier than Hales's, and the interval from it to that of the Foundation of Solomon's Temple, B.C. cir. 1010, would be about 642 yrs., or 4 yrs. in excess of that previously obtained from the numerical statements in the Bible. We therefore take B.C. 1652 as the most satisfactory date of the Exodus.—6. Date of the Commencement of the 430 years of Sojourn.—We hold the 430 years of Sojourn to have commenced when Abraham entered Palestine, and that the interval was of 430 complete years, or a little more, commencing about the time of the vernal equinox, B.C. 2082, or nearer the beginning of that proleptic Julian year.—7. Date of the Dispersion.—Taking the LXX. numbers as most probable, the Dispersion must be placed B.C. cir. 2698, or, if we accept Ussher's correction of the age of Terah at the birth of Abraham, cir. 2758.—8. Date of the Flood.—The Flood, as ending about 401 yrs before the birth of Peleg, would be placed B.C. cir. 3099 or 3159. The year preceding, or the 402nd, was that mainly occupied by the catastrophe. It is most reasonable to suppose the Noachian colonists to have begun to spread about three centuries after the Flood. As far as we can learn, no independent historical evidence points to an earlier period than the middle of the 28th century B.C. as the time of the foundation of kingdoms, although the chronology of Egypt reaches to about this period, while that of Babylon and other states does not greatly fall short of the same antiquity.—9. Date of the Creation of Adam.—The numbers given by the LXX. for the antediluvian patriarchs would place the creation of Adam 2262 yrs. before the end of the Flood, or B.C. cir. 5361 or 5421.

Chrysolite, one of the precious stones in the foundation of the heavenly Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 20) It has been already stated [BERYL] that the chrysolite of the ancients is identical with the modern Oriental topaz, the tarshish of the Hebrew Bible.

Chrysoprase occurs only in Rev. xxi. 20. M. King (Antique Gems, p. 59, note) says that the true chrysoprase is sometimes found in antiqu Egyptian jewellery set alternately with bits of lapis-lazuli; it is not improbable therefore that this is the stone which was the tenth in the walls of the heavenly Jerusalem.

Chub, the name of a people in alliance with Egypt in the time of Nebuchadnezzar (Ez. xxx. 5), and probably of northern Africa, or of the lands near Egypt to the south. Some have proposed to recognise Chub in the names of various African places. Others, however, think the present Heb. text corrupt in this word. It has been therefore proposed to read Nûb for Nubia, as the Arab. vers. has "the people the Noobeh." Far better, on the score of probability, is the emendation which Hitzig proposes, Lûb. The Lubim might well occur among the peoples suffering in the fall of Egypt. In the absence of better evidence we prefer the reading of the present Heb. text.

Chun, a city of Hadadezer, called Berothai in 2 Sam. viii. 8. Chun is believed to be a corruption (1 Chr. xviii. 8). [BEROTHAI.]

Church. (1.) The derivation of the word Church is uncertain. It is generally said to be derived from the Greek κυριακόν. But the derivation has been too hastily assumed. It was probably connected with kirk, the Latin circus, circulus, the Greek κύκλος, and possibly also with the Welsh cylch, cylt, cynchle, or caer.—II. The word ἐκκλησία is no doubt derived from ἐκκαλεῖν, and in accordance with its derivation it originally meant an assembly called out by the magistrate, or by legitimate authority. This is the ordinary classical sense of the word. But it throws no light on the nature of the institution so designated in the New Testament. For to the writers of the N. T. the word had now lost its primary signification, and was either used generally for any meeting (Acts xix. 32), or more particularly, it denoted (1) the religious assemblies of the Jews (Deut. iv. 10, xviii. 16); (2) the whole assembly or congregation of the Israelitish people (Acts vii. 38; Heb. ii. 12; Ps. xxii. 22; Deut. xxxi. 30). It was in this last sense that the word was adopted and applied by the writers of the N. T. to the Christian congregation. The chief difference between the words "ecclesia" and "church," would probably consist in this, that "ecclesia" primarily signified the Christian body, and secondarily the place of assembly, while the first signification of "church" was the place of assembly, which imparted its name to the body of worshippers.—III. The Church as described in the Gospels.—The word occurs only twice. Each time in St. Matthew (Matt. xvi. 18, "On this rock will I build my Church;" xviii. 17, "Tell it unto the Church"). In every other case it is spoken of as "the kingdom of heaven" by St. Matthew, and as "the kingdom of God" by St. Mark and St. Luke. St. Mark, St. Luke, and St. John, never use the expression "kingdom of heaven." St. John once uses the phrase "kingdom of God" (iii. 3). St. Matthew occasionally speaks of "the kingdom of God" (vi. 33, xxi. 31, 43), and sometimes simply of "the kingdom" (iv. 23, xiii. 19, xxiv. 14). In xiii. 41 and xvi. 28, it is "the Son of Man's kingdom." In xx. 21, "thy kingdom," i. e. Christ's. In the one Gospel of St. Matthew the Church is spoken of no less than thirty-six times as "the kingdom." Other descriptions or titles are hardly found in the Evangelists. It is Christ's household (Matt. x. 25), the salt and light of the world (v. 13, 15), Christ's flock (Matt. xxvi. 31; John x. 1), its members are the branches growing on Christ the Vine (John xv.); but the general description of it, not metaphorically but directly, is, that it is a kingdom (Matt. xvi. 19). From the Gospel then, we learn that Christ was about to establish His heavenly kingdom on earth, which was to be the substitute for the Jewish Church and kingdom, now doomed to destruction (Matt. xxi. 43).—IV. The Church as described in the Acts and in the Epistles—its Origin, Nature, Constitution, and Growth.—From the Gospels we learn little in the way of detail as to the kingdom which was to be established. It was in the great forty days which intervened between the Resurrection and the Ascension that our Lord explained specifically to His Apostles "the things pertaining to the kingdom of God" (Acts i. 3), that is, his future Church.—Its Origin.—The removal of Christ from the earth had left his followers a shattered company with no bond of external or internal cohesion, except the memory of the Master whom they had lost, and the recollection of his injunctions to unity and love, together with the occasional glimpses of His presence which were vouchsafed them. They continued together, meeting for prayer and supplication, and waiting for Christ's promise of the gift of the Holy Ghost. They numbered in all some 140 persons, namely, the eleven, the faithful women, the Lord's mother, his brethren, and 120 disciples. They had faith to believe that there was a work before them which they were about to be called to perform; and that they might be ready to do it, they filled up the number of the Twelve by the appointment of Matthias "to be a true witness" with the eleven "of the Resurrection." The Day of Pentecost is the birth-day of the Christian Church. The Spirit, who was then sent by the Son from the Father, and rested on each of the Disciples, combined them once more into a whole—combined them as they never had before been combined, by an internal and spiritual bond of cohesion. Before they had been individual followers of Jesus, now they became his mystical body, animated by His Spirit.—Its Nature.—"Then they that gladly received his word were baptized . . . and they continued steadfastly in the Apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread and in prayers" (Acts ii. 1). Here we have indirectly exhibited the essential conditions of Church Communion. They are 1) Baptism, Baptism implying on the part of the recipient repentance and faith; (2) Apostolic Doctrine; (3) Fellowship with the Apostles; (4) the Lord's Supper; (5) Public Worship. Every requisite for church-membership is here enumerated not only for the Apostolic days, but for future ages. St. Luke's treatise being historical, not dogmatical, he does not directly enter further into the essential nature of the Church. The community of goods, which he describes as being universal amongst the members of the infant society (ii. 44, iv. 32), is specially declared to be a voluntary practice (v. 4), not a necessary duty of Christians as such (comp. Acts ix. 36, 39, xi. 29). From the illustrations adopted by St. Paul in his Epistles, we have additional light thrown upon the nature of the Church. The passage which is most illustrative of our subject in the Epistles is Eph. iv. 3, 6. Here we see what it is that constitutes the unity of the Church in the mind of the Apostle: (1) unity of Headship, "one Lord;" (2) unity of belief, "one faith;" (3) unity of Sacraments, "one baptism;" (4) unity of hope of eternal life, "one hope of your calling;" (5) unity of love, "unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace;" (6) unity of organisation, "one body." The Church, then, at this period was a body of baptized men and women who believed in Jesus as the Christ, and in the revelation made by Him, who were united by having the same faith, hope, and animating Spirit of love, the same Sacraments, and the same spiritual invisible Head.—What was the Constitution of this body?—On the evening of the Day of Pentecost, the 3140 members of which it consisted were (1) Apostles, (2) previous Disciples, (3) converts. At this time the Church was not only morally but actually one congregation. Soon, however, its numbers grew so considerably that it was a physical impossibility that all its members should come together in one spot. It became, therefore, an aggregate of congregations, though without losing its essential unity. The Apostles, who had been closest to the Lord Jesus in his life on earth would doubtless have formed the centres of the several congregations. Thus the Church continued for apparently some seven years, but at the end of that time "the number of disciples was" so greatly "multiplied" (Acts vi. 1) that the Twelve Apostles found themselves to be too few to carry out these works unaided. They thereupon for the first time exercised the powers of mission intrusted to them (John xx. 21), and by laying their hands on the Seven who were recommended to them by the general body of Christians, they appointed them to fulfil the secular task of distributing the common stock. It is a question which cannot be certainly answered whether the office of these Seven is to be identified with that of the deacons elsewhere found. We incline to the hypothesis which makes the Seven the originals of the Deacons. From this time therefore, or from about this time, there existed in the Church—(1) the Apostles; (2) the Deacons and Evangelists; (3) the multitude of the faithful. We hear of no other Church-officer till the year 44, seven years after the appointment of the deacons. We find that there were then in the Church of Jerusalem officers named Presbyters (xi. 30) who were the assistants of James, the chief administrator of that Church (xii. 17). The circumstances of their first appointment are not recounted. No doubt they were similar to those under which the Deacons were appointed. The name of Presbyter or Elder implies that the men selected were of mature age. By the year 44, therefore, there were in the Church of Jerusalem—

(1) the Apostles holding the government of the whole body in their own hands: (2) Presbyters invested by the Apostles with authority for conducting public worship in each congregation; (3) Deacons or Evangelists similarly invested with the lesser power of preaching and of baptizing unbelievers, and of distributing the common goods among the brethren. The same order was established in the Gentile Churches founded by St. Paul, the only difference being that those who were called Presbyters in Jerusalem bore indifferently the name of Bishops (Phil. i. 1; 1 Tim. iii. 1, 2; Tit. i. 7) or of Presbyters (1 Tim. v. 17; Tit. i. 5) elsewhere. It was in the Church of Jerusalem that another order of the ministry found its exemplar. James the brother of the Lord remained unmolested during the persecution of Herod Agrippa in the year 44, and from this time he is the acknowledged head of the Church of Jerusalem. A consideration of Acts xii. 17; xv. 13, 19; Gal. ii. 2, 9, 12; Acts xxi. 18, will remove all doubt on this point. Whatever his pre-eminence was, he appears to have borne no special title indicating it. The example of the Mother Church of Jerusalem was again followed by the Pauline Churches. Timothy and Titus had probably no distinctive title, but it is impossible to read the Epistles addressed to them without seeing that they had an authority superior to that of the ordinary bishops or priests (1 Tim. iii.; v. 17, 19; Tit. i. 5). Thus, then, we see that where the Apostles were themselves able to superintend the Churches that they had founded, the Church-officers consisted of—(1) Apostles; (2) Bishops or Priests; (3) Deacons and Evangelists. When the Apostles were unable to give personal superintendence, they delegated that power which they had in common to one of themselves, as in Jerusalem, or to one in whom they had confidence, as at Ephesus and in Crete. As the Apostles died off, these Apostolic Delegates necessarily multiplied. By the end of the first century, when St. John was the only Apostle that now survived, they would have been established in every country, as Crete, and in every large town where there were several bishops or priests, such as the seven towns of Asia mentioned in the Book of Revelation. These superintendents appear to be addressed by St. John under the name of Angels. With St. John's death the Apostolic College was extinguished, and the Apostolic Delegates or Angels were left to fill their places in the government of the Church, not with the full unrestricted power of the Apostles, but with authority only to be exercised in limited districts. In the next century we find that these officers bore the name of Bishops, while those who in the first century were called indifferently Presbyters or Bishops had now only the title of Presbyters. We conclude, therefore, that the title bishop was gradually dropped by the second order of the ministry, and applied specifically to those who represented what James, Timothy, and Titus had been in the Apostolic age.—Its External Growth.—The 3000 souls that were added to the Apostles and to the 120 brethren on the day of Pentecost were increased daily by new converts (Acts ii. 47, v. 14). These converts were without exception Jews residing in Jerusalem, whether speaking Greek or Hebrew (vi. 1). After seven or eight years a step was made outwards. Philip, in his capacity of Evangelist, preached Christ to the Samaritans, and admitted them into the Church by baptism. The first purely Gentile convert that we hear of by name is Sergius Paulus (xiii. 7), but we are told that the companions of Cornelius were Gentiles, and by their baptism the admission of the Gentiles was decided by the agency of St. Peter, approved by the Apostles and Jewish Church (xi. 18), not, as might have been expected, by the agency of St. Paul. This great event took place after the peace caused by Caligula's persecution of the Jews, which occurred A. D. 40 (ix. 31), and more than a year before the famine, in the time of Claudius, A. D. 44 (xi. 26, 29). Galilee had already been evangelized as well as Judaea and Samaria, though the special agent in the work is not declared (ix. 31). The history of the growth of the Gentile Church, so far as we know it, is identical with the history of St. Paul. In his three journeys he carried Christianity through the chief cities of Asia Minor and Greece.—Its further growth.—Three great impulses enlarged the borders of the Church. The first is that which began on the day of Pentecost, and continued down to the conversion of Constantine. By this the Roman Empire was converted to Christ. The second impulse gathered within the Church the hitherto barbarous nations formed by the Teutonic and Celtic tribes. The third impulse gathered in the Slavonian nations. The first of these impulses lasted to the fourth century—the second to the ninth century—the third (beginning before the second had ceased) to the tenth and eleventh centuries.—V. Alterations in its Constitution.—We have said that ecclesiastical authority resided (1) in the Apostles; (2) in the Apostles and the Deacons; (3) in the Apostles, the Presbyters, and the Deacons; (4) in the Apostolic Delegates, the Presbyters, and the Deacons; (5) in those who succeeded the Apostolic Delegates, the Presbyters, and the Deacons. And to these successors of the Apostolic Delegates came to be appropriated the title of Bishop, which was originally applied to Presbyters. At the commencement of the second century and thenceforward Bishops, Presbyters, and Deacons are the officers of the Church wherever the Church existed. Bishops were looked on as Christ's Vicegerents, and as having succeeded to the Apostles. They retained in their own hands authority over presbyters and the function of ordination, but with respect to each other they were equals whether their see was at Rome or at Eugubium. Within this equal college of bishops there soon arose difference of rank though not of order. Below the city-bishops there sprang up a class of country-bishops (chorepiscopi). Their position was ambiguous, and in the fifth century they began to decay and gradually died out. Above the city-bishops there were, in the second century apparently, Metropolitans, and in the third, Patriarchs or Exarchs. The metropolitan was the chief bishop in the civil division of the empire which was called a province. The authority of the patriarch or exarch extended over the still larger division of the civil empire which was called a diocese. The churches were independent self-ruled wholes. The only authority which they recognised as capable of controlling their separate action, was that of an Oecumenical Council composed of delegates from each. It was by John of Constantinople that the first, overt attempt at erecting a Papal Monarchy was made; and by Gregory the Great of Rome, in consequence, it was fiercely and indignantly denounced. From this time the federal character of the constitution of the Church was overthrown. In the West it became wholly despotic, and in the East, though the theory of aristocratical government was and is maintained, the still-cherished title of Oecumenical Patriarch indicates that it is weakness which has prevented Constantinople from erecting at least an Eastern if she could not an Universal Monarchy. In the sixteenth century a further change of constitution occurred. A great part of Europe revolted from the Western despotism. The Churches of England and Sweden returned to, or rather retained, the episcopal form of government after the model of the first centuries. In parts of Germany, of France, of Switzerland, and of Great Britain a Presbyterian, or still less defined, form was adopted, while Rome tightened her hold on her yet remaining subjects, and by destroying all peculiarities of national liturgy and custom, and, by depressing the order of bishops except as interpreters of her decrees, converted that part of the Church over which she had sway into a jealous centralized absolutism.—VI. Definitions of the Church.—The Greek Church gives the following: "The Church is a divinely instituted community of men, united by the orthodox faith, the law of God, the hierarchy, and the Sacraments." The Latin Church defines it "the company of Christians knit together by the profession of the same faith and the communion of the same Sacraments, under the government of lawful pastors, and especially of the Roman bishop as the only Vicar of Christ upon earth." The Church of England, "a congregation of faithful men in which the pure word of God is preached, and the Sacraments be duly ministered according to Christ's ordinance in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same." The Lutheran Church, "a congregation of saints in which the Gospel is rightly taught and the Sacraments rightly administered." The Confessio Helvetica, "a congregation of faithful men called, or collected out of the world, the communion of all saints." The Confessio Saxonica, "a congregation of men embracing the Gospel of Christ, and rightly using the Sacraments." The Confessio Belgica, "a true congregation, or assembly of all faithful Christians who look for the whole of their salvation from Jesus Christ alone, as being washed by His blood, and sanctified and sealed by His Spirit." These definitions show the difficulty in which the different sections of the divided Church find themselves in framing a definition which will at once accord with the statements of Holy Scripture, and be applicable to the present state of the Christian world. We must not expect to see the Church of Holy Scripture actually existing in its perfection on earth. It is not to be found, thus perfect, either in the collected fragments of Christendom, or still less in any one of these fragments; though it is possible that one of those fragments more than another may approach the Scriptural and Apostolic ideal.—VII. The Faith and Attributes of the Church.—The Nicene Creed is the especial and authoritative exponent of the Church's faith. We have the Western form of the same Creed in that which is called the Creed of the Apostles—a name probably derived from its having been the local Creed of Rome, which was the chief Apostolic see of the West. An expansion of the same Creed, made in order to meet the Arian errors, is found in the Creed of St. Athanasius. The attributes of the Church are drawn from the expressions of the Creeds. The Church is described as One, Holy, Catholic, Apostolic. Its Unity consists in having one object of worship (Eph. iv. 6), one Head (Eph. iv. 15), one body (Rom. xii. 5), one Spirit (Eph. iv. 4), one faith (ib. 13), hope (ib. 12), love (1 Cor. xiii. 13), the same sacraments (ib. x. 17), discipline and worship (Acts ii. 42). Its Holiness depends on its Head and Spirit, the means of grace which it offers, and the holiness that it demands of its members (Eph. iv. 24). Its Catholicity consists in its being composed of many national Churches, not confined as the Jewish Church to one country (Mark xvi. 15); in its enduring to the end of time (Matt. xxviii. 20); in its teaching the whole truth, and having at its disposal all the means of grace vouchsafed to man. Its Apostolicity in being built on the foundation of the Apostles (Eph. ii. 20), and continuing in their doctrine and fellowship (Acts ii. 42).

Chush'an-Rishathaim, the king of Mesopotamia who oppressed Israel during eight years in the generation immediately following Joshua (Judg. iii. 8). The seat of his dominion was probably the region between the Euphrates and the Khabour. Chushan-rishathaim's yoke was broken from the neck of the people of Israel at the end of eight years by Othniel, Caleb's nephew (Judg. iii. 10), and nothing more is heard of Mesopotamia as an aggressive power. The rise of the Assyrian empire, about B.C. 1270, would naturally reduce the bordering nations to insignificance.

Chu'si, a place named only in Judith vii. 18, as near E. krebel, and upon the brook Mochmur.

Chuzza (properly Chuzas), the house-steward of Herod Antipas (Luke viii. 3).

Cic'car. [JORDAN.]

Cilicia, a maritime province in the S.E. of Asia Minor, bordering on Pamphylia in the W., Lycania and Cappadocia in the N., and Syria in the E. Lofty mountain chains separate it from these provinces, Mons Amanus from Syria, and Antitaurus from Cappadocia. The western portion of the province is intersected with the ridges of Antitaurus, and was denominated Trachaea, rough, in contradistinction to Pedias, the level district in the E. The connexion between the Jews and Cilicia dates from the time when it became part of the Syrian kingdom. In the Apostolic age they were still there in considerable numbers (Acts vi. 9). Cilicia was from its geographical position the high road between Syria and the West; it was also the native country of St. Paul; hence it was visited by him, firstly, soon after his conversion (Gal. i. 21; Acts ix. 30); and again in his second apostolical journey, when he entered it on the side of Syria, and crossed Antitaurus by the Pylae Ciliciae into Lycania (Acts xv. 41).

Cinnamon, a well-known aromatic substance, the rind of the Laurus cinamomum, called Korunda-gawah in Ceylon. It is mentioned in Ex. xxx. 23 as one of the component parts of the holy anointing oil, which Moses was commanded to prepare—in Prov. vii. 17 as a perfume for the bed—and in Cant. iv. 14 as one of the plants of the garden which is the image of the spouse. In Rev. xviii. 13 it is enumerated among the merchandize of the great Babylon. It was imported into Judaea by the Phoenicians or by the Arabians, and is now found in Sumatra, Borneo, China, &c., but chiefly, and of the best quality, in the S.W. part of Ceylon. Sir E. Tennent believes that it first reached India and Phoenicia overland by way of Persia from China, and that at a later period, the cassia of the Troglodytic coast supplanted the cinnamon of the far East.

Cin'heroth, All, a district named with the "land of Naphtali" and other northern places as having been laid waste by Benhadad (1 K. xv. 20). It was possibly the small enclosed district north of Tiberias, and by the side of the lake, afterwards known as "the plain of Gennesareth."

Cirama. The people of Cirama and Gabdes came up with Zorobabel from Babylon (1 Esdr. v. 20).

Circumcision was peculiarly, though not exclusively, a Jewish rite. It was enjoined upon Abraham, the father of the nation, by God, at the institution, and as the token, of the Covenant, which assured to him and his descendants the promise of the Messiah (Gen. xvii.). It was thus made a necessary condition of Jewish nationality. Every male child was to be circumcised when eight days old (Lev. xii. 3) on pain of death. If the eighth day were a Sabbath the rite was not postponed (John vii. 22, 23). Slaves, whether home-born or purchased, were circumcised (Gen. xvii. 12, 13); and foreigners must have their males circumcised before they could be allowed to partake of the passover (Ex. xii. 48), or become Jewish citizens. The operation, which was performed with a sharp instrument (Ex. iv. 25; Josh. v. 2), was a painful one, at least to grown persons (Gen. xxxiv. 25; Josh. v. 8). It seems to have been customary to name a child when it was circumcised (Luke i. 59). The use of circumcision by other nations besides the Jews is to be gathered almost entirely from sources extraneous to the Bible. The rite has been found to prevail extensively both in ancient and modern times; and among some nations, as, for instance, the Abyssinians, Nubians, modern Egyptians, and Hottentots, a similar custom is said to be practised by both sexes. The biblical notice of the rite describes it as distinctively Jewish; so that in the N. T. "the circumcision" (ἡ περιτομή) and "the uncircumcision" (ἡ ἀκροβυστία) are frequently used as synonyms for the Jews and the Gentiles. Circumcision certainly belonged to the Jews as it did to no other people, by virtue of its divine institution, of the religious privileges which were attached to it, and of the strict regulations which enforced its observance. Moreover, the O. T. history incidentally discloses the fact that many, if not all, of the nations with whom they came in contact were uncircumcised. The origin of the custom amongst one large section of those Gentiles who follow it, is to be found in the biblical record of the circumcision of Ishmael (Gen. xvii. 25). Josephus relates that the Arabians circumcise after the thirteenth year, because Ishmael, the founder of their nation, was circumcised at that age. Though Mohammed did not enjoin circumcision in the Koran, he was circumcised himself, according to the custom of his country; and circumcision is now as common amongst the Mohammedans as amongst the Jews. The process of restoring a circumcised person to his natural condition by a surgical operation was sometimes undergone. Some of the Jews in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, wishing to assimilate themselves to the heathen around them, built a gymnasium (γυμνάσιον) at Jerusalem, and that they might not be known to be Jews when they appeared naked in the games, "made themselves uncircumcised" (1 Macc. i. 15). Against having recourse to this practice, from an excessive anti-Judaistic tendency, St. Paul cautions the Corinthians (1 Cor. vii. 18). The attitude which Christianity, at its introduction, assumed towards circumcision was one of absolute hostility, so far as the necessity of the rite to salvation, or its possession of any religious or moral worth were concerned (Acts xv.; Gal. v. 2). The Abyssinian Christians still practise circumcision as a national custom. An ethical idea is attached to circumcision even in the O. T. (Ex. vi. 12, 30; Jer. vi. 10; Lev. xxvi. 41), because circumcision was the symbol of purity (see Is. lii. 1).

Cisai, Esth. xi. 2. [KISH, 2.]

Cistern, a receptacle for water, either conducted from an external spring, or proceeding from rainfall. The dryness of the summer months between May and September, in Syria, and the scarcity of springs in many parts of the country, make it necessary to collect in reservoirs and cisterns the rain-water, of which abundance falls in the intermediate period. The larger sort of public tanks or reservoirs, in Arabic Birkeh, Hebr. Berechah, are usually called in A. V. "pool," while for the smaller and more private it is convenient to reserve the name cistern. Both birkehs and cisterns are frequent throughout the whole of Syria and Palestine. On the long forgotten way from Jericho to Bethel, "broken cisterns" of high antiquity are found at regular intervals. Jerusalem, described by Strabo as well supplied with water, in a dry neighbourhood, depends mainly for this upon its cisterns, of which almost every private house possesses one or more, excavated in the rock on which the city is built. The cisterns have usually a round opening at the top, sometimes built up with stonework above and furnished with a cub and a wheel for the bucket (Eccl. xii. 6), so that they have externally much the appearance of an ordinary well. The water is conducted into them from the roofs of the houses during the rainy season, and with care remains sweet during the whole summer and autumn. In this manner most of the larger houses and public buildings are supplied. Empty cisterns were sometimes used as prisons and places of confinement. Joseph was cast into a "pit" (Gen. xxxvii. 22), and his "dungeon" in Egypt is called by the same name (xli. 14). Jeremiah was thrown into a miry though empty cistern, whose depth is indicated by the cords used to let him down (Jer. xxxviii. 6).

Cithern (1 Mac. iv. 54), a musical instrument, resembling a guitar, most probably of Greek origin, employed by the Chaldeans, and introduced by the H. brews into Palestine on their return thither after the Babylonian captivity. With respect to the shape of the Cithern or Cithara mentioned in the Apocrypha, the opinion of the learned is divided: according to some it resembled in form the Greek delta Δ , others represent it as a half-moon, and others again like the modern guitar. In many eastern countries it is still in use with strings, varying in number from three to twenty-four. Under the name of Koother, the traveller Niebuhr describes it as a wooden plate or dish, with a hole beneath and a piece of skin stretched above like a drum. In Mendelssohn's edition of the Psalms, the Koother or Kathrus is described by the accompanying figure.

Cities. 1. Ar, and also Ir: 2. Kiryath; probably the most ancient name for city, but seldom used in prose as a general name for town. The classification of the human race into dwellers in towns and nomade wanderers (Gen. iv. 20, 22) seems to be intimated by the etymological sense of both words, as places of security against an enemy, distinguished from the unwall'd village or hamlet, whose resistance is more easily overcome by the marauding tribes of the desert. The earliest notice in Scripture of city-building is of Enoch by Cain, in the land of his exile (Gen. iv. 17). After the confusion of tongues, the descendants of Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, Accad, and Calneh, in the land of Shinar, and Asshur, a branch from the same stock, built Nineveh, Rehoboth-by-the-river, Calah, and Resen, the last being "a great city." A subsequent passage mentions Sidon, Gaza, Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Lashan, as cities of the Canaanites, but without implying for them antiquity equal to that of Nineveh and the rest (Gen. x. 10-12, 19, xi. 3, 9, xxxvi. 37). The earliest description of a city, properly so called, is that of Sodom (Gen. xix. 1-22); but it is certain that from very early times cities existed on the sites of Jerusalem, Hebron, and Damascus. Hebron is said to have been built seven years before Zoan (Tanis) in Egypt, and is thus the only Syrian town which presents the elements of a date for its foundation (Num. xiii. 22). Even before the time of Abraham there were cities in Egypt (Gen. xii. 14, 15; Num. xiii. 22), and the Israelites, during their sojourn there, were employed in building or fortifying the "treasure cities" of Pithom and Raamses (Ex. i. 11). Meanwhile the settled inhabitants of Syria on both sides of the Jordan had grown in power and in number of "fenced cities," which were occupied and perhaps partly rebuilt or fortified after the conquest. But from some of these the possessors were not expelled till a late period, and Jerusalem itself was not captured till the time of David (2 Sam. v. 6, 9). From this time the Hebrews became a city-dwelling and agricultural rather than a pastoral people. David enlarged Jerusalem, and Solomon, besides embellishing his capital, also built or rebuilt Tadmor (Palmyra), Gezer, Beth-horon, Hazor, and Megiddo, besides store-cities (2 Sam. v. 7, 9, 10; 1 K. ix. 15-18; 2 Chr. viii. 6). Collections of houses in Syria for social habitation may be classed under three heads:—1. cities; 2. towns with citadels or towers for resort and defence; 3. unwall'd villages. The cities may be assumed to have been in almost all cases "fenced cities." But around the city, especially in peaceable times, lay undefended suburbs (1 Chr. vi. 57; Num. xxv. 1-5; Josh. xxi.), to which the privileges of the city extended. The city thus became the citadel, while the population overflowed into the suburbs (1 Mac. xi. 61). The absence of walls as indicating security in peaceable times, is illustrated by the prophet Zechariah (ii. 4; 1 K. iv. 25). According to Eastern custom, special cities were appointed to furnish special supplies for the service of the state. Governors for these and their surrounding districts were appointed by David and by Solomon (1 K. iv. 7, ix. 19; 1 Chr. xxvii. 25; 2 Chr. xvii. 12, xxi. 3; 1 Mac. x. 39). To this practice our Lord alludes in his parable of the pounds. In many Eastern cities much space is occupied by gardens, and thus the size of the city is greatly increased. The vast extent of Nineveh and of Babylon may thus be in part accounted for. In most Oriental cities the streets are extremely narrow, seldom allowing more than two loaded camels, or one camel and two foot passengers, to pass each other, though it is clear that some of the streets of Nineveh must have been wide enough for chariots to pass (Nah. ii. 4). The open spaces near the gates of towns were in ancient times, as they are still, used as places of assembly by the elders, of holding courts by kings and judges, and of general resort by citizens (Gen. xxiii. 10; Ruth iv. 1; Matt. vi. 5; Luke xiii. 26, &c.). They were also used as places of public exposure by way of punishment (Jer. x. 2; Am. v. 10).

Cities of Refuge. Six Levitical cities specially chosen for refuge to the involuntary homicide until released from banishment by the death of the high-priest (Num. xxxv. 6, 13, 15; Josh. xx. 2, 7, 9). There were three on each side of Jordan. 1. KEDESH, in Naphtali (1 Chr. vi. 76). 2. SHECHEM, in Mount Ephraim (Josh. xxi. 21; 1 Chr. vi. 67; 2 Chr. x. 1). 3. HEBRON, in Judah (Josh. xxi. 13; 2 Sam. v. 5; 1 Chr. vi. 55, xxix. 27; 2 Chr. xi. 10). 4. On the E. side of Jordan—BEZER, in the tribe of Reuben, in the plains of Moab (Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xx. 8, xxi. 36; 1 Macc. v. 26). 5. RAMOTH-GILEAD, in the tribe of Gad (Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xxi. 38; 1 K. xxii. 3). 6. GOLAN, in Bashan, in the half-tribe of Manasseh (Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xxi. 27; 1 Chr. vi. 71). Maimonides says all the 48 Levitical cities had the privilege of asylum, but that the six refuge-cities were required to receive and lodge the homicide gratuitously. The directions respecting the refuge-cities present some difficulties in interpretation. The Levitical cities were to have a space of 1000 cubits (about 583 yards) beyond the city wall for pasture and other purposes. Presently after, 2000 cubits are ordered to be the suburb limit (Num. xxxv. 4, 5). The solution of the difficulty may be, either the 2000 cubits are to be added to the 1000 as "fields of the suburbs" (Lev. xxv. 34), or the additional 2000 cubits were a special gift to the refuge-cities, whilst the other Levitical cities had only 1000 cubits for suburb.

Citizens. 1 Macc. viii. 5. [CHITTIM.]

Citizenship. The use of this term in Scripture has exclusive reference to the usages of the Roman empire. The privilege of Roman citizenship was originally acquired in various ways, as by purchase (Acts xxii. 28), by military services, by favour, or by manumission. The right once obtained descended to a man's children (Acts xxii. 28). Among the privileges attached to citizenship, we may note that a man could not be bound or imprisoned without a formal trial (Acts xxi. 29), still less be scourged (Acts xvi. 37; Cic. in Verr. v. 63, 66). Another privilege attaching to citizenship was the appeal from a provincial tribunal to the emperor at Rome (Acts xxv. 11).

Citron. [APPLE TREE.]

Clauda (Acts xxvii. 16). A small island nearly due W. of Cape Matala on the S. coast of Crete, and nearly due S. of PHOENICE. It is still called Clandansea, or Gaudonesi, by the Greeks, which the Italians have corrupted into Gozzo. The ship which conveyed St. Paul was seized by the gale a little after passing Cape Matala, when on her way from Fair Havens to Phoenice (Acts xxvii. 12-17). The storm came down from the island (v. 14), and there was danger lest the ship should be driven into the African Syrtis (v. 17). It is added that she was driven to Claudia and ran under the lee of it (v. 16). The gale came from the N.E., or E.N.E. Under the lee of Claudia there would be smooth water.

Claudia, a Christian woman mentioned in 2 Tim. iv. 21, as saluting Timotheus. There is reason for supposing that this Claudia was a British maiden, daughter of king Cogidubnus, an ally of Rome, who took the name of his imperial patron, Tiberius Claudius. She appears to have become the wife of Pudens, who is mentioned in the same verse.

Claudius, fourth Roman emperor, reigned from 41 to 54 A.D. He was the son of Nero Drusus, was born in Lyons Aug. 1, B.C. 9 or 10, and lived private and unknown till the day of his being called to the throne, January 24, A.D. 41. He was nominated to the supreme power mainly through the influence of Herod Agrippa the First. In the reign of Claudius there were several famines, arising from unfavourable harvests, and one such occurred in Palestine and Syria (Acts xi. 28-30) under the procurators Cuspius Fadus and Tiberius Alexander, which perhaps lasted some years. Claudius was induced by a tumult of the Jews in Rome, to expel them from the city (cf. Acts xviii. 2). The date of this event is uncertain. After a weak and foolish reign he was poisoned by his fourth wife Agrippina, the mother of Nero, Oct. 13, A.D. 54.

Claudius Lysias. [LYSIAS.]

Clay. As the sediment of water remaining in pits or in streets, the word is used frequently in O. T. (Is. lvii. 20; Jer. xxxviii. 6; Ps. xviii. 42), and in N. T. (John ix. 6), a mixture of sand or dust with spittle. It is also found in the sense of potter's clay (Is. xli. 25). The word most commonly used for "potter's clay" is chômer (Ex. i. 14; Job iv. 19; Is. xxix. 16; Jer. xvii. 4, &c.). The great seat of the pottery of the present day in Palestine is Gaza, where are made the vessels in dark blue clay so frequently met with. Another use of clay was for sealing (Job xxxviii. 14). Wine jars in Egypt were sometimes sealed with clay; mummy pits were sealed with the same substance, and remains of clay are still found adhering to the stone door-jambs. Our Lord's tomb may have been thus sealed (Matt. xxvii. 66), as also the earthen vessel containing the evidences of Jeremiah's purchase (Jer. xxxii. 14). The seal used for public documents was rolled on the moist clay, and the tablet was then placed in the fire and baked. The practice of sealing doors with clay to facilitate detection in case of malpractice is still common in the East.

Clement (Phil. iv. 3), a fellow-labourer of St. Paul, when he was at Philippi. It was generally believed in the ancient church, that this Clement was identical with the Bishop of Rome, who afterwards became so celebrated.

Cleopas, one of the two disciples who were going to Emmaus on the day of the resurrection (Luke xxiv. 18). It is a question whether this Cleopas is to be considered as identical with CLEOPHAS (accur. Clopas) or Alphaeus in John xix. 25. On the whole, it seems safer to doubt their identity.

Cleopatra. 1. "The wife of Ptolemy" (Esth. xi. 1) was probably the granddaughter of Antiochus, and wife of Ptol. VI. Philometor.—2. A daughter of Ptol. VI. Philometor and Cleopatra (1), who was married first to Alexander Balas B.C. 150

(1 Macc. x. 58), and afterwards given by her father to Demetrius Nicator when he invaded Syria (1 Macc. xi. 12). During the captivity of Demetrius in Parthia, Cleopatra married his brother Antiochus VII. Sidetes. She afterwards murdered Seleucus, her eldest son by Demetrius; and at length was herself poisoned B.C. 120 by a draught which she had prepared for her second son Antiochus VIII.

Cleophas. [CLEOPAS; ALPHAEUS.]

Clothing. [DRESS.]

Cloud. The shelter given, and refreshment or rain promised, by clouds, give them their peculiar prominence in Oriental imagery, and the individual cloud in an ordinarily cloudless region becomes well defined and is dwelt upon like the individual tree in the bare landscape. When a cloud appears, rain is ordinarily apprehended, and thus the "cloud without rain" becomes a proverb for the man of promise without performance (Prov. xvi. 15; Is. xviii. 4, xxv. 5; Jude 12; comp. Prov. xxv. 14). The cloud is a figure of transitoriness (Job xxx. 15; Hos. vi. 4), and of whatever intercepts divine favour or human supplication (Lam. ii. 1, iii. 44). Being the least substantial of visible forms, it is the one amongst material things which suggests most easily spiritual being. Hence it is the recognised machinery by which supernatural appearances are introduced (Is. xix. 1; Ez. i. 4; Rev. i. 7). A bright cloud, at any rate at times, visited and rested on the Mercy Seat (Ex. xlii. 42, 43; 1 K. viii. 10, 11; 2 Chr. v. 14; Ez. xliii. 4) and was by later writers named Shechinah.

Cloud, Pillar of. This was the active form of the symbolical glory-cloud, betokening God's presence to lead His chosen host, or to inquire and visit offences, as the luminous cloud of the sanctuary exhibited the same under an aspect of repose. The cloud, which became a pillar when the host moved, seems to have rested at other times on the tabernacle, whence God is said to have "come down in the pillar" (Num. xii. 5; so Ex. xxxiii. 9, 10). It preceded the host, apparently resting on the ark which led the way (Ex. xiii. 21, xl. 36, &c.; Num. ix. 15-23, x. 34).

Cnidus is mentioned in 1 Macc. xv. 23, as one of the Greek cities which contained Jewish residents in the 2nd century B.C., and in Acts xxvii. 7, as a harbour which was passed by St. Paul after leaving Myra, and before running under the lee of Crete. It was a city of great consequence, situated at the extreme S.W. of the peninsula of Asia Minor, on a promontory now called Cape Crio, which projects between the islands of Cos and Rhodes (see Acts xxi. 1). All the remains of Cnidus show that it must have been a city of great magnificence.

Coal. In A. V. this word represents no less than five different Heb. words. 1. The first and most frequently used is gacheleth, a live ember, burning fuel, as distinguished from pechâm (Prov. xxvi. 21). In 2 Sam. xxii. 9, 13, "coals of fire" are put metaphorically for the lightnings proceeding from God (Ps. xviii. 8, 12, 13, xl. 10). In Prov. xxv. 22 we have the proverbial expression, "Thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head," which has been adopted by St. Paul in Rom. xii. 20, and by which is metaphorically expressed the burning shame and confusion which men must feel when their evil is requited by good.—2. Pechâm. In Prov. xxvi. 21, this word clearly signifies fuel not yet lighted. The fuel meant in the above passages is probably charcoal, and not coal in our sense of the word.—

3. Retseph, or Ritspah. In the narrative of Elijah's miraculous meal (1 K. xix. 6) the word is used to describe the mode in which the cake was baked, viz. on a hot stone, as is still usual in the East. Ritspah in Is. vi. 6, properly means "a hot stone."—4. Resheph in Hab. iii. 5, is rendered in A. V. "burning coals," and in the margin "burning diseases." The former meaning is supported by Cant. viii. 6, the latter by Deut. xxxii. 24.—5. Shichôr, Lam. iv. 8, is rendered in A. V. "their visage is blacker than a coal," or in the marg. "darker than blackness."

Coat. [DRESS.]

Cock. There appears to be no mention of domestic poultry in the O. T. In the N. T. the "cock" is mentioned in reference to St. Peter's denial of our Lord, and indirectly in the word "cock-crowing" (Matt. xxvi. 34; Mark xiv. 30, xiii. 35, &c.). We know that the domestic cock and hen were early known to the ancient Greeks and Romans, and as no mention is made in the O. T. of these birds, and no figures of them occur on the Egyptian monuments, we are inclined to think that they came into Judaea with the Romans, who, as is well known, prized these birds both as articles of food and for cock-fighting.

Cockatrice. [ADDER.]

Cockle (Heb. boshâk) occurs only in Job xxxi. 40. Celsius has argued in favour of the aconite, the Aconitum Napellus, which however is quite a mountain—never a field—plant. But we are inclined to believe that the boshâk denotes any bad weeds or fruit, and may in Job signify bad or smutted barley. Or it may mean some of the useless grasses which have somewhat the appearance of barley, such as Hordeum murinum, &c.

Coelesyria, "the hollow Syria," was (strictly speaking) the name given by the Greeks, after the time of Alexander, to the remarkable valley or hollow (κοιλία) which intervenes between Libanus and Anti-Libanus, stretching from lat. 33° 20' to 34° 40', a distance of nearly a hundred miles. "The view of this great valley is chiefly remarkable as being exactly to the eye what it is on maps—the 'hollow' between the two mountain ranges of Syria." The term Coele-Syria was also used in a much wider sense. In the first place it was extended so as to include the inhabited tract to the east of the Anti-Libanus range, between it and the desert, in which stood the great city of Damascus; and then it was further carried on upon that side of Jordan, through Trachonitis and Perea, to Idumaea and the borders of Egypt. The only distinct reference to the region, as a separate tract of country, which the Jewish Scriptures contain, is probably that in Amos (i. 5), where "the inhabitants of the plain of Aven," (Bikath-Aven) are threatened in conjunction with those of Damascus. Bikath denotes exactly such a plain as Coele-Syria. In the Apocryphal Books there is frequent mention of Coele-Syria in a somewhat vague sense, nearly as an equivalent for Syria (1 Esd. ii. 17, 24, 27, iv. 48, vi. 29, vii. 1, viii. 67; 1 Macc. x. 68; 2 Macc. iii. 5, 8, iv. 4, viii. 8, x. 11). In all these cases the word is given in A. V. as CELOSRYIA.

Coffer (Argâz), a moveable box hanging from the side of a cart (1 Sam. vi. 8, 11, 15). This word is found nowhere else.

Coffin. [BURIAL.]

Cola, a place (Jud. xv. 4, only), the position or real name of which has not been ascertained.

COLHOZEH

Col-ho'zeh, a man of the tribe of Judah in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 15, xi. 5).

Coli'us, 1 Esdr. ix. 23. [KELAI'AH.]

Collar. For the proper sense of this term, as it occurs in Judg. viii. 26, see EARRINGS.

College, the. * In 2 K. xxii. 14 it is said in the A. V. that Huldah the prophetess "dwelt in Jerusalem in the college (Heb. mishneh)," or, as the margin has it, "in the second part." The same part of the city is undoubtedly alluded to in Zeph. i. 10 (A. V. "the second"). Keil's explanation is probably the true one, that the mishneh was the "lower city," built on the hill Akra.

Colony, a designation of Philippi, in Acts xvi. 12. After the battle of Actium, Augustus assigned to his veterans those parts of Italy which had espoused the cause of Antony, and transported many of the expelled inhabitants to Philippi, Dyrrachium, and other cities. In this way Philippi was made a Roman colony with the "Jus Italicum," and accordingly we find it described as a "colonia" both in inscriptions and upon the coins of Augustus.

COLOSSIANS, EPISTLE TO THE 169

Colos'se (more properly Colos'sae). A city in the upper part of the basin of the Maeander, on one of its affluents named the Lycus. Hierapolis and Laodicea were in its immediate neighbourhood (Col. ii. 1, iv. 13, 15, 16; see Rev. i. 11, iii. 14). Colossae fell, as these other two cities rose in importance. It was situated close to the great road which led from Ephesus to the Euphrates. Hence our impulse would be to conclude that St. Paul passed this way, and founded or confirmed the Colossian Church on his third missionary journey (Acts xviii. 23, xix. 1). The most competent commentators, however, agree in thinking that Col. ii. 1, proves that St. Paul had never been there, when the Epistle was written. That the Apostle hoped to visit the place on being delivered from his Roman imprisonment is clear from Philemon 22 (compare Phil. ii. 24). Philemon and his slave Onesimus were dwellers in Colossae. So also were Archippus and Epaphras. Mr. Hamilton was the first to determine the actual site of the ancient city, which appears to be at some little distance from the modern village of Chonas.

Colossians, the Epistle to the, was written by the Apostle St. Paul during his first captivity at Rome (Acts xxviii. 16), and apparently in that portion of it (Col. iv. 8, 4) when the Apostle's imprisonment had not assumed the more severe character which seems to be reflected in the Epistle to the Philippians (ch. i. 20, 21, 30, ii. 27), and which not improbably succeeded the death of Burrus in A.D. 62, and the decline of the influence of Seneca. This important and profound epistle was addressed to the Christians of the once large and influential, but now smaller and declining, city of Colossae, and was delivered to them by Tychicus, whom the Apostle had sent both to them (ch. iv. 7, 8) and to the church of Ephesus (ch. vi. 21), to inquire into their state and to administer exhortation and comfort. The epistle seems to have been called forth by the information St. Paul had received from Epaphras (ch. iv. 12; Philem. 23) and from Onesimus, both of whom appear to have been natives of Colossae, and the former of whom was, if not the special founder, yet certainly one of the very earliest preachers of the gospel in that city. The main object of the epistle is not merely, as in the case of the Epistle to the Philippians, to exhort and to confirm, nor as in that to the Ephesians, to set forth the great features of the church of the chosen in Christ, but is especially designed to warn the Colossians against a spirit of semi-Judaistic and semi-Oriental philosophy which was corrupting the simplicity of their belief, and was noticeably tending to obscure the eternal glory and dignity of Christ. With regard to its genuineness and authenticity, it is satisfactory to be able to say with distinctness that there are no grounds for doubt. The external testimonies are explicit, and the internal arguments, founded on the style, balance of sentences, positions of adverbs, uses of the relative pronoun, participial anacolutha, unusually strong and well defined. A few special points demand from us a brief notice.—1. The opinion that this epistle and those to the Ephesians and to Philemon were written during the Apostle's imprisonment at Caesarea (Acts xxi. 27–xxvi. 32), i.e. between Pentecost A.D. 58 and the autumn of A.D. 60, has been recently advocated by several writers of ability, and stated with such cogency and clearness by Meyer, as to deserve some consideration. But to go no further than the present epistle, the notices of the Apostle's imprisonment in ch. iv. 3, 4, 11, certainly seem historically inconsistent with the nature of the imprisonment at Caesarea. The permission of Felix (Acts xxiv. 23) can scarcely be strained into any degree of liberty to teach or preach the Gospel.—2. The nature of the erroneous teaching condemned in this epistle has been very differently estimated. Three opinions only seem to deserve any serious consideration; (a) that these erroneous teachers were adherents of Neo-Platonism, or of some forms of Occidental philosophy; (b) that they leaned to Essene doctrines and practices; (c) that they advocated that admixture of Christianity, Judaism, and Oriental philosophy which afterwards became consolidated into Gnosticism. Of these (a) has but little in its favour, except the somewhat vague term 'philosophy' (ch. ii. 8), which, however, it seems arbitrary to restrict to Grecian philosophy; (b) is much more plausible as far as the usages alluded to, but seems inconsistent both with the exclusive nature and circumscribed localities of Essene teaching; (c) on the contrary is in accordance with the Gentile nature of the church of Colossae (ch. i. 21), with its very locality—speculative and superstitious Phrygia—and with that tendency to associate Judicial observances (ch. ii. 10) with more purely theosophistic speculations (ch. ii. 18), which became afterwards so conspicuous in developed Gnosticism.—3. The striking similarity between many portions of this epistle and of that to the Ephesians has given rise to much speculation, both as to the reason of this studied similarity, and as to the priority of order in respect to composition. The similarity may reasonably be accounted for, (1) by the proximity in time at which the two epistles were written; (2) by the high probability that in two cities of Asia within a moderate distance from one another, there would be many doctrinal prejudices, and many social relations, that would call forth and need precisely the same language of warning and exhortation. The priority in composition must remain a matter for a reasonable difference of opinion. To us the shorter and perhaps more vividly expressed Epistle to the Colossians seems to have been first written, and to have suggested the more comprehensive, more systematic, but less individualizing, epistle to the church of Ephesus.

Colours. The terms relative to colour, occurring in the Bible, may be arranged in two classes, the first including those applied to the description of natural objects, the second those artificial mixtures which were employed in dyeing or painting.—1. The natural colours noticed in the Bible are white, black, red, yellow, and green. Of these yellow is very seldom noticed; it was apparently regarded as a shade of green, for the same term greenish is applied to gold (Ps. lxxviii. 13), and to the leprous spot (Lev. xiii. 49), and very probably the golden or yellow hue of the leprous hair (Lev. xiii. 30–32) differed little from the greenish spot on the garments (Lev. xiii. 49). Green is frequently noticed, but an examination of the passages, in which it occurs, will show that the reference is seldom to colour. The only fundamental colour of which the Hebrews appear to have had a clear conception was red; and even this is not very often noticed. They had therefore no scientific knowledge of colours, and we cannot but think that the attempt to explain such passages as Rev. iv. 3 by the rules of philosophical truth, must fail. The highest development of colour in the mind of the Hebrew evidently was light, and hence the predominance given to white as its representative. This feeling appears both in the more numerous allusions to it than to any other colour—in the variety of terms by which they discriminated the shades from a pale, dull tint (Lev. xiii. 21 ff.), up to the most brilliant splendour (Ex. viii. 2; Dan. xii. 3)—and in the comparisons by which they sought to heighten their ideas of it. Next to white, black, or rather dark, holds the most prominent place, not only as its opposite, but also as representing the complexion of the Orientals. There were various shades of it, including the brown of the Nile water (whence its name Sihor)—the reddish tint of early dawn, to which the complexion of the bride is likened (Cant. vi. 10), as well as the lurid hue produced by a flight of locusts (Joel ii. 2)—and the darkness of blackness itself (Lam. iv. 8). As before, we have various heightening images. Red was also a colour of which the Hebrews had a vivid conception; this may be attributed partly to the prevalence of that colour in the outward aspect of the countries and peoples with which they were familiar. It remains for us now to notice the various terms applied to these three colours.—1. WHITE. The most common term is lābān, which is applied to such objects as milk (Gen. xlix. 12), manna (Ex. xvi. 31), snow (Is. i. 18), horses (Zech. i. 8), raiment (Eccl. ix. 8); and a cognate word expresses the colour of the moon (Is. xxiv. 23). Tsach, dazzling white is applied to the complexion (Cant. v. 10): chivdār, a term of a later age, to snow (Dan. vii. 9 only), and to the paleness of shame (Is. xxix. 22); sib, to the hair alone. Another class of terms arises from the textures of a naturally white colour. These were without doubt primarily applied to the material; but the idea of colour is also prominent, particularly in the description of the curtains of the tabernacle (Ex. xxvi. 1), and the priests' vestments (Ex. xxviii. 6). White was symbolical of innocence, of joy, and of victory.—2. BLACK. The shades of this colour are expressed in the terms shāchōr, applied to the hair (Lev. xiii. 31; Cant. v. 11); the complexion (Cant. i. 5), particularly when affected with disease (Job xxx. 30); horses (Zech. vi. 2, 6): chām, lit. scorched (A. V. "brown," Gen. xxx. 32), applied to sheep; the word expresses the colour produced by influence of the sun's rays: kādar, lit. to be dirty, applied to a complexion blackened by sorrow or disease (Job xxx. 30); mourner's robes (Jer. viii. 21, xiv.

2); a clouded sky (1 K. xviii. 45); night (Mic. iii. 6; Jer. iv. 28; Joel ii. 10, iii. 15); a turbid brook (whence possibly KEDRON), particularly when rendered so by melted snow (Job vi. 16). Black, as being the opposite to white, is symbolical of evil (Zech. vi. 2, 6; Rev. vi. 5).—3. RED. Adām is applied to blood (2 K. iii. 22); a garment sprinkled with blood (Is. lxiii. 2); a heifer (Num. xix. 2); pottage made of lentiles (Gen. xxv. 30); a horse (Zech. i. 8, vi. 2); wine (Prov. xxiii. 31); the complexion (Gen. xxv. 25; Cant. v. 10; Lam. iv. 7). Adamām, reddish, is applied to a leprous spot (Lev. xiii. 19; xiv. 37). Sārōk, lit. fox-coloured, bay, is applied to a horse (A. V. "speckled," Zech. i. 8), and to a species of vine bearing a purple grape (Is. v. 2, xvi. 8). This colour was symbolical of bloodshed (Zech. vi. 2; Rev. vi. 4, xii. 3).—II. ARTIFICIAL COLOURS. The art of extracting dyes, and of applying them to various textures, appears to have been known at a very early period. We read of scarlet thread at the time of Sarah's birth (Gen. xxxviii. 28); of blue and purple at the time of the Exodus (Ex. xxvi. 1). There is however no evidence to show that the Jews themselves were at that period acquainted with the art. They were probably indebted both to the Egyptians and the Phoenicians; to the latter for the dyes, and to the former for the mode of applying them. The purple dyes which they chiefly used were extracted by the Phoenicians (Ez. xxvii. 16), and in certain districts of Asia Minor, especially Thyatira (Acts xvi. 14). The dyes consisted of purples, light and dark (the latter being the "blue" of the A. V.), and crimson, (scarlet, A. V.): vermilion was introduced at a late period.—1. PURPLE (Argamān; Chaldaic form, Argēvānā, Dan. v. 7, 16). This colour was obtained from the secretion of a species of shell-fish, the Murex trunculus of Linnaeus, which was found in various parts of the Mediterranean Sea. It is difficult to state with precision the tint described under the Hebrew name. The Greek equivalent was, we know, applied with great latitude, not only to all colours extracted from the shell-fish, but even to other brilliant colours. The same may be said of the Latin purpureus. Generally speaking, however, the tint must be considered as having been defined by the distinction between the purple proper, and the other purple dye (A. V. "blue"), which was produced from another species of shell-fish. The latter was undoubtedly a dark violet tint, while the former had a light reddish tinge. Robes of a purple colour were worn by kings (Judg. viii. 26), and by the highest officers, civil and religious. They were also worn by the wealthy and luxurious (Jer. x. 9; Ez. xxvii. 7; Luke xvi. 19; Rev. xvii. 4, xviii. 16).—2. BLUE (teqēloth). This dye was procured from a species of shell-fish found on the coast of Phoenicia, and called by modern naturalists Helix Ianthina. The tint is best explained by the statements of Josephus (Ant. iii. 7, §7) and Philo that it was emblematic of the sky, in which case it represents not the light blue of our northern climate, but the deep dark hue of the eastern sky. The A. V. has rightly described the tint in Esth. i. 6 (margin) as violet. This colour was used in the same way as purple.—3. SCARLET (CRIMSON, Is. i. 18; Jer. iv. 30). The terms by which this colour is expressed in Hebrew vary; sometimes shānī simply is used, as in Gen. xxxviii. 28-30; sometimes tolā'ath shānī, as in Ex. xxv. 4; and sometimes tolā'ath simply, as in Is. i. 18. The word carmīl (A. V. "crimson," 2 Chr. ii. 7, 14, iii. 14) was introduced at a late period, probably from Armenia, to express the same colour. The first of these terms expresses the brilliancy of the colour; the second the worm, or grub, whence the dye was procured. The dye was produced from an insect, somewhat resembling the cochineal, which is found in considerable quantities in Armenia and other eastern countries. The Arabian name of the insect is hermez (whence crimson): the Linnaean name is Coccus Ilicis. The tint produced was crimson rather than scarlet. The only natural object to which it is applied in Scripture is the lips, which are compared to a scarlet thread (Cant. iv. 3). The three colours above described, purple, blue, and scarlet, together with white, were employed in the textures used for the curtains of the tabernacle and for the sacred vestments of the priests.—4. VERMILION (shāshar). This was a pigment used in fresco paintings, either for drawing figures of idols on the walls of temples (Ez. xxiii. 14), for colouring the idols themselves (Wisd. xiii. 14), or for decorating the walls and beams of houses (Jer. xxii. 14). Vermilion was a favourite colour among the Assyrians, as is still attested by the sculptures of Nimroud and Khorsabad.

Commerce. From the time that men began to live in cities, trade, in some shape, must have been carried on to supply the town-dwellers with necessities, but it is also clear that international trade must have existed and affected to some extent even the pastoral nomade races, for we find that Abraham was rich, not only in cattle, but in silver, gold, and gold and silver plate and ornaments (Gen. xiii. 2, xxiv. 22, 53). Among trading nations mentioned in Scripture, Egypt holds in very early times a prominent position, though her external trade was carried on, not by her own citizens, but by foreigners, chiefly of the nomade races. It was an Ishmaelite caravan, laden with spices, which carried Joseph into Egypt. From Egypt it is likely that at all times, but especially in times of general scarcity, corn would be exported, which was paid for by the non-exporting nations in silver, which was always weighed (Gen. xli. 57, xlii. 3, 25, 35, xliii. 11, 12, 21). Intercourse with Tyre does not appear to have taken place till a later period. At the same period it is clear that trade was carried on between Babylon and the Syrian cities, and also that gold and silver ornaments were common among the Syrian and Arabian races (Num. xxxi. 50; Josh. vii. 21; Judg. v. 30, viii. 24; Job vi. 19). Until the time of Solomon the Hebrew nation may be said to have had no foreign trade. Foreign trade was indeed contemplated by the Law, but its spirit was more in favour of agriculture (Deut. xvii. 16, 17). Solomon, however, organized an extensive trade with foreign countries. He imported linen yarn, horses, and chariots from Egypt (1 K. x. 22-29). It was by Phoenicians that the cedar and other timber for his great architectural works was brought by sea to Joppa, whilst Solomon found the provisions necessary for the workmen in Mount Lebanon (1 K. v. 6, 9; 2 Chr. ii. 16). But the trade which Solomon took so much pains to encourage was not a maritime trade only. He built, or more probably fortified, Basalbec and Palmyra; the latter at least expressly as a caravan station for the land-commerce with eastern and south-eastern Asia (1 K. ix. 18). After his death the maritime trade declined, and an attempt made by Jehoshaphat to revive it proved unsuccessful (1 K. xxii. 48, 49). We know, however, that Phœnicia was supplied from Judæa with wheat, honey, oil, and balm (1 K. v. 11; Ezek. xxvii. 17; Acts xii. 20), whilst Tyrian dealers brought fish and other merchandize to Jerusalem at the time of the return from captivity (Neh. xiii. 16), as well as timber for the rebuilding of the temple, which then, as in Solomon's time, was brought by sea to Joppa (Ezr. iii. 7). Oil was exported to Egypt (Hos. xii. 1), and fine linen and ornamental girdles of domestic manufacture were sold to the merchants (Prov. xxxi. 24). The successive invasions to which Palestine was subjected must have impoverished the country from time to time, but much wealth must somewhere have existed; so much so that, in the language of Ezekiel, Jerusalem appears as the rival of Tyre, and through its port, Joppa, to have carried on trade with foreign countries (Is. ii. 6, 16, iii. 11, 23; Hos. xii. 7; Ez. xxvi. 2; Jonah i. 3). The internal trade of the Jews, as well as the external, was much promoted, as was the case also in Egypt, by the festivals, which brought large numbers of persons to Jerusalem, and caused great outlay in victims for sacrifices and in incense (1 K. viii. 63). The places of public market were, then as now, chiefly the open spaces near the gates, to which goods were brought for sale by those who came from the outside (Neh. xiii. 15, 16; Zeph. i. 10). The traders in later times were allowed to intrude into the temple, in the outer courts of which victims were publicly sold for the sacrifices (Zech. xiv. 21; Matt. xxi. 12; John ii. 14).

Concubine. The difference between wife and concubine was less marked among the Hebrews than among us, owing to the absence of moral stigma. The concubine's condition was a definite one, and quite independent of the fact of there being another woman having the rights of wife towards the same man. The difference probably lay in the absence of the right of the libellus divoritii, without which the wife could not be repudiated. With regard to the children of wife and concubine, there was no such difference as our illegitimacy implies; the latter were a supplementary family to the former, their names occur in the patriarchal genealogies (Gen. xxii. 24; 1 Chr. i. 32), and their position and provision would depend on the father's will (Gen. xxv. 6). The state of concubinage is assumed and provided for by the law of Moses. A concubine would generally be either (1) a Hebrew girl bought of her father; (2), a gentile captive taken in war; (3), a foreign slave bought, or (4), a Canaanitish woman, bond or free. The rights of (1) and (2) were protected by law (Ex. xxi. 7; Deut. xxi. 10-14), but (3) was unrecognised, and (4) prohibited. Free Hebrew women also might become concubines. So Gideon's concubine seems to have been of a family of rank and influence in Shechem, and such was probably the state of the Levite's concubine (Judg. xx). The ravages of war among the male sex, or the impoverishment of families might often induce this condition. The case (1) was not a hard lot (Ex. xxi.). The provisions relating to (2) are merciful and considerate to a rare degree, but overlaid by the Rabbis with distorting comments. In the books of Samuel and Kings the concubines mentioned belong to the king, and their condition and number cease to be a guide to the general practice. A new king stepped into the rights of his predecessor, and by Solomon's time the custom had approximated to that of a Persian harem (2 Sam. xii. 8, xvi. 21; 1 K. ii. 22). To seize on royal concubines for his use was thus an usurper's first act. Such was probably the intent of Abner's act (2 Sam. iii. 7), and similarly the request on behalf of Adonijah was construed (1 K. ii. 21-24).

Conduit. 1. Although no notice is given either by Scripture or by Josephus of any connexion between the pools of Solomon beyond Bethlehem and a supply of water for Jerusalem, it seems unlikely that so large a work as the pools should be constructed merely for irrigating his gardens (Eccl. ii. 6), and tradition, both oral and as represented by Talmudical writers, ascribes to Solomon the formation of the original aqueduct by which water was brought to Jerusalem. Pontius Pilate applied the sacred treasure of the Corban to the work of bringing water by an aqueduct. Whether his work was a new one or a reparation of Solomon's original aqueduct cannot be determined. The aqueduct, though much injured, and not serviceable for water beyond Bethlehem, still exists; the water is conveyed from the fountains which supply the pools about two miles S. of Bethlehem.—2. Among the works of Hezekiah he is said to have stopped the "upper watercourse of Gihon," and brought it down straight to the W. side of the city of David (2 Chr. xxxii. 30). The direction of this watercourse of course depends on the site of Gihon. [Gihon.]

Coney, Heb. Shaphân, a gregarious animal of the class Pachydermata, which is found in Palestine, living in the caves and clefts of the rocks, and has been erroneously identified with the Rabbit or Coney. Its scientific name is Hyrax Syriacus. In Lev. xi. 5 and in Deut. xiv. 7 it is declared to be unclean, because it chews the cud, but does not divide the hoof. In Ps. civ. 18 we are told "the rocks are a refuge for the coney," and in Prov. xxv. 26 that "the coney is but a feeble folk, yet make they their houses in the rocks." The Hyrax satisfies exactly the expressions in the two last passages. Its colour is grey or brown on the back, white on the belly; it is like the alpine marmot, scarcely of the size of the domestic cat, having long hair, a very short tail, and round ears. It is found on the Lebanon and in the Jordan and Dead Sea valleys.

Congregation. This term describes the Hebrew people in its collective capacity under its peculiar aspect as a holy community, held together by religious rather than political bonds. Sometimes it is used in a broad sense as inclusive of foreign settlers (Ex. xii. 19); but more properly, as exclusively appropriate to the Hebrew element of the population (Num. xv. 15). Every circumcised Hebrew was a member of the congregation, and took part in its proceedings, probably from the time that he bore arms. It is important, however, to observe that he acquired no political rights in his individual capacity, but only as a member of a house; for the basis of the Hebrew polity was the house, whence was formed in an ascending scale the family or collection of houses, the tribe or collection of families, and the congregation or collection of tribes. The congregation occupied an important position under the Theocracy, as the convitia or national parliament, invested with legislative and judicial powers; each house, family, and tribe being represented by its head or father. The number of these representatives being inconveniently large for ordinary business, a further selection was made by Moses of 70, who formed a species of standing committee (Num. xi. 16). Occasionally indeed the whole body of the people was assembled at the door of the tabernacle, hence usually called the tabernacle of the congregation (Num. x. 3). The people were strictly bound by the acts of their representatives, even in cases where they disapproved of them (Josh. ix. 18). After the occupation of the land of Canaan, the congregation was assembled only on matters of the highest importance. In the later periods of Jewish history the congregation was represented by the Sanhedrim.

Coni'ah. [JECONIAH.]

Cononi'ah, a Levite, ruler of the offerings and tithes in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxxi. 12, 13).

Consecration. [PRIEST.]

Convocation. This term is applied invariably to meetings of a religious character, in contradistinction to congregation. With one exception (Is. i. 13), the word is peculiar to the Pentateuch.

Cooking. As meat did not form an article of ordinary diet among the Jews, the art of cooking was not carried to any perfection. Few animals were slaughtered except for purposes of hospitality or festivity. The proceedings on such occasions appear to have been as follow:—On the arrival of a guest the animal, either a kid, lamb, or calf was killed (Gen. xviii. 7; Luke xv. 23), its throat being cut so that the blood might be poured out (Lev. vii. 26); it was then flayed and was ready either for roasting or boiling: in the former case the animal was preserved entire (Ex. xii. 46), and roasted either over a fire (Ex. xii. 8) of wood (Is. xlv. 16), or perhaps, as the mention of fire implies another method, in an oven, consisting simply of a hole dug in the earth, well heated, and covered up. The Paschal lamb was roasted by the first of these methods (Ex. xii. 8, 9; 2 Chr. xxxv. 13). Boiling, however, was the more usual method of cooking. Vegetables were usually boiled, and served up as pottage (Gen. xxv. 29; 2 K. iv. 38). Fish was also cooked (Luke xxiv. 42), probably broiled. The cooking was in early times performed by the mistress of the household (Gen. xviii. 6); professional cooks were afterwards employed (1 Sam. viii. 13, ix. 23).

Co'os, Acts xxi. 1. [Cos.]

Copper, Heb. Nechosheth, in the A. V. always rendered "brass," except in Ezr. viii. 27, and Jer. xv. 12. This metal is usually found as pyrites sulphuret of copper and iron, malachite (carb. of copper), or in the state of oxide, and occasionally in a native state, principally in the New World. It was almost exclusively used by the ancients for common purposes; for which its elastic and ductile nature rendered it practically available. We read in the Bible of copper, possessed in countless abundance (2 Chr. iv. 18), and used for every kind of instrument; as chains (Judg. xvi. 21), pillars (1 K. vii. 15-21), lavers, the great one being called "the copper sea" (2 K. xxv. 13; 1 Chr. xviii. 8), and the other temple vessels. These were made in the foundry, with the assistance of Hiram, a Phoenician (1 K. vii. 13), although the Jews were not ignorant of metallurgy (Ez. xxii. 18; Deut. iv. 20, &c.), and appear to have worked their own mines (Deut. vii. 9; Is. li. 1). We read also of copper mirrors (Ex. xxxviii. 8; Job xxxvii. 18), and even of copper arms, as helmets, spears, &c. (1 Sam. xvii. 5, 6, 38; 2 Sam. xxi. 16). The expression "bow of steel," in Job xx. 24, Ps. xviii. 34, should be rendered "bow of copper." They could hardly have applied copper to these purposes without possessing some judicious system of alloys, or perhaps some forgotten secret for rendering the metal harder and more elastic than we can make it. The only place in the A. V. where "copper" is mentioned is Ezr. viii. 27 (cf. 1 Esd. viii. 57). These vessels may have been of orichalcum, like the Persian or Indian vases found among the treasures of Darius. In Ez. xxvii. 13 the importation of copper vessels to the markets of Tyre by merchants of Javan, Tubal, and Meshech is alluded to. Probably these were the Moschi, &c., who worked the copper-mines in the neighbourhood of Mount Caucasus. In 2 Tim. iv. 14 χαλκός is rendered "coppersmith," but the term is perfectly general.

Coral occurs only, as the somewhat doubtful rendering of the Hebrew râmôth, in Job xxviii. 18, and in Ez. xxvii. 16. The old versions fail to afford us any clue. On the whole, we see no reason to be dissatisfied with the rendering of the A. V. "Coral" has decidedly the best claim of any other substances to represent the râmôth. The natural upward form of growth of the Corallium rubrum is well suited to the etymology of the word. With regard to the estimation in which coral was held by the Jews and other Orientals, it must be remembered that coral varies in price with us. Pliny says that the Indians valued coral as the Romans valued pearls. Coral, Mr. King informs us, often occurs in ancient Egyptian jewellery as used for beads and amulets.

Corban, an offering to God of any sort, bloody or bloodless, but particularly in fulfilment of a vow. The law laid down rules for vows, 1. affirmative; 2. negative (Lev. xxvii.; Num. xxx.). Upon these rules the traditionists enlarged, and laid down that a man might interdict himself by vow, not only from using for himself, but from giving to another, or receiving from him some particular object whether of food or any other kind whatsoever. The thing thus interdicted was considered as Corban. A person might thus exempt himself from any inconvenient obligation under plea of corban. It was practices of this sort that our Lord reprehended (Matt. xv. 5; Mark vii. 11), as annulling the spirit of the law.

Cor'be, 1 Esdr. v. 12. Apparently ZACCAI.

Cord. Of the various purposes to which cord, including under that term rope, and twisted thongs, was applied, the following are specially worthy of notice—(1.) For fastening a tent (Ex. xxxv. 18, xxxix. 40; Is. liv. 2). As the tent supplied a favourite image of the human body, the cords which held it in its place represented the principle of life (Job iv. 21; Eccl. xii. 6).—(2.) For leading or binding animals, as a halter or rein (Ps. cxviii. 27; Hos. xi. 4).—(3.) For yoking them either to a cart (Is. v. 18) or a plough (Job xxxix. 10).—(4.) For binding prisoners (Judg. xv. 13; Ps. ii. 3, xxxix. 4; Ez. iii. 25).—(5.) For bow-strings (Ps. xi. 2), made of catgut; such are spoken of in Judg. xvi. 7 (A. V. "green withs;" but more properly fresh or moist bow-strings).—(6.) For the ropes or "tacklings" of a vessel (Is. xxxiii. 23).—(7.) For measuring ground (2 Sam. viii. 2; Ps. lxxviii. 55; Am. vii. 17; Zech. ii. 1), hence cord or line became an expression for an inheritance (Josh. xvii. 14, xix. 9; Ps. xvi. 6; Ez. xlvii. 13), and even for any defined district (Deut. iii. 4).—(8.) For fishing and snaring.—(9.) For attaching articles of dress; as the "wreathen chains," which were rather twisted cords, worn by the high-priests (Ex. xxviii. 14, 22, 24, xxxix. 15, 17).—(10.) For fastening awnings (Esth. i. 6).—(11.) For attaching to a plummet.—(12.) For drawing water out of a well, or raising heavy weights (Josh. ii. 15; Jer. xxxviii. 6, 13). The materials of which cord was made varied according to the strength required; the strongest rope was probably made of strips of camel hide as still used by the Bedouins. The finer sorts were made of flax (Is. xix. 9), and probably of reeds and rushes. In the N. T. the term σχοινία is applied to the whip which our Saviour made (John ii. 15), and to the ropes of a ship (Acts xxvii. 32).

Core, Ecclus. xlv. 18; Jude 11. [KORAH, 1.]

Coriander. The plant called Coriandrum sativum is found in Egypt, Persia, and India, and has a round tall stalk; it bears umbelliferous white or reddish flowers, from which arise globular, greyish, spicy seed-corns, marked with fine striae.

It is mentioned twice in the Bible (Ex. xvi. 31; Num. xi. 7).

Corinth. This city is alike remarkable for its distinctive geographical position, its eminence in Greek and Roman history, and its close connexion with the early spread of Christianity. Geographically its situation was so marked, that the name of its Isthmus has been given to every narrow neck of land between two seas. But, besides this, the site of Corinth is distinguished by another conspicuous physical feature—viz. the Acrocorinthus, a vast citadel of rock, which rises abruptly to the height of 2000 feet above the level of the sea, and the summit of which is so extensive that it once contained a whole town. The situation of Corinth, and the possession of her eastern and western harbours, are the secrets of her history. The earliest passage in her progress to eminence was probably Phœnician. But at the most remote period of which we have any sure record we find the Greeks established here in a position of wealth and military strength. In the latest passages of Greek history Corinth held a conspicuous place. It is not the true Greek Corinth with which we have to do in the life of St. Paul, but the Corinth which was rebuilt and established as a Roman colony. The distinction between the two must be carefully remembered. The new city was hardly less distinguished than the old, and it acquired a fresh importance as the metropolis of the Roman province of ACHAIA. Corinth was a place of great mental activity, as well as of commercial and manufacturing enterprise. Its wealth was so celebrated as to be proverbial; so were the vice and profligacy of its inhabitants. The worship of Venus here was attended with shameful licentiousness. All these points are indirectly illustrated by passages in the two epistles to the Corinthians. Corinth is still an episcopal see. The cathedral church of St. Nicolas, "a very mean place for such an ecclesiastical dignity," used in Turkish times to be in the Acrocorinthus. The city has now shrunk

to a wretched village, on the old site, and bearing the old name, which, however, is often corrupted into Gortho. Pausanias, in describing the antiquities of Corinth as they existed in his day, distinguishes clearly between those which belonged to the old Greek city, and those which were of Roman origin. Two relics of Roman work are still to be seen, one a heap of brick-work which may have been part of the baths erected by Hadrian, the other the remains of an amphitheatre with subterranean arrangements for gladiators. Far more interesting are the ruins of the ancient Greek temple, the oldest of which any remains are left in Greece. This article would be incomplete without some notice of the Posidonium, or sanctuary of Neptune, the scene of the Isthmian games, from which St. Paul borrows some of his most striking imagery in 1 Cor. and other epistles. This sanctuary was a short distance to the N.E. of Corinth, at the narrowest part of the Isthmus, near the harbour of Schoenus (now Kalamáki) on the Saronic gulf. The exact site of the temple is doubtful; but to the south are the remains of the stadium, where the foot-races were run (1 Cor. ix. 24); to the east are those of the theatre, which was probably the scene of the pugilistic contests (ib. 26); and abundant on the shore are the small green pine-trees which gave the fading wreath (ib. 25) to the victors in the games.

Corinthians, First Epistle to the, was written by the Apostle St. Paul toward the close of his nearly three-year stay at Ephesus (Acts xix. 10, xx. 31), which we learn from 1 Cor. xvi. 8, probably terminated with the Pentecost of A.D. 57 or 58. The bearers were probably (according to the common subscription) Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, who had been recently sent to the Apostle, and who, in the conclusion of this epistle (ch. xvi. 17), are especially commended to the honourable regard of the church of Corinth. This varied and highly characteristic letter was addressed not to any party, but to the whole body of the large (Acts xviii. 8, 10) Judæo-Gentile (Acts xviii. 4) church of Corinth, and appears to have been called forth, 1st, by the information the Apostle had received from members of the household of Chloe (ch. i. 11), of the divisions that were existing among them, which were of so grave a nature as to have already induced the Apostle to desire Timothy to visit Corinth (ch. iv. 17) after his journey to Macedonia (Acts xix. 22); 2ndly, by the information he had received of a grievous case of incest (ch. v. 1), and of the defective state of the Corinthian converts, not only in regard of general habits (ch. vi. 1, sq.) and church discipline (ch. xi. 20, sq.), but, as it would also seem, of doctrine (ch. xv.); 3rdly, by the inquiries that had been specially addressed to St. Paul by the church of Corinth on several matters relating to Christian practice. With regard to the genuineness and authenticity of this epistle no doubt has ever been entertained. The external evidences are extremely distinct, and the character of the composition such, that if any critic should hereafter be bold enough to question the correctness of the ascription, he must be prepared to extend it to all the epistles that bear the name of the great Apostle. Two special points deserve separate consideration:—1. The state of parties at Corinth at the time of the Apostle's writing. The few facts supplied to us by the Acts of the Apostles, and the notices in the epistle, appear to be as follows:—

The Corinthian church was planted by the Apostle himself (1 Cor. iii. 6), in his second missionary journey (Acts xviii. 1, sq.). He abode in the city a year and a half (ch. xviii. 11). A short time after the Apostle had left the city the eloquent Jew of Alexandria, Apollos, went to Corinth (Acts xix. 1). This circumstance of the visit of Apollos, appears to have formed the commencement of a gradual division into two parties, the followers of St. Paul, and the followers of Apollos (comp. ch. iv. 6). These divisions, however, were to be multiplied; for, as it would seem, shortly after the departure of Apollos, Judaizing teachers, supplied probably with letters of commendation (2 Cor. iii. 1) from the church of Jerusalem, appear to have come to Corinth and to have preached the Gospel in a spirit of direct antagonism to St. Paul personally. To this third party we may perhaps add a fourth that, under the name of "the followers of Christ" (ch. i. 12), sought at first to separate themselves from the factious adherence to particular teachers, but eventually were driven by antagonism into positions equally sectarian and inimical to the unity of the church. At this momentous period, before parties had become consolidated, and had distinctly withdrawn from communion with one another, the Apostle writes; and in the outset of the epistle (ch. i.-iv. 21) we have his noble and impassioned protest against this fourfold rending of the robe of Christ.—2. The number of epistles written by St. Paul to the Corinthian church will probably remain a subject of controversy to the end of time. The well known words (ch. v. 9) do certainly seem to point to some former epistolary communication to the church of Corinth. The whole context seems in favour of this view, though the Greek commentators are of the contrary opinion, and no notice has been taken of the lost epistle by any writers of antiquity. The apocryphal letter of the church of Corinth to St. Paul, and St. Paul's answer, existing in Armenian, are worthless productions that deserve no consideration.

Corinthians, Second Epistle to the, was written a few months subsequently to the first, in the same year,—and thus, if the dates assigned to the former epistle be correct, about the autumn of A.D. 57 or 58, a short time previous to the Apostle's three months' stay in Achaia (Acts xx. 3). The place whence it was written was clearly not Ephesus (see ch. i. 8), but Macedonia (ch. vii. 5, viii. 1, ix. 2), whither the Apostle went by way of Troas (ch. ii. 12), after waiting a short time in the latter place for the return of Titus (ch. ii. 13). The Vatican MS., the bulk of later MSS., and the old Syr. version, assign Philippi as the exact place whence it was written; but for this assertion we have no certain grounds to rely on: that the bearers, however, were Titus and his associates (Luke?) is apparently substantiated by ch. vii. 23, ix. 3, 5. The epistle was occasioned by the information which the Apostle had received from Titus, and also, as it would certainly seem probable, from Timothy, of the reception of the first epistle. If it be desirable to hazard a conjecture on the mission of Titus, it would seem most natural to suppose that the return of Timothy and the intelligence he conveyed might have been such as to make the Apostle feel the necessity of at once despatching to the contentious church one of his immediate followers, with instructions to support and strengthen the effect of the epistle, and to bring back the most recent tidings of the spirit that was prevailing at Corinth. These idings, as it would seem from our present epistle, were mainly favourable; the better part of the church were returning back to their spiritual allegiance to their founder (ch. i. 13, 14, vii. 9, 15, 16), but there was still a faction, possibly of the Judaizing members (comp. ch. xi. 22), that were sharpened into even a more keen animosity against the Apostle personally (ch. x. 1, 10), and more strenuously denied his claim to Apostleship. The contents of this epistle are thus very varied, but may perhaps be roughly divided into three parts:—1st, the Apostle's account of the character of his spiritual labours, accompanied with notices of his affectionate feelings towards his converts (ch. i.—vii.); 2dly, directions about the collections (ch. viii., ix.); 3rdly, defence of his own Apostolical character (ch. x.—xiii. 10). The genuineness and authenticity are supported by the most decided external testimony, and by internal evidence of such a kind that what has been said on this point in respect of the first epistle is here even still more applicable. The principal historical difficulty connected with the epistle relates to the number of visits made by the Apostle to the church of Corinth. The words of this epistle (ch. xii. 14, xiii. 1, 2) seem distinctly to imply that St. Paul had visited Corinth twice before the time at which he now writes. St. Luke, however, only mentions one visit prior to that time (Acts xviii. 1, sq.); for the visit recorded in Acts xx. 2, 3, is confessedly subsequent. We must assume that the Apostle made a visit to Corinth which St. Luke did not record, probably during the period of his 3-year residence at Ephesus.

Cormorant. The representative in the A. V. of the Hebrew words kāth and shālāc. As to the former, see PELICAN. Shālāc occurs only as the name of an unclean bird in Lev. xi. 17, Deut. xiv. 17. The word has been variously rendered. The etymology points to some plunging bird: the common cormorant (Phalacrocorax carbo), which some writers have identified with the Shālāc, is unknown in the eastern Mediterranean; another species is found S. of the Red Sea, but none on the W. coast of Palestine.

Corn. The most common kinds were wheat, barley, spelt (A. V., Ex. ix. 32, and Is. xxviii. 25, "rie"; Ez. iv. 9, "fitches"), and millet; oats are mentioned only by rabbinical writers. Corn-crops are still reckoned at twentyfold what was sown, and were anciently much more. "Seven ears on one stalk" (Gen. xli. 22) is no unusual phenomenon in Egypt at this day. The many-eared stalk is also common in the wheat of Palestine, and it is of course of the bearded kind. Wheat (see 2 Sam. iv. 6) was stored in the house for domestic purposes. It is at present often kept in a dry well, and perhaps the "ground corn" of 2 Sam. xvii. 19 was meant to imply that the well was so used. From Solomon's time (2 Chr. ii. 10, 15), as agriculture became developed under a settled government, Palestine was a corn-exporting country, and her grain was largely taken by her commercial neighbour Tyre (Ez. xxvii. 17; comp. Am. viii. 5). "Plenty of corn" was part of Jacob's blessing (Gen. xxvii. 28; comp. Ps. lxxv. 13).

Cornelius, a Roman centurion of the Italian cohort stationed in Caesarea (Acts x. 1, &c.), a man full of good works and alms-deeds. With his household he was baptised by St. Peter, and thus Cornelius became the first-fruits of the Gentile world to Christ. Tradition has been busy with his life and acts. According to Jerome he built a Christian Church at Caesarea; but later tradition makes him Bishop of Scamandios (-ria?), and ascribes to him the working of a great miracle.

Corner. The "corner" of the field was not allowed (Lev. xix. 9) to be wholly reaped. It formed a right of the poor to carry off what was so left, and this was a part of the maintenance from the soil to which that class were entitled. On the principles of the Mosaic polity every Hebrew family had a hold on a certain fixed estate, and could by no ordinary and casual calamity be wholly beggared. Hence its indigent members had the claims of kindred on the "corners," &c., of the field which their landed brethren reaped. In the later period of the prophets their constant complaints concerning the defrauding the poor (Is. x. 2; Am. v. 11, viii. 6) seem to show that such laws had lost their practical force. Still later, under the Scribes, minute legislation fixed one-sixtieth as the portion of a field which was to be left for the legal "corner;" but provided also (which seems hardly consistent) that two fields should not be so joined as to leave one corner only where two should fairly be reckoned. The proportion being thus fixed, all the grain might be reaped, and enough to satisfy the regulation subsequently separated from the whole crop. This "corner" was, like the gleanings, tithe-free.

Corner-stone, a quoin or corner-stone, of great importance in binding together the sides of a building. Some of the corner-stones in the ancient work of the Temple foundations are 17 or 19 feet long, and 7½ feet thick. At Nineveh the corners are sometimes formed of one angular stone. The phrase "corner-stone" is sometimes used to denote any principal person, as the princes of Egypt (Is. xix. 13), and is thus applied to our Lord (Is. xxviii. 16; Matt. xxi. 42; 1 Pet. ii. 6, 7).

Cornet (Heb. Shôphâr), a loud-sounding instrument, made of the horn of a ram or of a chamois (sometimes of an ox), and used by the ancient Hebrews for signals, for announcing the "Jubile" (Lev. xxv. 9), for proclaiming the new year, for the purposes of war (Jer. iv. 5, 19; comp. Job xxxix. 25), as well as for the sentinels placed at the watch-towers to give notice of the approach of an enemy (Ez. xxxiii. 4, 5). Shôphâr is generally rendered in the A. V. "trumpet," but "cornet" (the more correct translation) is used in 2 Chr. xv. 14; Ps. xlviii. 6; Hos. v. 8; and 1 Chr. xv. 28. "Cornet" is also employed in Dan. iii. 5, 7, 10, 15, for the Chaldee Keren (literally a horn). Oriental scholars for the most part consider Shôphâr and Keren to be one and the same musical instrument; but some Biblical critics regard Shôphâr and Chatsôtsêrah as belonging to the species of Keren, the general term for a horn. The generally received opinion is, that Keren is the crooked horn, and Shôphâr the long and straight one. The silver trumpets which Moses was charged to furnish for the Israelites, were to be used for the following purposes: for the calling together of the assembly, for the journeying of the camps, for sounding the alarm of war, and for celebrating the sacrifices on festivals and new moons (Num. x. 1-10). In the age of Solomon the "silver trumpets" were increased in number to 120 (2 Chr. v. 12); and, independently of the objects for which they had been first introduced, they were now employed in the orchestra of the Temple as an accompaniment to songs of thanks.

giving and praise. Yôbél, used sometimes for the "year of Jubile" (comp. Lev. xv. 13, 15, with xxv. 28, 30), generally denotes the institution of Jubile, but in some instances it is spoken of as a musical instrument, resembling in its object, if not in its shape, the Keren and the Shôphâr. Gesenius pronounces Yôbél to be applied to the sound of a trumpet signal. Still it is difficult to divest Yôbél of the meaning of a sounding instrument in the following instances: Ex. xix. 13; Josh. vi. 5, 6. The sounding of the cornet was the distinguishing ritual feature of the festival appointed by Moses to be held on the first day of the seventh month under the denomination of "a day of blowing trumpets" (Num. xxix. 1), or "a memorial of blowing of trumpets" (Lev. xxiii. 24); and that rite is still observed by the Jews in their celebration of the same festival, which they now call "the day of memorial," also "New Year." The intention of the appointment of the festival "of the Sounding of the Cornet," as well as the duties of the sacred institution, appear to be set forth in the words of the prophet, "Sound the cornet in Zion, sanctify the fast, proclaim the solemn assembly" (Joel ii. 15). Agreeably to the order in which this passage runs, the institution of "the festival of Sounding the Cornet" seems to be the prelude and preparation for the awful Day of Atonement. The word "solemn assembly," in the verse from Joel quoted above, applies to the festival "Eighth Day of Solemn Assembly" (Lev. xxiii. 36), the closing rite of the festive cycle of Tishri. The cornet is also sounded in the synagogue at the close of the service for the Day of Atonement, and, amongst the Jews who adopt the ritual of the Sephardim, on the seventh day of the feast of Tabernacles, known by the post-Biblical denomination of "the Great Hosannah."

Cos or Co's (now Stanchio or Stanko). This small island of the Grecian Archipelago has several interesting points of connexion with the Jews. It is specified as one of the places which contained Jewish residents (1 Macc. xv. 23). Josephus, quoting Strabo, mentions that the Jews had a great amount of treasure stored there during the Mithridatic war. From the same source we learn that Julius Caesar issued an edict in favour of the Jews of Cos. Herod the Great conferred many favours on the island. St. Paul, on the return from his third missionary journey, passed the night here, after sailing from MILETUS. It was celebrated for its light woven fabrics and for its wines—also for a temple of Aesculapius, which was virtually a museum of anatomy and pathology. The emperor Claudius bestowed upon Cos the privilege of a free state. The chief town (of the same name) was on the N.E. near a promontory called Scandarium; and perhaps it is to the town that reference is made in the Acts (xxi. 1).

Co'sam, son of Elmodam, in the line of Joseph the husband of Mary (Luke iii. 28).

Cotton, Heb. carpus (comp. Lat. carbasus), Esth. i. 6, where the Vulg. has carbasini coloris, as if a colour, not a material (so in A. V. "green"), were intended. There is a doubt whether under Shesh, in the earlier, and Uts, in the later books of the O. T., rendered in the A. V. by "white linen," "fine linen," &c., cotton may have been included as well. The dress of the Egyptian priests, at any rate in their ministrations, was without doubt of linen (Herod. ii. 37), in spite of Pliny's assertion (ix. 1, 2) that they preferred cotton. Yet cotton garments for the worship of the temples are said to be mentioned in the Rosetta stone. The same with the Jewish ephod and other priestly attire, in which we cannot suppose any carelessness to have prevailed. There is, however, no word for the cotton plant in the Hebrew, nor any reason to suppose that there was any early knowledge of the fabric. The Egyptian mummy swathings are decided to have been of linen, and not cotton. The very difficulty of deciding, however, shows how easily even scientific observers may mistake, and, much more, how impossible it would have been for ancient popular writers to avoid confusion. Varro knew of tree-wool on the authority of Ctesias, contemporary with Herodotus. The Greeks, through the commercial consequences of Alexander's conquests, must have known of cotton cloth, and more or less of the plant. Cotton was manufactured and worn extensively in Egypt, but extant monuments give no proof of its growth, as in the case of flax, in that country. But when Pliny (A.D. 115) asserts that cotton was then grown in Egypt, a statement confirmed by Julius Pollux (a century later), we can hardly resist the inference that, at least as a curiosity and as an experiment, some plantations existed there. This is the more likely since we find the cotton-tree is mentioned still by Pliny as the only remarkable tree of the adjacent Ethiopia; and since Arabia, on its other side, appears to have known cotton from time immemorial, to grow it in abundance, and in parts to be highly favourable to that product. In India, however, we have the earliest records of the use of cotton for dress; of which, including the starching of it, some curious traces are found as early as 800 B.C., in the Institutes of Manu. Cotton is now both grown and manufactured in various parts of Syria and Palestine; but there is no proof that, till they came in contact with Persia, the Hebrews generally knew of it as a distinct fabric from linen.

Couch. [BED.]

Council. 1. The great council of the Sanhedrim, which sat at Jerusalem. [SANHEDRIM.] 2. The lesser courts (Matt. x. 17; Mark xiii. 9), of which there were two at Jerusalem, and one in each town of Palestine. The constitution of these courts is a doubtful point. The existence of local courts, however constituted, is clearly implied in the passages quoted from the N. T.; and perhaps the "judgment" (Matt. v. 21) applies to them. 3. A kind of jury or privy council (Acts xxv. 12), consisting of a certain number of assessors, who assisted Roman governors in the administration of justice and other public matters.

in the A. V. most commonly to the enclosures of the Tabernacle and the Temple (Ex. xxvii. 9, xi. 33; Lev. vi. 16; 1 K. vi. 36, vii. 8, 2 K. xxiii. 12; 2 Chr. xxxiii. 5, &c.). In 2 Chr. iv. 9 and vi. 13, however, a different word is employed, apparently, for the same places—azārāh, from a root of similar meaning to the above. Chātsēr also designates the court of a prison (Neh. iii. 25; Jer. xxxii. 2, &c.), of a private house (2 Sam. xvii. 18), and of a palace (2 K. xx. 4; Esth. i. 5, &c.).

Coutha. One of the servants of the Temple who returned with Zerobabel (1 Esdr. v. 32).

Covenant. The Heb. bērit is taken by Gesenius to mean primarily "a cutting," with reference to the custom of cutting or dividing animals in two, and passing between the parts in ratifying a covenant (Gen. xv.; Jer. xxxiv. 18, 19). Professor Lee suggests that the proper signification of the word is an eating together, or banquet, because among the Orientals to eat together amounts almost to a covenant of friendship. In the N. T. the word διαθήκη is frequently, though by no means uniformly, translated testament in the Authorised Version. There seems, however, to be no necessity for the introduction of a new word conveying a new idea. In its Biblical meaning of a compact or agreement between two parties, the word is used—1. Improperly, of a covenant between God and man. Man not being in any way in the position of an independent covenanting party, the phrase is evidently used by way of accommodation. Strictly speaking, such a covenant is quite unconditional, and amounts to a promise (Gal. iii. 15 ff.) or act of mere favour (Ps. lxxxix. 28). Thus the assurance given by God after the Flood, that a like judgment should not be repeated, and that the recurrence of the seasons, and of day and night, should not cease, is called a covenant (Gen. ix.; Jer. xxxiii. 20). Generally, however, the form of a covenant is maintained, by the benefits which God engages to bestow being made by Him dependent upon the fulfilment of certain conditions which He imposes on man. Consistently with this representation of God's dealings with man under the form of a covenant, such covenant is said to be confirmed, in conformity to human custom, by an oath (Deut. iv. 31; Ps. lxxxix. 3), to be sanctioned by curses to fall upon the unfaithful (Deut. xxix. 21), and to be accompanied by a sign, such as the rainbow (Gen. ix.), circumcision (Gen. xvii.), or the Sabbath (Ex. xxxi. 16, 17).—2. Property, of a covenant between man and man. i. e. a solemn compact or agreement, either between tribes or nations (1 Sam. xi. 1; Josh. ix. 6, 15), or between individuals (Gen. xxxi. 44), by which each party bound himself to fulfil certain conditions, and was assured of receiving certain advantages. In making such a covenant God was solemnly invoked as witness (Gen. xxxi. 50), and an oath was sworn (Gen. xxi. 31). A sign or witness of the covenant was sometimes framed, such as a gift (Gen. xxi. 30), or a pillar, or heap of stones erected (Gen. xxxi. 52). The marriage compact is called "the covenant of God" (Prov. ii. 17; see Mal. ii. 14). The word covenant came to be applied to a sure ordinance, such as that of the shew-bread (Lev. xxiv. 8); and is used figuratively in such expressions as a covenant with death (Is. xxviii. 18), or with the wild beasts (Hos. ii. 18).

Cow. [BULL.]

Cow, a man among the descendants of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 8).

Cow'bi, daughter of Zur, a chief of the Midianites, (Num. xiv. 15, 18).

Crane. There can be little doubt that the A. V. is incorrect in rendering sūs by "crane," which bird is probably intended by the Hebrew word āyār, translated "swallow," by the A. V. [SWALLOW.] Mention is made of the sūs in Hezekiah's prayer (Is. xxxviii. 14), "Like a sūs or an āyār so did I twitter;" and again in Jer. viii. 7 these two words occur in the same order, from which passage we learn that both birds were migratory. According to the testimony of most of the ancient versions, sūs denotes a "swallow." The passage in Jeremiah, compared with the twittering notes of the sūs in Hezekiah's prayer, goes far to establish this translation.

Crates, governor of the Cyprians in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc. iv. 29).

Creditor. [LOAN.]

Crescens (2 Tim. iv. 10), an assistant of St. Paul, said to have been one of the seventy disciples. According to early tradition, he preached the Gospel in Galatia. Later tradition makes him preach in Gaul, and found the Church at Vienne.

Crete, the modern Candia. This large island, which closes in the Greek Archipelago on the S., extends through a distance of 140 miles between its extreme points of Cape SALMONE (Acts xxvii. 7) on the E. and Cape Criumetopon beyond PHOENICE or Phoenix (ib. 12) on the W. Though extremely bold and mountainous, this island has very fruitful valleys, and in early times it was celebrated for its hundred cities. It seems likely that a very early acquaintance existed between the Cretans and the Jews. There is no doubt that Jews were settled in the island in considerable numbers during the period between the death of Alexander the Great and the final destruction of Jerusalem. Gortyna seems to have been their chief residence (1 Macc. xv. 23). Thus the special mention of Cretans (Acts ii. 11) among those who were at Jerusalem at the great Pentecost is just what we should expect. No notice is given in the Acts of any more direct evangelisation of Crete; and no absolute proof can be adduced that St. Paul was ever there before his voyage from Caesarea to Puteoli. The circumstances of St. Paul's recorded visit were briefly as follows. The wind being contrary when he was off CNIDUS (Acts xxvii. 7), the ship was forced to run down to Cape Salmone, and thence under the lee of Crete to FAIR HAVENS, which was near a city called LASAEA (v. 8). Thence, after some delay, an attempt was made, on the wind becoming favourable, to reach Phoenix for the purpose of wintering there (v. 12). The next point of connexion between St. Paul and this island is found in the epistle to Titus. It is evident from Tit. i. 5, that the Apostle himself was here at no long interval of time before he wrote the letter.

Cretes (Acts ii. 11). Cretans, inhabitants of Crete.

Crimson. [COLOURS.]

Crispus, ruler of the Jewish synagogue at Corinth (Acts xviii. 8); baptized with his family by St. Paul (1 Cor. i. 14). According to tradition, he became afterwards Bishop of Aegina.

Cross. Except the Latin crux there was no word definitively and invariably applied to this instrument of punishment. As the emblem of a slave's death and a murderer's punishment, the cross was naturally looked upon with the profoundest horror.

But after the celebrated vision of Constantine, he ordered his friends to make a cross of gold and gems, such as he had seen, and "the towering eagles resigned the flags unto the cross" (Pearson), and "the tree of cursing and shame" "sat upon the sceptres and was engraved and signed on the foreheads of kings" (Jer. Taylor, Life of Christ, iii. xv. 1). The new standards were called by the name Labarum, and may be seen on the coins of Constantine the Great and his nearer successors. The Labarum is described in Eusebius, and, besides the pendent cross, supported the celebrated embroidered monogram of Christ, which was also inscribed on the shields and helmets of the legions. We may tabulate thus the various descriptions of cross:—

3. Commissa
and ansata.

4. Immissa, or capitata.

1. The crux simplex, or mere stake of one single piece without transom, was probably the original of the vest. Sometimes it was merely driven through the man's chest, but at other times it was driven longitudinally, coming out at the mouth. Another form of punishment consisted of tying the criminal to the stake, from which he hung by his arms.—2. The crux decussata is called St. Andrew's cross, although on no good grounds. It was in the shape of the Greek letter X.—3. The crux commissa, or St. Anthony's cross (so called from being embroidered on that saint's cope), was in the shape of the T. A variety of this cross (the crux ansata, "crosses with circles on their heads") is found "in the sculptures from Khorsabad and the ivories from Nimroud. In the Egyptian sculptures, a similar object, called a crux ansata, is constantly borne by divinities. The same symbol has been also found among the Copts, and (perhaps accidentally) among the Indians and Persians.—4. The crux immissa, or Latin cross, differed from the former by the projection of the upright above the crossbar. That this was the kind of cross on which our Lord died is obvious from the mention of the "title," as placed above our Lord's head, and from the almost unanimous tradition; it is repeatedly found on the coins and columnus of Constantine. There was a projection from the central stem, on which the body of the sufferer rested. This was to prevent the weight of the body from tearing away the hands. Whether there was also a support to the feet (as we see in pictures), is doubtful. An inscription was generally placed above the criminal's head, briefly expressing his guilt, and generally was carried before him. It was covered with white gypsum, and the letters were black. Nicquetus says it was white with red letters. It is a question whether tying or binding to the cross was the more common method. That our Lord was nailed, according to prophecy, is certain (John xx. 25, 27, &c.; Zech. xii. 10; Ps. xxii. 16). It is, however, extremely probable that both methods were used at once. The story of the so-called "invention of the cross," A.D. 326, is too famous to be altogether passed over. Besides Socrates and Theodoret, it is mentioned by Rufinus, Sozomen, Paulinus, Sulp. Severus, and Chrysostom, but it would require far more probable evidence to outweigh the silence of Eusebius. To this day the supposed title, or rather fragments of it, are shown to the people once a year in the church of Sta. Croce in Gerusalemme at Rome. It was not till the 6th century that the emblem of the cross became the image of the crucifix. As a symbol the use of it was frequent in the early Church. It was not till the 2nd century that any particular efficacy was attached to it.

Crown. This ornament, which is both ancient and universal, probably originated from the fillets used to prevent the hair from being dishevelled by the wind. Such fillets are still common, and they may be seen on the sculptures of Persepolis, Nineveh, and Egypt; they gradually developed into turbans, which by the addition of ornamental or precious materials assumed the dignity of mitres or crowns. The use of them as ornaments probably was suggested by the natural custom of encircling the head with flowers in token of joy and triumph (Wisd. ii. 8; Jud. xv. 13). Both the ordinary priests and the high-priest wore them. The common "bonnet," Ex. xxviii. 37, xxix. 6, &c., formed a sort of linen fillet or crown. The mitre of the high-priest (used also of a regal crown, Ez. xxi. 26) was much more splendid (Ex. xxviii. 36; Lev. viii. 9). It had a second fillet of blue lace, and over it a golden diadem (Ex. xxix. 6). The gold band was tied behind with blue lace (embroidered with flowers), and being two fingers broad, bore the inscription "Holiness to the Lord" (comp. Rev. xvii. 5). "A striped head-dress and queue," or "a short wig, on which a band was fastened, ornamented with an asp, the symbol of royalty," was used by the kings of Egypt in religious ceremonies (Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt, iii. 354, fig. 13). The crown worn by the kings of Assyria was "a high mitre . . . frequently adorned with flowers, &c., and arranged in bands of linen or silk. Originally there was only one band, but afterwards there were two, and the ornaments were richer" (Layard, ii. 320, and the illustrations in Jahn, Archäologie, Part i. vol. ii. tab. ix. 4 and 8). There are many words in Scripture denoting a crown besides those mentioned: the head-dress of bridegrooms (Is. lxi. 10; Bar. v. 2; Ez. xxiv. 17), and of women (Is. iii. 20); a head-dress of great splendour (Is. xxviii. 5); a wreath of flowers (Prov. i. 9, iv. 9); and a common tiara or turban (Job xxix. 14; Is. iii. 23). The general word is atârâ, and we must attach to it the notion of a costly turban irradiated with pearls and gems of priceless value, which often form sigettes for feathers, as in the crowns of modern Asiatic sovereigns. Such was probably the crown, which with its precious stones weighed (or rather "was worth") a talent, taken by David from the king of Ammon at Rabbah, and used as the state crown of Judah (2 Sam. xii. 30). Στέφανος is used in the N. T. for every kind of crown; but στέμμα only once (Acts xiv. 18) for the garlands used with victims. In Rev. xii. 3, xix. 12, allusion is made to "many crowns" worn in token of extended dominion. The laurel, pine, or parsley crowns given to victors in the great games of Greece are finely alluded to by St. Paul (1 Cor. ix. 25; 2 Tim. ii. 5, &c.).

Crowns worn by Assyrian Kings (From Nimroud and Kouyunjik.)

Crown of Thorns, Matt. xxvii. 29. Our Lord was crowned with thorns in mockery by the Roman soldiers. The object seems to have been insult, and not the infliction of pain as has generally been supposed. The Rhamnus or Spina Christi, although abundant in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, cannot be the plant intended, because its thorns are so strong and large that it could not have been woven into a wreath. Had the acacia been intended, as some suppose, the phrase would have been different. Obviously some small flexible thorny shrub is meant; perhaps capparis spinosa. Hasselquist says that the thorn used was the Arabian Nabb.

Crucifixion was in use among the Egyptians (Gen. xl. 19), the Carthaginians, the Persians (Eth. vii. 10), the Assyrians, Scythians, Indians, Germans, and from the earliest times among the Greeks and Romans. Whether this mode of execution was known to the ancient Jews is a matter of dispute. Probably the Jews borrowed it from the Romans. It was unanimously considered the most horrible form of death. Among the Romans also the degradation was a part of the infliction, and the punishment if applied to freemen was only used in the case of the vilest criminals. Our Lord was condemned to it by the popular cry of the Jews (Matt. xxvii. 23) on the charge of sedition against Caesar (Luke xxiii. 2), although the Sanhedrim had previously condemned him on the totally distinct charge of blasphemy. The scarlet robe, crown of thorns, and other insults to which our Lord was subjected were illegal, and arose from the spontaneous petulance of the brutal soldiery. But the punishment properly commenced with scourging, after the criminal had been stripped. It was inflicted not with the comparatively mild rods, but the more terrible scourge (2 Cor. xi. 24, 25), which was not used by the Jews (Deut. xxv. 3). Into these scourges the soldiers often stuck nails, pieces of bone, &c. to heighten the pain, which was often so intense that the sufferer died under it. In our Lord's case, however, this infliction seems neither to have been the legal scourging after sentence, nor yet the examination by torture (Acts xxii. 24), but rather a scourging before the sentence, to excite pity and procure immunity from further punishment (Luke xxiii. 22; John xix. 1). The criminal carried his own cross, or at any rate a part of it. The place of execution was outside the city (1 K. xxi. 13; Acts vii. 58; Heb. xiii. 12), often in some public road or other conspicuous place. Arrived at the place of execution, the sufferer was stripped naked, the dress being the perquisite of the soldiers (Matt. xxvii. 35). The cross was then driven into the ground, so that the feet of the condemned were a foot or two above the earth, and he was lifted upon it, or else stretched upon it on the ground, and then lifted with it. Before the nailing or binding took place, a medicated cup was given out of kindness to confuse the senses and deaden the pangs of the sufferer (Prov. xxxi. 6), usually of "wine mingled with myrrh," because myrrh was soporific. Our Lord refused it that his senses might be clear (Matt. xxvii. 34; Mark xv. 23). He was crucified between two "thieves" or "malefactors," according to prophecy (Is. liii. 12); and was watched according to custom by a party of four soldiers (John xix. 23) with their centurion (Matt. xxvii. 66), whose express office was to prevent the stealing of the body. This was necessary from the lingering character of the death, which sometimes did not supervene even for three days, and was at last the result of gradual numbing and starvation. But for this guard, the persons might have been taken down and recovered, as was actually done in the case of a friend of Josephus. Fracture of the legs was especially adopted by the Jews to hasten death (John xix. 31). But the unusual rapidity of our Lord's death was due to the depth of His previous agonies, or may be sufficiently accounted for simply from peculiarities of constitution. Pilate expressly satisfied himself of the actual death by questioning the centurion (Mark xv. 44). In most cases the body was suffered to rot on the cross by the action of sun and rain, or to be devoured by birds and beasts. Sepulture was generally therefore forbidden; but in consequence of Deut. xxi. 22, 23, an express national exception was made in favour of the Jews (Matt. xxvii. 58). This accursed and awful mode of punishment was happily abolished by Constantine.

Cruse, a word employed in the A. V., apparently without any special intention, to translate three distinct Hebrew words.—1. Tsappachath, carried by Saul when on his night expedition after David (1 Sam. xxvi. 11, 12, 16), and by Elijah (1 K. xix. 6). In a similar case in the present day this would be a globular vessel of blue porous clay about 9 inches diameter, with a neck of about 3 inches long, a small handle below the neck, and opposite the handle a straight spout, with an orifice about the size of a straw, through which the water is drunk or sucked.—2. The noise which these vessels make when emptied through the neck is suggestive of the second term, Babkék. This is found but twice: a "cruse of honey" (1 K. xiv. 3); and an "earthen bottle" (Jer. xix. 1).—3. Apparently very different from both these is the other term, Tsêlchâhâk. This was probably a flat metal saucer of the form still common in the East. It occurs in 2 Chr. xxxv. 13, "pans;" and other words from the same root are found in 2 K. ii. 20, "cruse," and 2 K. xxi. 13, "dish" (comp. Prov. xix. 24, xxvi. 15).

Crystal, the representative in the A. V. of two Hebrew words.—1. Zedekith occurs only in Job xxviii. 17. Notwithstanding the different interpretations of "rock crystal," "glass," "adamant,"

&c., that have been assigned to this word, there can, we think, be very little doubt that "glass" is intended.—2. Kerach occurs in numerous passages in the O. T. to denote "ice," "frost," &c.; but once only (Ex. i. 22), as is generally understood, to signify "crystal." The ancients supposed rock-crystal to be merely ice congealed by intense cold. The similarity of appearance between ice and crystal caused no doubt the identity of the terms to express these substances. The Greek word occurs in Rev. iv. 6, xxii. 1. It may mean either "ice" or "crystal."

Cubit. [MEASURES.]

Cuckoo (Heb. shachaph). There does not appear to be any authority for this translation of the A. V.; the Heb. word occurs twice only (Lev. xi. 16; Deut. xiv. 15), as the name of some unclean bird. Bochart has attempted to show that Shachaph denotes the Cephus or storm-petrel. Mr. Tristram has suggested that some of the larger petrels, such as the Puffinus cinereus and P. anglorum (shearwater), which abound in the east of the Mediterranean and which are similar in their habits to the storm-petrel, may be denoted by the Hebrew term.

Cucumbers (Heb. kishshukim). This word occurs once only, in Num. xi. 5, as one of the good things of Egypt for which the Israelites longed. There is no doubt as to the meaning of the Hebrew. Egypt produces excellent cucumbers, melons, &c. [MELON], the Cucumis chate being, according to Hasselquist (Trav. p. 258), the best of its tribe yet known. This plant grows in the fertile earth around Cairo after the inundation of the Nile, and not elsewhere in Egypt. The C. chate is a variety only of the common melon (C. melo); it was once cultivated in England and called "the round-leaved Egyptian melon;" but it is rather an insipid sort. Besides the Cucumis chate, the common cucumber (C. sativus), of which the Arabs distinguish a number of varieties, is common in Egypt. "Both Cucumis chate and C. sativus," says Mr. Tristram, "are now grown in great quantities in Palestine: on visiting the Arab school in Jerusalem (1858) I observed that the dinner which the children brought with them to school consisted, without exception, of a piece of barley cake and a raw cucumber, which they eat rind and all." The "lodge in a garden of cucumbers" (Is. i. 8) is a rude temporary shelter, erected in the open grounds where vines, cucumbers, gourds &c., are grown, in which some lonely man or boy is set to watch, either to guard the plants from robbers, or to scare away the foxes and jackals from the vines.

Cummin, one of the cultivated plants of Palestine (Is. xxviii. 25, 27; Matt. xxiii. 23). It is an umbelliferous plant something like fennel. The seeds have a bitterish warm taste with an aromatic flavour. The Maltese are said to grow it at the present day, and to thresh it in the manner described by Isaiah.

Cup. The chief words rendered "cup" in the A. V. are, 1. côs; 2. kêshôth, only in plural; 3. gêbba. The cups of the Jews, whether of metal or earthenware, were possibly borrowed, in point of shape and design, from Egypt and from the Phœnicians, who were celebrated in that branch of workmanship. Egyptian cups were of various shapes, either with handles or without them. In Solomon's time all his drinking vessels were of gold, none of silver (1 K. x. 21). Babylon is compared to a golden cup (Jer. li. 7). The great laver, or "sea," was made with a rim like the rim of a cup (Côs), "with flowers of lilies" (1 K. vii. 26), a form which the Persepolitan cups resemble. The common form of modern Oriental cups is represented in the accompanying drawing. The cups of the N. T. were often no doubt formed on Greek and Roman models. They were sometimes of gold (Rev. xvii. 4).

Cup-Bearer. An officer of high rank with Egyptian, Persian, Assyrian, as well as Jewish monarchs (1 K. x. 5). The chief cupbearer, or butler, to the king of Egypt was the means of raising Joseph to his high position (Gen. xl. 1, 21, xli. 9). Babelshakeh appears from his name to have filled a like office in the Assyrian court (2 K. xviii. 17). Nehemiah was cupbearer to Artaxerxes Longimanus king of Persia (Neh. i. 11, ii. 1).

Curtains. The Hebrew terms translated in the A. V. by this word are three.—1. Yeriôth; the ten "curtains" of fine linen, and also the eleven of goats' hair, which covered the Tabernacle of Moses (Ex. xxvi. 1-13; xxxvi. 8-17). The charge of these curtains and of the other textile fabrics of the Tabernacle was laid on the Gershonites (Num. iv. 25). Having this definite meaning, the word came to be used as a synonym for the Tabernacle (2 Sam. vii. 2).—2. Mâsc, the "hanging" for the doorway of the tabernacle, Ex. xxvi. 36, &c., and also for the gate of the court round the tabernacle, Ex. xxvii. 16, &c. The rendering "curtain" occurs but once, Num. iii. 26. The idea in the root of Mâsc seems to be that of shielding or protecting. If this be so, it may have been not a curtain or veil, but an awning to shade the entrances.—3. Dôk. This word is found but once (Is. xl. 22), and its meaning is doubtful.

Cush, a Benjamite mentioned only in the title to Ps. vii. He was probably a follower of Saul, the head of his tribe.

Cush, the name of a son of Ham, apparently the eldest, and of a territory or territories occupied by his descendants.—1. In the genealogy of Noah's children Cush seems to be an individual, for it is said "Cush begat Nimrod" (Gen. x. 8; 1 Chr. i. 10). If the name be older than his time he may have been called after a country allotted to him.—

C: Cush as a country appears to be African in all passages except Gen. ii. 13. We may thus distinguish a primaeval and a post-diluvian Cush. The former was encompassed by Gihon, the second river of Paradise: it would seem therefore to have been somewhere to the northward of Assyria. It is possible that Cush is in this case a name of a period later than that to which the history relates, but it seems more probable that it was of the earliest age, and that the African Cush was named from this older country. In the ancient Egyptian inscriptions Ethiopia above Egypt is termed Keesh or Kesh, and this territory probably perfectly corresponds to the African Cush of the Bible. The Cushites however had clearly a wider extension, like the Ethiopians of the Greeks, but apparently with a more definite ethnic relation. The Cushites appear to have spread along tracts extending from the higher Nile to the Euphrates and Tigris. History affords many traces of this relation of Babylonia, Arabia, and Ethiopia. Zerah the Cushite (A. V. "Ethiopian") who was defeated by Asa, was most probably a king of Egypt, certainly the leader of an Egyptian army. Very soon after their arrival in Africa, the Cushites appear to have established settlements along the southern Arabian coast, on the Arabian shore of the Persian Gulf and in Babylonia, and thence onwards to the Indus, and probably northward to Nineveh; and the Mizraites spreading along the south and east shores of the Mediterranean, on part of the north shore, and in the great islands.

Cu'shan (Hab. iii. 7), possibly the same as Cushan-rishathaim (A. V. Chushan-) king of Mesopotamia (Judg. iii. 8, 10). The order of events alluded to by the prophet seems to favour this supposition. There is far less reason for the supposition that Cushan here stands for an Asiatic Cush.

Cu'hi. Properly "the Cushite," "the Ethiopian," a man apparently attached to Joab's person, but unknown and unaccustomed to the king, as may be inferred from his not being recognised by the watchman, and also from the abrupt manner in which he breaks his evil tidings to David. That Cushi was a foreigner—as we should infer from his name—is also slightly corroborated by his ignorance of the ground in the Jordan valley, by knowing which Ahimaz was enabled to outrun him (2 Sam. xviii. 21, 22, 23, 31, 32).

Cuth or Cu'thah. One of the countries whence Shalmaneser introduced colonists into Samaria (2 K. xvii. 24, 30). The position of Cuthah is undecided; Josephus speaks of a river of that name in Persia, and fixes the residence of the Cuthaeans in the interior of Persia and Media. Two localities have been proposed, each of which corresponds in part, but neither wholly, with Josephus' account.—1. Kutha, of the Arab geographers, between the Tigris and Euphrates, the site of which has been identified with the ruins of Towibah immediately adjacent to Babylon.—2. The Cuthaeans have been identified with the Cossaei, a warlike tribe, who occupied the mountain ranges dividing Persia and Media.

Cutting off from the People. [EXCOMMUNICATION.]

Cuttings [in the Flesh]. The prohibition (Lev. xix. 28) against marks or cuttings in the flesh for the dead must be taken in connexion with the parallel passages (Lev. xxi. 5; Deut. xiv. 1), in which shaving the head with the same view is equally forbidden. But it appears from Jer. xvi. 6, 7, that some outward manifestation of grief in this way was not wholly forbidden, or was at least tolerated. The ground, therefore, of the prohibition must be sought elsewhere, and will be found in the superstitious or inhuman practices prevailing among heathen nations. The priests of Baal cut themselves with knives to propitiate the god "after their manner" (1 K. xviii. 28). Herodotus says the Carians, who resided in Europe, cut their foreheads with knives at festivals of Isis; in this respect exceeding the Egyptians, who beat themselves on these occasions (Herod. ii. 61). Lucian, speaking of the Syrian priestly attendants of this mock deity, says, that using violent gestures they cut their arms and tongues with swords. The prohibition, therefore, is directed against practices prevailing not among the Egyptians whom the Israelites were leaving, but among the Syrians, to whom they were about to become neighbours. But there is another usage contemplated more remotely by the prohibition, viz., that of printing marks, tattooing, to indicate allegiance to a deity, in the same manner as soldiers and slaves bore tattooed marks to indicate allegiance or inscription. This is evidently alluded to in the Revelation of St. John (xiii. 16, xvii. 5, xix. 20), and, though in a contrary direction, by Ezekiel (ix. 4), by St. Paul (Gal. vi. 17), in the Revelation (vii. 3), and perhaps by Isaiah (xliv. 5) and Zechariah (xiii. 6).

Cy'amon, a place named only in Judith vii. 3, as lying in the plain (A. V. "valley") over against Esdraelom. If by "Esdraelom" we may understand Jezreel, this description answers to the situation of the modern village Tell Ka'môn, on the eastern slopes of Carmel, in a conspicuous position overlooking the Kishon and the great plain.

Cymbal, Cymbals, a percussive musical instrument. Two kinds of cymbals are mentioned in Ps. cl. 5, "loud cymbals" or castagnettes, and "high-sounding cymbals." The former consisted of four small plates of brass or of some other hard metal; two plates were attached to each hand of the performer, and were struck together to produce a loud noise. The latter consisted of two larger plates, one held in each hand, and struck together as an accompaniment to other instruments. The use of cymbals was not necessarily restricted to the worship of the Temple or to sacred occasions: they were employed for military purposes, and also by the Hebrew women as a musical accompaniment to their national dances. Both kinds of cymbals are still common in the East in military music, and Niebuhr often refers to them in his travels. The "bells" of Zech. xiv. 20, were probably concave pieces or plates of brass which the people of Palestine and Syria attached to horses by way of ornament.

Cypress (Heb. tirzâh). The Heb. word is found only in Is. xlv. 14. We are quite unable to assign any definite rendering to it. Besides the cypress, the "beech," the "holm-oak," and the "fir" have been proposed; but there is nothing in the etymology of the Hebrew name, or in the passage where it occurs, to guide us to the tree intended. The true cypress is a native of the Taurus. The Hebrew word points to some tree with a hard grain, and this is all that can be positively said of it.

Cyprians. Inhabitants of the island of Cyprus (2 Macc. iv. 29). At the time alluded to (that is during the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes), they were under the dominion of Egypt, and were governed by a viceroys possessed of ample powers. Crates, one of these viceroys, was left by Nostratus in command of the castle, or acropolis, of Jerusalem while he was summoned before the king.

Cyprus. This island was in early times in close commercial connexion with Phœnicia; and there is little doubt that it is referred to in such passages of the O. T. as Ez. xxvii. 6. [CHITTIM.] Josephus makes this identification in the most express terms (Ant. i. 6, §1). Possibly Jews may have settled in Cyprus before the time of Alexander. Soon after his time they were numerous in the island, as is distinctly implied in 1 Macc. xv. 23. The first notice of it in the N. T. is in Acts iv. 36, where it is mentioned as the native place of Barnabas. In Acts xi. 19, 20, it appears prominently in connexion with the earliest spreading of Christianity, and is again mentioned in connexion with the missionary journeys of St. Paul (Acts xiii. 4-13, xv. 39, xxi. 3), and with his voyage to Rome (xxvii. 4). Situated in the extreme eastern corner of the Mediterranean, with the range of Lebanon on the east, and that of Taurus on the north, distinctly visible, it never became a thoroughly Greek island. Its religious rites were half Oriental, and its political history has almost always been associated with Asia and Africa. It was rich and productive. Its fruits and flowers were famous. The mountains also produced metals, especially copper. The island became a Roman province (B.C. 58) under circumstances discreditable to Rome. At first its administration was joined with that of Cilicia, but after the battle of Actium it was separately governed. In the first division it was made an imperial province; but the emperor afterwards gave it up to the Senate. The pro-consul appears to have resided at Paphos on the west or the island.

Cyrene, the principal city of that part of northern Africa, which was anciently called Cyrenaica, and also (from its five chief cities) Pentapolitana. This district was that wide projecting portion of the coast (corresponding to the modern Tripoli), which was separated from the territory of Carthage on the one hand, and that of Egypt on the other. Its surface is a table-land descending by terraces to the sea; and it was celebrated for its climate and fertility. The points to be noticed in reference to Cyrene as connected with the N. T. are these,—that, though on the African coast, it was a Greek city; that the Jews were settled there in large numbers, and that under the Romans it was politically connected with Crete. The Greek colonisation of this part of Africa under Battus began as early as B.C. 631. After the death of Alexander the Great, it became a dependency of Egypt. It is in this period that we find the Jews established there with great privileges, having been introduced by Ptolemy the son of Lagus. Soon after the Jewish war they rose against the Roman power. In the year B.C. 75 the territory of Cyrene was reduced to the form of a province. On the conquest of Crete (B.C. 67) the two were united in one province, and together frequently called Creta-Cyrene. The numbers and position of the Jews in Cyrene prepare us for the frequent mention of the place in the N. T. in connexion with Christianity. Simon, who bore our Saviour's cross (Matt. xxvii. 32; Mark xv. 21; Luke xxiii. 26) was a native of Cyrene. Jewish dwellers in Cyrenaica were in Jerusalem at Pentecost (Acts ii. 10). They even gave their name to one of the synagogues in Jerusalem (ib. vi. 9). Christian converts from Cyrene were among those who contributed actively to the formation of the first Gentile church at Antioch (xi. 20). Lucius of Cyrene (xiii. 1) is traditionally said to have been the first bishop of his native district.

Cyrenius, the literal English rendering in the A. V. of the Greek name, which is itself the Greek form of the Roman name QUIRINUS. The full name is Publius Sulpicius Quirinus. He was consul A.U.C. 742, B.C. 12, and made governor of Syria after the banishment of Archelaus in A.D. 6. He was sent to make an enrolment of property in Syria, and made accordingly, both there and in Judaea, a census or ἀπογραφή. But this census seems in Luke (ii. 2) to be identified with one which took place at the time of the birth of Christ, when Sentius Saturninus was governor of Syria. Hence has arisen a considerable difficulty, which has been variously solved, either by supposing some corruption in the text of St. Luke, or by giving some unusual sense to his words. But A. W. Zumpt, of Berlin, has shown it to be probable that Quirinus was twice governor of Syria, and by arguments too long to be reproduced here, but very striking and satisfactory, fixes the time of his first governorship at from B.C. 4 to B.C. 1, when he was succeeded by M. Lollius.

Cyrus, the founder of the Persian empire (see Dan. vi. 28, x. 1, 13; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 22, 23), was, according to the common legend, the son of Mandane, the daughter of Astyages the last king of Media, and Cambyses a Persian of the royal family of the Achaemenidae. In consequence of a dream, Astyages, it is said, designed the death of his infant grandson, but the child was spared by those whom he charged with the commission of the crime, and was reared in obscurity under the name of Agradates. When he grew up to manhood his courage and genius placed him at the head of the Persians. The tyranny of Astyages had at that time alienated a large faction of the Medes, and Cyrus headed a revolt which ended in the defeat and capture of the Median king B.C. 559, near Pasargadae. After consolidating the empire which he thus gained, Cyrus entered on that career of conquest which has made him the hero of the east. In B.C. 546 (?) he defeated Croesus, and the kingdom of Lydia was the prize of his success. Babylon fell before his army, and the ancient dominions of Assyria were added to his empire (B.C. 538). It is probable that Cyrus planned an invasion of Egypt; and there are traces of campaigns in Central Asia, in which he appears to have attempted to extend his power to the Indus. Afterwards he attacked the Massagetae, and according to Herodotus fell in a battle against them B.C. 529. His tomb is still shown at Pasargadae, the scene of his first decisive victory. Hitherto the great kings, with whom the Jews had been brought into contact, had been open oppressors or seductive allies; but Cyrus was a generous liberator and a just guardian of their rights. An inspired prophet (Is. xlv. 28) recognised in him "a shepherd" of the Lord, an "anointed" king (Is. xlv. 1). Cyrus stands out clearly as the representative of the east, as Alexander afterwards of the west. The one led to the development of the idea of order, and the other to that of independence. Ecclesiastically the first crisis was signalised by the consolidation of a Church; the second by the distinction of sects. The one found its outward embodiment in "the great Synagogue;" the other in the dynasty of the Asmonaeans. The edict of Cyrus for the rebuilding of the Temple (2 Chr. xxxvi. 22, 23; Ezr. i. 1-4, iii. 7, iv. 3, v. 13, 17, vi. 3) was in fact the beginning of Judaism; and the great changes by which the nation was transformed into a church are clearly marked.

Dab'erath (with the art. in Josh.), a town on the boundary of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 12) named as next to Chisloth-Tabor. But in 1 Chr. vi. 72, and in Josh. xxi. 28, it is said to belong to Issachar. Under the name of Deb'arieh it still lies at the western foot of Tabor.

Da'gon, apparently the masculine (1 Sam. v. 3, 4) correlative of Atargatis, was the national god of the Philistines. The most famous temples of Dagon were at Gaza (Judg. xvi. 21-30) and Ashdod (1 Sam. v. 5, 6; 1 Chr. x. 10). The latter temple was destroyed by Jonathan in the Maccabean wars (1 Macc. x. 83, 84, xi. 4). Traces of the worship of Dagon likewise appear in the names Caphar-Dagon (near Jamnia), and Beth-Dagon in Judah (Josh. xv. 41) and Asher (Josh. xix. 27). Dagon was represented with the face and hands of a man and the tail of a fish (1 Sam. v. 5). The fish-like form was a natural emblem of fruitfulness, and as such was likely to be adopted by seafaring tribes in the representation of their gods.

Dalmanutha. From a comparison of Matt. xv. 39 and Mark viii. 10 we may conclude that Dalmanutha was a town on the west side of the Sea of Galilee near Magdala. The latter stood close upon the shore, at the southern end of the little plain of Gennesaret. [MAGDALA.] About a mile from Magdala is a narrow glen to the south, at the mouth of which are the ruins of a village. The place is called 'Ain-el-Bârideh, "the cold Fountain." Here in all probability is the site of the long lost Dalmanutha.

Dam'aria, an Athenian woman converted to Christianity by St. Paul's preaching (Acts xvii. 34). Chrysostom and others held her to have been the wife of Dionysius the Areopagite.

Damascus is one of the most ancient, and has at all times been one of the most important, of the cities of Syria. It is situated in a plain of vast size and of extreme fertility, which lies east of the great chain of Anti-Libanus, on the edge of the desert. This fertile plain, which is nearly circular, and about 30 miles in diameter, is due to the river Barada, which is probably the "Abana" of Scripture. This stream, rising high up on the western flank of Anti-Libanus, forces its way through the chain, running for some time among the mountains, till suddenly it bursts through a narrow cleft upon the open country east of the hills, and diffuses fertility far and wide. Two other streams, the Wady Helbon upon the north, and the Awaj upon the south, which flows direct from Hermon, increase the fertility of the Damascene plain, and contend for the honour of representing the "Pharpar" of Scripture. According to Josephus, Damascus was founded by Uz, the son of Aram, and grandson of Shem. It is first mentioned in Scripture in connexion with Abraham (Gen. xiv. 15), whose steward was a native of the place (xv. 2). We may gather from the name of this person, as well as from the statement of Josephus, which connects the city with the Aramaeans, that it was a Shemitic settlement. Nothing more is known of Damascus until the time of David, when "the Syrians of Damascus came to succour Hadadezer, king of Zobah," with whom David was at war (2 Sam. viii. 5; 1 Chr. xviii. 5). On this occasion David "slew of the Syrians 22,000 men;" and in consequence of this victory became completely master of the whole territory, which he garrisoned with Israelites (2 Sam. viii. 6). It appears that in the reign of Solomon, a certain Rezon, who had been a subject of Hadadezer, king of Zobah, and had escaped when David conquered Zobah, made himself master of Damascus, and established his own rule there (1 K. xi. 23-25). Afterwards the family of Hadad appears to have recovered the throne, and a Benhadad, grandson of the antagonist of David, is found in league with Baasha, king of Israel, against Asa (1 K. xv. 19; 2 Chr. xvi. 3), and afterwards in league with Asa against Baasha (1 K. xv. 20). He was succeeded by his son, Hadad IV. (the Benhadad II. of Scripture), who was defeated by Ahab (1 K. xx.). Three years afterwards war broke out afresh, through the claim of Ahab to the city of Ramoth-Gilead (1 K. xxii. 1-4). The defeat and death of Ahab at that place (ib. 15-37) seem to have enabled the Syrians of Damascus to resume the offensive. Their bands ravaged the lands of Israel during the reign of Jehoram; and they even undertook at this time a second siege of Samaria, which was frustrated miraculously (2 K. vi. 24, vii. 6, 7). After this, we do not hear of any more attempts against the Israelite capital. The cuneiform inscriptions show that towards the close of his reign Benhadad was exposed to the assaults of a great conqueror, who was bent on extending the dominion of Assyria over Syria and Palestine. It may have been these circumstances which encouraged Hazael, the servant of Benhadad, to murder him, and seize the throne, which Elisha had declared would certainly one day be his (2 K. viii. 15). Shortly after the accession of Hazael (about B.C. 884), he was in his turn attacked by the Assyrians, who defeated him with great loss amid the fastnesses of Anti-Libanus. However, in his wars with Israel and Judah he was more fortunate, and his son Benhadad followed up his successes. At last a deliverer appeared (verse 5), and Joash, the son of Jehoahaz, "beat Hazael thrice, and recovered the cities of Israel" (verse 25). In the next reign still further advantages were gained by the Israelites. Jeroboam II. (ab. B.C. 836) is said to have "recovered Damascus" (2 K. xiv. 28), and though this may not mean that he captured the city, it at least implies that he obtained a certain influence over it. A century later (ab. B.C. 742) the Syrians appear as allies of Israel against Judah (2 K. xv. 37). It seems to have been during a pause in the struggle against Assyria that Rezin king of Damascus, and Pekah king of Israel, resolved conjointly to attack Jerusalem, intending to depose Ahaz and set up as king a creature of their own (Is. vii. 1-6; 2 K. xvi. 5). Jerusalem successfully maintained itself against the combined attack. Ahaz was induced to throw himself into the arms of Tiglath-Pileser, to ask aid from him, and to accept voluntarily the position of an Assyrian feudatory (ib.

xvi. 7, 8). The aid sought was given, with the important result, that Rezin was slain, the kingdom of Damascus brought to an end, and the city itself destroyed, the inhabitants being carried captive into Assyria (2 K. xvi. 9; comp. Is. vii. 8 and Am. i. 5). It was long before Damascus recovered from this serious blow. We do not know at what time Damascus was rebuilt; but Strabo says that it was the most famous place in Syria during the Persian period. At the time of the Gospel history, and of the apostle Paul, it formed a part of the kingdom of Aretas (2 Cor. xi. 32), an Arabian prince, who held his kingdom under the Romans. Damascus has always been a great centre for trade. It would appear from Ez. xxvii. that Damascus took manufactured goods from the Phoenicians, and supplied them in exchange with wool and wine. But the passage trade of Damascus has probably been at all times more important than its direct commerce.—Certain localities in Damascus are shown as the site of those Scriptural events which especially interest us in its history. A "long wide thoroughfare," leading direct from one of the gates to the Castle or palace of the Pasha, is "called by the guides 'Straight'" (Acts ix. 11); but the natives know it among themselves, as "the Street of Bazaars." The house of Judas is shown, but it is not in the street "Straight." That of Ananias is also pointed out. The scene of the conversion is confidently said to be an open green spot, surrounded by trees, and used as the Christian burial-ground; but four distinct spots have been pointed out at different times, so that little confidence can be placed in any of them. The point of the walls at which St. Paul was let down by a basket (Acts ix. 25; 2 Cor. xi. 33) is also shown.

Dan. 1. The fifth son of Jacob, and the first of Bilhah, Rachel's maid (Gen. xxx. 6). The origin of the name is given in the exclamation of Rachel—"God hath judged me (dánanni) . . . and given me a son," therefore she called his name Dan, i.e. "judge." In the blessing of Jacob (Gen. xlix. 16) this play on the name is repeated—"Dan shall judge (yádin) his people." The records of Dan are unusually meagre. Of the patriarch himself, unfortunately, no personal history is preserved. Only one son is attributed to him (Gen. xlii. 23); but when the people were numbered in the wilderness of Sinai, his tribe was, with the exception of Judah, the most numerous of all, containing 62,700 men able to serve. The position of Dan during the march through the desert was on the north side of the tabernacle (Num. ii. 25), the hindmost of the long procession (ii. 31, x. 25). It arrived at the threshold of the Promised Land, and passed the ordeal of the rites of Baal-peor (Num. xxv.) with an increase of 1700 on the earlier census. The remaining notices of the tribe before the passage of the Jordan are unimportant. It furnished a "prince" to the apportionment of the land; and it was appointed to stand on Mount Ebal at the ceremony of blessing and cursing (Deut. xvii. 13). After this nothing is heard of Dan till the specification of the inheritance allotted to him (Josh. xix. 48). He was the last of the tribes to receive his portion, and that portion, according to the record of Joshua, strange as it appears in the face of the numbers just quoted, was the smallest of the twelve. But notwithstanding its smallness it had eminent natural advantages. On the north and east it was completely embraced by its two brother-tribes, Ephraim and Benjamin, while on the south-east and south it joined Judah, and was thus surrounded by the three most powerful states of the whole confederacy. From Japho—afterwards Joppa, and now Yafa—on the north, to Ekron and Gathrimmon on the south, a length of at least 14 miles, that noble tract, one of the most fertile in the whole of Palestine, was allotted to this tribe. But this rich district, the corn-field and the garden of the whole south of Palestine, was too valuable to be given up without a struggle by its original possessors. The Amorites accordingly "forced the children of Dan into the mountain, for they would not suffer them to come down into the valley" (Judg. i. 34)—forced them up from the corn-fields of the plain, with their deep black soil, to the villages whose ruins still crown the hills that skirt the lowland. With the help of Ephraim, Dan prevailed against the Amorites for a time, but in a few years the Philistines took the place of the Amorites and with the same result. These considerations enable us to understand how it happened that long after the partition of the land "all the inheritance of the Danites had not fallen to them among the tribes of Israel" (Judg. xviii. 1). They also explain the warlike and independent character of the tribe betokened in the name of their head-quarters Mahaneh-Dan, "the camp, or host, of Dan," in the fact specially insisted on and reiterated (xviii. 11, 16, 17) of the complete equipment of their 600 warriors "appointed with weapons of war,"—and the lawless freebooting style of their behaviour to Micah. In the "security" and "quiet" (Judg. xviii. 7, 10) of their rich northern possession the Danites enjoyed the leisure and repose which had been denied them in their original seat. But of the fate of the city to which they gave "the name of their father" (Josh. xix. 47), we know scarcely anything. In the time of David Dan still kept its place among the tribes (1 Chr. xii. 35). Asher is omitted, but the "prince of the tribe of Dan" is mentioned in the list of 1 Chr. xxvii. 22. But from this time forward the name as applied to the tribe vanishes; it is kept alive only by the northern city. In the genealogies of 1 Chr. ii.-xii. Dan is omitted entirely. Lastly, Dan is omitted from the list of those who were sealed by the Angel in the vision of St. John (Rev. vii. 5-7).—2. The well-known city, so familiar as the most northern landmark of Palestine, in the common expression "from Dan even to Beersheba." The name of the place was originally LAISH or LESHEM (Josh. xix. 47). Its inhabitants lived "after the manner of the Zidonians," i.e. engaged in commerce, and without defence. Living thus "quiet and secure," they fell an easy prey to the active and practised freebooters of the Danites. They conferred upon their new acquisition the name of their own tribe, "after the name of their father who was born unto Israel" (Judg. xviii. 29; Josh. xix. 47), and Laish became Dan. The locality of the town is specified with some minuteness. It was "far from Zidon," and "in the valley that is by Beth-rehob;" but, as this latter place has not been identified with certainty, the position of Dan must be ascertained by other means. After the establishment of the Danites at Dan it became the acknowledged extremity of the country. Dan was, with other northern cities, laid waste by Benhadad (1 K. xv. 20; 2 Chr. xvi. 4), and this is the last mention of the place. Various considerations would incline to the suspicion that Dan was a holy place of note from a far earlier date than its conquest by the Danites. With regard Gen. xiv. 14 three explanations suggest themselves.—1. That another place of the same name is intended.—2. That it is a prophetic anticipation by the sacred historian of a name which was not to exist till centuries later.—3. That the passage originally contained an older name, as Laish; and that when that was superseded by Dan, the new name was inserted in the MSS. This last is Ewald's, and of the three is the most probable. The Tell el Kadi, a mound from the foot of which gushes out one of the largest fountains in the world, the main source of the Jordan, is very probably the site of the town and citadel of Dan. The spring is called Leiddan, possibly a corruption of Dan, and the stream from the spring Nahr ed Dhan, while the name, Tell el Kadi, "the Judge's mound," agrees in signification with the ancient name.—3. Apparently the name of a city, associated with Javan, as one of the places in Southern Arabia from which the Phoenicians obtained wrought iron, cassia, and calamus (Ez. xxvii. 19). Nothing is certainly known about it.

Dan'ites, The. The descendants of Dan, and members of his tribe (Judg. xiii. 2, xviii. 1, 11 1 Chr. xii. 35).

Dan-ja'an, a place named only in 2 Sam. xxiv. 6 as one of the points visited by Joab in taking the census of the people. It occurs between Gilead and Zidon—and therefore may have been somewhere in the direction of Dan (Laish), at the sources of the Jordan. There seems no reason for doubting that the well known Dan is intended.

Dance. The dance is spoken of in Holy Scripture universally as symbolical of some rejoicing, and is often coupled for the sake of contrast with mourning, as in Eccl. iii. 4 (comp. Ps. xxx. 11; Matt. xi. 17). In the earlier period it is found combined with some song or refrain (Ex. xv. 20, xxii. 18, 19; 1 Sam. xxi. 11); and with the tambourine (A.V. "timbrel"), more especially in those impulsive outbursts of popular feeling which cannot find sufficient vent in voice or in gesture singly. Dancing formed a part of the religious ceremonies of the Egyptians, and was also common in private entertainments. Many representations of dances both of men and women are found in the Egyptian paintings. The "feast unto the Lord," which Moses proposed to Pharaoh to hold, was really a dance. Women, however, among the Hebrews made the dance their especial means of expressing their feelings; and so welcomed their husbands or friends on their return from battle. The "eating and drinking and dancing" of the Amalekites is recorded, as is the people's "rising up to play," with a tacit censure. So among the Bedouins, native dances of men are mentioned, and are probably an ancient custom. The Hebrews, however, save in such moments of temptation, seem to have left dancing to the women. But more especially, on such occasions of triumph, any woman whose nearness of kin to the champion of the moment gave her a public character among her own sex, seems to have felt that it was her part to lead such a demonstration of triumph, or of welcome (Ex. xv. 20; Judg. xi. 34). This marks the peculiarity of David's conduct, when, on the return of the Ark of God from its long sojourn among strangers and borderers, he (2 Sam. vi. 5-22) was himself choregus; and here too the women, with their timbrels; (see especially vv. 5, 19, 20, 22), took an important share. This fact brings out more markedly the feelings of Saul's daughter Michal, keeping aloof from the occasion, and "looking through a window" at the scene. She should, in accordance with the examples of Miriam, &c., have herself led the female choir, and so come out to meet the Ark and her lord. She stays with the "household" (ver. 20), and "comes out to meet" him with reproaches, perhaps feeling that his zeal was a rebuke to her apathy. From the mention of "damsels," "timbrels," and "dances" (Ps. lxxviii. 25, clix. 3, cl. 4), as elements of religious worship, it may perhaps be inferred that David's feeling led him to incorporate in its rites that popular mode of festive celebration. In the earlier period of the Judges the dances of the virgins in Shiloh (Judg. xxi. 19-23) were certainly part of a religious festivity. Dancing also had its place among merely festive amusements apart from any religious character (Jer. xxxi. 4, 13; Lam. v. 15; Mark vi. 22; Luke xv. 25).

Egyptian dances (Wilkinson).

Dance. By this word is rendered in the A.V. the Hebrew term, máchoh, a musical instrument of percussion, supposed to have been used by the Hebrews at an early period of their history. In the grand Hallelujah Psalm (cl.) which closes that magnificent collection, the sacred poet exhorts mankind to praise Jehovah in His sanctuary with all kinds of music; and amongst the instruments mentioned at the 3rd, 4th, and 5th verses is found máchól. It is generally believed to have been made of metal, open like a ring: it had many small bells attached to its border, and was played at weddings and merry-makings by women, who accompanied it with the voice. According to the author of Shilto Haggiborin, the máchól had tinkling metal plates fastened on wires, at intervals within the circle that formed the instrument, like the modern tambourine; according to others, a similar instrument, also formed of a circular piece of metal or wood, but furnished with a handle, which the performer might so manage as to set in motion several rings strung on a metal bar, passing from one side of the instrument to the other, the waving of which produced a loud, merry sound.

Dan'iel, the name of four persons in the Old Testament.—1. The second son of David by Abigail the Carmelitess (1 Chr. iii. 1). In 2 Sam. iii. 3, he is called Chileab.—2. The fourth of "the greater prophets." Nothing is known of his parentage or family. He appears, however, to have been of royal or noble descent (Dan. i. 3), and to have possessed considerable personal endowments (Dan. i. 4). He was taken to Babylon in "the third year of Jehoiakim" (B.C. 604), and trained for the king's service with his three companions. Like Joseph in earlier times, he gained the favour of his guardian, and was divinely supported in his resolve to abstain from the "king's meat" for fear of defilement (Dan. i. 8-16). At the close of his three years' discipline (Dan. i. 5, 18), Daniel had an opportunity of exercising his peculiar gift (Dan. i. 17) of interpreting dreams, on the occasion of Nebuchadnezzar's decree against the Magi (Dan. ii. 14 ff.). In consequence of his success he was made "ruler of the whole province of Babylon," and "chief of the governors over all the wise men of Babylon" (ii. 48). He afterwards interpreted the second dream of Nebuchadnezzar (iv. 8-27), and the handwriting on the wall which disturbed the feast of Belshazzar (v. 10-28), though he no longer held his official position among the magi (Dan. v. 7, 8, 12), and probably lived at Susa (Dan. viii. 2). At the accession of Darius he was made first of the "three presidents" of the empire (Dan. vi. 2), and was delivered from the lions' den, into which he had been cast for his faithfulness to the rites of his faith (vi. 10-23; cf. Bel and Dr. 29-42). At the accession of Cyrus he still retained his prosperity (vi. 28; cf. i. 21; Bel & Dr. 2); though he does not appear to have remained at Babylon (cf. Dan. i. 21), and in "the third year of Cyrus" (B.C. 534) he saw his last recorded vision on the banks of the Tigris (x. 1, 4). In the prophecies of Ezekiel mention is made of Daniel as a pattern of righteousness (xiv. 14, 20) and wisdom (xxviii. 3); and since Daniel was still young at that time (c. B.C. 588-584), some have thought that another prophet of the name must have lived at some earlier time, perhaps during the captivity of Nineveh, whose fame was transferred to his later namesake. On the other hand the narrative in Dan. i. 11, implies that Daniel was conspicuously distinguished for purity and knowledge at a very early age (cf. Hst. Sus. 45), and he may have been nearly forty years old at the time of Ezekiel's prophecy.—3. A descendant of Ithamar, who returned with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 2).—4. A priest who sealed the covenant drawn up by Nehemiah B.C. 445 (Neh. x. 6). He is perhaps the same as (3).

Daniel, The Book of, is the earliest example of apocalyptic literature, and in a great degree the model according to which all later apocalypses were constructed. In this aspect it stands at the head of a series of writings in which the deepest thoughts of the Jewish people found expression after the close of the prophetic era.—1. In studying the book of Daniel it is of the utmost importance to recognise its apocalyptic character. To the old prophets Daniel stands, in some sense, as a commentator (Dan. ix. 2-19): to succeeding generations, as the herald of immediate deliverance. The form, the style, and the point of sight of prophecy, are relinquished upon the verge of a new period in the existence of God's people, and fresh instruction is given to them suited to their new fortunes. The change is not abrupt and absolute, but yet it is distinctly felt. The eye and not the ear is the organ of the Seer: visions and not words are revealed to him. The Babylonian exile supplied the outward training and the inward necessity for this last form of divine teaching; and the prophetic visions of Ezekiel form the connecting link between the characteristic types of revelation and prophecy.—2. The language of the book, no less than its general form, belongs to an era of transition. Like the book of Ezra, Daniel is composed partly in the vernacular Aramaic (Chaldee), and partly in the sacred Hebrew. The introduction (i.—ii. 4 a) is written in Hebrew. On the occasion of the "Syriac" (i. e. Aramaic) answer of the Chaldeans, the language changes to Aramaic, and this is retained till the close of the seventh chapter (ii. 4 b—vii.). The personal introduction of Daniel as the writer of the text (viii. 1) is marked by the resumption of the Hebrew, which continues to the close of the book (viii.—xii.). The character of the Hebrew bears the closest affinity to that of Ezekiel and Habakkuk. The Aramaic, like that of Ezra, is also of an earlier form than exists in any other Chaldaic document. The use of Greek technical terms marks a period when commerce had already united Persia and Greece; and the occurrence of peculiar words which admit of an explanation by reference to Aryan and not to Semitic roots is almost inexplicable on the supposition that the prophecies are a Palestinian forgery of the Maccabean age.—3. The book is generally divided into two nearly equal parts. The first of these (i.—vi.) contains chiefly historical incidents, while the second (vii.—xii.) is entirely apocalyptic. But this division takes no account of the difference of language, nor of the change of person at the beginning of c. viii. It seems better to divide the book into three parts. The first chapter forms an introduction. The next six chapters (ii.—vii.) give a general view of the progressive history of the powers of the world, and of the principles of the divine government as seen in events of the life of Daniel. The remainder of the book (viii.—xii.) traces in minutest detail the fortunes of the people of God, as typical of the fortunes of the Church in all ages.—4. The position which the book of Daniel occupies in the Hebrew Canon seems at first sight remarkable. It is placed among the Holy writings between Esther and Ezra, or immediately before Esther, and not among the prophets. This collocation, however, is a natural consequence of the right apprehension of the different functions of the prophet and seer. Daniel's Apocalypse is as distinct from the prophetic writings as the Apocalypse of St. John from the Apostolic epistles.—5. The unity of the book in its present form, notwithstanding the difference of language, is generally acknowledged. Still there is a remarkable difference in its internal character. In the first seven chapters Daniel is spoken of historically (i. 6-21, ii. 14-49, iv. 8-27, v. 13-29, vi. 2-28, vii. 1, 2): in the last five he appears personally as the writer (vii. 15-28, viii. 1-ix. 22, x. 1-9, xii. 5). The cause of the difference of person is commonly supposed to lie in the nature of the case. It is, however, more probable that the peculiarity arose from the manner in which the book assumed its final shape.—6. Allusion has been made already to the influence which the book exercised upon the Christian Church. Apart from the general type of Apocalyptic composition which the Apostolic writers derived from Daniel (2 Thess. ii.; lev. passim; cf. Matt. xxvi. 64, xxi. 44?), the New Testament incidentally acknowledges each of the characteristic elements of the book, its miracles (Hebr. xi. 33, 34), its predictions (Matt. xxiv. 15), and its doctrine of angels (Luke i. 19, 26). At a still earlier time the same influence may be traced in the Apocrypha. The book of Baruch exhibits so many coincidences with Daniel, that by some the two books have been assigned to the same author (cf. Fritzsche, Handb. zu d. Apok. i. 173); and the first book of Maccabees represents Mattathias quoting the marvellous deliverances recorded in Daniel, together with those of earlier times (1 Macc. ii. 59, 60), and elsewhere exhibits an acquaintance with the Greek version of the book (1 Macc. i. 54 = Dan. ix. 27). The allusion to the guardian angels of nations, which is introduced into the Alexandrine translation of the Pentateuch (Deut. xxxii. 8; LXX.), and recurs in the Wisdom of Sirach (Ecclus. xvii. 17), may have been derived from Dan. x. 21, xii. 1, though this is uncertain, as the doctrine probably formed part of the common belief. According to Josephus (Ant. xi. 8, §4) the prophecies of Daniel gained for the Jews the favour of Alexander [ALEXANDER THE GREAT]; and whatever credit may be given to the details of his narrative, it at least shows the unquestioning belief in the prophetic worth of the book which existed among the Jews in his time.—7. The testimony of the Synagogue and the Church gave a clear expression to the judgment implied by the early and authoritative use of the book, and pronounced it to contain authentic prophecies of Daniel, without contradiction, with one exception, till modern times. Porphyry alone († c. 305 A.D.) assailed the book. Externally it is as well attested as any book of Scripture.—8. The history of the assaults upon the prophetic worth of Daniel in modern times is full of interest. The real grounds on which most modern critics rely in rejecting the book, are the "fabulousness of its narratives," and "the minuteness of its prophetic history."—9. The general objections against the "legendary" miracles and specific predictions of Daniel are strengthened by other objections in detail, which cannot, however, be regarded in themselves as of any considerable weight. Not only, it is said, is the book placed among the Hagiographa, but Daniel is omitted in the list of prophets given in the Wisdom of Sirach; the language is corrupted by an intermixture of Greek words; the details are essentially unhistorical; the doctrinal and moral teaching betrays a late date. In reply to these remarks, it may be urged, that if the book of Daniel was already placed among the Hagiographa at the time when the Wisdom of Sirach was written, the omission of the name of Daniel (Ecclus. xlix.) is most natural. Nor is the mention of Greek musical instruments (iii. 5, 7, 10) surprising at a time when the intercourse of the East and West was already considerable. Yet further the scene and characters of the book are Oriental. In doctrine, again, the book is closely connected with the writings of the Exile, and forms a last step in the development of the ideas of Messiah (vii. 13, &c.), of the resurrection (xii. 2, 3), of the ministry of angels (viii. 16, xii. 1, &c.), of personal devotion (vi. 10, 11, i. 8), which formed the basis of later speculations, but received no essential addition in the interval before the coming of our Lord. Generally it may be said that while the book presents in many respects a startling and exceptional character, yet it is far more difficult to explain its composition in the Maccabean period than to connect the peculiarities which it exhibits with the exigencies of the Return.—10. But while all historical evidence supports the canonicity of the book of Daniel, it does not follow that the recognition of the unity and authority of the book is necessarily connected with the belief that the whole is to be assigned to the authorship of Daniel. According to the Jewish tradition the books of Ezekiel, the twelve minor prophets, Daniel and Esther, were written (i. e. drawn up in their present form) by the men of the great synagogue, and in the case of Daniel the tradition is supported by strong internal evidence.—11. There is no Chaldee translation of Daniel. The Greek version has undergone singular changes. At an early time the LXX. version was supplanted in the Greek Bibles by that of Theodotion, and in the time of Jerome the version of Theodotion was generally "read by the Churches." Meanwhile the original LXX. translation passed entirely out of use, and it was supposed to have been lost till the last century, when it was published at Rome.

Daniel, Apocryphal Additions to. The Greek translations of Daniel, like that of Esther, contain several pieces which are not found in the original text. The most important of these additions are contained in the Apocrypha of the English Bible under the titles of The Song of the three Holy Children, The History of Susannah, and The History of . . . Bel and the Dragon.—1. a. The first of these pieces is incorporated into the narrative of Daniel. After the three confessors were thrown into the furnace (Dan. iii. 23), Azarias is represented praying to God for deliverance (Song of Three Children, 3-22); and in answer the angel of the Lord shields them from the fire which consumes their enemies (23-27), whereupon "the three, as out of one mouth," raise a triumphant song (29-68), of which a chief part (35-66) has been used as a hymn in the Christian Church since the 4th century.—2. The two other pieces appear more distinctly as appendices, and offer no semblance of forming part of the original text. The History of Susanna (or The judgment of Daniel) is generally found at the beginning of the book (Gk. MSS.

Vet. Lat.); though it also occurs after the 12th chapter (Vulg. ed. Compl.). The History of Bel and the Dragon is placed at the end of the book; and in the LXX. version it bears a special heading as "part of the prophecy of Habakkuk."—2. The additions are found in both the Greek texts, the LXX. and Theodotion, in the Old Latin and Vulgate, and in the existing Syriac and Arabic versions. On the other hand there is no evidence that they ever formed part of the Hebrew text, and they were originally wanting in the Syriac.—3. Various conjectures have been made as to the origin of the additions. It has been supposed that they were derived from Aramaic originals, but the character of the additions themselves indicates rather the hand of an Alexandrine writer; and it is not unlikely that the translator of Daniel wrought up traditions which were already current, and appended them to his work.

Dan'nah, a city in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 49), and probably south, or south-west of Hebron. No trace of its name has been discovered.

Daph'ne, a celebrated grove and sanctuary of Apollo, near Antioch in Syria (2 Macc. iv. 33). Its establishment, like that of the city, was due to Seleucus Nicator. The distance between the two places was about 5 miles, and in history they are associated most intimately together. The situation was of extreme natural beauty, with perennial fountains and abundant wood. The succeeding Seleucid monarchs, especially Antiochus Epiphanes, embellished the place still further. When Syria became Roman, Daphne continued to be famous as a place of pilgrimage and vice. The site has been well identified by Pococke and other travellers at Beit-el-Maa, "the House of the Water," on the left bank of the Orontes, to the S.W. of Antioch.

Da'ra, 1 Chr. ii. 6. [DARDA.]

Dar'da, a son of Mahol, one of four men of great fame for their wisdom, but surpassed by Solomon (1 K. iv. 31). In 1 Chr. ii. 6, however, the same four names occur again as "sons of Zerah," of the tribe of Judah, with the slight difference that Darda appears as Dara. The identity of these persons with those in 1 K. iv. has been greatly debated; but there cannot be much reasonable doubt that they are the same.

Daric (A. V. "dram;" Ezr. ii. 69; viii. 27; Neh. vii. 70, 71, 72; 1 Chr. xxix. 7), a gold coin current in Palestine in the period after the return from Babylon. At these times there was no large issue of gold money except by the Persian kings. The Darics which have been discovered are thick pieces of pure gold, of archaic style, bearing on the obverse the figure of a king with bow and javelin, or bow and dagger, and on the reverse an irregular incuse square. Their full weight is about 128 grains troy, or a little less than that of an Attic stater, and is most probably that of an early didrachm of the Phoenician talent. They must have been the common gold pieces of the Persian empire.

Dari'us, the name of several kings of Media and Persia. Three kings bearing this name are mentioned in the O. T.—1. DARIUS the MEDE (Dan. xi. 1, vi. 1), "the son of Ahasuerus of the seed of the Medes," (ix. 1), who succeeded to the Babylonian kingdom on the death of Belshazzar, being then sixty-two years old (Dan. v. 31; ix. 1). Only one year of his reign is mentioned (Dan. ix. 1, xi. 1); but that was of great importance for the Jews. Daniel was advanced by the king to the highest dignity (Dan. vi. 1 ff.), probably in consequence of his former services (cf. Dan. v. 17); and after his miraculous deliverance, Darius issued a decree enjoining throughout his dominions "reverence for the God of Daniel" (Dan. vi. 25 ff.). The extreme obscurity of the Babylonian annals has given occasion to three different hypotheses as to the name under which Darius the Mede is known in history. The first of these which identifies him with Darius Hystaspis rests on no plausible evidence, and may be dismissed at once. The second, which was adopted by Josephus, and has been supported by many recent critics is more deserving of notice. According to this he was Cyaxares II., "the son and successor of Astyages," who is commonly regarded as the last king of Media. A third identification remains, by which Darius is represented as the personal name of "Astyages," the last king of the Medes, and this appears to satisfy all the conditions of the problem.—2. DARIUS the son of HYSTASPEs the founder of the Perso-Arian dynasty. Upon the usurpation of the Magian Smerdis, he conspired with six other Persian chiefs to overthrow the impostor, and on the success of the plot was placed upon the throne B.C. 521. His designs of foreign conquest were interrupted by a revolt of the Babylonians. After the subjugation of Babylon Darius turned his arms against Scythia, Libya, and India. The defeat of Marathon (B.C. 490) only roused him to prepare vigorously for that decisive struggle with the West which was now inevitable. His plans were again thwarted by rebellion. With regard to the Jews, Darius Hystaspis pursued the same policy as Cyrus, and restored to them the privileges which they had lost (Ezr. v. 1, &c.; vi. 1, &c.).—3. DARIUS THE PERSIAN (Neh. xii. 22), may be identified with Darius II. Nothus (Ochus), king of Persia B.C. 424-3—405-4, if the whole passage in question was written by Nehemiah. If, however, the register was continued to a later time, as is not improbable, the occurrence of the name Jaddua (vv. 11, 22), points to Darius III. Codomannus, the antagonist of Alexander, and last king of Persia B.C. 336-330 (1 Macc. i. 1).—4. Areus, king of the Lacedaemonians (1 Macc. xii. 7). [AREUS.]

Darkness is spoken of as encompassing the actual presence of God, as that out of which He speaks, the envelope, as it were, of Divine glory (Ex. xx. 21; 1 K. viii. 12). The plague of darkness in Egypt has been ascribed by various commentators to non-miraculous agency, but no sufficient account of its intense degree, long duration, and limited area, as proceeding from any physical cause, has been given. The darkness "over all the land" (Matt. xxvii. 45) attending the crucifixion has been similarly attributed to an eclipse. Phlegon of Tralles indeed mentions an eclipse of intense darkness, which began at noon, and was combined, he says, in Bithynia, with an earthquake, which in the uncertain state of our chronology more or less nearly synchronises with the event. Wiseler however, and De Wette, consider the year of Phlegon's eclipse an impossible one for the crucifixion, and reject that explanation of the darkness. Origen also denies the possibility of such a cause; for by the fixed Paschal reckoning the moon must have been about full. The argument from the duration (3 hours) is also of great force; for an eclipse seldom lasts in great intensity more than 6 minutes. On the other hand, Seyfarth maintains that the Jewish calendar, owing to their following the sun, had become so far out that the moon might possibly have been at new. He however views this rather as a natural basis than as a full account of the darkness, which in its degree at Jerusalem was still preternatural. Darkness is also, as in the expression "land of darkness," used for the state of the dead (Job x. 21, 22); and frequently figuratively, for ignorance and unbelief, as the privation of spiritual light (John i. 5; iii. 19).

Dar'kon. Children of Darkon were among the "servants of Solomon," who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 56; Neh. vii. 58).

Dates, 2 Chr. xxxi. 5 marg. [PALM TREE.]

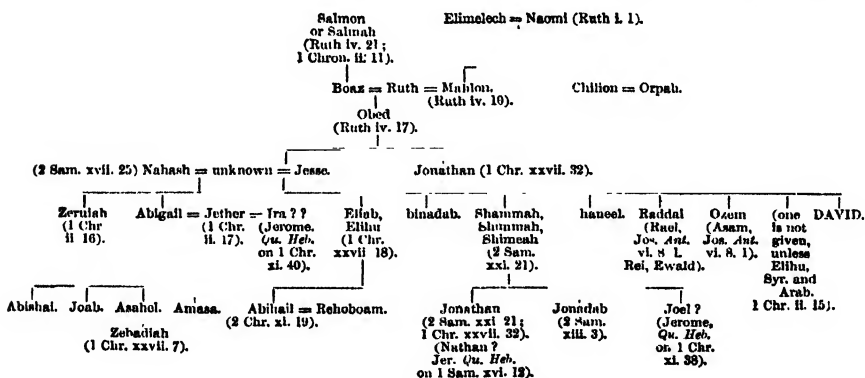

Da'than, a Reubenite chieftain, son of Eliab, who joined the conspiracy of Korah the Levite (Num. xvi. 1, xxvi. 9; Deut. xl. 6; Ps. cvi. 17).

Dath'ema, a fortress in which the Jews of Gilead took refuge from the heathen (1 Macc. v. 9). The rendering of the Peshito Syriac, Rantha, points to Ramoth-Gilead, which can hardly fail to be the correct identification.

Daughter. 1. The word is used in Scripture not only for daughter, but for granddaughter or other female descendant, much in the same way and like extent with "son" (Gen. xiv. 48, xxi. 43).—2. The female inhabitants of a place, a country, or the females of a particular race are called daughters (Gen. vi. 2, xxvii. 46, xxviii. 6, xxxvi. 2; Num. xxv. 1; Deut. xxiii. 17; Is. fil. 16; Jer. xli. 11, xlii. 2, 3, 4; Luke xxiii. 28).—3. The same notion of descent explains the phrase "daughters of music," i. e. singing birds (Eccl. xii. 4), and the use of the word for branches of a tree (Gen. xlix. 22), the pupil of the eye (Lam. ii. 18; Ps. xvii. 8), and the expression "daughter of 90 years," to denote the age of Sarah (Gen. xvii. 17).—4. It is also used of cities in general (Is. x. 32, xxiii. 12; Jer. vi. 2, 26; Zech. ix. 9).—5. But more specifically of dependent towns or hamlets, while to the principal city the correlative "mother" is applied (Num. xxi. 25; Josh. xvii. 11, 16; Judg. i. 27; 1 Chr. vii. 28; 2 Sam. xx. 19).

David, the son of Jesse, is the best known to us of any of the characters in the O. T. In him, as in the case of St. Paul in the N. T., we have the advantage of comparing a detailed narrative of his life with undoubted works of his own composition, and the combined result is a knowledge of his personal character, such as we probably possess of no historical personage before the Christian era, with the exception of Cicero, and perhaps of Caesar. His life may be divided into three portions, more or less corresponding to the three old lost biographies by Samuel, Gad, and Nathan.—I. His youth before his introduction to the court of Saul. II. His relations with Saul. III. His reign.—I. The early life of David contains in many important respects the antecedents of his future career. 1. His family may best be seen in the form of a genealogy. It thus appears that David was the youngest son, probably the youngest child, of a family of ten. His mother's name is unknown. His father, Jesse, was of a great age when David was still young (1 Sam. xvii. 12). His parents both lived till after his final rupture with Saul (1 Sam. xxii. 3). Through them David inherited several points which he never lost. (a) His connexion with Moab through his great-grandmother Ruth. This he kept up when he escaped to Moab and entrusted his aged parents to the care of the king (1 Sam. xxii. 3), and it may not have been without its use in keeping open a wider view in his mind and history than if he had been of purely Jewish descent. (b) His birthplace, BETHLEHEM. His recollection of the well of Bethlehem is one of the most touching incidents of his later life (1 Chr. xi. 17), and it is his connexion with it that brought the place again in connexion into universal fame (Luke ii. 4). (c) His general connexion with the tribe of Judah. (d) His relations to Zeruah and Abigail. Though called in 1 Chr. ii. 16, sisters of David, they are not expressly called the daughters of Jesse; and Abigail, in 2 Sam. xvii. 25, is called the daughter of Nahash. Is it too much to suppose that David's mother had been the wife or concubine of Nahash, and then married by Jesse? 2. As the youngest of the family he may possibly have received from his parents the name, which first appears in him, David, the beloved, the darling. Perhaps for this same reason he was never intimate with his brethren. The familiarity which he lost with his brothers he gained with his nephews. The three sons of his sister Zeruiah, and the one son of his sister Abigail, were probably of the same age as David himself, and they accordingly were to him throughout life in the relation usually occupied by brothers and cousins. The two sons of his brother Shimeah are both connected with his after history. One was Jonadab, the friend and adviser of his eldest son Amnon (2 Sam. xiii. 3). The other was Jonathan (2 Sam. xxi. 21), who afterwards became the counsellor of David himself (1 Chr. xxvii. 32). The first time that David appears in history at once admits us to the whole family circle. There was a practice once a year at Bethlehem, probably at the first new moon of the year, of holding a sacrificial feast, at which Jesse, as the chief proprietor of the place, would preside (1 Sam. xx. 6), with the elders of the town. At this or such like feast (xvi. 1) suddenly appeared the great prophet Samuel, driving a heifer before him, and having in his hand a horn of the consecrated oil of the Tabernacle. The heifer was killed. The party were waiting to begin the feast. Samuel stood with his horn to pour forth the oil, as if for an invitation to begin (comp. ix. 22). He was restrained by divine intimation as son after son passed by. Eliab, the eldest, by "his neigh," and "his countenance," seemed the natural counterpart of Saul, whose rival, unknown to them, the prophet came to select. But the day was gone when kings were chosen because they were head and shoulders taller than the rest. "Samuel said unto Jesse, Are these all thy children? And he said, There remaineth yet the youngest, and behold he keepeth the sheep." This is our first and most characteristic introduction to the future king. The boy was brought in. We are enabled to fix his appearance at once in our minds. He was of short stature, with red or auburn hair, such as is not unfrequently seen in his countrymen of the East at the present day. In later life he wore a beard. His bright eyes are especially mentioned (xvi. 12), and generally he was remarkable for the grace of his figure and countenance ("fair of eyes," "comely," "goodly," xvi. 12, 18, xvii. 42), well made, and of immense strength and agility. His swiftness and activity made him (like his nephew Asahel) like a wild gazelle, his feet like harts' feet, and his arms strong enough to break a bow of steel (Ps. xviii. 33, 34). He was pursuing the occupation allotted in Eastern countries usually to the slaves, the females, or the despised of the family. He usually carried a switch or wand in his hand (1 Sam. xvii. 40), such as would be used for his dogs (xvii. 43), and a scrip or wallet round his neck, to carry anything that was needed for his shepherd's life (xvii. 40). 3. But there was another preparation still more needed for his office, which is his next introduction to the history. When the body-guard of Saul were discussing with their master where the best minstrel could be found to chase away his madness by music, one of the young men in the guard suggested David. Saul, with the absolute control inherent in the idea of an Oriental king, instantly sent for him, and in the successful effort of David's harp we have the first glimpse into that genius for music and poetry which was afterwards consecrated in the Psalms. 4. One incident alone of his solitary shepherd life has come down to us—his conflict with the lion and the bear in defence of his father's flocks (1 Sam. xvii. 34, 35). But it did not stand alone. He was already known to Saul's guards for his martial exploits, probably against the Philistines (xvi. 18), and, when he suddenly appeared in the camp, his elder brother immediately guessed that he had left the sheep in his ardour to see the battle (xvii. 28). There is no perfectly satisfactory means of reconciling the apparently contradictory accounts in 1 Sam. xvi. 14-23, and xvii. 12-31, 55-58. The latter may be accepted as an independent statement of David's first appearance. The scene of the battle is at EPHEZ-DAMMIM, in the frontier-hills of Judah, called probably from this or similar encounters "the bound of blood." Saul's army is encamped on one side of the ravine, the Philistines on the other, the watercourse of Elah or "the Terebith" runs between them. A Philistine of gigantic stature, and clothed in complete armour, insults the comparatively defenceless Israelites, amongst whom the king alone appears to be well armed (xvii. 38; comp. xiii. 20). No one can be found to take up the challenge. At this juncture David appears in the camp. Just as he comes to the circle of wagons which formed, as in Arab settlements, a rude fortification round the Israelite camp (xvii. 20), he hears the well-known shout of the Israelite war-cry (comp. Num. xxiii. 21). The martial spirit of the boy is stirred at the sound; he leaves his provisions with the baggage-master, and darts to join his brothers, like one of the royal messengers, into the midst of the lines. Then he hears the challenge, now made for the fortieth time—sees the dismay of his countrymen—hears the reward proposed by the king—goes with the impetuosity of youth from soldier to soldier talking of the event, in spite of his brother's rebuke—he is introduced to Saul—undertakes the combat. His victory over the gigantic Philistine is rendered more conspicuous by his own diminutive stature, and by the simple weapons with which it was accomplished—not the armour of Saul, which he naturally found too large, but the shepherd's sling, which he always carried with him, and the five polished pebbles which he picked up as he went from the watercourse of the valley, and put in his shepherd's wallet. Two trophies long remained of the battle—one, the huge sword of the Philistine, which was hung up behind the ephod in the Tabernacle at Nob (1 Sam. xxi. 9); the other, the head, which he bore away himself, and which was either laid up at Nob, or subsequently at Jerusalem. Ps. cxliv., though by its contents of a much later date, is by the title in the LXX. "against Goliath." But there is also a psalm, preserved in the LXX. at the end of the Psalter, and which, though probably a mere adaptation from the history, well sums up this early period of his life.—II. Relations with Saul.—We now enter on a new aspect of David's life. The victory over Goliath had been a turning point of his career. Saul inquired his parentage, and took him finally to his court. Jonathan was inspired by the romantic friendship which bound the two youths together to the end of their lives. The triumphant songs of the Israelitish women announced that they felt that in him Israel had now found a deliverer mightier even than Saul. And in those songs, and in the fame which David thus acquired, was laid the foundation of that unhappy jealousy of Saul towards him which, mingling with the king's constitutional malady, poisoned his whole future relations to David. Three new qualities now began to develop themselves in David's character. The first was his prudence. It was that peculiar Jewish caution which has been compared to the sagacity of a hunted animal, such as is remarked in Jacob, and afterwards in the persecuted Israelites of the middle ages. Secondly, we now see his magnanimous forbearance called forth, in the first instance, towards Saul, but displaying itself (with a few painful exceptions) in the rest of his life. He is the first example of the virtue of chivalry. Thirdly, his hairbreadth escapes, continued through so many years, impressed upon him a sense of dependence on the Divine help, clearly derived from this epoch. This course of life subdivides itself into four portions:—1. His life at the court of Saul till his final escape (1 Sam. xviii. 2–xix. 18). His office is not exactly defined. But it would seem that, having been first armour-bearer (xvi. 21, xviii. 2), then made captain over a thousand—the subdivision of a tribe—(xviii. 13), he finally, on his marriage with Michal, the king's second daughter, was raised to the high office of captain of the king's body-guard, second only, if not equal, to Abner, the captain of the host, and Jonathan, the heir apparent. These three formed the usual companions of the king at his meals (xx. 23). David was now chiefly known for his successful exploits against the Philistines, by one of which he won his wife, and drove back the Philistine power with a blow from which it only rallied at the disastrous close of Saul's reign. He also still performed from time to time the office of minstrel. But the successive snares laid by Saul to entrap him, and the open violence into which the king's madness twice broke out, at last convinced him that his life was no longer safe. He had two faithful allies, however, in the court—the son of Saul, his friend Jonathan—the daughter of Saul, his wife Michal. Warned by the one, and assisted by the other, he escaped by night, and was from thenceforward a fugitive. Jonathan he never saw again except by stealth. Michal was given in marriage to another (Phaltiel), and he saw her no more till long after her father's death. 2. His escape (1 Sam. xix. 18–xxi. 15). He first fled to Natioth (or the pastures) of Ramah, to Samuel. This is the first recorded occasion of his meeting with Samuel since the original interview during his boyhood at Bethlehem. Up to this time both the king and himself had thought that a reunion was possible (see xx. 5, 26). But the madness of Saul now became more settled and ferocious in character, and David's danger proportionably greater. The secret interview with Jonathan confirmed the alarm already excited by Saul's endeavour to seize him at Ramah, and he now determined to leave his country, and take refuge, like Coriolanus, or Themistocles in like circumstances, in the court of his enemy. Before this last resolve, he visited NOB, the seat of the tabernacle, partly to obtain a final interview with the high-priest (1 Sam. xxii. 9, 15), partly to obtain food and weapons. On the pretext of a secret mission from Saul, he gained an answer from the oracle, some of the consecrated loaves, and the consecrated sword of Goliath. His stay at the court of ACHISH was short. Discovered possibly by "the sword of Goliath," his presence revived the national enmity of the Philistines against their former conqueror, and he only escaped by feigning madness (1 Sam. xxi. 13). 3. His life as an independent outlaw (xxii. 1–xxvi. 25). (a) His first retreat was the cave of Adullam, probably the large cavern, not far from Bethlehem, now called Khu-reitén. From its vicinity to Bethlehem, he was joined there by his whole family, now feeling themselves insecure from Saul's fury (xxii. 1). This was probably the foundation of his intimate connexion with his nephews, the sons of Zeruiah. Besides these, were outlaws and debtors from every part. (b) His next move was to a stronghold, either the mountain, afterwards called Herodium, close to Adullam, or the fastness called by Josephus Masada, the Grecised form of the Hebrew word Matzed (1 Sam. xxii. 4, 5; 1 Chr. xii. 16), in the neighbourhood of En-gedi. Whilst there he had deposited his aged parents, for the sake of greater security, beyond the Jordan, with their ancestral kinsman of Moab (ib. 3). The neighbouring king, Nahash of Ammon, also treated him kindly (2 Sam. x. 2). Here occurred the chivalrous exploit of the three heroes just mentioned to procure water from the well of Bethlehem, and David's chivalrous answer, like that of Alexander in the desert of Gedrosia (1 Chr. xi. 16–19; 2 Sam. xxiii. 14–17). He was joined here by two separate bands. One a little body of eleven fierce Gadite mountaineers, who swam the Jordan in flood-time to reach him (1 Chr. xii. 8). Another was a detachment of men from Judah and Benjamin under his nephew Amasai, who henceforth attached himself to David's fortunes (1 Chr. xii. 16–18). (c) At the warning of Gad, he fled next to the forest of Hareth, and then again fell in with the Philistines, and again, apparently advised by Gad (xxiii. 4), made a descent on their foraging parties, and relieved Keilah, in which he took up his abode. Whilst there, now for the first time in a fortified town of his own (xxiii. 7), he was joined by a new and most important ally—Abiathar, the last survivor of the house of Ithamar. By this time the 400 who had joined him at Adullam (xxii. 2) had swelled to 600 (xxiii. 13). (d) The situation of David was now changed by the appearance of Saul himself on the scene. Apparently the danger was too great for the little army to keep together. They escaped from Keilah, and dispersed, "whithersoever they could go," amongst the fastnesses of Judah. Henceforth it becomes difficult to follow his movements with exactness. But thus much we discern. He is in the wilderness of Ziph. Once (or twice) the Ziphites betray his movements to Saul. From thence Saul literally hunts him like a partridge, the treacherous Ziphites beating the bushes before him, and 3000 men, stationed to catch even the print of his footsteps on the hills (1 Sam. xxiii. 14, 22 (Heb.), 24 (LXX.), xxiv. 11, xxvi. 2, 20). David finds himself driven to the extreme south of Judah, in the wilderness of Maon. On two, if not three occasions, the pursuer and pursued catch sight of each other (1 Sam. xxiii. 25–29, xxiv. 1–22, xxvi.). Whilst he was in the wilderness of Maon occurred David's adventure with NABAL, instructive as showing his mode of carrying on the freebooter's life, and his marriage with Abigail. His marriage with Ahinoam from Jezreel, also in the same neighbourhood (Josh. xv. 56), seems to have taken place a short time before (1 Sam. xxv. 43, xxvii. 3; 2 Sam. iii. 2). 4. His service under Achish (1 Sam. xxvii. 1; 2 Sam. i. 27). Wearied with his wandering life he at last crosses the Philistine frontier, not, as before, in the capacity of a fugitive, but the chief of a powerful band—his 600 men now grown into an organised force, with their wives and families around them (xxvii. 3, 4). After the manner of Eastern potentates, Achish gave him, for his support, a city—Ziklag on the frontier of Philistia (xxvii. 6). There we meet with the first note of time in David's life. He was settled there for a year and four months (xxvii. 7), and a body of Benjamite archers and slingers, twenty-two of whom are specially named, joined him from the very tribe of his rival (1 Chr. xii. 1-7). He deceived Achish into confidence by attacking the old Nomadic inhabitants of the desert frontier, and representing the plunder to be of portions of the southern tribes or the Nomadic allied tribes of Israel. But this confidence was not shared by the Philistine nobles, and accordingly David was sent back by Achish from the last victorious campaign against Saul. During his absence the Bedouin Amalekites, whom he had plundered during the previous year, had made a descent upon Ziklag, burnt it to the ground, and carried off the wives and children of the new settlement. A wild scene of frantic grief and recrimination ensued between David and his followers. It was calmed by an oracle of assurance from Abiathar. Assisted by the Manassites who had joined him on the march to Gilboa (1 Chr. xii. 19-21), he overtook the invaders in the desert, and recovered the spoil (1 Sam. xxx.). Two days after this victory a Bedouin arrived from the north with the fatal news of the defeat of Gilboa. The reception of the tidings of the death of his rival and of his friend, the solemn mourning, the vent of his indignation against the bearer of the message, the pathetic lamentation that followed, well close the second period of David's life (2 Sam. i. 1-27).—III. David's reign.—(1.) As king of Judah at Hebron, 7½ years (2 Sam. ii. 11); (2 Sam. ii. 1-5). Hebron was selected, doubtless, as the ancient sacred city of the tribe of Judah, the burial place of the patriarchs and the inheritance of Caleb. Here David was first formally anointed king (2 Sam. ii. 4). To Judah his dominion was nominally confined. Gradually his power increased, and during the two years which followed the elevation of Ishbosheth a series of skirmishes took place between the two kingdoms. Then rapidly followed, though without David's consent, the successive murders of ABNER and of ISHBOSHETH (2 Sam. iii. 30, iv. 5). The throne, so long waiting for him, was now vacant, and the united voice of the whole people at once called him to occupy it. A solemn league was made between him and his people (2 Sam. v. 3). For the third time David was anointed king, and a festival of three days celebrated the joyful event (1 Chr. xii. 39). His little band had now swelled into "a great host, like the host of God" (1 Chr. xii. 22). The command of it, which had formerly rested on David alone, he now devolved on his nephew Joab (2 Sam. ii. 28). (II.) Reign over all Israel 33 years (2 Sam. v. 5 to 1 K. ii. 11). (1) The foundation of Jerusalem. One fastness alone in the centre of the land had hitherto defied the arms of Israel. On this, with a singular prescience, David fixed as his future capital. By one sudden assault Jebus was taken. The reward bestowed on the successful scaler of the precipice was the highest place in the army. Joab henceforward became captain of the host (1 Chr. xi. 6). The royal residence was instantly fixed there—fortifications were added by the king and by Joab—and it was known by the special name of the "city of David" (1 Chr. xi. 7;

2 Sam. v. 9). The Philistines made two ineffectual attacks on the new king (2 Sam. v. 17-20), and a retribution on their former victories took place by the capture and conflagration of their own idols (1 Chr. xiv. 12). Tyre, now for the first time appearing in the sacred history, allied herself with Israel; and Hiram sent cedarwood for the buildings of the new capital (2 Sam. v. 11), especially for the palace of David himself (2 Sam. vii. 2). Unhallowed and profane as the city had been before, it was at once elevated to a sanctity which it has never lost, above any of the ancient sanctuaries of the land. The ark was now removed from its obscurity at Kirjath-jearim with marked solemnity. A temporary halt (owing to the death of Uzza) detained it at Obed-edom's house, after which it again moved forward with great state to Jerusalem. It was the greatest day of David's life. One incident only tarnished its splendour—the reproach of Michal, his wife, as he was finally entering his own palace, to carry to his own household the benediction which he had already pronounced on his people. His act of severity towards her was an additional mark of the stress which he himself laid on the solemnity (2 Sam. vi. 20-23; 1 Chr. xv. 29). (2) Foundation of the Court and Empire of Israel, 2 Sam. viii. to xii. The erection of the new capital at Jerusalem introduces us to a new era in David's life and in the history of the monarchy. He became a king on the scale of the great Oriental sovereigns of Egypt and Persia, with a regular administration and organization of court and camp; and he also founded an imperial dominion which for the first time realised the prophetic description of the bounds of the chosen people (Gen. xv. 18-21). The internal organization now established lasted till the final overthrow of the monarchy. The empire was of much shorter duration, continuing only through the reigns of David and his successor Solomon. But, for the period of its existence, it lent a peculiar character to the sacred history. (a) In the internal organization of the kingdom the first new element that has to be considered is the royal family, the dynasty, of which David was the founder, a position which entitled him to the name of "Patriarch" (Acts ii. 29), and (ultimately) of the ancestor of the Messiah. Of these, Absalom and Adonijah both inherited their father's beauty (2 Sam. xiv. 25; 1 K. i. 6); but Solomon alone possessed any of his higher qualities. It was from a union of the children of Solomon and Absalom that the royal line was carried on (1 K. xv. 2). David's strong parental affection for all of them is very remarkable (2 Sam. xiii. 31, 33, 36, xiv. 33, xvii. 5, 33, xix. 4; 1 K. i. 6). (b) The military organization, which was in fact inherited from Saul, but greatly developed by David, was as follows: 1) "The Host," i. e. the whole available military force of Israel, consisting of all males capable of bearing arms, and summoned only for war. There were 12 divisions of 24,000 each, who were held to be in duty month by month; and over each of them presided an officer, selected for this purpose from the other military bodies formed by David (1 Chr. xxvii. 1-15). The army was still distinguished from those of surrounding nations by its primitive aspect of a force of infantry without cavalry. The only innovations as yet allowed were the introduction of a very limited number of chariots (2 Sam. viii. 4) and of mules for the princes and officers instead of the asses (2 Sam. xiii. 29, xvii.

9). (2) The Body-guard. This also had existed in the court of Saul, and David himself had probably been its commanding officer (1 Sam. xxii. 14). But it now assumed a peculiar organization. They were at least in name foreigners, as having been drawn from the Philistines, probably during David's residence at the court of Gath. They are usually called from this circumstance "Cherethites and Pelethites." The captain of the force was, however, not only not a foreigner, but an Israelite of the highest distinction and purest descent, who first appears in this capacity, but who outlived David, and became the chief support of the throne of his son, namely Benaiah, son of the chief-priest Jehoiada, representative of the eldest branch of Aaron's house (2 Sam. viii. 18, xv. 18, x. 23; 1 K. i. 38, 44).

(3) The most peculiar military institution in David's army was that which arose out of the peculiar circumstances of his early life. The nucleus of what afterwards became the only standing army in David's forces was the band of 600 men who had gathered round him in his wanderings. The number of 600 was still preserved. It became yet further subdivided into 3 large bands of 200 each, and small bands of 20 each. The small bands were commanded by 30 officers, one for each band, who together formed "the thirty," and the 3 large bands by 3 officers, who together formed "the three," and the whole by one chief, "the captain of the mighty men" (2 Sam. xxiii. 8-39; 1 Chr. xi. 9-47). This commander of the whole force was Abishai, David's nephew (1 Chr. xi. 20; and comp. 2 Sam. xvi. 9).

(c) Side by side with this military organization were established social and moral institutions. Some were entirely for pastoral, agricultural, and financial purposes (1 Chr. xxvii. 25-31), others for judicial (1 Chr. xxvi. 29-32). Some few are named as constituting what would now be called the court, or council of the king; the councillors, Ahithophel of Gilo, and Jonathan the king's nephew (1 Chr. xxvii. 32, 33); the companion or "friend," Hushai (1 Chr. xxvii. 33; 2 Sam. xv. 37, xvi. 19); the scribe, Sheva, or Seraiah, and at one time Jonathan (2 Sam. xx. 25; 1 Chr. xxvii. 32); Jehoshaphat, the recorder or historian (2 Sam. xx. 24), and Adoram the tax-collector, both of whom survived him (2 Sam. xx. 24; 1 K. xii. 18, iv. 3, 6). But the more peculiar of David's institutions were those directly bearing on religion. Two prophets appear as the king's constant advisers. Of these, Gad, who seems to have been the elder, had been David's companion in exile, and from his being called "the seer," belongs probably to the earliest form of the prophetic schools. Nathan, who appears for the first time after the establishment of the kingdom at Jerusalem (2 Sam. vii. 2), is distinguished both by his title of "prophet," and by the nature of the prophecies which he utters (2 Sam. vii. 5-17, xii. 1-14), as of the purest type of prophetic dispensation, and as the hope of the new generation, which he supports in the person of Solomon (1 K. i.). Two high-priests also appear—representatives of the two rival houses of Aaron (1 Chr. xxiv. 3); here again, as in the case of the two prophets, one, Abiathar, who attended him at Jerusalem, companion of his exile, and connected with the old time of the judges (1 Chr. xxvii. 34), joining him after the death of Saul, and becoming afterwards the support of his son; the other Zadok, who ministered at Gibeon (1 Chr. xvi. 39), and who was made the head of the Aaronic family

(xxvii. 17). Besides these four great religious functionaries there were two classes of subordinates—prophets, specially instructed in singing and music, under Asaph, Heman the grandson of Samuel, and Jeduthun (1 Chr. xiv. 1-31)—Levites, or attendants on the sanctuary, who again were subdivided into the guardians of the gates and guardians of the treasures (1 Chr. xxvi. 1-28) which had been accumulated, since the re-establishment of the nation, by Samuel, Saul, Abner, Joab, and David himself (1 Chr. xxvi. 26-28). (d) From the internal state of David's kingdom we pass to its external relations. These will be found at length under the various countries to which they relate. It will be here only necessary to briefly indicate the enlargement of his dominions. Within ten years from the capture of Jerusalem, he had reduced to a state of permanent subjection the PHILISTINES on the west (2 Sam. viii. 1); the MOABITES on the east (2 Sam. viii. 2), by the exploits of Benaiah (2 Sam. xii. 20); the SYRIANS on the north-east as far as the Euphrates (2 Sam. viii. 3); the EDMOMITES (2 Sam. viii. 14), on the south; and finally the AMMONITES, who had broken their ancient alliance, and made one grand resistance to the advance of his empire (2 Sam. x. 1-19, xii. 26-31). These three last wars were entangled with each other. The last and crowning point was the siege of Rabbah. (3) Three great calamities may be selected as marking the beginning, middle, and close of David's otherwise prosperous reign; which appears to be intimated in the question of Gad (2 Sam. xxiv. 13), "a three years' famine, a three months' flight, or a three days' pestilence." (a) Of these, the first (the three years' famine) introduces us to the last notices of David's relations with the house of Saul. There has often arisen a painful suspicion in later times, as there seems to have been at the time (xvi. 7), that the oracle, which gave as the cause of the famine Saul's massacre of the Gibeonites, may have been connected with the desire to extinguish the last remains of the fallen dynasty. But such an explanation is not needed. The massacre was probably the most recent national crime that had left any deep impression; and the whole tenor of David's conduct towards Saul's family is of an opposite kind. (b) The second group of incidents contains the tragedy of David's life, which grew in all its parts out of the polygamy, with its evil consequences, into which he had plunged on becoming king. Underneath the splendour of his last glorious campaign against the Ammonites, was a dark story, known probably at that time only to a very few; the double crime of adultery with Bathsheba, and of the virtual murder of Uriah. The crimes are undoubtedly those of a common Oriental despot. But the rebuke of Nathan; the sudden revival of the king's conscience; his grief for the sickness of the child; the gathering of his uncles and elder brothers around him; his return of hope and peace; are characteristic of David, and of David only. But the clouds from this time gathered over David's fortunes, and henceforward "the sword never departed from his house" (2 Sam. xii. 10). The outrage on his daughter Tamar; the murder of his eldest son Amnon; and then the revolt of his best-beloved Absalom, brought on the crisis which once more sent him forth a wanderer, as in the days when he fled from Saul; and this, the heaviest trial of his life, was aggravated by the impetuosity of Joab, now perhaps, from his complicity in David's crime, more unmanageable than ever. The rebellion was fostered apparently by the growing jealousy of the tribe of Judah at seeing their king absorbed into the whole nation; and if, as appears from 2 Sam. xi. 3, xxiii. 34, Ahithophel was the grandfather of Bathsheba, its main supporter was one whom David had provoked by his own crimes. For its general course the reader is referred to the names just mentioned. Mahanaim was the capital of David's exile, as it had been of the exiled house of Saul (2 Sam. xvii. 24; comp. ii. 8, 12). His forces were arranged under the three great military officers who remained faithful to his fortunes—Joab, captain of the host; Abishai, captain of "the mighty men;" and Ittai, who seems to have taken the place of Benaiah as captain of the guard (2 Sam. xviii. 2). On Absalom's side was David's nephew Amasa (ib. xvii. 25). The final battle was fought in the "forest of Ephraim," which terminated in the accident leading to the death of Absalom. At this point the narrative resumes its minute detail. The return was marked at every stage by rejoicing and amnesty (2 Sam. xix. 16-40; 1 K. ii. 7). Judah was first reconciled. The embers of the insurrection still smouldering (2 Sam. xix. 41-43) in David's hereditary enemies of the tribe of Benjamin were trampled out by the mixture of boldness and sagacity in Joab, now, after the murder of Amasa, once more in his old position. And David again reigned in undisturbed peace at Jerusalem (2 Sam. xx. 1-22). (c) The closing period of David's life, with the exception of one great calamity, may be considered as a gradual preparation for the reign of his successor. This calamity was the three days' pestilence which visited Jerusalem at the warning of the prophet Gad. The occasion which led to this warning was the census of the people taken by Joab at the king's orders (2 Sam. xxiv. 1-9; 1 Chr. xxi. 1-7, xxvii. 23, 24). Joab's repugnance to the measure was such that he refused altogether to number Levi and Benjamin (1 Chr. xxi. 6). The plague and its cessation were commemorated down to the latest times of the Jewish nation. Outside the walls of Jerusalem, Araunah or Ornan, a wealthy Jebusite—perhaps even the ancient king of Jebus (2 Sam. xxiv. 23)—possessed a threshing-floor; there he and his sons were engaged in threshing the corn gathered in from the harvest (1 Chr. xxi. 20). At this spot an awful vision appeared, such as is described in the later days of Jerusalem, of the Angel of the Lord stretching out a drawn sword between earth and sky over the devoted city. The scene of such an apparition at such a moment was at once marked out for a sanctuary. David demanded, and Araunah willingly granted, the site; the altar was erected on the rock of the threshing-floor; the place was called by the name of "Moriah" (2 Chr. iii. 1); and for the first time a holy place, sanctified by a vision of the Divine presence, was recognised in Jerusalem. It was this spot which afterwards became the altar of the Temple, and therefore the centre of the national worship, with but slight interruption, for more than 1000 years, and it is even contended that the same spot is the rock, still regarded with almost idolatrous veneration, in the centre of the Mussulman "Dome of the Rock." A formidable conspiracy to interrupt the succession broke out in the last days of David's reign, which detached from his person two of his court, who from personal offence or adherence to the ancient family had been alienated from him—

Joab and Abiathar. But Zadok, Nathan, Benaiah, Shimei, and Rei remaining firm, the plot was stifled, and Solomon's inauguration took place under his father's auspices (1 K. i. 1-53). By this time David's infirmities had grown upon him. The warmth of his exhausted frame was attempted to be restored by the introduction of a young Shunammite, of the name of Abishag, mentioned apparently for the sake of an incident which grew up in connexion with her out of the later events (1 K. i. 1, ii. 17). His last song is preserved—a striking union of the ideal of a just ruler which he had placed before him, and of the difficulties which he had felt in realizing it (2 Sam. xxiii. 1-7). His last words, as recorded, to his successor, are general exhortations to his duty, combined with warnings against Joab and Shimei, and charges to remember the children of Barzillai (1 K. ii. 1-9). He died, according to Josephus, at the age of 70, and "was buried in the city of David." After the return from the captivity, "the sepulchres of David" were still pointed out "between Siloah and the house of the mighty men," or "the guardhouse" (Neh. iii. 16). His tomb, which became the general sepulchre of the kings of Judah, was pointed out in the latest times of the Jewish people. The edifice shown as such from the Crusades to the present day is on the southern hill of modern Jerusalem, commonly called Mount Zion, under the so-called "Coenaculum;" but it cannot be identified with the tomb of David, which was emphatically within the walls.

David, City of. [JERUSALEM.]

Day. The variable length of the natural day at different seasons led in the very earliest times to the adoption of the civil day (or one revolution of the sun) as a standard of time. The commencement of the civil day varies in different nations: the Babylonians reckoned it from sunrise to sunrise; the Umbrians from noon to noon; the Romans from midnight to midnight; the Athenians and others from sunset to sunset. The Hebrews naturally adopted the latter reckoning (Lev. xxiii. 32; "from even to even shall ye celebrate your sabbath") from Gen. i. 5, "the evening and the morning were the first day." The Jews are supposed, like the modern Arabs, to have adopted from an early period minute specifications of the parts of the natural day. Roughly indeed they were content to divide it into "morning, evening, and noonday" (Ps. lv. 17); but when they wished for greater accuracy they pointed to six unequal parts, each of which was again subdivided. These are held to have been:—I. Nesheph and Shachar, "the dawn." After their acquaintance with Persia they divided this into, (a) the time when the eastern, and (b) when the western horizon was illuminated. The writers of the Jerus. Talmud divide the dawn into four parts.—II. Boker, "sunrise." Some suppose that the Jews, like other Oriental nations, commenced their civil day at this time until the Exodus.—III. Chom hayyôm, "heat of the day," about 9 o'clock.—IV. Tsharaim, "the two noons" (Gen. xliii. 16; Deut. xxviii. 29).—V. Ruach hayyôm, "the cool (lit. wind) of the day," before sunset (Gen. iii. 8); so called by the Persians to this day.—VI. Ereb, "evening." The phrase "between the two evenings" (Ex. xvi. 12, xxx. 8), being the time marked for slaying the paschal lamb and offering the evening sacrifice (Ex. xii. 6, xix. 39), led to a dispute between the Karaites and Samaritans on the one hand, and the Pharisees on the other. The former took it to mean between sunset and full darkness (Deut. xvi. 6); the Rabbinites explained it as the time between the beginning and end of sunset.—Before the captivity the Jews divided the night into three watches (Ps. cxiii. 6, xc. 4), viz. the first watch, lasting till midnight (Lam. ii. 19, A. V. "the beginning of the watches"); the "middle watch," lasting till cock-crow (Judg. vii. 19); and the morning watch, lasting till sunrise (Ex. xiv. 24). These divisions were probably connected with the Levitical duties in the Temple service. The Jews, however, say (in spite of their own definition, "a watch is the third part of the night") that they always had four night-watches (comp. Neh. ix. 3), but that the fourth was counted as a part of the morning. In the N. T. we have allusions to four watches, a division borrowed from the Greeks and Romans. These were, 1. from twilight till 9 o'clock (Mark xi. 11; John xx. 19); 2. midnight, from 9 till 12 o'clock (Mark xiii. 35); 3. till 3 in the morning (Mark xiii. 35; 3 Macc. v. 23); 4. till daybreak (John xviii. 28). The word held to mean "hour" is first found in Dan. iii. 6, 15, v. 5. Perhaps the Jews, like the Greeks, learnt from the Babylonians the division of the day into 12 parts. In our Lord's time the division was common (John xi. 9).

Daysman, an old English term, meaning umpire or arbitrator (Job ix. 33). It is derived from day, in the specific sense of a day fixed for a trial. The word "daysman" is found in Spenser's Faerie Queene, ii. c. 8, in the Bible published in 1551 (1 Sam. ii. 25), and in other works of the same age.

Deacon. The office described by this title appears in the N. T. as the correlative of ἐπίσκοπος. [BISHOP.] The two are mentioned together in Phil. i. 1; 1 Tim. iii. 2, 8. Like most words of similar import, it appears to have been first used in its generic sense, implying subordinate activity (1 Cor. iii. 5; 2 Cor. vi. 4), and afterwards to have gained a more defined connotation, as applied to a distinct body of men in the Christian society. The narrative of Acts vi. is commonly referred to as giving an account of the institution of this office. The Apostles, in order to meet the complaints of the Hellenistic Jews, that their widows were neglected in the daily ministration (διακονία), call on the body of believers to choose seven men "full of the Holy Ghost and of wisdom," whom they "may appoint over this business." It may be questioned, however, whether the seven were not appointed to higher functions than those of the deacons of the N. T. There are indications, however, of the existence of another body in the Church of Jerusalem whom we may compare with the deacons of Phil. i. 1, and 1 Tim. iii. 8. As the "elders" of Acts xv. 23, xv. 6; 1 Pet. v. 1, were not merely men advanced in years, so the "young men" of Acts v. 6, 10, were probably not merely young men, but persons occupying a distinct position and exercising distinct functions. It is natural to infer that there was a parallelism between the two titles of διακονοί and πρεσβυτεροί. Luke xxii. 26 tends to the same conclusion. Assuming on these data the identity of the two names we have to ask—(1) To what previous organisation, if any, the order is traceable? (2) What were the qualifications and functions of the men so designated? L. As the constitution of the Jewish synagogue had its elders or pastors, so also it had its subordinate officers (Luke iv. 20), whose work it was to give the reader the rolls containing the lessons for the day, to clean the synagogue, to open and close it at the right times. II. The moral qualifications described in 1 Tim. iii., as necessary for the office of a deacon, are substantially the same as those of the bishop. The deacons, however, were not required to be "given to hospitality," nor to be "apt to teach." It was enough for them to "hold the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience." They were not to gain their living by disreputable occupations. On offering themselves for their work they were to be subject to a strict scrutiny (1 Tim. iii. 10), and if this ended satisfactorily were to enter on it. From the analogy of the synagogue, and from the scanty notices of the N. T., we may think of the πρεσβυτεροί in the Church of Jerusalem as preparing the rooms in which the disciples met, taking part in the distribution of alms out of the common fund, at first with no direct supervision, then under that of the Seven, and afterwards under the elders, maintaining order at the daily meetings of the disciples to break bread, baptising new converts, distributing the bread and the wine of the Lord's Supper, which the Apostle or his representative had blessed. It does not appear to have belonged to the office of a deacon to teach publicly in the Church. The possession of any special χάρισμα would lead naturally to a higher work and office, but the idea that the diaconate was but a probation through which a man had to pass before he could be an elder or bishop was foreign to the constitution of the Church of the 1st century.

Deaconess. The word διάκονος is found in Rom. xvi. 1 (A. V. "servant"), associated with a female name, and this has led to the conclusion that there existed in the Apostolic age, as there undoubtedly did a little later, an order of women bearing that title, and exercising in relation to their own sex functions which were analogous to those of the deacons. On this hypothesis it has been inferred that the women mentioned in Rom. xvi. 6, 12, belonged to such an order. The rules given as to the conduct of women in 1 Tim. iii. 11, Tit. ii. 3, have in like manner been referred to them, and they have been identified even with the "widows" of 1 Tim. v. 3-10. In some of these instances, however, it seems hardly doubtful that writers have transferred to the earliest age of the Church the organisation of a later.

Dead Sea. This name nowhere occurs in the Bible, and appears not to have existed until the 2nd century after Christ. In the O. T. the lake is called "the Salt Sea," and "the Sea of the Plain," and under the former of these names it will be found described.

Dearth. [FAMINE.]

De'bir, the name of three places of Palestine. 1. A town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 49), one of a group of eleven cities to the west of Hebron. The earlier name of Debir was Kirjath-sepher, "city of book" (Josh. xv. 15; Judg. i. 11), and Kirjath-sannah, "city of palm" (Josh. xv. 49). It was one of the cities given with their "suburbs" to the priests (Josh. xxi. 15; 1 Chr. vi. 58). Debir does not appear to have been known to Jerome, nor has it been discovered with certainty in modern times. About three miles to the west of Hebron is a deep and secluded valley called the Wady Nunkar, enclosed on the north by hills, of which one bears a name certainly suggestive of Debir—Debir-ban. Schwarz speaks of a Wady Dibir in this direction. Van de Velde finds Debir at Dilbeh, six miles S.W. of Hebron.—2. A place on the north boundary of Judah, near the "Valley of Achor" (Josh. xv. 7), and therefore somewhere in the complications of hill and ravine behind Jericho. A Wady Dabir is marked in Van de Velde's map as close to the S. of Nehy Musa, at the N.W. corner of the Dead Sea.—3. The "border of Debir" is named as forming part of the boundary of Gad (Josh. xiii. 26), and as apparently not far from Mahanaim.

Deb'ora, a woman of Naphtali, mother of Tobiel, the father of Tobit (Tob. i. 8).

Deb'orah. 1. The nurse of Rebekah (Gen. xxv. 8). Deborah accompanied Rebekah from the house of Bethuel (Gen. xxiv. 59), and is only mentioned by name on the occasion of her burial, under the oak-tree of Bethel, which was called in her honour Allon-Bachuth.—2. A prophetess who judged Israel (Judg. iv., v.). She lived under the palm-tree of Deborah, between Ramah and Bethel in Mount Ephraim (Judg. iv. 5), which, as palm-trees were rare in Palestine, "is mentioned as a well-known and solitary landmark, and was probably the same spot as that called (Judg. xx. 33) Baal-Tamar, or the sanctuary of the palm" (Stanley, S. and P. 146). She was probably a woman of Ephraim, although, from the expression in Judg. v. 15, some suppose her to have belonged to Issachar. Lapidoth was probably her husband, and not Barak, as some say. She was not so much a judge as one gifted with prophetic command (Judg. iv. 6, 14, v. 7), and by virtue of her inspiration "a mother in Israel." Jabin's tyranny was peculiarly felt in the northern tribes, who were near his capital and under her jurisdiction, viz. Zebulun, Naphtali, and Issachar: hence, when she summoned Barak to the deliverance, it was on them that the brunt of the battle fell. Under her direction Barak encamped on the broad summit of Tabor. Deborah's prophecy was fulfilled (Judg. iv. 9), and the enemy's general perished among the "oaks of the wanderers (Zaanaim)," in the tent of the Bedouin Kenite's wife (Judg. iv. 21) in the northern mountains. Deborah's title of "prophetess" includes the notion of inspired poetry, as in Ex. xv. 20; and in this sense the glorious triumphal ode (Judg. v.) well vindicates her claim to the office.

Debtor. [LOAN.]

Decapolis. This name occurs only three times in the Scriptures, Matt. iv. 25, Mark v. 20, and vii. 31. Immediately after the conquest of Syria by the Romans (B.C. 65) ten cities appear to have been rebuilt, partially colonised, and endowed with peculiar privileges; the country around them was hence called Decapolis. Pliny enumerates them as follows: Scythopolis, Hippus, Gadara, Pella, Philadelphia, Gerasa, Dion, Canatha, Damascus, and Raphana. Ptolemy (v. 17) makes Capitolas one of the ten; and an old Palmyrene inscription includes Abila. Josephus calls Scythopolis the largest city of Decapolis, thus manifestly excluding Damascus from the number. All the cities of Decapolis, with the single exception of Scythopolis, lay on the east of the Jordan. It would appear, however, from Matt. iv. 25, and Mark vii. 31, that Decapolis was a general appellation for a large district extending along both sides of the Jordan.

Pliny says it reached from Damascus on the north to Philadelphia on the south, and from Scythopolis on the west to Canatha on the east. This region, once so populous and prosperous, from which multitudes flocked to hear the Saviour, and through which multitudes followed His footsteps, is now almost without an inhabitant.

De'dan. 1. The name of a son of Raamah, son of Cush (Gen. x. 7; 1 Chr. i. 9).—2. A son of Jokshan, son of Keturah (Gen. xxv. 3; 1 Chr. i. 32). The usual opinion respecting these founders of tribes is that the first settled among the sons of Cush, wherever these latter may be placed; the second, on the Syrian borders, about the territory of Edom. But Gesenius and Winer have suggested that the name may apply to one tribe; and this may be adopted as probable on the supposition that the descendants of the Keturahite Dedan intermarried with those of the Cushite Dedan, whom the writer places, presumptively, on the borders of the Persian Gulf. The theory of this mixed descent gains weight from the fact that in each case the brother of Dedan is named Sheba. It may be supposed that the Dedanites were among the chief traders traversing the caravan-route from the head of the Persian Gulf to the south of Palestine, bearing merchandise of India, and possibly of Southern Arabia; and hence the mixture of such a tribe with another of different (and Keturahite) descent presents no impossibility. The passages in the Bible in which Dedan is mentioned (besides the genealogies above referred to) are contained in the prophecies of Isaiah (xxi. 13), Jeremiah (xxv. 23, xlix. 8), and Ezekiel (xxv. 13, xxvii. 15, 20, xxxviii. 13), and are in every case obscure. The probable inferences from these mentions of Dedan are—1. That Dedan, son of Raamah, settled on the shores of the Persian Gulf, and his descendants became caravan-merchants between that coast and Palestine. 2. That Jokshan, or a son of Jokshan, by intermarriage with the Cushite Dedan formed a tribe of the same name, which appears to have had its chief settlement in the borders of Idumaea, and perhaps to have led a pastoral life. A native indication of the name is presumed to exist in the island of Dadan, on the borders of the gulf.

De'danim. Is. xxi. 13. [DEDAN.]

Dedication, Feast of, the festival instituted to commemorate the purging of the Temple and the rebuilding of the altar after Judas Maccabaeus had driven out the Syrians, B.C. 164. It is named only once in the Canonical Scriptures, John x. 22. Its institution is recorded 1 Macc. iv. 52-59. It commenced on the 25th of Chisleul, the anniversary of the pollution of the Temple by Antiochus Epiphanes, B.C. 167. Like the great Mosaic feasts, it lasted eight days, but it did not require attendance at Jerusalem. It was an occasion of much festivity. The writer of 2 Macc. tells us that it was celebrated in nearly the same manner as the Feast of Tabernacles, with the carrying of branches of trees, and with much singing (x. 6, 7). Josephus states that the festival was called "Lights." In the Temple at Jerusalem the "Hallel" was sung every day of the feast.

Deer. [FALLOW-DEER.]

Degrees, Songs of, a title given to fifteen Psalms, from cxx. to cxxiv. inclusive. Four of them are attributed to David, one is ascribed to the pen of Solomon, and the other ten give no indication of their author. Eichhorn supposes them all to be the work of one and the same bard, and he also shares the opinion of Herder, who interprets the title, "Hymns for a journey." With respect to the term rendered in the A. V. "degrees," a great diversity of opinion prevails amongst Biblical critics. According to some it refers to the melody to which the Psalm was to be chanted. Others, including Gesenius, derive the word from the poetical composition of the song, and from the circumstance that the concluding words of the preceding sentence are often repeated at the commencement of the next verse (comp. cxxi. 4, 5, and cxxiv. 1-2 and 3-4). Aben Ezra quotes an ancient authority, which maintains that the degrees allude to the fifteen steps which, in the temple of Jerusalem, led from the court of the women to that of the men, and on each of which steps, one of the fifteen songs of degrees was chanted. The most generally accredited opinion, however, is that they were pilgrim songs, sung by the people as they went up to Jerusalem.

De'havites are mentioned but once in Scripture (Ezr. iv. 9). They were among the colonists planted in Samaria after the completion of the Captivity of Israel. From their name, taken in conjunction with the fact that they are coupled with the Susanchites (Susianians, or people of Susa) and the Elamites (Elymæus, natives of the same country), it is fairly concluded that they are the Dni or Dahi, mentioned by Herodotus (i. 125) among the nomadic tribes of Persia.

Dekar. The son of Deker, i. e. BEN-DEKER, was Solomon's commissariat officer in the western part of the hill-country of Judah and Benjamin, Shaaibim and Bethshemesh (1 K. iv. 9).

Delaiah. 1. A priest in the time of David, leader of the twenty-third course of priests (1 Chr. xiv. 18).—2. "Children of Delaiah" were among the people of uncertain pedigree who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 60; Neh. vii. 62).—3. Son of Mehetabel and father of Shemaiah (Neh. vi. 10).—4. Son of Shemaiah, one of the "princes" about the court of Jehoiakim (Jer. xxvi. 12, 25). The name also occurs in the A. V. as DALAIAH.

Del'iah, a woman who dwelt in the valley of Sorek, beloved by Samson (Judg. xvi. 4-18). Her connexion with Samson forms the third and last of those amatory adventures which in his history are so inextricably blended with the craft and prowess of a judge in Israel. She was bribed by the "lords of the Philistines" to win from Samson the secret of his strength, and the means of overcoming it. There seems to be little doubt that she was a Philistine courtesan; and her employment as a political emissary, together with the large sum which was offered for her services (1100 pieces of silver from each lord=5500 shekels; cf. Judg. iii. 8), and the tact which is attributed to her in Judges, but more especially in Josephus, indicates a position not likely to be occupied by any Israelitish woman at that period of national depression.

Deluge. [NOAH.]

Delus, mentioned in 1 Macc. xv. 23, is the smallest of the islands called Cyclades in the Aegæan Sea. It was one of the chief seats of the worship of Apollo, and was celebrated as the birthplace of this god and of his sister Artemis (Diana).

De mas, most probably a contraction from Demetrius, or perhaps from Demarchus, a companion of St. Paul (Philem. 24; Col. iv. 14) during his first imprisonment at Rome. At a later period (2 Tim. iv. 10) we find him mentioned as having deserted the apostle through love of this present world, and gone to Thessalonica.

Demetrius, a maker of silver shrines of Artemis at Ephesus (Acts xix. 24). These were small models of the great temple of the Ephesian Artemis, with her statue, which it was customary to carry on journeys, and place on houses, as charms.

Demetrius I., surnamed Soter, "The Saviour," king of Syria, was the son of Seleucus Philopator, and grandson of Antiochus the Great. While still a boy he was sent by his father as a hostage to Rome (B.C. 175) in exchange for his uncle Antiochus Epiphanes. From his position he was unable to offer any opposition to the usurpation of the Syrian throne by Antiochus IV.; but on the death of that monarch (B.C. 164) he claimed his liberty and the recognition of his claim by the Roman senate in preference to that of his cousin Antiochus V. His petition was refused, he left Italy secretly, and landed with a small force at Tripolis in Phœnicia (2 Macc. xiv. 1; 1 Macc. vii. 1). The Syrians soon declared in his favour (B.C. 162), and Antiochus and his protector Lysias were put to death (1 Macc. vii. 2, 3; 2 Macc. xiv. 2). His campaigns against the Jews were unsuccessful. In B.C. 152, Alexander Balas was brought forward, with the consent of the Roman senate, as a claimant to the throne. The rivals met in a decisive engagement (B.C. 150), and Demetrius, after displaying the greatest personal bravery, was defeated and slain (1 Macc. x. 48-50).

Tetradrachm (Attic talent) of Demetrius I.

Demetrius II., "The Victorious" (Nicator), was the elder son of Demetrius Soter. He was sent by his father, together with his brother Antiochus, with a large treasure, to Cnidus, when Alexander Balas laid claim to the throne of Syria. When he was grown up he made a descent on Syria (B.C. 148), and was received with general favour (1 Macc. x. 67 ff.). His campaigns against Jonathan and the Jews are described in 1 Macc. x. xi. In B.C. 138, Demetrius was taken prisoner by Arsaces VI. (Mithridates), whose dominions he had invaded (1 Macc. xiv. 1-3). Mithridates treated his captive honourably, and gave him his daughter in marriage. When Antiochus Sidetes, who had gained possession of the Syrian throne, invaded Parthia, Phraortes employed Demetrius to effect a diversion. In this Demetrius succeeded, and when Antiochus fell in battle, he again took possession of the Syrian crown (B.C. 128). Not long afterwards a pretender, supported by Ptol. Physcon, appeared in the field against him, and after suffering a defeat he was assassinated, according to some by his wife, while attempting to escape by sea.

Demon. I. Its usage in classical Greek is various. In Homer, where the gods are but supernatural men, it is used interchangeably with "god;" afterwards in Hesiod, when the idea of the gods had become more exalted and less familiar, the "demons" are spoken of as intermediate beings, the messengers of the gods to men.—II. In the LXX. the words δαίμων and δαιδόνιον are not found very frequently, but yet employed to render different Hebrew words; generally in reference to the idols of heathen worship. In Josephus we find the word "demons" used always of evil spirits. By Philo it appears to be used in a more general sense, as equivalent to "angels," and referring to both good and evil.—III. We now come to the use of the term in the N. T. In the Gospels generally, in James ii. 19, and in Rev. xvi. 14, the demons are spoken of as spiritual beings, at enmity with God, and having power to afflict man, not only with disease, but, as is marked by the frequent epithet "unclean," with spiritual pollution also. They "believe" the power of God "and tremble" (James ii. 19); they recognise the Lord as the Son of God (Matt. viii. 29; Luke iv. 41), and acknowledge the power of His name, used in exorcism, in the place of the name of Jehovah, by His appointed messengers (Acts xix. 15); and look forward in terror to the judgment to come (Matt. viii. 29). The description is precisely that of a nature akin to the angelic in knowledge and powers, but with the emphatic addition of the idea of positive and active wickedness. There can be no doubt of its being a doctrine of Scripture, mysterious (though not necessarily impossible) as it may be, that in idolatry the influence of the demons was at work and permitted by God to be effective within certain bounds. Of the nature and origin of the demons, Scripture is all but silent.

Demoniacs. This word is frequently used in the N. T., and applied to persons suffering under the possession of a demon or evil spirit, such possession generally showing itself visibly in bodily disease or mental derangement. With regard to the frequent mention of demoniacs in Scripture three main opinions have been started.—I. That of Strauss and the mythical school, which makes the whole account merely symbolic, without basis of fact. The notion stands or falls with the mythical theory as a whole.—II. The second theory is, that our Lord and the Evangelists, in referring to demoniacal possession, spoke only in accommodation to the general belief of the Jews, without any assertion as to its truth or its falsity. It is concluded that, since the symptoms of the affliction were frequently those of bodily disease (as dumbness, Matt. ix. 32; blindness, Matt. xii. 22; epilepsy, Mark ix. 17-27), or those seen in cases of ordinary insanity (as in Matt. viii. 28; Mark v. 1-5), since also the phrase "to have a devil" is constantly used in connexion with, and as apparently equivalent to, "to be mad" (see John vii. 20, viii. 48, x. 20, and perhaps Matt. xi. 18; Luke vii. 33); and since, lastly, cases of demoniacal possession are not known to occur in our own days, therefore we must suppose that our Lord spoke, and the Evangelists wrote, in accordance with the belief of the time, and with a view to be clearly understood, especially by the sufferers themselves, but that the demoniacs were merely persons suffering under unusual diseases of body and mind. With regard to this theory also, it must be remarked that it does not accord either with the general principles or with the particular language of Scripture. Accommodation is possible when, in things indifferent, language is used which, although scientifically or etymologically inaccurate, yet conveys a true impression, or when, in things not indifferent, a declaration of truth (1 Cor. iii. 1, 2), or a moral law (Matt. xix. 8), is given, true or right as far as it goes, but imperfect, because of the imperfect progress of its recipients. But certainly here the matter was not indifferent. Nor was the language used such as can be paralleled with mere conventional expression. Nor is there, in the whole of the New Testament, the least indication that any "economy" of teaching was employed on account of the "hardness" of the Jews' "hearts." Possession and its cure are recorded plainly and simply; demoniacs are frequently distinguished from those afflicted with bodily sickness (see Mark i. 32, xvi. 17, 18; Luke vi. 17, 18), even, it would seem, from the epileptic (Matt. iv. 24); the same outward signs are sometimes referred to possession, sometimes merely to disease (comp. Matt. iv. 24, with xvii. 15; Matt. xii. 22, with Mark vii. 32, &c.); the demons are represented as speaking in their own persons with superhuman knowledge, and acknowledging our Lord to be, not as the Jews generally called him, son of David, but Son of God (Matt. viii. 29; Mark i. 24, v. 7; Luke iv. 41, &c.). All these things speak of a personal power of evil, and, if in any case they refer to what we might call mere disease, they at any rate tell us of something in it more than a morbid state of bodily organs or self-caused derangement of mind. Nor does our Lord speak of demons as personal spirits of evil to the multitude alone, but in His secret conversations with His disciples, declaring the means and conditions by which power over them could be exercised (Matt. xvii. 21). Twice also He distinctly connects demoniacal possession with the power of the evil one; once in Luke x. 18, to the seventy disciples, where He speaks of his power and theirs over demoniacs as a "fall of Satan," and again in Matt. xii. 25-30, when He was accused of casting out demons through Beelzebub, and, instead of giving any hint that the possessed were not really under any direct and personal power of evil, He uses an argument, as to the division of Satan against himself, which, if possession be unreal, becomes inconclusive and almost insincere. Lastly, the single fact recorded of the entrance of the demon at Gadara (Mark v. 10-14) into the herd of swine, and the effect which that entrance caused, is sufficient to overthrow the notion that our Lord and the Evangelists do not assert or imply any objective reality of possession. In the face of this mass of evidence it seems difficult to conceive how the theory can be reconciled with anything like truth of Scripture.—III. We are led, therefore, to the ordinary and literal interpretation of these passages, that there are evil spirits, subjects of the Evil One, who, in the days of the Lord Himself and His Apostles especially, were permitted by God to exercise a direct influence over the souls and bodies of certain men. This influence is clearly distinguished from the ordinary power of corruption and temptation wielded by Satan through the permission of God. The distinguishing feature of possession is the complete or incomplete loss of the sufferer's reason or power of will; his actions, his words, and almost his thoughts are mastered by the evil spirit (Mark i. 24, v. 7; Acts xix. 15), till his personality seems to be destroyed, or, if not destroyed, so overborne as to produce the consciousness of a twofold will within him, like that sometimes felt in a dream. In the ordinary temptations and assaults of Satan, the will itself yields consciously, and by yielding gradually assumes, without losing its apparent freedom of action, the characteristics of the Satanic nature. It is solicited, urged, and persuaded against the strivings of grace, but not overborne.

Denarius, A. V. "penny." (Matt. xviii. 28, xx. 2, 9, 13, xxii. 19; Mark vi. 37, xii. 15, xiv. 5; Luke vii. 41, x. 35, xx. 24; John vi. 7, xii. 5; Rev. vi. 6), a Roman silver coin, in the time of Our Saviour and the Apostles. It took its name from its being first equal to ten "asses," a number afterwards increased to sixteen. The earliest specimens are of about the commencement of the 2nd century B.C. From this time it was the principal silver coin of the commonwealth. In the time of Augustus eighty-four denarii were struck from the pound of silver, which would make the standard weight about 60 grs. This Nero reduced by striking ninety-six from the pound, which would give a standard weight of about 52 grs., results confirmed by the coins of the periods, which are, however, not exactly true to the standard. In Palestine in the N. T. period, we learn from numismatic evidence that denarii must have mainly formed the silver currency. From the parable of the labourers in the vineyard it would seem that a denarius was then the ordinary pay for a day's labour (Matt. xx. 2, 4, 7, 9, 10, 13).

Deposit, the arrangement by which one man kept at another's request the property of the latter, until demanded back, was one common to all the nations of antiquity. The exigencies of war and other causes of absence must often have rendered such a deposit, especially as regards animals, an owner's only course. The articles specified by the Mosaic law are, (1.) "money or stuff;" and (2.) "an ass, or an ox, or a sheep, or any beast." The first case was viewed as only liable to loss by theft (probably for loss by accidental fire, &c., no compensation could be claimed), and the thief, if found, was to pay double, i. e., probably to compensate the owner's loss, and the unjust suspicion thrown on the depositary. If no theft could be proved, the depositary was to swear before the judges that he had not appropriated the article, and then was quit. In the second, if the beast were to "die or be hurt, or driven away, no man seeing it,"—accidents to which beasts at pasture were easily liable,—the depositary was to purge himself by a similar oath. In case, however, the animal were stolen, the depositary was liable to restitution, which probably was necessary to prevent collusive theft. If it were torn by a wild beast, some proof was easily producible, and, in that case, no restitution was due (Ex. xxii. 7-13). In case of a false oath so taken, the perjured person, besides making restitution, was to "add the fifth part more thereto," to compensate the one injured, and to "bring a ram for a trespass-offering unto the Lord" (Lev. vi. 5, 6).

Deputy. The uniform rendering in the A. V. of the Greek word which signifies "proconsul" (Acts xiii. 7, 8, 12, xix. 38). The English word is curious in itself, and to a certain extent appropriate, having been applied formerly to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

Der'be (Acts xiv. 20, 21, xvi. 1, xx. 4). The exact position of this town has not yet been ascertained, but its general situation is undoubted. It was in the eastern part of the great upland plain of LYCAONIA, which stretches from ICONIUM eastwards along the north side of the chain of Taurus. It must have been somewhere near the place where the pass called the Cilician Gates opened a way from the low plain of Cilicia to the table-land of the interior; and probably it was a stage upon the great road which passed this way. Three sites have been assigned to Derbe. (1.) By Col. Leake it was supposed to be Bu-bir-Kilisesh, at the foot of the Karadagh, a remarkable volcanic mountain which rises from the Lycaonian plain; but this is almost certainly the site of Lystra. (2.) In Kiepert's Map, Derbe is marked farther to the east, at a spot where there are ruins, and which is in the line of a Roman road. (3.) Hamilton and Texier are disposed to place it at Diolé, a little to the S.W. of the last position and nearer to the roots of Taurus.

Desert, a word which is sparingly employed in the A. V. to translate four Hebrew terms, of which three are essentially different in signification. A "desert," in the sense which is ordinarily attached to the word, is a vast, burning, sandy, plain, alike destitute of trees and of water. Here, it is simply necessary to show that the words rendered in the A. V. by "desert," when used in the historical books, denoted definite localities; and that those localities do not answer to the common conception of a "desert."—1. ARABAH. It has been already shown that when used, as it invariably is in the historical and topographical records of the Bible, with the definite article, this word means that very depressed and enclosed region—the deepest and the hottest chasm in the world—the sunken valley north and south of the Dead Sea, but more particularly the former. [ARABAH.] ARABAH in the sense of the Jordan Valley is translated by the word "desert" only in Ez. xlvi. 8. In a more general sense of waste, deserted country—a meaning easily suggested by the idea of excessive heat contained in the root—"Desert," as the rendering of Arabah, occurs in the prophets and poetical books; as Is. xxv. 1, 6, xl. 3, xli. 19, li. 3; Jer. ii. 6, v. 6, xvii. 6, l. 12; but this general sense is never found in the historical books.—2. But if Arabah gives but little support to the ordinary conception of a "desert," still less does the other word which our translators have most frequently rendered by it. MIDBAR is accurately the "pasture ground." Its usual translation is "wilderness," a word in which the idea of vegetation is present. In speaking of the Wilderness of the Wanderings the word "desert" occurs as the rendering of Midbar, in Ex. iii. 1, v. 3, xix. 2; Num. xxxiii. 15, 16; and in more than one of these it is evidently employed for the sake of euphony merely. Midbar is most frequently used for those tracts of waste land which lie beyond the cultivated ground in the immediate neighbourhood of the towns and villages of Palestine, and which are a very familiar feature to the traveller in that country. In the poetical books "desert" is found as the translation of Midbar in Deut. xxxii. 10; Job xxiv. 5; Is. xxi. 1; Jer. xxv. 24.—3. CHARBAH, appears to have the force of dryness, and thence of desolation. It does not occur in any historical passages. It is rendered "desert" in Ps. cii. 6; Is. xlviii. 21; Ezek. xiii. 4. The term commonly employed for it in the A. V. is "waste places" or "desolation."—4. JESHIMON with the definite article, apparently denotes the waste tracts on both sides of the Dead Sea. In all these cases it is treated as a proper name in the A. V. Without the article it occurs in a few passages of poetry; in the following of which it is rendered "desert." Ps. lxxxviii. 40; cvi. 14; Is. xliii. 19, 20.

DESSAU, a village (not "town"), at which Nicanor's army was once encamped during his campaign with Judas (2 Macc. xiv. 16). Ewald conjectures that it may have been Adasa.

DEU'EL, father of Eliasaph, the "captain" of the tribe of Gad at the time of the numbering of the people at Sinai (Num. i. 14, vii. 42, 47, x. 20). The same man is mentioned again in ii. 14, but here the name appears as Reuel, owing to an interchange of the two very similar Hebrew letters.

DEUTERONOMY. A. Contents. The Book consists chiefly of three discourses delivered by Moses shortly before his death. They were spoken to all Israel in the plains of Moab on the eastern side of the Jordan (i. 1), in the eleventh month of the last year of their wanderings, the fortieth year after their exodus from Egypt (i. 3). Subjoined to these discourses are the Song of Moses, the Blessing of Moses, and the story of his death.—I. The first discourse (i. 1—iv. 40). After a brief historical introduction, the speaker recapitulates the chief events of the last 40 years in the wilderness, and especially those events which had the most immediate bearing on the entry of the people into the promised land. To this discourse is appended a brief notice of the severing of the three cities of refuge on the east side of the Jordan (iv. 41-43).—II. The second discourse is introduced like the first by an explanation of the circumstances under which it was delivered (iv. 44-49). It extends from chap. v. 1—xxvi. 19, and contains a recapitulation, with some modifications and additions, of the Law already given on Mount Sinai. It will be observed that no pains are taken here, or indeed generally in the Mosaic legislation, to keep the several portions of the law, considered as moral, ritual, and ceremonial, apart from each other by any clearly marked line. But there is in this discourse a very manifest gradual descent from the higher ground to the lower. The speaker begins by setting forth Jehovah Himself as the great object of love and worship, thence he passes (1.) to the Religious, (2.) to the Political, and (3.) to the Social economy of his people.—III. In the third discourse (xxvii. 1—xxx. 20), the Elders of Israel are associated with Moses. The people are commanded to set up stones upon Mount Ebal, and on them to write "all the words of this law." Then follow the several curses to be pronounced by the Levites on Ebal (xxvii. 14-26), and the blessings on Gerizim (xxviii. 1-14).—IV. The delivery of the Law as written by Moses (for its still further preservation) to the custody of the Levites, and a charge to the people to hear it read once every seven years (xxxi.): the Song of Moses spoken in the ears of the people (xxxii. 30—xxxiii. 44): and the blessing of the twelve tribes (xxxiii.).—V. The Book closes (xxxiv.) with an account of the death of Moses, which is first announced to him in xxxii. 48-52.—B. Relation of Deuteronomy to the preceding books. It has been an opinion very generally entertained by the more modern critics, as well as by the earlier, that the book of Deuteronomy forms a complete whole in itself, and that it was appended to the other books as a later addition. The more conservative critics contend that Deuteronomy forms an integral part of the Pentateuch, which is throughout to be ascribed to Moses. Others have given reasons for believing that it was written by the Jehovist; whilst others again are in favour of a different author. The chief grounds on which the last opinion rests are the many variations and additions to be found in Deuteronomy, both in the historical and legal portions, as well as the observable difference of style and phraseology. It is necessary, therefore, before we come to consider more directly the question of authorship, to take into account these alleged peculiarities; and it may be well to enumerate the principal discrepancies, additions, &c., and to subjoin the replies and explanations which they call forth.—1. Discrepancies. The most important discrepancies alleged to exist between the historical portions of Deuteronomy and the earlier books are the following:—(1.) The appointment of judges (i. 6-18) is at variance with the account in Ex. xviii. To this it has been answered, that although Deut. i. 6 mentions the departure from Sinai, yet Deut. i. 9-17 refers evidently to what took place during the abode there, as is shown by comparing the expression "at that time," ver. 9, with the same expression ver. 18. Again, there is no force in the objection that Jethro's counsel is here passed over in silence. When making allusion to a well-known historical fact, it is unnecessary for the speaker to enter into details. This at most is an omission, not a contradiction. Lastly, the story in Exodus is perfectly distinct from that in Num. xi., and there is no confusion of the two here. Nothing is said of the institution of the seventy in Deut., probably because the office was only temporary, and if it did not cease before the death of Moses, was not intended to be perpetuated in the promised land.—(2.) Chap. i. 22 is at variance with Num. xiii. 2, because here Moses is said to have sent the spies into Canaan at the suggestion of the people, whereas there God is said to have commanded the measure. The explanation is obvious. The people make the request; Moses refers it to God, who then gives to it his sanction.—(3.) Chap. i. 44, "And the Amorites which dwell in that mountain," &c., whereas in the story of the same event, Num. xiv. 43-45, Amalekites are mentioned. The Amorites stand here not for "Ama-

Isaiah," b it for "Canaanites," as being the most powerful of all the Canaanitish tribes.—(4.) Chap. ii. 2-8, confused and at variance with Num. xx. 14-21, and xxi. 4. In the former we read (ver. 4), "Ye are to pass through the coast of your brethren, the children of 'Esau.'" In the latter (ver. 20), "And he said, Thou shalt not go through. And Edom came out against him," &c. But, according to Deut., that part of the Edomite territory only was traversed which lay about Elath and Ezion-geber.—(5.) More perplexing is the difference in the account of the encampments of the Israelites, as given Deut. x. 6, 7, compared with Num. xx. 23, xxxiii. 30 and 37. The explanation given by Kurtz is on the whole the most satisfactory. He says: "In the first month of the fortieth year the whole congregation comes a second time to the wilderness of Zin, which is Kadesh, Num. xxxiii. 36. On the down-route to Ezion-geber they had encamped at the several stations Moseroth (or Mosera), Bene-Jaakan, Hor-hagidgad, and Jotbath. But now again departing from Kadesh, they go to Mount Hor, 'in the edge of the land of Edom' (ver. 37, 38), or to Moserah (Deut. x. 6, 7), this last being in the desert at the foot of the mountain. Bene-Jaakan, Gudgodah, and Jotbath were also visited about this time, i. e. a second time, after the second halt at Kadesh."—(6.) In Deut. the usual name for the mountain on which the law was given is Horeb, only once (xxxii. 2) Sinai; whereas in the other books Sinai is far more common than Horeb. The answer given is, that Horeb was the general name of the whole mountain-range; Sinai, the particular mountain on which the law was delivered.

The additions both to the historical and legal sections are of far more importance, and the principal of them we shall here enumerate.—II. Additions.—(1.) In the history. (a) The command of God to leave Horeb, Deut. i. 6, 7, not mentioned Num. x. 17. The repentance of the Israelites, Deut. i. 45, omitted Num. xiv. 45. The intercession of Moses in behalf of Aaron, Deut. ix. 20, of which nothing is said Ex. xxxii. xxxiii. These are so slight, however, that they might have been passed over very naturally in the earlier books. But of more note are: (b) The command not to fight with the Moabites and Ammonites, Deut. ii. 9, 19, or with the Edomites, but to buy of them food and water, ii. 4-8. The notices which are given respecting the earlier inhabitants of the countries of Moab and Ammon and of Mount Seir, ii. 10-12, 20-23; the sixty fortified cities of Bashan, iii. 4; the king of the country who was "of the remnant of giants," iii. 11; the different names of Hermon, iii. 9; the wilderness of Kedemoth, ii. 26; and the more detailed account of the attack of the Amalekites, xxv. 17, 18, compared with Ex. xvii. 8.—(2.) In the Law. The appointment of the cities of refuge, Deut. xix. 7-9, as compared with Num. xxxv. 14 and Deut. iv. 41; of one particular place for the solemn worship of God, where all offerings, tithes, &c., are to be brought, Deut. xii. 5, &c., whilst the restriction with regard to the slaying of animals only at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation (Lev. xvii. 3, 4) is done away, 15, 20, 21; the regulations respecting tithes to be brought with the sacrifices and burnt-offerings to the appointed place, Deut. xii. 6, 11, 17, xiv. 22, &c., xvi. 12; concerning false prophets and seducers to idolatry and those that hearken unto them, xiii.; concerning the king and the manner of the kingdom, xvii. 14, &c.; the prophets, xviii. 15, &c.; war and military service, xx.; the expiation of secret murder; the law of female captives; of first-born sons by a double marriage; of disobedient sons; of those who suffer death by hanging, xxi.; the laws in xxii. 5-8, 13-21; of divorce, xxiv. 1; and various lesser enactments, xxiii. and xxv.; the form of thanksgiving in offering the first-fruits, xxvi.; the command to write the law upon stones, xxvii., and to read it before all Israel at the Feast of Tabernacles, xxxi. 10-13. Many others are rather extensions or modifications of, than additions to, existing laws.—C. Author. 1. It is generally agreed that by far the greater portion of the book is the work of one author. 2. It cannot be denied that the style of Deuteronomy is very different from that of the other four books of the Pentateuch. 3. Who then was the author? On this point the following principal hypotheses have been maintained:—(1.) The old traditional view that this book, like the other books of the Pentateuch, is the work of Moses himself. Of the later critics, Hengstenberg, Hävernick, Ranke, and others, have maintained this view. In support of this opinion it is said: a. That supposing the whole Pentateuch to have been written by Moses, the change in style is easily accounted for when we remember that the last book is hortatory in its character, that it consists chiefly of orations, and that these were delivered under very peculiar circumstances. b. That the usus loquendi is not only generally in accordance with that of the earlier books, and that as well in their Elohist as in their Jehovistic portions, but that there are certain peculiar forms of expression common only to these five books. c. That the alleged discrepancies in matters of fact between this and the earlier books may all be reconciled. d. That the book bears witness to its own authorship (xxxi. 19), and is expressly cited in the N. T. as the work of Moses (Matt. xix. 7, 8; Mark x. 3; Acts iii. 22, vii. 37). The advocates of this theory of course suppose that the last chapter, containing an account of the death of Moses, was added by a later hand, and perhaps formed originally the beginning of the book of Joshua.—(2.) The opinion of Stähelin (and as it would seem of Bleek) that the author is the same as the writer of the Jehovistic portions of the other books.—(3.) The opinion of De Wette, Gesenius, and others, that the Deuteronomist is a distinct writer from the Jehovist.—(4.) From the fact that certain phrases occurring in Deut. are found also in the prophecy of Jeremiah, it has been too hastily concluded by some critics that both books were the work of the prophet.—(5.) Ewald is of opinion that it was written by a Jew living in Egypt during the latter half of the reign of Manasseh. The song of Moses (xxxii.) is, according to him, not by the Deuteronomist, but is nevertheless later than the time of Solomon.—D. Date of Composition. Was the Book really written, as its language certainly implies, before the entry of Israel into the Promised Land? To suppose it was written long after the settlement of the Israelites in Canaan, in the reign of Solomon, or in that of Manasseh, is not only to make the Book an historical romance, but to attribute very considerable inventive skill to the author. De Wette argues, indeed, that the character of the Laws is such as of itself to presuppose a long residence in the land of Canaan. He instances the allusion to the temple (xii. and xvi. 1-7), the provision for the right discharge of the kingly and prophetic offices, the rules for civil and military organisation and the state of the Levites, who are represented as living without cities (though such are granted to them in Num. xxxv.) and without tithes (allotted to them in Num. xviii. 20, &c.). Other reasons for a later date, such as the mention of the worship of the sun and moon (iv. 19, xvii. 3); the punishment of stoning (xvii. 5, xxii. 21, &c.); the name Feast of Tabernacles; and the motive for keeping the Sabbath, are of little force. A further discussion of the question of authorship, as well as of the date of the legislation in Deuteronomy, must be reserved for another article. [PENTATEUCH.]

Devil. The name describes Satan as slandering God to man, and man to God. The former work is, of course, a part of his great work of temptation to evil; and is not only exemplified but illustrated as to its general nature and tendency by the narrative of Gen. iii. The effect is to stir up the spirit of freedom in man to seek a fancied independence; and it is but a slight step further to impute falsehood or cruelty to God. The other work, the slandering or accusing man before God is, as it must necessarily be, unintelligible to us. The question touches on two mysteries, the relation of the Infinite to the Finite spirit, and the permission of the existence of evil under the government of Him who is "the Good." The essence of this accusation is the imputation of selfish motives (Job i. 9, 10), and its refutation is placed in the self-sacrifice of those "who loved not their own lives unto death." [SATAN; DEMON.]

Dew. This in the summer is so copious in Palestine that it supplies to some extent the absence of rain (Ecclus. xviii. 16, xliii. 22), and becomes important to the agriculturist. As a proof of this copiousness the well-known sign of Gideon (Judg. vi. 37, 39, 40) may be adduced. Thus it is coupled in the divine blessing with rain, or mentioned as a prime source of fertility (Gen. xxvii. 28; Deut. xxxiii. 13; Zech. viii. 12), and its withdrawal attributed to a curse (2 Sam. i. 21; 1 K. xvii. 1; Hag. 1. 10). It becomes a leading object in prophetic imagery by reason of its penetrating moisture without the apparent effort of rain (Deut. xxxii. 2; Job xxix. 19; Ps. cxxiii. 3; Prov. xix. 12; Is. xxvi. 19; Hos. xiv. 5; Mic. v. 7); while its speedy evanescence typifies the transient goodness of the hypocrite (Hos. vi. 4, xiii. 3).

Diadem. What the "diadem" of the Jews was we know not. That of other nations of antiquity was a fillet of silk, two inches broad, bound round the head and tied behind, the invention of which is attributed to Liber. Its colour was generally white; sometimes, however, it was of blue, like that of Darius; and it was sown with pearls or other gems (Zech. ix. 16), and enriched with gold (Rev.

ix. 7). It was peculiarly the mark of Oriental sovereigns (1 Macc. xiii. 32). A crown was used by the kings of Israel, even in battle (2 Sam. i. 10); but in all probability this was not the state crown (2 Sam. xii. 30), although used in the coronation of Joash (2 K. xi. 12). In Esth. i. 11, ii. 17, we have cether for the turban worn by the Persian king, queen, or other eminent persons to whom it was conceded as a special favour (viii. 15). The diadem of the king differed from that of others in having an erect triangular peak. The words in Ez. xxiii. 15 mean long and flowing turbans of gorgeous colours.

Dial. The word ma'âlôth is the same as that rendered "steps" in A. V. (Ex. xx. 26; 1 K. x. 19), and "degrees" in A. V. (2 K. xx. 9, 10, 11; Is. xxxviii. 8), where, to give a consistent rendering, we should read with the margin the "degrees" rather than the "dial" of Ahaz. In the absence of any materials for determining the shape and structure of the solar instrument, which certainly appears intended, the best course is to follow the most strictly natural meaning of the words, and to consider with Cyril of Alexandria and Jerome, that the ma'âlôth were really stairs, and that the shadow (perhaps of some column or obelisk on the top) fell on a greater or smaller number of them according as the sun was low or high. The terrace of a palace might easily be thus ornamented.

Diamond (Heb. yuhâlôn), a precious stone, the third in the second row on the breast-plate of the High-priest (Ex. xxviii. 18, xxxix. 11), and mentioned by Ezekiel (xxviii. 13) among the precious stones of the king of Tyre. Our translation, "diamond," is derived from Eben Esra, and is defended by Braun. Kalisch says "perhaps Emerald." Respecting shâmîr, which is translated "diamond" in Jer. xvii. 1, see under ADAMANT.

Dian'a. This Latin word, properly denoting a Roman divinity, is the representative of the Greek Artemis, the tutelary goddess of the Ephesians, who plays so important a part in the narrative of Acts xix. The Ephesian Diana was, however, regarded as invested with very different attributes, and made the object of a different worship, from the ordinary Diana of the Greeks, and is rather perhaps to be identified with Astarte and other female divinities of the East. In some respects there was doubtless a fusion of the two. Diana was the goddess of rivers, of pools, and of harbours; and these conditions are satisfied by the situation of the sanctuary at Ephesus. Again, on coins of Ephesus we sometimes find her exhibited as a huntress and with a stag. But the true Ephesian Diana is represented in a form entirely alien from Greek art. The coin below will give some notion of the image, which was grotesque and archaic in character. The head wore a mural crown, each hand held a bar of metal, and the lower part ended in a rude block covered with figures of animals and mystic inscriptions. This idol was regarded as an object of peculiar sanctity, and was believed to have fallen down from heaven (Acts xix. 35). The cry of the mob (Acts xix. 28), "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!" and the strong expression in ver. 27, "whom all Asia and the world worshippeth," may be abundantly illustrated from a variety of sources. The term "great" was evidently a title of honour recognised as belonging to the Ephesian goddess. We find it in inscriptions, and in Xenophon's Ephesiaca, i. 11.

Dibla'im, mother of Hosen's wife Gomer (Hos. i. 3).

Dib'lath (accurately DIBLAH), a place named only in Ez. vi. 14, as if situated at one of the extremities of the land of Israel. It is natural to infer that Diblah was in the north. The only name in the north at all like it is RIBLAH, and the letters D and R are so much alike in Hebrew, and so frequently interchanged, owing to the carelessness of copyists, that there is a strong probability that Riblah is the right reading.

Dib'on, a town on the east side of Jordan, in the rich pastoral country, which was taken possession of and rebuilt by the children of Gad (Num. xxxii. 3, 34). From this circumstance it possibly received the name of DIBON-GAD. Its first mention is in the ancient fragment of poetry Num. xvi. 30, and from this it appears to have belonged originally to the Moabites. We find Dibon counted to Reuben in the lists of Joshua (xiii. 9, 17). In the time of Isaiah and Jeremiah, however, it was again in possession of Moab (Is. xv. 2; Jer. xlviii. 18, 22, comp. 24). In the same denunciations of Isamah it appears, probably, under the name of DIMON. In modern times the name Dhiban has been discovered by Seetzen, Irby and Mangles, and Burckhardt as attached to extensive ruins on the Roman road, about three miles north of the Arnon (Wady Madjeb). All agree, however, in describing these ruins as lying low.—2. One of the towns which was re-inhabited by the men of Judah after the return from captivity (Neh. xi. 25). From its mention with Jezabzeel, Moladah, and other towns of the south, there can be no doubt that it is identical with DIMONAH.

Dib'on-Gad, one of the halting-places of the Israelites (Num. xxxiii. 45, 46). It was no doubt the same place which is generally called DIBON.

Dib'ri, a Danite, father of Shelomith (Lev. xxiv. 11).

Didrachmon. [MONEY; SHEKEL.]

Didymus, that is, the Twin, a surname of the apostle Thomas (John xi. 16, xx. 24, xxi. 2). [THOMAS.]

Dik'lah (Gen. x. 27; 1 Chr. i. 21), a son of Joktan, whose settlements, in common with those of the other sons of Joktan, must be looked for in Arabia. The name in Hebrew signifies "a palm-tree," hence it is thought that Diklah is a part of Arabia containing many palm-trees. Bochart, and after him Gesenius, refer the descendants of Diklah to the Minaei, a people of Arabia Felix inhabiting a palmiferous country. No trace of Diklah is known to exist in Arabic works, except the mention of a place called Dakalah in El-Yemaneh, with many palm-trees. Nakhleh also signifies a palm-tree, and is the name of many places, especially Nakhleh el-Yemneeyeh; and Nakhleh esh-Shameeyeh, two well-known towns situate near each other. Therefore, 1. Diklah may probably be recovered in the place called Dakalah above mentioned; or, possibly, 2. in one of the places named Nakhleh.

Dil'eai, one of the cities in the lowlands of Judah (Josh. xv. 38). It has not been identified with certainty. Van de Velde suggests that it may be the modern place Tina, about three miles north of Tell-es-Safich in the maritime plain of Philistia, south of Ekron.

Dim'nah, a city in the tribe of Zebulun, given to the Meruite Levites (Josh. xxi. 35). RIMMON (1 Chr. vi. 77) may possibly be a variation of Dimnah.

Di'mon, THE WATERS OF, some streams on the east of the Dead Sea, in the land of Moab, against which Isaiah is here uttering denunciations (Is. xv. 9). Gesenius conjectures that the two names Dimon and Dibon are the same.

Dimonah, a city in the south of Judah (Josh. xv. 22), perhaps the same as DIBON in Neh. xi. 25.

Di'nah, the daughter of Jacob by Leah (Gen. xxx. 21). She accompanied her father from Mesopotamia to Canaan, and, having ventured among the inhabitants, was violated by Shechem the son of Hamor, the chieftain of the territory in which her father had settled (Gen. xxxiv.). Her age at this time, judging by the subsequent notice of Joseph's age (Gen. xxxvii. 2), may have been from 13 to 15, the ordinary period of marriage in Eastern countries. Shechem proposed to make the usual reparation by paying a sum to the father and marrying her (Gen. xxxiv. 12). But in this case the suitor was an alien, and the crown of the offence consisted in its having been committed by an alien against the favoured people of God; he had "wrought folly in Israel" (xxxiv. 7). The proposals of Hamor, who acted as his deputy, were framed on the recognition of the hitherto complete separation of the two peoples; he proposed the fusion of the two by the establishment of the rights of intermarriage and commerce. The sons of Jacob, bent upon revenge, availed themselves of the eagerness, which Shechem showed, to effect their purpose; they demanded, as a condition of the proposed union, the circumcision of the Shechemites. They therefore assented; and on the third day, when the pain and fever resulting from the operation were at the highest, Simeon and Levi, own brothers to Dinah, as Josephus observes, attacked them unexpectedly, slew all the males and plundered their city.

Di'naïtes (Ezr. iv. 9), the name of some of the Cuthaeu colonists who were placed in the cities of Samaria after the captivity of the ten tribes. Nothing more is known of them. Junius, without any authority, identifies them with the people known to geographers by the name Dennani.

Din'habah (Gen. xxxvi. 32; 1 Chr. i. 43), the capital city, and probably the birthplace, of Bela, son of Beor, king of Edom. It has not been identified.

Dionysia, "the feast of Bacchus," which was celebrated, especially in later times, with wild extravagance, and licentious enthusiasm. Women, as well as men, joined in the processions, acting the part of Maenads, crowned with ivy and bearing the thyrsus. Shortly before the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, 168 B.C., in which the Jews

206 DIONYSIUS THE AREOPAGITE

"were compelled to go in procession to Bacchus carrying ivy" (2 Macc. vi. 7), the secret celebration of the Bacchanalia in Italy had been revealed to the Roman senate (B.C. 186). A decree was passed forbidding its observance in Rome or Italy. This fact offers the best commentary on the conduct of Antiochus.

Dionysius the Areopagite (Acts xvii. 34), an eminent Athenian, converted to Christianity by the preaching of St. Paul. Eusebius makes him, on the authority of Dionysius, bishop of Corinth, to have been first bishop of Athens. The writings which were once attributed to him are now confessed to be the production of some neo-Platonists of the 6th century.

Dionysus (2 Macc. xiv. 33; 3 Macc. ii. 29), also called BACCHUS, was properly the god of wine. The eastern wanderings of Dionysus are well known, but they do not seem to have left any special trace in Palestine. His worship, however, was greatly modified by the incorporation of Eastern elements, and assumed the twofold form of wild orgies and mystic rites. To the Jew, Dionysus would necessarily appear as the embodiment of paganism in its most material shape, sanctioning the most tumultuous passions and the worst excesses.

Dioscorinthus. [MONTHS.]

Diotrephes, a Christian mentioned in 3 John 9, but of whom nothing is known.

Disciple. [EDUCATION; SCHOOLS.]

Discus, a circular plate of stone or metal, made for throwing to a distance as an exercise of strength and dexterity (2 Macc. iv. 14).

Dioscorus. (Osterley, Denk. der alt. Kunst, vol. I. no. 136.)

Diseases. [MEDICINE.]

Dish. [BASIN; CHARGER]. In ancient Egypt, and also in Judaea, guests at the table handled their food with the fingers. The same is the case in modern Egypt. Each person breaks off a small piece of bread, dips it in the dish, and then conveys it to his mouth, together with a small portion of the meat or other contents of the dish. To pick out a delicate morsel and hand it to a friend is esteemed a compliment, and to refuse such an offering is contrary to good manners. Judas dipping his hand in the same dish with our Lord was showing especial friendliness and intimacy.

Dis'hān, the youngest son of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 21, 28, 30; 1 Chr. i. 38, 42).

Dis'hon. 1. The fifth son of Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 21, 26, 30; 1 Chr. i. 38).—2. The son of Anah and grandson of Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 25; 1 Chr. i. 38). Dishon and Dishan belong to the same root. The geographical position of the tribes descended from these patriarchs is uncertain. Knobel places them to E. and S.E. of the Gulf of Akaba.

Dispersion, The Jews of the, or simply THE DISPERSION, was the general title applied to those Jews who remained settled in foreign countries after the return from the Babylonian exile, and during the period of the second Temple. The Dispersion, as a distinct element influencing the entire character of the Jews, dates from the Babylonian exile. Outwardly and inwardly, by its effects both on the Gentiles and on the people of Israel, the Dispersion appears to have been the clearest providential preparation for the spread of Christianity. At the beginning of the Christian era the Dispersion was divided into three great sections, the Babylonian, the Syrian, the Egyptian. Precedence was yielded to the first. From Babylon the Jews spread throughout Persia, Media, and Parthia; but the settlements in China belong to a modern date. The Greek conquests in Asia extended the limits of the Dispersion. Seleucus Nicator transplanted large bodies of Jewish colonists from Babylonia to the capitals of his western provinces. His policy was followed by his successor Antiochus the Great; and the persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes only served to push forward the Jewish emigration to the remoter districts of his empire. Large settlements of Jews were established in Cyprus, in the islands of the Aegean, and on the western coast of Asia Minor. The Jews of the Syrian provinces gradually formed a closer connexion with their new homes, and together with the Greek language adopted in many respects Greek idiom. This Hellenizing tendency, however, found its most free development at Alexandria. The Jewish settlements established there by Alexander and Ptolemy I. became the source of the African dispersion, which spread over the north coast of Africa, and perhaps inland to Abyssinia. At Cyrene and Berenice (Tripoli) the Jewish inhabitants formed a considerable portion of the population. The African Dispersion, like all other Jews, preserved their veneration for the "holy city," and recognised the universal claims of the Temple by the annual tribute. But the distinction in language led to wider differences, which were averted in Babylon by the currency of an Aramaic dialect. After the destruction of the Temple the Zealots found a reception in Cyrene; and towards the close of the reign of Trajan, A.D. 115, the Jewish population in Africa rose with terrible ferocity. The Jewish settlements in Rome were consequent upon the occupation of Jerusalem by Pompey, B.C. 63. The captives and emigrants whom he brought with him were located in the trans-Tiberine quarter. In the reign of Claudius the Jews became objects of suspicion from their immense numbers; and the internal disputes led to their banishment from the city (Acts xviii. 2). This expulsion, if general, can only have been temporary, for in a few years the Jews at Rome were numerous (Acts xxviii. 17 ff.). The influence of the Dispersion on the rapid promulgation of Christianity can scarcely be overrated. The course of the apostolic preaching followed in a regular progress the line of Jewish settlements. The mixed assembly from which the first converts were gathered on the day of Pentecost represented each division of the Dispersion (Acts ii. 9-11; (1) Parthians . . . Mesopotamia; (2) Judaea (i. e. Syria) . . . Pamphylia; (3) Egypt . . . Greece; (4) Romans . . .), and these converts naturally prepared the way for the apostles in the interval which preceded the beginning of the separate apostolic missions.

Divination (Ez. xiii. 7; Wisd. xvii. 7; Is. xlvii. 9). This art "of taking an aim of divine matters by human, which cannot but breed mixture of imaginations" (Bacon, Ess. xvii.) has been universal in all ages, and all nations alike civilized and savage. The first kind of divination was called Natural, in which the medium of inspiration was transported from his own individuality, and became the passive instrument of supernatural utterances. The other kind of divination was artificial, and probably originated in an honest conviction that external nature sympathised with and frequently indicated the condition and prospects of mankind; a conviction not in itself ridiculous, and fostered by the accidental synchronism of natural phenomena with human catastrophes. When once this feeling was established the supposed manifestations were infinitely multiplied. The invention of divination is ascribed to Prometheus, to the Phrygians and Etrurians, especially sages, or to the devil. In the same way Zoroaster ascribes all magic to Ahriman. Similar opinions have prevailed in modern times. Many forms of divination are mentioned in Scripture, and the subject is so frequently alluded to that it deserves careful examination. Diviners are first mentioned as a prominent body in the Egyptian court, Gen. xli. 8.—1. Charumimim. They were a class of Egyptian priests, eminent for learning.—2. Chacamin (Ex. vii. 11). Possibly these, as well as their predecessors, were merely a learned class, invested by vulgar superstition with hidden power.

- Daniel was made head of the college by Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. v. 11).—3. Mecasshephim (Ex. vii. 11, cassaphim). The word seems to denote mere jugglers, of the class to which belonged Janues and Jambres (2 Tim. iii. 8). How they produced the wonders which hardened the heart of Pharaoh is idle to conjecture. Michaelis explains them to be "astrologers," such as in ancient times were supposed to be able to control the sun and moon by spells. Women were supposed to be peculiarly addicted to these magical arts (Ex. xxii. 18).—4. Yidd'ônim (Lev. xix. 31, xx. 6), wizards. Those that could by whatever means reveal the future.—5. Obôth (Lev. xx. 6; Is. viii. 19, xix. 3). The word properly means "spirits of the dead," and then by an easy metonymy those who consulted them. They are also called Pythones. Hence the "spirit of Python," Acts xvi. 16. These ventriloquists "peeped and muttered" from the earth to imitate the voice of the revealing familiar (Is. xxix. 4, &c.; 1 Sam. xxviii. 8; Lev. xx. 27). Ob properly means a bottle (Job xxii. 19), and was applied to the magician, because he was supposed to be inflated by the spirit. Of this class was the witch of Endor.—6. Kôsêm kêsâmim (Deut. xviii. 10). This word may be taken to mean astrologers, magi, &c.—7. M'ônên (Mic. v. 12; 2 K. xxi. 6; A. V. "an observer of times"). It is derived by some from 'ânân, to cover, and may mean generally "using hidden arts" (Is. ii. 6; Jer. xxvii. 9). If it be derived from 'ânân, an eye, it will mean "one who fascinates with the eyes," as in the Syr. Vers. 'A belief in the evil eye was universal, and is often alluded to in Scripture (Deut. xxiii. 6; Matt. xx. 15; Tob. iv. 7, 1 Sam. xviii. 9, "Saul eyed David"). Others again make the 'ônênim (Is. ii. 6, &c.), "soothsayers," who predicted "times" as in A. V., from the observation of the clouds. In Judg. ix. 37, the expression "terebinth of M'ônênim" refers not so much to the general sacredness of great trees as to the fact that (probably) here Jacob had buried his amulets (Gen. xxv. 4).—8. Menachashim (Ps. lviii. 5; 2 K. xvii. 17, xxi. 6, &c. A. V. enchanter) who were supposed to render serpents innocuous and obedient (Ex. vii. 9; Jer. vii. 17; Eccl. x. 11), chiefly by the power of music; but also no doubt by the possession of some genuine and often hereditary secret. They had a similar power over scorpions. The root has, however, a general meaning of "learning by experience," like "to angur," in English, Gen. xxx. 27.—9. Chôbêr calebârim. Those who acquired power by uttering spells, &c.—10. Belomants. Alluded to in Ez. xxi. 21, where Nebuchadnezzar, at the parting of two ways, uses divination by arrows to decide whether he shall proceed against Jerusalem or Babylon. Jerome explains it of mingling in a quiver arrows on which were inscribed the names of various cities, that city being attacked the name of which was drawn out. Estius says he threw up a bundle of arrows to see which way they would light, and falling on the right hand he marched towards Jerusalem.—11. Closely connected with this was divination by rods (Hos. iv. 12).—12. Cup divination (Gen. xli. 5). Parkhurst and others, denying that divination is intended, make it a mere cup of office "for which he would search carefully." But in all probability the A. V. is right. The divination was by means of radiations from the water or from magically inscribed gems, &c. thrown into it.—13. Consultation of Teraphim (Zech. x. 2; Ez. xxi. 21; 1 Sam. xv. 23). These were wooden images (1 Sam. xix. 13) consulted as "idols," from which the excited worshippers fancied that they received oracular responses [TERAPHIM].—14. Divination by the liver (Ez. xxi. 21). The liver was the most important part of the sacrifice. Thus the deaths of both Alexander and Hephaestion were foretold.—15. Divination by dreams (Deut. xiii. 2, 3; Judg. vii. 13; Jer. xliii. 32). Many warnings occur in Scripture against the impostures attendant on the interpretation of dreams (Zech. x. 2, &c.). We find however no direct trace of seeking for dreams.—16. The consultation of oracles may be considered as another form of divination (Is. xli. 21-24, xli. 7). The term oracle is applied to the Holy of Holies (1 K. vi. 16; Ps. xxviii. 2). That there were several oracles of heathen gods known to the Jews we may infer both from the mention of that of Baal-zebub at Ekron (2 K. i. 2-6), and from the towns named Debir. Moses forbade every species of divination because a prying into the future clouds the mind with superstition, and because it would have been an incentive to idolatry; indeed the frequent denunciations of the sin in the prophets tend to prove that these forbidden arts presented peculiar temptations to apostate Israel. But God supplied his people with substitutes for divination, which would have ren-clared it superfluous, and left them in no doubt as to his will in circumstances of danger, had they continued faithful. It was only when they were unfaithful that the revelation was withdrawn (1 Sam. xxviii. 6; 2 Sam. ii. 1; v. 23, &c.). Superstition not unfrequently goes hand in hand with scepticism, and hence, amid the general infidelity prevalent through the Roman empire at our Lord's coming, imposture was rampant; as a glance at the pages of Tacitus will suffice to prove. Hence the lucrative trades of such men as Simon Magus (Acts viii. 9), Bar-jesus (Acts xiii. 6, 8), the slave with the spirit of Python (Acts xvi. 16), the vagabond Jews, exorcists (Luke xi. 19; Acts xix. 13), and others (2 Tim. iii. 13; Rev. xix. 20, &c.), as well as the notorious dealers in magical books at Ephesus (Acts xix. 19).

Divorce. The law regulating this subject is found Deut. xxiv. 1-4, and the cases in which the right of a husband to divorce his wife was lost, are stated ib. xxii. 19, 29. The ground of divorce is a point on which the Jewish doctors of the period of the N. T. widely differed; the school of Shammai seeming to limit it to a moral delinquency in the woman, whilst that of Hillel extended it to trifling causes, e. g., if the wife burnt the food she was cooking for her husband. The Pharisees wished perhaps to embolden our Saviour with these rival schools by their question (Matt. xix. 3); by His answer to which, as well as by His previous maxim (v. 31), he declares that but for their hardened state of heart, such questions would have no place. Yet from the distinction made, "but I say unto you," v. 31, 32, it seems to follow, that He regarded all the lesser causes than "fornication" as standing on too weak ground, and declined the question of how to interpret the words of Moses. It would be unreasonable, therefore, to suppose that by "some uncleanness," to which he limited the remedy of divorce, Moses meant "fornication," i. e. adultery, for that would have been to stultify the law "that such should be stoned" (John vii. 5; Lev. xx. 10). The practical difficulty, however, which attends on the doubt which is now found in interpreting Moses' words will be lessened if we consider, that the mere giving "a bill (or rather "book," of divorcement" (comp. Is. i. 1; Jer. iii. 8), would in ancient times require the intervention of a Levite, not only to secure the formal correctness of the instrument, but because the art of writing was then generally unknown. This would bring the matter under the cognizance of legal authority, and tend to check the rash exercise of the right by the husband. But the absence of any case in point in the period which lay nearest to the lawgiver himself, or in any, save a much more recent one, makes the whole question one of great uncertainty.

Dizahab, a place in the Arabian Desert, mentioned Deut. i. 1, as limiting the position of the spot in which Moses is there represented as addressing the Israelites. It is by Robinson identified with Dahab, a cape on the W. shore of the Gulf of Akabah.

Do'ous, a "little hold" near Jericho (1 Macc. xvi. 15, comp. verse 14) built by Ptolemy the son of Abubus. The name still remains attached to the copious and excellent springs of Ain-Duk, which burst forth in the Wady Nau'd'meh, at the foot of the mountain of Quarantania (Kuruntul), about 4 miles N.W. of Jericho. Above the springs are traces of ancient foundations, which may be those of Ptolemy's castle, but more probably of that of the Templars, one of whose stations this was.

Do'dai, an Ahoite who commanded the course of the 2nd month (1 Chr. xxvii. 4). It is probable that he is the same as DODO, 2.

Do'danim, Gen. x. 4; 1 Chr. i. 7 (in some copies and in marg. of A. V. 1 Chr. i. 7, 'RODANIM'), a family or race descended from Javan, the son of Japhet (Gen. x. 4; 1 Chr. i. 7). The weight of authority is in favour of the former name. Dodanim is regarded as identical with Dardani. The Dardani were found in historical times in Illyricum and Troy; the former district was regarded as their original seat. They were probably a semi-Pelagic race, and are grouped with the Chittim in the genealogical table, as more closely related to them, than to the other branches of the Pelagic race. Kalisch identifies Dodanim with the Daunians, who occupied the coast of Apulia.

Do'dayah, a man of Maresha in Judah, father of Eliezer who denounced Jehoshaphat's alliance with Ahaziah (2 Chr. xx. 37).

Do'do. 1. A man of Bethlehem, father of Elhanan, who was one of David's thirty captains (2 Sam. xxiii. 24; 1 Chr. xi. 26). He is a different person from—2. DODO THE AHOITE, father of Eleazar, the 2nd of the three mighty men who were over the thirty (2 Sam. xxiii. 9; 1 Chr. xi. 12). He, or his son—in which case we must suppose the words "Eleazar son of" to have escaped from the text—probably had the command of the second monthly course (1 Chr. xxvii. 4). In the latter passage the name is DODAI.—3. A man of Issachar, forefather of Tola the Judge (Judg. x. 1).

Do'eg, an Idumaean, chief of Saul's herdmen. He was at Nob when Ahimelech gave David the sword of Goliath, and not only gave information to Saul, but when others declined the office, himself executed the king's order to destroy the priests of Nob, with their families, to the number of 85 persons, together with all their property (1 Sam. xxi. 7, xxii. 9, 18, 22; Ps. lii.).

Dog, an animal frequently mentioned in Scripture. It was used by the Hebrews as a watch for their houses (Is. lvi. 10), and for guarding their flocks (Job xxx. 1). Then also as now, troops of hungry and semi-wild dogs used to wander about the fields and streets of the cities, devouring dead bodies and other offal (1 K. xiv. 11, xvi. 4, xxi. 19, 23, xxii. 38, 2 K. ix. 10, 36; Jer. xv. 3, Ps. lix. 6, 14), and thus became such objects of dislike that fierce and cruel enemies are poetically styled dogs in Ps. xxii. 16, 20. Moreover the dog being an unclean animal (Is. lxvi. 3), the terms dog, dead dog, dog's head were used as terms of reproach, or of humility in speaking of one's self (1 Sam. xxiv. 14; 2 Sam. iii. 8, ix. 8, xvi. 9; 2 K. viii. 13). Stanley mentions that he saw on the very site of Jezreel the descendants of the dogs that devoured Jezebel, prowling on the mounds without the walls for offal and carrion thrown out to them to consume.

Doors. [GATES.]

Doph'kai, a place mentioned Num. xxxiii. 12, as a station in the Desert where the Israelites encamped; see WILDERNESS.

Dor (Josh. xvii. 11, 1 K. iv. 11; 1 Macc. xv. 11), an ancient royal city of the Canaanites (Josh. xii. 23), whose ruler was an ally of Jabin king of Hazor against Joshua (Josh. xi. 1, 2). It was probably the most southern settlement of the Phoenicians on the coast of Syria. Josephus describes it as a maritime city, on the west border of Manasseh and the north border of Dan near Mount Carmel. It appears to have been within the territory of the tribe of Asher, though allotted to Manasseh (Josh. xvii. 11; Judg. i. 27). The original inhabitants were never expelled; but during the prosperous reigns of David and Solomon they were made tributary (Judg. i. 27, 28), and the latter monarch stationed at Dor one of his twelve purveyors (1 K. iv. 11). Tryphon, the murderer of Jonathan Maccabaeus and usurper of the throne of Syria, having sought an asylum in Dor, the city was besieged and captured by Antiochus Sidetes (1 Macc. xv. 11). Of the site of Dor there can be no doubt. The descriptions of Josephus and Jerome are clear and full. The latter places it on the coast, "in the ninth mile from Caesarea, on the way to Ptolemais." Just at the point indicated is the small village of Tantûra, probably an Arab corruption of Dora, consisting of about thirty houses, wholly constructed of ancient materials.

Dôra. 1 Macc. xv. 11, 13, 25. [DOR.]

Dor'cas. [TABITHA.]

Dorymenes, father of Ptolemy, surnamed Macron (1 Macc. iii. 38; 2 Macc. iv. 45). It is probable that he is the same Dorymenes who fought against Antiochus the Great.

Dositheus. 1. "A priest and Levite," who carried the translation of Esther to Egypt (Esth. xi. 1, 2).—2. One of the captains of Judas Maccabaeus in the battle against Timotheus (2 Macc. xii. 19, 24).—3. A horse-soldier of Bacenor's company, a man of prodigious strength, who, in attempting to capture Gorgias, was cut down by a Thracian (2 Macc. xii. 35).—4. The son of Drimylus, a Jew, who had renounced the law of his fathers, and was in the camp of Ptolemy Philopator at Raphia (3 Macc. i. 3). He was perhaps a chamberlain.

Dôthaim. [DOTHAN.]

Dôthan, a place first mentioned (Gen. xxxvii. 17) in connexion with the history of Joseph, and apparently as in the neighbourhood of Shechem. It next appears as the residence of Elisha (2 K. vi. 13). Later still we encounter it as a landmark in the account of Holofernes' campaign against Bethulia (Jud. iv. 6, vii. 3, 18, viii. 5). DOTHAIM is due to the Greek text, from which this book is translated. Dothain was known to Eusebius, who places it 12 miles to the N. of Sebaste (Samaria); and here it has been at length discovered in our own times, still bearing its ancient name unimpaired, and situated at the south end of a plain of the richest pasture, 4 or 5 miles S.W. of Jenin, and separated only by a swell or two of hills from the plain of Esdraelon.

Dove (Heb. Yônah). The first mention of this bird occurs in Gen. viii. The dove's rapidity of flight is alluded to in Ps. lv. 6; the beauty of its plumage in Ps. lxxviii. 13; its dwelling in the rocks and valleys in Jer. xlviii. 28, and Ez. vii. 16; its mournful voice in Is. xxxviii. 14, lix. 11; Nah. ii. 7; its harmlessness in Matt. x. 16; its simplicity in Hos. vii. 11, and its amateness in Cant. i. 15, ii. 14. Doves are kept in a domesticated state in many parts of the East. The pigeon-cote is an universal feature in the houses of Upper Egypt. In Persia pigeon-houses are erected at a distance from the dwellings, for the purpose of collecting the dung as manure. There is probably an allusion to such a custom in Is. lx. 8.

Dove's Dung. Various explanations have been given of the passage in 2 K. v. 25, which describes the famine of Samaria to have been so excessive, that "an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of dove's dung for five pieces of silver." The old versions and very many ancient commentators are in favour of a literal interpretation of the Heb. word. Bochart has laboured to show that it denotes a species of cicer, "chick-pea," which he says the Arabs call usdn, and sometimes improperly "dove's or sparrow's dung." Linnaeus suggested that the chirynim may signify the Ornithogalum umbellatum, "Star of Bethlehem." With regard to Bochart's opinion, Celsius, who advocates the literal interpretation, has shown that it is founded on an error. It can scarcely be believed that even in the worst horrors of a siege a substance so vile as is implied by the literal rendering should have been used for food, and in the absence of further evidence we must refrain from deciding.

Dowry. [MARRIAGE.]

Drachm (2 Macc. iv. 19, x. 20, xii. 43; Luke xv. 8, 9), a Greek silver coin, varying in weight on account of the use of different talents. The Jews must have been acquainted with three talents, the Ptolemaic, the Phœnician, and the Attic. The drachmae of these talents weigh respectively, during the period of the Maccabees, about 55 grs. troy, 58·5, and 66. In Luke (A. V. "piece of silver") denarii seem to be intended. [MONEY; SILVER, PIECE OF.]

Dragon. The translators of the A. V., apparently following the Vulgate, have rendered by the same word "dragon" the two Hebrew words Tan and Tannin, which appear to be quite distinct in meaning.—I. The former is used, always in the plural, in Job xxx. 29; Is. xxxiv. 13, xliii. 20; in Is. xlii. 22; in Jer. x. 22, xlix. 33; in Ps. xlv. 19; and in Jer. ix. 11, xiv. 6, li. 37; Mic. i. 8. It is always applied to some creatures inhabiting the desert, and we should conclude from this that it refers rather to some wild beast than to a serpent. The Syriac renders it by a word which, according to Pococke, means a "jackal."—II. The word tannin seems to refer to any great monster, whether of the land or the sea, being indeed more usually applied to some kind of serpent or reptile, but not exclusively restricted to that sense. When we examine special passages we find the word used in Gen. i. 21, of the great sea-monsters, the representatives of the inhabitants of the deep. On the other hand, in Ex. vii. 9, 10, 12, Deut. xxxii. 33, Ps. xci. 13, it refers to land-serpents of a powerful and deadly kind. In the N. T. it is only found in the Apocalypse (Rev. xii. 3, 4, 7, 9, 16, 17, &c.), as applied metaphorically to "the old serpent, called the Devil, and Satan," the description of the "dragon" being dictated by the symbolical meaning of the image rather than by any reference to any actually existing creature. The reason of this scriptural symbol is to be sought not only in the union of gigantic power with craft and malignity, of which the serpent is the natural emblem, but in the record of the serpent's agency in the temptation. (Gen. iii.)

Dram. [DARIC.]

Dreams.—I. The main difference between our sleeping and waking thoughts appears to lie in this—that, in the former case, the perceptive faculties of the mind are active, while the reflective powers are generally asleep. Yet there is a class of dreams in which the reason is not wholly asleep. In these cases it seems to look on as it were from without, and so to have a double consciousness. In either case the ideas suggested are accepted by the mind in dreams at once and inevitably, instead of being weighed and tested, as in our waking hours. But it is evident that the method of such suggestion is still undetermined, and in fact is no more capable of being accounted for by any single cause than the suggestion of waking thoughts. The material of these latter is supplied either by ourselves, through the senses, the memory, and the imagination, or by other men, generally through the medium of words, or lastly by the direct action of the Spirit of God, or of created spirits of orders superior to our own, or the spirit within us. So also it is in dreams. On the first two points experience gives undoubted testimony; as to the third, it can, from the nature of the case, speak but vaguely and uncertainly. The Scripture declares, not as any strange thing, but as a thing of course, that the influence of the Spirit of God upon the soul extends to its sleeping as well as its waking thoughts.—II. It is of course, with this last class of dreams that we have to do in Scripture. The dreams of memory or imagination are indeed referred to in Eccl. v. 3; Is. xxix. 8; but it is the history of the Revelation of the Spirit of God to the spirit of man, whether sleeping or waking, which is the proper subject of Scripture itself. It must be observed that, in accordance with the principle enunciated by S. Paul in 1 Cor. xiv. 15, dreams, in which the understanding is asleep, are recognised indeed as a method of divine revelation, but placed below the visions of prophecy, in which the understanding plays its part. It is true that the book of Job, standing as it does on the basis of "natural religion," dwells on dreams and "visions in deep sleep," as the chosen method of God's revelation of Himself to man (see Job iv. 13, vii. 14, xxxiii. 15). But in Num. xii. 6; Deut. xiii. 1, 3, 5; Jer. xxvii. 9; Joel ii. 28, &c., dreamers of dreams, whether true or false, are placed below "prophets," and even below "diviners;" and similarly in the climax of 1 Sam. xxviii. 6, we read that "Jehovah answered Saul not, neither by dreams, nor by Urim [by symbol], nor by prophets." Under the Christian dispensation, while we read frequently of trances and visions, dreams are never referred to as vehicles of divine revelation. In exact accordance with this principle are the actual records of the dreams sent by God. The greater number of such dreams were granted, for prediction or for warning, to those who were aliens to the Jewish covenant. And, where dreams are recorded as means of God's revelation to His chosen servants, they are almost always referred to the periods of their earliest and most imperfect knowledge of Him. The general conclusion therefore is, first, that the Scripture claims the dream as a medium through which God may speak to man either directly, or indirectly in virtue of a general influence upon all his thoughts; and secondly, that it lays far greater stress on that divine influence by which the understanding also is affected, and leads us to believe that as such influence extends more and more, revelation by dreams, unless in very peculiar circumstances, might be expected to pass away.

Dress. This subject includes the following particulars:—1. Materials. 2. Colour and decoration. 3. Name, form, and mode of wearing the various articles. 4. Special usages relating thereto.—1. The earliest and simplest robe was made out of the leaves of a tree, portions of which were sewn together, so as to form an apron (Gen. iii. 7). After the fall, the skins of animals supplied a more durable material (Gen. iii. 21), which was adapted to a rude state of society, and is stated to have been used by various ancient nations. Skins were not wholly disused at later periods: the "mantle" worn by Elijah appears to have been the skin of a sheep or some other animal with the wool left on. It was characteristic of a prophet's office from its mean appearance (Zech. xiii. 4; cf. Matt. vii. 15). Pelisses of sheep-skin still form an ordinary article of dress in the East. The art of weaving hair was known to the Hebrews at an early period (Ex. xxvi. 7, xxxv. 6); the sackcloth used by mourners was of this material. John the Baptist's robe was of camel's hair (Matt. iii. 4). Wool, we may presume, was introduced at a very early period, the flocks of the pastoral families being kept partly for their wool (Gen. xxxviii. 12); it was at all times largely employed, particularly for the outer garments (Lev. xiii. 47; Deut. xxii. 11; &c.). It is probable that the acquaintance of the Hebrews with linen, and pe-laps cotton, dates from the period of the captivity in Egypt, when they were instructed in the manufacture (1 Chr. iv. 21). After their return to Palestine we have frequent notices of linen. Silk was not introduced until a very late period (Rev. xviii. 12). The use of mixed material, such as wool and flax, was forbidden (Lev. xix. 19; Deut. xxii. 11).—2. Colour and decoration. The prevailing colour of the Hebrew dress was the natural white of the materials employed, which might be brought to a high state of brilliancy by the aid of the fuller (Mark ix. 3). It is uncertain when the art of dyeing became known to the Hebrews; the dress worn by Joseph (Gen. xxxvii. 3, 23) is variously taken to be either a "coat of divers colours," or a tunic furnished with sleeves and reaching down to the ankles. The latter is probably the correct sense. The notice of scarlet thread (Gen. xxxviii. 28) implies some acquaintance with dyeing. The Egyptians had carried the art of weaving and embroidery to a high state of perfection, and from them the Hebrews learned various methods of producing decorated stuffs. The elements of ornamentation were—(1) weaving with threads previously dyed (Ex. xxxv. 25); (2) the introduction of gold thread or wire (Ex. xxviii. 6 ff.); (3) the addition of figures. These devices may have been either woven into the stuff, or cut out of other stuff and afterwards attached by needlework: in the former case the pattern would appear only on one side, in the latter the pattern might be varied. Robes decorated with gold (Ps. xiv. 13), and at a later period with silver thread (cf. Acts xii. 21), were worn by royal personages; other kinds of embroidered robes were worn by the wealthy both of Tyre (Ez. xvi. 13) and Palestine (Judg. v. 30; Ps. xlv. 14). The art does not appear to have been maintained among the Hebrews: the Babylonians and other eastern nations (Josh. vii. 21; Ez. xxvii. 24), as well as the Egyptians (Ez. xxvii. 7), excelled in it. Nor does the art of dyeing appear to have been followed up in Palestine: dyed robes were imported from foreign countries (Zeph. i. 8), particularly from Phœnicia, and were not much used on account of their expensiveness: purple (Prov. xxxi. 22; Luke xvi. 19) and scarlet (2 Sam. i. 24) were occasionally worn by the wealthy. The surrounding nations were more lavish in their use of them: the wealthy Tyrians (Ez. xxvii. 7), the Midianitish kings (Judg. viii. 26), the Assyrian nobles (Ex. xxiii. 6), and Persian officers (Esth. viii. 15), are all represented in purple.—3. The names, forms, and mode of wearing the robes. It is difficult to give a satisfactory account of the various articles of dress mentioned in the Bible. The general characteristics of Oriental dress have indeed preserved a remarkable uniformity in all ages: the modern Arab dresses much as the ancient Hebrew did; there are the same flowing robes, the same distinction between the outer and inner garments, the former heavy and warm, the latter light, adapted to the rapid and excessive changes of temperature in those countries; and there is the same distinction between the costume of the rich and the poor, consisting in the multiplication of robes of a finer texture and more ample dimensions. Hence the numerous illustrations of ancient costume, which may be drawn from the usages of modern Orientals, supplying in great measure the want of contemporaneous representations. The costume of the men and women was very similar; there was sufficient difference, however, to mark the sex, and it was strictly forbidden to a woman to wear the appendages such as the staff, signet-ring, and other ornaments, or, according to Josephus, the weapons of a man; as well as to a man to wear the outer robe of a woman (Deut. xxii. 5). We shall first describe the robes which were common to the two sexes, and then those which were peculiar to woman. (1.) The cēthōneth was the most essential article of dress. It was a closely fitting garment, resembling in form and use our shirt, though unfortunately translated coat in the A. V. The material of which it was made was either wool, cotton, or linen. The primitive cēthōneth was without sleeves and reached only to the knee. Another kind reached to the wrists and ankles. It was in either case kept close to the body by a girdle, and the fold formed by the overlapping of the robe served as an inner pocket. A person wearing the cēthōneth alone was described as naked, A. V. The annexed woodcut (fig. 1) represents the simplest style of Oriental dress, a long loose shirt or cēthōneth without a girdle, reaching nearly to the ankle. (2.) The sādīn appears to have been a wrapper of fine linen, which might be used in various ways, but especially as a night-shirt (Mark xiv. 51). (3.) The mēll was an upper or second tunic, the difference being that it was longer than the first. As an article of ordinary dress it was worn by kings (1 Sam. xxiv. 4), prophets (1 Sam. xxviii. 14), nobles (Job i. 20), and youths (1 Sam. ii. 19). It may, however, be doubted whether the term is used in its specific sense in these passages, and not rather for any robe that chanced to be worn over the cēthōneth. Where two tunics are mentioned (Luke iii. 11) as being worn at the same time, the second would be a mēll; travellers generally wore two, but the practice was forbidden to the disciples (Matt. x. 10; Luke ix. 3). The dress of the middle and upper classes in modern Egypt (fig. 2) illustrates the customs of the Hebrews. (4.) The ordinary outer garment consisted of a quadrangular piece of woollen cloth, probably resembling in shape a Scotch plaid. The size and texture would vary with the means of the wearer. The Hebrew terms referring to it are—simlah, sometimes put for clothes generally (Gen. xxxv. 2, xxxvii. 34; Ex. iii. 22, xxii. 9; Deut. x. 18; Is. iii. 7, iv. 1); begeg, which is more usual in speaking of robes of a handsome and substantial character (Gen. xxvii. 15, xli. 42; Ex. xxviii. 2; 1 K. xxii. 10; 2 Chr. xviii. 9; Is. lxiii. 1); cēsūth, appropriate to passages where covering or protection is the prominent idea (Ex. xxii. 26; Job xxvi. 8, xxxi. 19); and lastly gishūb, usual in poetry, but specially applied to a warrior's cloak (2 Sam. xx. 8), priests' vestments (2 K. x. 22), and royal apparel (Esth. vi. 11, viii. 15). Another term, mad, is specifically applied to a long cloak (Judg. iii. 16; 2 Sam. xx. 8), and to the priest's coat (Ley. vi. 10). The begeg might be worn in various ways, either wrapped round the body, or worn over the shoulders, like a shawl, with the ends or "skirts" hanging down in front; or it might be thrown over the head, so as to conceal the face (2 Sam. xv. 30; Esth. vi. 12). The ends were skirted with a fringe and bound with a dark purple riband (Num. xv. 38): it was confined at the waist by a girdle, and the fold, formed by the overlapping of the robe, served as a pocket. The dress of the women differed from that of the men in regard to the outer garment, the cēthōneth being worn equally by both sexes (Cant. v. 3). The names of their distinctive robes were as follows:—(1) mitpachath (veil, wimple, A. V.), a kind of shawl (Ruth iii. 15: Is. iii. 22); (2) ma'atāphāh (mantle, A. V.), another kind of shawl (Is. iii. 22); (3) tsāiph (veil, A. V.), probably a light summer dress of handsome appearance and of ample dimensions; (4) rādāid (veil, A. V.), a similar robe (Is. iii. 23; Cant. v. 7). (5) pethiytl (atomacher, A. V.), a term of doubtful origin, but probably significant of a gay holiday dress (Is. iii. 24); (6) gilyonim (Is. iii. 23), also a doubtful word, probably means, as in the A. V., glasses. The garments of females were terminated by an ample border or fringe (skirts, A. V.), which concealed the feet (Is. xlvii. 2; Jer. xiii. 22). Figs. 3 and 4 illustrate some of the peculiarities of female dress; the former is an Egyptian woman (in her walking dress); the latter represents a dress, probably of great antiquity, still worn by the peasants in the south of Egypt. Having now completed our description of Hebrew dress, we add a few remarks relative to the selection of equivalent terms in our own language. Cethoneth answers in many respects to "frock." In the sacerdotal dress a more technical term might be used: "vestment," in its specific sense as = the chasuble, or casula would represent it very aptly. Mēl may perhaps be best rendered "gown." In sacerdotal dress "alb" exactly meets it. Addereth answers in several respects to "pelisse," although this term is now applied almost exclusively to female dress. Sadin = "linen wrapper." Simlah we would render "garment," and in the plural "clothes," as the broadest term of the kind; beged "vestment," as being of superior quality; lobush "robe," as still superior; mad "cloak," as being long; and malbush "dress," in the specific sense in which the term is not unfrequently used as = fine dress. In female costume mitpachath might be rendered "shawl," ma'atāphāh "mantle," tsāiph "handsome dress," rādāid "cloak." The dresses of foreign nations are occasionally referred to in the Bible; that of the Persians is described in Dan. iii. 21 in terms which have been variously understood, but which may be identified in the following manner:—(1) The sarbalin (A. V. "coats") or drawers, which were the distinctive feature in the Persian as compared with the Hebrew dress; (2) the pattish (A. V. "hosen") or inner tunic; (3) the carbeld (A. V. "hat") or upper tunic, corresponding to the meil of the Hebrews; (4) the lobush (A. V. "garment") or cloak, which was worn, like the beged, over all. In addition to these terms, we have notice of a robe of state of fine linen, tacric, so called from its ample dimensions (Esth. viii. 15). The references to Greek or Roman dress are few: the χλαμύς (2 Macc. xii. 35; Matt. xxvii. 28) was either the paludamentum, the military scarf of the Roman soldiery, or the Greek chlamys itself, which was introduced under the Emperors: it was especially worn by officers. The travelling cloak referred to by St. Paul (2 Tim. iv. 13) is generally identified with the Roman paenula, of which it may be a corruption. It is, however, otherwise explained as a travelling case for carrying clothes or books.—4. Special usages relating to dress. The length of the dress rendered it inconvenient for active exercise; hence the outer garments were either left in the house by a person working close by (Matt. xxiv. 18) or were thrown off when the occasion arose (Mark x. 50; John xiii. 4; Acts vii. 58), or, if this was not possible, as in the case of a person travelling, they were girded up (1 K. xviii. 46; 2 K. iv. 29, ix. 1; 1 Pet. i. 13); on entering a house the upper garment was probably laid aside and resumed on going out (Acts xii. 8). In a sitting posture, the garments concealed the feet; this was held to be an act of reverence (Is. vi. 2). The number of suits possessed by the Hebrews was considerable: a single suit consisted of an under and upper garment. The presentation of a robe in many instances amounted to installation or investiture (Gen. xli. 42; Esth. viii. 15; Is. xxii. 21); on the other hand, taking it away amounted to dismissal from office (2 Macc. iv. 38). The production of the best robe was a mark of special honour in a household (Luke xv. 22). The number of robes thus received or kept in store for presents was very large, and formed one of the main elements of wealth in the East (Job xxvii. 16; Matt. vi. 19; James v. 2), so that to have clothing = to be wealthy and powerful (Is. iii. 6, 7). On grand occasions the entertainer offered becoming robes to his guests. The business of making clothes devolved upon women in a family (Prov. xxxi. 22; Acts ix. 39); little art was required in what we may term the tailoring department; the garments came forth for the most part ready made from the loom, so that the weaver supplanted the tailor.

Drink, Strong. The Hebrew term shêcar, in its etymological sense, applies to any beverage that had intoxicating qualities. We may infer from Cant. viii. 2 that the Hebrews were in the habit of expressing the juice of other fruits besides the grape for the purpose of making wine; the pomegranate, which is there noticed, was probably one out of many fruits so used. With regard to the application of the term in later times we have the explicit statement of Jerome, as well as other sources of information, from which we may state that the following beverages were known to the Jews:—1. Beer, which was largely consumed in Egypt under the name of zythus, and was thence introduced into Palestine. It was made of barley; certain herbs, such as lupin and skirrett, were used as substitutes for hops. 2. Wine, which is noticed in the Mishna as apple-wine. 3. Honey-wine, of which there were two sorts, one, consisting of a mixture of wine, honey, and pepper; the other a decoction of the juice of the grape, termed dêbâsh (honey) by the Hebrews, and ubs by the modern Syrians. 4. Date-wine, which was also manufactured in Egypt. It was made by mashing the fruit in water in certain proportions. 5. Various other fruits and vegetables are enumerated by Pliny as supplying materials for fæctitious or home-made wine, such as figs, millet, the carob fruit, &c. It is not improbable that the Hebrews applied raisins to this purpose in the simple manner followed by the Arabians, viz., by putting them in jars of water and burying them in the ground until fermentation takes place.

Dromedary. The representative in the A. V. of the Heb. words bêcer or bicrah, recesh and rammac. As to the two former terms, see under CAMEL. 1. Recesh, is variously interpreted in our version by "dromedaries" (1 K. iv. 28), "mules" (Esth. viii. 10, 14), "swift beasts" (Mic. i. 13). There seems to be no doubt that it denotes "a superior kind of horse." 2. Râmmac (Esth. viii. 10) is properly a "mare."

Drusilla, daughter of Herod Agrippa I. (Acts xii. 1, 19 ff.) and Cyprus. She was at first betrothed to Antiochus Epiphanes, prince of Commagene, but was married to Azizus, king of Emesa. Soon after, Felix, procurator of Judæa, brought about her seduction by means of the Cyprian sorcerer Simon, and took her as his wife. In Acts xxiv. 24, we find her in company with Felix at Caesarea. Felix had by Drusilla a son named Agrippa, who, together with his mother, perished in the eruption of Vesuvius under Titus.

Dulcimer (Heb. Sumphoniah), a musical instrument, mentioned in Daniel, iii. 5, 15. Rabbi Saadia Gaon describes the Sumphoniah as the bag-pipe, an opinion adopted by the majority of biblical critics. The same instrument is still in use amongst peasants in the N.W. of Asia and in Southern Europe, where it is known by the similar name Sampogna or Zampogna. With respect to the etymology of the word a great difference of opinion prevails.

Dum'ah, a son of Ishmael, most probably the founder of an Ishmaelite tribe of Arabia, and thence the name of the principal place, or district, inhabited by that tribe (Gen. xxv. 14; 1 Chr. i. 30; Is. xxi. 11). The name of a town in the north-western part of the peninsula, Doomat-el-Jendel, is held by Gesenius and others to have been thus derived. It signifies "Dumah of the stones or blocks of stone," and seems to indicate that the place was built of unhewn or Cyclopean masonry, similar to that of very ancient structures.

Du'mah, a city in the mountainous district of Judah, near Hebron (Josh. xv. 52). Robinson passed the ruins of a village called ed-Daumeh, 6 miles south-west of Hebron, and this may possibly be Dumah.

Dung. The uses of dung were twofold, as manure, and as fuel. The manure consisted either of straw steeped in liquid manure (Is. xlv. 10), or the sweepings (Is. v. 25) of the streets and roads, which were carefully removed from about the houses and collected in heaps outside the walls of the towns at fixed spots (hence the dung-gate at Jerusalem, Neh. ii. 13), and thence removed in due course to the fields. The mode of applying manure to trees was by digging holes about their roots and inserting it (Luke xiii. 8), as still practised in Southern Italy. In the case of sacrifices the dung was burnt outside the camp (Ex. xxix. 14; Lev. iv. 11, viii. 17; Num. xix. 5); hence the extreme opprobrium of the threat in Mal. ii. 3. Particular directions were laid down in the law to enforce cleanliness with regard to human ordure (Deut. xxiii. 12 ff.): it was the grossest insult to turn a man's house into a receptacle for it (2 K. x. 27; Ezr. vi. 11; Dan. ii. 5, iii. 29, "dung-hill" A. V.); public establishments of that nature are still found in the large towns of the East. The difficulty of procuring fuel in Syria, Arabia, and Egypt, has made dung in all ages valuable as a substitute: it was probably used for heating ovens and for baking cakes (Ez. iv. 12, 15), the equable heat, which it produced, adapting it peculiarly for the latter operation. Cow's and camel's dung is still used for a similar purpose by the Bedouins.

Dungeon. [PRISON.]

Du'ra, the plain where Nebuchadnezzar set up the golden image (Dan. iii. 1). There has been sometimes identified with a tract a little below Tekrit, on the left bank of the Tigris, where the name Dur is still found. M. Oppert places the plain (or, as he calls it, the "valley") of Dura to the south-east of Babylon in the vicinity of the mound of Dowair or Du'ur.

Eagle (Heb. nesher). The Hebrew word, which occurs frequently in the O. T., may denote a particular species of the Falconidae, as in Lev. xi. 13; Deut. xiv. 12, where the nesher is distinguished from the ossifrage, osprey, and other rapacious birds; but the term is used also to express the griffon vulture (Vultur fulvus) in two or three passages. At least four distinct kinds of eagles have been observed in Palestine, viz. the golden eagle (Aquila Chrysaetos), the spotted eagle (A. naevia) the commonest species in the rocky districts (see Ibia, i. 23), the imperial eagle (Aquila Heluaca), and the very common Circætos galicus, which preys on the numerous reptilia of Palestine. The Heb. nesher may stand for any of these different species, though perhaps more particular reference to the golden and imperial eagles and the griffon vulture may be intended. The passage in Mic. i. 16, "Enlarge thy baldness as the eagle," has been understood by Bochart and others to refer to the eagle at the time of its moulting in the spring. But if the neshet is supposed to denote the griffon vulture (Vultur fulvus), the simile is peculiarly appropriate, for the whole head and neck of this bird are destitute of true feathers. The "eagles" of Matt. xxiv. 28, Luke xvii. 37, may include the Vultur fulvus and Neophron percnopterus; though, as eagles frequently prey upon dead bodies, there is no necessity to restrict the Greek word to the Vulturidæ. The figure of an eagle is now and has been long a favourite military ensign. The Persians so employed it; a fact which illustrates the passage in Is. xlvi. 11. The same bird was similarly employed by the Assyrians and the Romans.

Eanes, 1 Esd. ix. 21, a name which stands in the place of HIRIM, MAASEIAH, and ELIJAH, in the parallel list of Ezra x.

Earnest (2 Cor. i. 22, v. 5; Eph. i. 14). The equivalent in the original is ἄρραβών, a Græcised form of the Heb. ʿarabôn, which was introduced by the Phœnicians into Greece, and also into Italy, where it reappears under the forms arrhabo and arrha. It may again be traced in the French arrhes, and in the old English expression Earl's or Arie's money. The Hebrew word was used generally for pledge (Gen. xxxviii. 17), and in its cognate forms for surety (Prov. xvii. 18) and hostage (2 K. xiv. 14). The Greek derivative, however, acquired a more technical sense as signifying the deposit paid by the purchaser on entering into an agreement for the purchase of any thing.

Earrings. The word nezem, by which these ornaments are usually described, is unfortunately ambiguous, originally referring to the nose-ring (as its root indicates), and thence transferred to the earring. The material of which earrings were made was generally gold (Ex. xxxii. 2), and their form circular. They were worn by women and by youth of both sexes (Ex. i. c.). It has been inferred from the passage quoted, and from Judg. viii. 24, that they were not worn by men: these passages are, however, by no means conclusive. The earring appears to have been regarded with superstitious reverence as an amulet. On this account they were surrendered along with the idols by Jacob's household (Gen. xxxv. 4). Chardin describes earrings, with talismanic figures and characters on them, as still existing in the East. Jewels were sometimes attached to the rings. The size of the earrings still worn in eastern countries far exceeds what is usual among ourselves; hence they formed a handsome present (Job xlii. 11), or offering to the service of God (Num. xxxi. 50).

Earth. The term is used in two widely different senses: (1) for the material of which the earth's surface is composed; (2) as the name of the planet on which man dwells. The Hebrew language discriminates between these two by the use of separate terms, Adamah for the former, Erets for the latter. As the two are essentially distinct we shall notice them separately.—I. Adamah is the earth in the sense of soil or ground, particularly as being susceptible of cultivation. The earth supplied the elementary substance of which man's body was formed, and the terms adam and adamah are brought into juxtaposition, implying an etymological connexion (Gen. ii. 7).—II. Erets is applied in a more or less extended sense:—1. to the whole world (Gen. i. 1); 2. to land as opposed to sea, (Gen. i. 10); 3. to a country (Gen. xii. 32); 4. to a plot of ground (Gen. xxiii. 15); and 5. to the ground on which a man stands (Gen. xxxiii. 3). The two former senses alone concern us, the third involving an inquiry into the opinions of the Hebrews on Cosmogony, the second on Geography.—I. COSMOGONY.—The views of the Hebrews on this subject are confessedly imperfect and obscure. 1. The earth was regarded not only as the central point of the universe, but as the universe itself, every other body—the heavens, sun, moon, and stars—being subsidiary to, and, as it were, the complement of the earth. The Hebrew language has no expression equivalent to our universe; "the heavens and the earth" (Gen. i. 1, xiv. 19; Ex. xxxi. 17) has been regarded as such; but it is clear that the heavens were looked upon as a necessary adjunct of the earth—the curtain of the tent in which man dwells (Is. xl. 22), the sphere above which fitted the sphere below (comp. Job xxii. 14, and Is. xl. 22)—designed solely for purposes of beneficence in the economy of the earth. As with the heaven itself, so also with the heavenly bodies; they were regarded solely as the ministers of the earth. 2. The earth was regarded in a twofold aspect; in relation to God, as the manifestation of His infinite attributes; in relation to man, as the scene of his abode. (1.) The Hebrew cosmogony is based upon the leading principle that the universe exists, not independently of God by any necessity or any inherent power, nor yet contemporaneously with God, as being co-existent with Him, nor yet in opposition to God, as a hostile element, but dependently upon Him, subsequently to Him, and in subjection to Him. (2.) The earth was regarded in relation to man, and accordingly each act of creation is a preparation of the earth for his abode—light, as the primary condition of all life; the heavens, for purposes already detailed; the dry land, for his home; “grass for the cattle and herb for the service of man” (Ps. civ. 14); the alternations of day and night, the one for his work and the other for his rest (Ps. civ. 23); fish, fowl, and flesh for his food; the beasts of burden, to lighten his toil. The work of each day of creation has its specific application to the requirements and the comforts of man, and is recorded with that special view. 3. Creation was regarded as a progressive work—a gradual development from the inferior to the superior orders of things. Thus it was with the earth’s surface, at first a chaotic mass, and thence gradually brought into a state of order and beauty. Thus also with the different portions of the universe, the earth before the light, the light before the firmament, the firmament before the dry land. Thus also with the orders of living beings; firstly, plants; secondly, fish and birds; thirdly, cattle; and lastly, man. 4. Order involves time; a succession of events implies a succession of periods; and accordingly Moses assigns the work of creation to six days, each having its specific portion. The manner, in which these acts are described as having been done, precludes all idea of time in relation to their performance: it was miraculous and instantaneous: “God said” and then “it was.” But the progressiveness, and consequently the individuality of the acts, does involve an idea of time as elapsing between the completion of one and the commencement of another; otherwise the work of creation would have resolved itself into a single continuous act. The period assigned to each individual act is a day—the only period which represents the entire cessation of a work through the interposition of night. That a natural day is represented under the expression “evening was and morning was,” admits we think, of no doubt. The interpretation that “evening and morning” = beginning and end, is opposed not only to the order in which the words stand, but to the sense of the words elsewhere. 5. The Hebrews, though regarding creation as the immediate act of God, did not ignore the evident fact that existing materials and intermediate agencies were employed both then and in the subsequent operations of nature. 6. With regard to the earth’s body, the Hebrews conceived its surface to be an immense disc, supported like the flat roof of an Eastern house by pillars (Job ix. 6; Ps. lxxv. 3), which rested on solid foundations (Job xxxviii. 4, 6; Ps. civ. 5; Prov. viii. 29); but where those foundations were on which the “sockets” of the pillars rested, none could tell (Job xxxviii. 6). The more philosophical view of the earth being suspended in free space seems to be implied in Job xxvi. 7. Other passages (Ps. xxiv. 2, cxxxvi. 6) seem to imply the existence of a vast subterraneous ocean; the words, however, are susceptible of the sense that the earth was elevated above the level of the seas. Beneath the earth’s surface was sheol, the hollow place, “hell” (Num. xvi. 30; Deut.

xxxii. 22; Job xi. 8). It extended beneath the sea (Job xxvi. 5, 6), and was thus supposed to be continuous with the upper world.—II. GEOGRAPHY.—We shall notice (1) the views of the Hebrews as to the form and size of the earth, its natural divisions, and physical features; (2) the countries into which they divided it and their progressive acquaintance with those countries.—(1.) There seem to be traces of the same ideas as prevailed among the Greeks, that the world was a disc (Is. xl. 22), bordered by the ocean (Deut. xxx. 13; Job xxvi. 10; Ps. cxxxix. 9; Prov. viii. 27), with Jerusalem as its centre (Ez. v. 5), which was thus regarded, like Delphi, as the navel (Judg. ix. 37; Ez. xxxviii. 12), or, according to another view, the highest point of the world. But Jerusalem might be regarded as the centre of the world, not only as the seat of religious light and truth, but to a certain extent in a geographical sense. A different view has been gathered from the expression “four corners,” as though implying the quadrangular shape of a garment stretched out; but the term “corners” may be applied in a metaphorical sense for the extreme ends of the world (Job xxxvii. 3; Is. xi. 12; Ez. vii. 2). As to the size of the earth, the Hebrews had but a very indefinite notion. Without unduly pressing the language of prophecy, it may be said that their views on this point extended but little beyond the nations with which they came in contact; its solidity is frequently noticed, its dimensions but seldom (Job xxxviii. 18; Is. xlii. 5). The earth was divided into four quarters or regions corresponding to the four points of the compass; these were described in various ways, sometimes according to their positions relatively to a person facing the east, before, behind, the right hand, and the left hand, representing respectively E., W., S., and N. (Job xxiii. 8, 9); sometimes relatively to the sun’s course, the rising, the setting (Ps. l. 1), the brilliant quarter (Ez. xl. 24), and the dark quarter (Ex. xxvi. 20); sometimes as the seat of the four winds (Ez. xxxvii. 9); and sometimes according to the physical characteristics, the sea for the W. (Gen. xxviii. 14), the parked for the S. (Ex. xxvii. 9), and the mountains for the N. (Is. xiii. 4). The north appears to have been regarded as the highest part of the earth’s surface, in consequence perhaps of the mountain ranges which existed there, and thus the heaviest part of the earth (Job xxvi. 7). The north was also the quarter in which the Hebrew el-Dorado lay, the land of gold mines (Job xxxvii. 22; margin; comp. Her. iii. 116).—(2.) We proceed to give a brief sketch of the geographical knowledge of the Hebrews down to the period when their distinctive names and ideas were superseded by those of classical writers. Of the physical objects noticed we may make the following summary, omitting of course the details of the geography of Palestine:—1. Sea—the Mediterranean, which was termed the “great sea” (Num. xxxiv. 6), the “sea of the Philistines” (Ex. xxiii. 31), and the “western sea” (Deut. xi. 24); the Red Sea, under the names of the “sea of Suph or sedge” (Ex. x. 19), and the “Egyptian sea” (Is. xi. 15); the Dead Sea, under the names “Salt Sea” (Gen. xiv. 3), “Eastern Sea” (Joel ii. 20), and “Sea of the Desert” (Deut. iv. 49); and the Sea of Chinnereth, or Galilee (Num. xxiv. 11); 2. Rivers—the Euphrates, which was specifically “the river” (Gen. xxi. 21), or “the great river” (Deut. i. 7); the Nile, which was named either

Yeor (Gen. xli. 1), or Shor (Josh. xlii. 3); the Tigris, under the name of Hiddekel (Dan. x. 4); the Chebar, Chaboras, a tributary to the Euphrates (Ex. i. 3); the Habor, probably the same, but sometimes identified with the Chaboras that falls into the Tigris (2 K. xvii. 6); the river of Egypt (Num. xxxiv. 5); and the rivers of Damascus, Abana (Barada), and Parpar (2 K. v. 12). For the Gihon and Pison (Gen. ii. 11, 13), see EDEN. 3. Mountains—Ararat or Armenia (Gen. viii. 4); Sinai (Ex. xix. 2); Horeb (Ex. iii. 1); Hor (Num. xx. 22) near Petra; Lebanon (Deut. iii. 25); and Sephar (Gen. x. 30) in Arabia. The distribution of the nations over the face of the earth is systematically described in Gen. x., to which account subsequently, though not very important, additions are made in caps. xxv. and xxxvi., and in the prophetic and historical books. Although the table in Gen. x. is essentially ethnographical, yet the geographical element is also strongly developed: the writer had in his mind's eye not only the descent but the residence of the various nations. Some of the names indeed seem to be purely geographical designations. Commencing from the west, the "isles of the Gentiles," i. e. the coasts and islands of the Mediterranean sea, were occupied by the Japhetites in the following order:—Javan, the Ionians, in parts of Greece and Asia Minor; Eliphaz, perhaps the Aeolians, in the same countries; Dodanim, the Dardani, in Illyricum; Thras in Thrace; Kittim, at Citium, in Cyprus; Ashkenaz in Phrygia; Gomer in Cappadocia, and Tarshish in Cilicia. In the north, Tubal, the Tibareni, in Pontus; Meshech, the Moschici in Colchis; Magog, Gogarene, in northern Armenia; Togarmah in Armenia; and Madai in Media. The Hamites represent the southern parts of the known world. This sketch is filled up, as far as regards northern Arabia, by a subsequent account, in cap. xxv., of the settlement of the descendants of Abraham by Keturah and of Ishmael. The countries, however, to which historical interest attaches are Mesopotamia and Egypt. The hereditary connexion of the Hebrews with the former of these districts, and the importance of the dynasties which bore sway in it, make it by far the most prominent feature in the map of the ancient world. The Egyptian captivity introduces to our notice some of the localities in Lower Egypt, viz. the province of Goshen, and the cowns Rameses (Gen. xlvii. 11); On, Heliopolis (Gen. xli. 45); Pithom, Patumus? (Ex. i. 11); and Migdol, Magdohm? (Ex. xiv. 2). It is difficult to estimate the amount of information which the Hebrews derived from the Phœnicians; but there can be no doubt that it was from them that they learned the route to Ophir, and that they also became acquainted with the positions and productions of a great number of regions comparatively unknown. From Ez. xxvii. we may form some idea of the extended ideas of geography which the Hebrews had obtained. The progress of information on the side of Africa is clearly marked: the distinction between Upper and Lower Egypt is shown by the application of the name Pathos to the former (Ex. xxix. 14). Memphis, the capital of Lower Egypt, is first mentioned in Hosea (ix. 6) under the name Moph, and afterwards frequently as Noph (Is. xix. 13); Thebes, the capital of Upper Egypt, at a later period, as No-Ammon (Nah. iii. 8) and No (Jer. xlvi. 25); and the distant Syene (Ez. xxix. 10). Several other towns are noticed in the Delta. The wars with the Assyrians and Babylonians, and the captivities which followed, bring us back again to the geography of the East. Incidental notice is taken of several important places in connexion with these events. The names of Persia (2 Chr. xxxvi. 20) and India (Esth. i. 1) now occur: whether the far-distant China is noticed at an earlier period under the name Sinim (Is. xlix. 12) admits of doubt. The names of Greece and Italy are hardly noticed in Hebrew geography: the earliest notice of the former, subsequently to Gen. x., occurs in Is. lxvi. 19, under the name of Javan. If Italy is described at all, it is under the name Chittim (Dan. xi. 30). In the Maccabean era the classical names came into common use; and henceforward the geography of the Bible, as far as foreign lands are concerned, is absorbed in the wider field of classical geography.

Earthquake. Earthquakes, more or less violent, are of frequent occurrence in Palestine, as might be expected from the numerous traces of volcanic agency visible in the features of that country. The recorded instances, however, are few; but the most remarkable occurred in the reign of Uzziah (Am. i. 1; Zech. xiv. 5), which Josephus connected with the sacrilege and consequent punishment of that monarch (2 Chr. xxvi. 16 ff.). From Zech. xiv. 4 we are led to infer that a great convulsion took place at this time in the Mount of Olives, the mountain being split so as to leave a valley between its summits. Josephus records something of the sort, but his account is by no means clear. We cannot but think that the two accounts have the same foundation, and that the Mount of Olives was really affected by the earthquake. An earthquake occurred at the time of our Saviour's crucifixion (Matt. xxvii. 51-54), which may be deemed miraculous rather from the conjunction of circumstances than from the nature of the phenomenon itself. Earthquakes are not unfrequently accompanied by fissures of the earth's surface; instances of this are recorded in connexion with the destruction of Korah and his company (Num. xvi. 32), and at the time of our Lord's death (Matt. xxvii. 51); the former may be paralleled by a similar occurrence at Oppido in Calabria A.D. 1783, where the earth opened to the extent of 500, and a depth of more than 200 feet.

East. The Hebrew terms, descriptive of the east, differ in idea, and, to a certain extent, in application; (1) kedem properly means that which is before or in front of a person, and was applied to the east from the custom of turning in that direction when describing the points of the compass, before, behind, the right and the left, representing respectively E., W., S., and N. (Job xxiii. 8, 9); (2) mizrach means the place of the sun's rising. Bearing in mind this etymological distinction, it is natural that kedem should be used when the four quarters of the world are described (as in Gen. xiii. 14, xlviii. 14; Job xxii. 8, 9; Ez. xlvii. 18 ff.), and mizrach when the east is only distinguished from the west (Josh. xi. 3; Ps. l. 1, ciii. 12, cxlii. 3; Zech. viii. 7), or from some other one quarter (Dan. viii. 9, xi. 44; Am. viii. 12); exceptions to this usage occur in Ps. cviii. 8, and Is. xliii. 5, each, however, admitting of explanation. Again, kedem is used in a strictly geographical sense to describe a spot or country immediately before another in an easterly direction; hence it occurs in such passages as Gen. ii. 8, iii. 24, xi. 2, xiii. 11, xxv. 6; and hence the subsequent application of the term, as a proper name (Gen. xxv. 6, eastward, unto the land of Kedar), to the lands lying immediately eastward of Palestine, viz. Arabia, Mesopotamia and Babylonia; on the other hand mizraah is area of the far east with a less definite signification (Is. xlii. 2, 25, xliiii. 5, xlv. 11).

Easter. The occurrence of this word in the A. V. of Acts xii. 4, is chiefly noticeable as an example of the want of consistency in the translators. In the earlier English versions Easter had been frequently used as the translation of πάσχα. At the last revision Passover was substituted in all passages but this. [PASSOVER.]

East Wind. [WINDS.]

Ebal. 1. One of the sons of Shobal the son of Scir (Gen. xxxvi. 23; 1 Chr. i. 40).—2. OBAL the son of Joktan (1 Chr. i. 22; comp. Gen. x. 28).

Ebal, Mount, a mount in the promised land, on which, according to the command of Moses, the Israelites were, after their entrance on the promised land, to "put" the curse which should fall upon them if they disobeyed the commandments of Jehovah. The blessing consequent on obedience was to be similarly localised on Mount Gerizim (Deut. xi. 26-29). Where then were Ebal and Gerizim situated? The all but unanimous reply to this is, that they are the mounts which form the sides of the fertile valley in which lies Nablus, the ancient SHECHEM—Ebal on the north and Gerizim on the south. (1.) It is plain that they were situated near together, with a valley between. (2.) Gerizim was very near Shechem (Judg. ix. 7), and in Josephus's time the names appear to have been attached to the mounts, which were then, as now, Ebal on the north and Gerizim on the south. Eusebius and Jerome place them in the Jordan valley, near Gilgal; but they speak merely from hearsay. It is well known that one of the most serious variations between the Hebrew text of the Pentateuch and the Samaritan text, is in reference to Ebal and Gerizim. In Deut. xxvii. 4, the Samaritan has Gerizim, while the Hebrew (as in A. V.) has Ebal, as the mount on which the altar to Jehovah, and the inscription of the law were to be erected. Upon this basis they ground the sanctity of Gerizim and the authenticity of the temple and holy place, which did exist and still exist there. Two points may merely be glanced at here which have apparently escaped notice. 1. Both agree that Ebal was the mount on which the cursings were to rest, Gerizim that for the blessings. It appears inconsistent, that Ebal, the mount of cursing, should be the site of the altar and the record of the law, while Gerizim, the mount of blessing, should remain unoccupied by a sanctuary of any kind. 2. Taking into account the known predilection of Orientals for ancient sites on which to fix their sanctuaries, it is more easy to believe (in the absence of any evidence to the contrary) that in building their temple on Gerizim, the Samaritans were making use of a spot already enjoying a reputation for sanctity, than that they built on a place upon which the curse was laid in the records which they received equally with the Jews. Thus the very fact of the occupation of Gerizim by the Samaritans would seem an argument for its original sanctity. The structure of Gerizim is nummulitic limestone with occasional outcrops of igneous rock, and that of Ebal is probably similar. At its base above the valley of Nablus are numerous caves and sepulchral excavations. The modern name of Ebal is Sitti Salamiyah, from a Mohammedan female saint, whose tomb is standing on the eastern part of the ridge, a little before the highest point is reached.

E'bed. 1. (many MSS., and the Syr. and Arab. Versions, have EBER), father of GAAL, who with his brethren assisted the men of Shechem in their revolt against Abimelech (Judg. ix. 26, 28, 30, 31, 35).—2. Son of Jonathan; one of the Bene-Adin who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 6). In 1 Esdras the name is given OBETH.

Eb'ed-Mel'ech, an Ethiopian eunuch in the service of king Zedekiah, through whose interference Jeremiah was released from prison (Jer. xxxviii. 7 ff., xxxix. 15 ff.). His name seems to be an official title = King's slave, i. e. minister.

Eb'en-ezer ("the stone of help"), a stone set up by Samuel after a signal defeat of the Philistines, as a memorial of the "help" received on the occasion from Jehovah (1 Sam. vii. 12). Its position is carefully defined as between MIZPEH and SHEM. Neither of these points, however, has been identified with any certainty—the latter not at all.

E'ber. 1. Son of Salah, and great-grandson of Shem (Gen. x. 24; 1 Chr. i. 19). For confusion between Eber and Heber see HEBER.—2. Son of Elpaal and descendant of Shaharaim of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chr. viii. 12).—3. A priest in the days of Joakim the son of Jeshua (Neh. xii. 20).

Ebi'asaph, a Kohathite Levite of the family of Korah, one of the forefathers of the prophet Samuel and of Heman the singer (1 Chr. vi. 23, 37). The same man is probably intended in ix. 19. The name appears also to be identical with ABIASAPH, and in one passage (1 Chr. xxvi. 1) to be abbreviated to Asaph.

Diospyros Ebenum.

Ebony (Heb. holmim, occurs only in Ez. xxv. 15, as one of the valuable commodities imported into Tyre by the men of Dedan. The best kind of ebony is yielded by the Diospyros ebenum, a tree which grows in Ceylon and Southern India; but there are many trees of the natural order Ebenaceae which produce this material. There is every reason for believing that the ebony afforded by the Diospyros ebenum was imported from India or Ceylon by Phœnician traders; though it is equally probable that the Tyrian merchants were supplied with ebony from trees which grew in Ethiopia. It is not known what tree yielded the Ethiopian ebony.

Ebro'nah. (Heb. Abronaḥ). One of the halting-places of the Israelites in the desert, immediately preceding Ezion-geber. (Numb. xxiii. 34, 35.)

Eco'nus, one of the five swift scribes who attended on Esdras (2 Esdr. xiv. 24).

Ecbat'ana (Heb. Achmēthā). It is doubtful whether the name of this place is really contained in the Hebrew Scriptures. Many of the best commentators understand the expression, in Ezr. vi. 2, differently, and translate it "in a coffer." If a city is meant, there is little doubt of one of the two Ecbatanas being intended. In the apocryphal books Ecbatana is frequently mentioned (Tob. iii. 7, xiv. 12, 14; Jud. i. 1, 2; 2 Macc. ix. 3, &c.). Two cities of the name of Ecbatana seem to have existed in ancient times, one the capital of Northern Media, the Media Atropatēne of Strabo; the other the metropolis of the larger and more important province known as Media Magna. The site of the former appears to be marked by the very curious ruins at Takht-i-Suleiman (lat. 36° 28', long. 47° 9'); while that of the latter is occupied by Hamadan, which is one of the most important cities of modern Persia. There is generally some difficulty in determining, when Ecbatana is mentioned, whether the northern or the southern metropolis is intended. Few writers are aware of the existence of the two cities, and they lie sufficiently near to one another for geographical notices in most cases to suit either site. The northern city was the "seven-walled town" described by Herodotus, and declared by him to have been the capital of Cyrus (Herod. i. 98-99, 153); and it was thus most probably there that the roll was found which proved to Darius that Cyrus had really made a decree allowing the Jews to rebuild their temple. The peculiar feature of the site of Takht-i-Suleiman, which it is proposed to identify with the northern Ecbatana, is a conical hill rising to the height of about 150 feet above the plain, and covered both on its top and sides with massive ruins of the most antique and primitive character. A perfect enceinte, formed of large blocks of squared stone, may be traced round the entire hill along its brow; within there is an oval enclosure about 800 yards in its greatest and 400 in its least diameter, strewn with ruins, which cluster round a remarkable lake. On three sides—the south, the west, and the north—the acclivity is steep and the height above the plain uniform, but on the east it abuts upon a hilly tract of ground, and here it is but slightly elevated above the adjacent country. The northern Ecbatana continued to be an important place down to the 13th century after Christ. By the Greeks and Romans it appears to have been known as Gaza, Gazaca, or Canzaca, "the treasure city," on account of the wealth laid up in it; while by the Orientals it was termed Shiz. Its decay is referable to the Mogul conquests, ab. A.D. 1200; and its final ruin is supposed to date from about the 15th or 16th century. In the 2nd book of Maccabees (ix. 3, &c.) the Ecbatana mentioned is undoubtedly the southern city, now represented both in name and site by Hamadan. This place, situated on the northern flank of the great mountain called formerly Orontes, and now Elwend, was perhaps as ancient as the other, and is far better known in history. If not the Median capital of Cyrus, it was at any rate regarded from the time of Darius Hystaspis as the chief city of the Persian satrapy of Media, and as such it became the summer residence of the Persian kings from Darius downwards. The Ecbatana of the book of Tobit is thought by Sir H. Rawlinson to be the northern city.

Ecclesiast'es (Heb. Kohēleth).—I. Title. The title of this book is taken from the name by which the son of David, or the writer who personates him, speaks of himself throughout it. The apparent anomaly of the feminine termination indicates that the abstract noun has been transferred from the office to the person holding it; and hence, with the single exception of Eccl. vii. 27, the noun, notwithstanding its form, is used throughout in the masculine. The word has been applied to one who speaks publicly in an assembly, and there is, to say the least, a tolerable agreement in favour of this interpretation. On the other hand, Grotius has suggested "compiler" as a better equivalent.—II. Canonicity. In the Jewish division of the books of the Old Testament, Ecclesiastes ranks as one of the five Megilloth or Rolls, and its position, as having canonical authority, appears to have been recognised by the Jews from the time in which the idea of a canon first presented itself. We find it in all the Jewish catalogues of the sacred books, and from them it has been received universally by the Christian Church. Some singular passages in the Talmud indicate, however, that the recognition was not altogether unhesitating, and that it was at least questioned how far the book was one which it was expedient to place among the Scriptures that were read publicly.—III. Author and Date. The hypothesis which is naturally suggested by the account that the writer gives of himself in ch. i. and ii. is that it was written by the only "son of David" (i. 1), who was "king over Israel in Jerusalem" (i. 12). The belief that Solomon was actually the author was, it need hardly be said, received generally by the Rabbinic commentators and the whole series of Patristic writers. Grotius was indeed almost the first writer who called it in question and started a different hypothesis. The objections which have been urged against the traditional belief by Grotius and later critics, and the hypotheses which they have substituted for it, are drawn chiefly from the book itself. 1. The language of the book belongs to the time when the older Hebrew was becoming largely intermingled with Aramaic forms and words, and as such takes its place in the latest group of books of the Old Testament. The prevalence of abstract forms is urged as belonging to a later period than that of Solomon in the development of Hebrew thought and language. The answers given to these objections by the defenders of the received belief are (a) that many of what we call Aramaic or Chaldean forms may have belonged to the period of pure Hebrew, though they have not come down to us in any extant writings; and (b) that so far as they are foreign to the Hebrew of the time of Solomon, he may have learnt them from his "strange wives," or from the men who came as ambassadors from other countries. 2. It has been asked whether Solomon would have been likely to speak of himself as in i. 12, or to describe with bitterness the misery and wrong of which his own misgovernment had been the cause, as in iii. 16, iv. 1. On the hypothesis that he was the writer, the whole book is an acknowledgment of evils which he had occasioned, while yet there is no distinct confession and repentance. The question here raised is, of course, worth considering, but it can hardly be looked on as leading in either direction to a conclusion. 3. It has been urged that the state of society indicated in this book leads to the same conclusion as its language, and carries us to a period after the return from the Babylonian captivity, when the Jews were enjoying comparative freedom from invasion, but were exposed to the evils of misgovernment under the satraps of the Persian king. Significant, though not conclusive, in either direction, is the absence of all reference to any contemporaneous prophetic activity, or to any Messianic hopes. The use throughout the book of Elohim instead of Jehovah as the divine Name, leaves the question as to date nearly where it was. The indications of rising questions as to the end of man's life, and the constitution of his nature, of doubts like those which afterwards developed into Sadduceism (iii. 19-21), of a copious literature connected with those questions, confirm, it is urged, the hypothesis of the later date. It may be added too, that the absence of any reference to such a work as this in the enumeration of Solomon's writings in 1 K. iv. 32, tends, at least, to the same conclusion. In this case, however, as in others, the arguments of recent criticism are stronger against the traditional belief than in support of any rival theory, content to rest their case upon the discordant hypotheses of their opponents. On the assumption that the book belongs, not to the time of Solomon, but to the period subsequent to the captivity, the dates which have been assigned to it occupy a range of more than 300 years. Grotius supposes Zerubbabel to be referred to in xii. 11, as the "One Shepherd," and so far agrees with Keil, who fixes it in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah. Ewald and De Wette conjecture the close of the period of Persian or the commencement of that of Macedonian rule; Bertholdt the period between Alexander the Great and Antiochus Epiphanes; Hitzig, circ. 204 B.C.; Hartmann, the time of the Maccabees. — IV. Plan. The book of Ecclesiastes comes before us as being conspicuously, among the writings of the O. T. the great stumbling-block or commentators. Some, at least, of the Rabbinical writers were perplexed by its teachings. Little can be gathered from the series of Patristic interpreters. The book is comparatively seldom quoted by them. No attempt is made to master its plan and to enter into the spirit of its writer. When we descend to the more recent developments of criticism, we meet with an almost incredible divergence of opinion. Luther sees in it a noble "Politica vel Oeconomica," leading men in the midst of all the troubles and disorders of human society to a true endurance and reasonable enjoyment. Grotius finds in it only a collection of many maxims, connected more or less closely with the great problems of human life. Others reject these views as partial and one-sided, and assert that the object of the writer was to point out the secret of a true blessedness in the midst of all the distractions and sorrows of the world as consisting in a tranquil calm enjoyment of the good that comes from God. The variety of these opinions indicates sufficiently that the book is as far removed as possible from the character of a formal treatise. It is that which it professes to be—the confession of a man of wide experience looking back upon his past life and looking out upon the disorders and calamities which surround him. The true utterances of such a man are the records of his struggles after truth, of his occasional glimpses of it, of his ultimate discovery. The writer of Ecclesiastes is not a didactic moralist, nor a prophet, but a man who has shined in giving way to selfishness and sensuality, who has paid the penalty of that sin in satiety and weariness of life; in whom the mood of spirit, over-reflective, indisposed to action, has become dominant in its darkest form, but who has through all this been under the discipline of a divine education, and has learnt from it the lesson which God meant to teach him. What that lesson was will be seen from an examination of the book itself. It is tolerably clear that the recurring burden of "Vanity of vanities" and the teaching which recommends a life of calm enjoyment, mark, whenever they occur, a kind of halting-place in the succession of thoughts. Taking this, accordingly, as our guide, we may look on the whole book as falling into four divisions, and closing with that which, in its position no less than its substance, is "the conclusion of the whole matter." (1.) Ch. i. and ii. This portion of the book more than any other has the character of a personal confession. The Preacher starts with reproducing the phase of despair and weariness into which his experience had led him (i. 2, 3). To the man who is thus satiated with life the order and regularity of nature are oppressive (i. 4-7). That which seems to be new is but the repetition of the old (i. 8-11). Then, having laid bare the depth to which he had fallen, he retraces the path by which he had travelled thitherward. First he had sought after wisdom as that to which God seemed to call him (i. 13); but the pursuit of it was a sore travail, and there was no satisfaction in its possession. The first experiment in the search after happiness had failed and he tried another (ii. 1-9). But this also failed to give him peace (ii. 11). The first section closes with that which, in different forms, is the main lesson of the book—to make the best of what is actually around one (ii. 24)—to substitute for the reckless feverish pursuit of pleasure the calm enjoyment which men may yet find both for the senses and the intellect. (2.) Ch. iii. 1—vi. 9. The order of thought in this section has a different starting-point. One who looked out upon the infinitely varied phenomena of men's life might yet discern, in the midst of that variety, traces of an order. There are times and seasons for each of them in its turn, even as there are for the vicissitudes of the world of nature (iii. 1-8). The heart of man with its changes is the mirror of the universe (iii. 11), and is, like that, inscrutable. And from this there comes the same conclusion as from the personal experience. Calmly to accept the changes and chances of life, entering into whatever joy they bring, as one accepts the order of nature, this is the way of peace (iii. 13). The thought of the ever-recurring cycle of nature, which had before been irritating and disturbing, now whispers the same lesson. The transition from this to the opening thoughts of ch. iv. seems at first somewhat abrupt. Instead of the self-centred search after happiness he looks out upon the miseries and disorders of the world, and learns to sympathise with suffering (iv. 1). And in this survey of life on a large scale, as in that of a personal experience, there is a cycle which is ever being repeated. The opening of ch. v. again presents the appearance of abruptness, but it is because the survey of human life takes a yet wider range. The eye of the Preacher passes from the dwellers in palaces to the worshippers in the Temple, the devout and religious men. Have they found out the secret of life, the path to wisdom and happiness? The answer to that question is that there the blindness and folly of mankind show themselves in their worst forms. The command "Fear thou God," meant that a man was to take no part in a religion such as this. But that command also suggested the solution of another problem, of that prevalence of injustice and oppression which had before weighed down the spirit of the inquirer. The section ends as before with the conclusion, that to feed the eyes with what is actually before them is better than the ceaseless wanderings of the spirit. (3.) Ch. vi. 10—viii. 15. So far the lines of thought all seemed to converge to one result. The ethical teaching that grew out of the wise man's experience had in it something akin to the higher forms of Epicureanism. But the seeker could not rest in this, and found himself beset with thoughts at once more troubling and leading to a higher truth. The spirit of man looks before and after, and the uncertainties of the future vex it (vi. 12). So far there are signs of a clearer insight into the end of life. Then comes an oscillation which carries him back to the old problems (vii. 15). The repetition of thoughts that had appeared before, is perhaps the natural consequence of such an oscillation, and accordingly in ch. viii. we find the seeker moving in the same round as before. There are the old reflections on the misery of man (viii. 6), and the confusions in the moral order of the universe (viii. 10, 11), the old conclusion that enjoyment, such enjoyment as is compatible with the fear of God, is the only wisdom (viii. 15). (4.) Ch. viii. 16—xii. 8. After the pause implied in his again arriving at the lesson of ver. 15, the Preacher retraces the last of his many wanderings. This time the thought with which he started was a profound conviction of the inability of man to unravel the mysteries of which he is surrounded (viii. 17), of the nothingness of man when death is thought of as ending all things (ix. 3-6), of the wisdom of enjoying life while we may (ix. 7-10), of the evils which affect nations or individual man (ix. 11, 12). The wide experience of the Preacher suggests sharp and pointed sayings as to these evils (x. 1-20), each true and weighty in itself, but not leading him on to any firmer standing-ground or clearer solution of the problems which oppressed him. It is here that the traces of plan and method in the book seem most to fail us. In ch. xi, however the progress is more rapid. The tone of the Preacher becomes more that of direct exhortation, and he speaks in clearer and higher notes. The end of man's life is not to seek enjoyment for himself only, but to do good to others, regardless of the uncertainties or disappointments that may attend his efforts (xi. 1-4). The secret of a true life is that a man should consecrate the vigour of his youth to God (xii. 1). It is well to do that before the night comes, before the slow decay of age benumbs all the faculties of sense (xii. 2, 6), before the spirit returns to God who gave it. The thought of that end rings out once more the knell of the nothingness of all things earthly (xii. 8); but it leads also to "the conclusion of the whole matter," to that to which all trains of thought and all the experiences of life had been leading the seeker after wisdom, that "to fear God and keep his commandments" was the highest good attainable. If the representation which has been given of the plan and meaning of the book be at all a true one, we find in it, no less than in the book of Job, indications of the struggle with the doubts and difficulties which in all ages of the world have presented themselves to thoughtful observers of the condition of mankind. The writer of the book of Job deals with the great mystery presented by the sufferings of the righteous. In the words of the Preacher, we trace chiefly the weariness or satiety of the pleasure-seeker, and the failure of all schemes of life but one. In both, though by very diverse paths, the inquirer is led to take refuge in the thought that God's kingdom is infinitely great, and that man knows but the smallest fragment of it; that he must refrain from things which are too high for him and be content with the duties of his own life and the opportunities it presents for his doing the will of God.

Ecclesiasticus, the title given in the Latin Version to the book which is called in the Septuagint THE WISDOM OF JESUS THE SON OF SIRACH. The word, like many others of Greek origin, appears to have been adopted in the African dialect. The right explanation of the word is given by Rufinus, who remarks that "it does not designate the author of the book, but the character of the writing," as publicly used in the services of the Church. According to Jerome the original Hebrew title was Proverbs; and the Wisdom of Sirach shared with the canonical book of Proverbs and the Wisdom of Solomon the title of The book of all virtues. In the Syriac version the book is entitled The book of Jesus the son of Simeon Asiro (i. e. the bound); and the same book is called the wisdom of the son of Asiro. In many places it is simply styled Wisdom. 2. The writer of the present book describes himself as Jesus (i. e. Jeshua) the son of Sirach, of Jerusalem (c. l. 27), but the conjectures which have been made to fill up this short notice are either unwarranted or absolutely improbable. The Palestinian origin of the author is, however, substantiated by internal evidence, e. g. xxiv. 10 f. 3. The language in which the book was originally composed was Hebrew, i. e. perhaps the Aramean dialect. Jerome says that he had met with the "Hebrew" text. The internal character of the present book bears witness to its foreign source. 4. Nothing however remains of the original proverbs of Ben Sira except the few fragments in pure Hebrew which occur in the Talmud and later Rabbinic writers; and even these may have been derived from tradition and not from any written collection. The Greek translation incorporated in the LXX., which is probably the source from which the other translations were derived, was made by the grandson of the author in Egypt "in the reign of Euergetes," for the instruction of those "in a strange country who were previously prepared to live after the law." The date which is thus given is unfortunately ambiguous. Two kings of Egypt bore the surname Euergetes. Ptol. III., the son and successor of Ptol. II. Philadelphus, B.C. 247-222; and Ptol. VII. Physcon, the brother of Ptol. VI. Philometor, B.C. 170-117. Some have supposed that the reference in chap. iv. is to Simon the Just, and that the grandson of Ben Sirach, who is supposed to have been his younger contemporary, lived in the reign of Ptolemy III.; others again have applied the eulogy to Simon II., and fixed the translation in the time of Ptolemy VII. But both suppositions are attended with serious difficulties. From these considerations it appears best to combine the two views. The grandson of the author was already past middle-age when he came to Egypt, and if his visit took place early in the reign of Ptolemy Physcon, it is quite possible that the book itself was written while the name and person of the last of "the men of the great synagogue" was still familiar to his countrymen. 5. The name of the Greek translator is unknown. He is commonly supposed to have borne the same name as his grandfather, but this tradition rests only on conjecture or misunderstanding. 6. It is a more important fact that the book itself appears to recognise the incorporation of earlier collections into its text. Jesus the son of Sirach, while he claims for himself the writing of the book, characterises his father as one "who poured forth a shower of wisdom from his heart." From the very nature of his work the author was like "a gleaner after the grape-gatherers" (xxxiii. 16). 7. The Syriac and Old Latin versions, which latter Jerome adopted without alteration, differ considerably from the present Greek text, and it is uncertain whether they were derived from some other Greek recension or from the Hebrew original. The Arabic version is directly derived from the Syriac. 8. The existing Greek MSS. present great discrepancies in order, and numerous interpolations. The arrangement of xxx. 25-xxxvi. 17, in the Vatican and Complutensian editions is very different. 9. It is impossible to make any satisfactory plan of the book in its present shape. The latter part, xlii. 15-l. 21, is distinguished from all that precedes in style and subject; and "the praise of noble men" seems to form a complete whole in itself (xlv.-l. 24). The words of Jerome imply that the original text presented a triple character answering to the three works of Solomon, the Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles. Eichhorn supposed that the book was made up of three distinct collections which were afterwards united: i.-xxiii.; xxiv.-xlii. 14; xlii. 15-l. 24. Bretschneider sets aside this hypothesis, and at the same time one which he had formerly been inclined to adopt, that the recurrence of the same ideas in xxiv. 32 ff.; xxxiii. 16, 17 (xxx.); l. 27, marks the conclusions of three parts. The last five verses of c. l. (l. 25-29) form a natural conclusion to the book; and the prayer, which forms the last chapter (li.), is wanting in two MSS. 10. The earliest clear coincidence with the contents of the book occurs in the epistle of Barnabas (c. xix. = Eccles. iv. 31), and there is no mark of quotation. The parallels which have been discovered in the New Testament are too general to show that they were derived from the written text, and not from popular language. The first distinct quotations occur in Clement of Alexandria; but from the end of the second century the book was much used and cited with respect. Clement speaks of it continually as Scripture, as the work of Solomon. Origen cites passages with the same formula as the Canonical books. The other writers of the Alexandrine school follow the same practice. Augustine quotes the book constantly himself as the work of a prophet, the word of God, "Scripture," but he expressly notices that it was not in the Hebrew Canon. Jerome, in like manner, contrasts the book with "the Canonical Scriptures" as "doubtful," while they are "sure." The book is not quoted by Irenaeus, Hippolytus, or Eusebius; and is not contained in the Canon of Melito, Origen, Cyril, Laodicea, Hilary, or Ruinus. It was never included by the Jews among their Scriptures. 11. But while the book is destitute of the highest canonical authority, it is a most important monument of the religious state of the Jews at the period of its composition. As an expression of Palestinian theology it stands alone; for there is no sufficient reason for assuming Alexandrine interpolations or direct Alexandrine influence.

Eclipse of the Sun. No historical notice of an eclipse occurs in the Bible, but there are passages in the prophets which contain manifest allusion to this phenomenon (Am. viii. 9; Mic. iii. 6; Zech. xiv. 6; Joel ii. 10, 31; iii. 15). Some of these notices probably refer to eclipses that occurred about the time of the respective compositions: thus the date of Amos coincides with a total eclipse, which occurred Feb. 9, B.C. 784, and was visible at Jerusalem shortly after noon; that of Micah with the eclipse of June 5, B.C. 716: A passing notice in Jer. xv. 9 coincides in date with the eclipse of Sept. 30, B.C. 610, so well known from Herodotus' account (i. 74, 103). The darkness that overspread the world at the crucifixion cannot with reason be attributed to an eclipse, as the moon was at the full at the time of the Passover.

Eden, the first residence of man. It would be difficult, in the whole history of opinion, to find any subject which has so invited, and at the same time so completely baffled, conjecture, as the Garden of Eden. In order more clearly to understand the merit of the several theories, it will be necessary to submit to a careful examination the historic narrative on which they are founded. Omitting those portions of the text of Gen. ii. 8-14 which do not bear upon the geographical position of Eden, the description is as follows:—"And the Lord God planted a garden in Eden eastward. . . . And a river goeth forth from Eden to water the garden; and from thence it is divided and becomes four heads (or arms). The name of the first is Pison: that is it which compasseth the whole land of Havilah where is the gold. And the gold of that land is good: there is the bdellium and the onyx stone. And the name of the second river is Gihon; that is it which compasseth the whole land of Cush. And the name of the third river is Hiddekel; that is it which floweth before Assyria. And the fourth river, that is Euphrates." In the eastern portion then of the region of Eden was the garden planted. The river which flowed through Eden watered the garden, and thence branched off into four distinct streams. The first problem to be solved then is this:—To find a river which, at some stage of its course, is divided into four streams, two of which are the Tigris and Euphrates. The identity of these rivers with the Hiddekel and P'ath has never been disputed, and no hypothesis which omits them is worthy of consideration. Setting aside minor differences of detail, the theories which have been framed with regard to the situation of the terrestrial paradise naturally divide themselves into two classes. The first class includes all those which place the garden of Eden below the junction of the Euphrates and Tigris, and interpret the names Pison and Gihon of certain portions of these rivers: the second, those which seek for it in the high table-land of Armenia, the fruitful parent of many noble streams. The old versions supply us with little or no assistance. It would be a hopeless task to attempt to chronicle the opinions of all the commentators upon this question: their name is legion. Philo is the first who ventured upon an allegorical interpretation. He conceived that by paradise is darkly shadowed forth the governing faculty of the soul; that the tree of life signifies religion, whereby the soul is immortalised; and by the faculty of knowing good and evil the middle sense, by which are discerned things contrary to nature. The four rivers he explains of the several virtues of prudence, temperance, courage, and justice; while the main stream of which they are branches is the generic virtue, goodness, which goeth forth from Eden, the wisdom of God. The opinions of Philo would not be so much worthy of consideration, were it not that he has been followed by many of the Fathers. Among the Hebrew traditions enumerated by Jerome is one that paradise was created before the world was formed, and is therefore beyond its limits. Among the literal interpreters there is an infinite diversity of opinions. What is the river which goes forth from Eden to water the garden? is a question which has been often asked, and still waits for a satisfactory answer. That the ocean stream which surrounded the earth was the source from which the four rivers flowed was the opinion of Josephus. It was the Shat-el-Arab, according to those who place the garden of Eden below the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates, and their conjecture would deserve consideration were it not that this stream cannot, with any degree of propriety, be said to rise in Eden. By those who refer the position of Eden to the highlands of Armenia, the "river" from which the four streams diverge is conceived to mean "a collection of springs," or a well-watered district. But this signification of the word is wholly without a parallel. According to some it was the Caspian sea. That the Hiddekel is the Tigris, and the P'ath the Euphrates, has never been denied, except by those who assume that the whole narrative is a myth which originated elsewhere, and was adapted by the Hebrews to their own geographical notions. With regard to the Pison, the most ancient and most universally received opinion identifies it with the Ganges. Josephus, Eusebius, and many others held this. But Rashi maintained that the Pison was the Nile. That the Pison was the Indus was an opinion current long before it was revived by Ewald and adopted by Kalisch. Philostorgius conjectured that it was the Hydaspes. Some have found the Pison in the Naharmalca, one of the artificial canals which formerly joined the Euphrates with the Tigris. Even those commentators who agree in placing the terrestrial Paradise on the Shat-el-Arab, the stream formed by the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates, between Ctesiphon and Apamea, are by no means unanimous as to which of the branches, into which this stream is again divided, the names Pison and Gihon are to be applied. Calvin conjectured that the Pison was the most easterly of these channels; Huet that it was the westernmost. The advocates of the theory that the true position of Eden is to be sought for in the mountains of Armenia have identified the Pison with the Phasis. Raumer endeavoured to prove that it was the Aras or Araxes, which flows into the Caspian Sea. Colonel Chesney, from the results of extensive observations in Armenia, was "led to infer that the rivers known by the comparatively modern names of Halys and Araxes are those which, in the book of Genesis, have the names of Pison and Gihon; and that the country within the former is the land of Havilah, whilst that which borders upon the latter is the still more remarkable country of Cush." In the narrative of Genesis the river Pison is defined as that which surrounds the whole land of Havilah. It is, then, absolutely necessary, to fix the position of Havilah before proceeding to identify the Pison with any particular river. In Gen. ii. 11, 12, it is described as the land where the best gold was found, and which was besides rich in the treasures of the ôdolach and the stone shoham. If the Havilah of Gen. ii. be identical with any one of the countries mentioned in Gen. x. 29, xxv. 18, 1 Sam. xv. 7, we must look for it on the east or south of Arabia, and probably not far from the Persian Gulf. That Havilah is that part of India through which the Ganges flows, and, more generally, the eastern region of the earth; that it is to be found in Susiana, in Ava, or in the Ural region, are conclusions necessarily following upon the assumptions with regard to the Pison. Hartmann, Reland, and Rosenmüller are in favour of Colchis, the scene of the legend of the Golden Fleece. For all these hypotheses there is no more support than the merest conjecture. The second river of Paradise presents difficulties not less insurmountable than the Pison. Those who maintained that the Pison was the Ganges held also that the Gihon was the Nile. The etymology of Gihon seems to indicate that it was a swiftly-flowing impetuous stream. According to Golius Jichon is the name given to the Oxus, which has, on this account, been assumed by Rosenmüller, Hartmann, and Michaelis to be the Gihon of Scripture. But the Araxa, too, is called by the Persians Jichon ar-Ras, and from this circumstance it has been adopted by Reland, Calmet, and Col. Chesney as the modern representative of the Gihon. Bochart and Huet contended that it was the easternmost of these channels by which the united streams of the Euphrates and Tigris fall into the Persian Gulf. Calvin considered it to be the most westerly. That it should be the Orontes, the Ganges, the Kur, or Cyrus, necessarily followed from the exigencies of the several theories. Rask and Verbrugge are in favour of the Gyndes of the ancients. From etymological considerations, Huet was induced to place Cush in Chusistan (2 K. xvii. 24), Leclerc in Cassiotis in Syria, and Reland in the "regio Cossæorum." Bochart identified it with Susiana, Link with the country about the Caucasus, and Hartmann with Bactria or Bálkh, the site of Paradise being, in this case, in the celebrated vale of Kashmir. The term Cush is generally applied in the Old Testament to the countries south of the Israelites. It was the southern limit of Egypt (Ez. xxix. 10), and apparently the most westerly of the provinces over which the rule of Ahasuerus extended, "from India even unto Ethiopia" (Esth. i. 1, viii. 9). Egypt and Cush are associated in the majority of instances in which the word occurs (Ps. lxxvii. 31; Is. xviii. 1; Jer. xli. 9, &c.); but in two passages Cush stands in close juxtaposition with Elam (Is. xi. 11), and Persia (Ez. xxxviii. 5). The Cushite king, Zerah, was utterly defeated by Asa at Mareshah, and pursued as far as Gerar, a town of the Philistines, on the southern border of Palestine, which was apparently under his sway (2 Chr. xiv. 9, &c.). In 2 Chr. xxi. 16, the Arabians are described as dwelling "beside the Cushites," and both are mentioned in connexion with the Philistines. The wife of Moses, who, we learn from Ex. ii., was the daughter of a Midianite chieftain, is in Num. xii. 1 denominated a Cushite. Further, Cush and Seba (Is. xliii. 3), Cush and the Sabæans (Is. xlv. 14) are associated in a manner consonant with the genealogy of the descendants of Ham (Gen. x. 7), in which Seba is the son of Cush. From all these circumstances it is evident that under the denomination Cush were included both Arabia and the country south of Egypt on the western coast of the Red Sea. It is possible, also, that the vast desert tracts west of Egypt were known to the Hebrews as the land of Cush, but of this we have no certain proof. In the midst of this diversity of opinions, what is the true conclusion at which we arrive? All the theories which have been advanced share the inevitable fate of conclusions which are based upon inadequate premises. The problem may be indeterminate because the data are insufficient. It would scarcely, on any other hypothesis, have admitted of so many apparent solutions.

Eden, 1. One of the marts which supplied the luxury of Tyre with richly embroidered stuffs. It is associated with Haran, Sheba, and Asshur. In 2 K. xix. 12, and Is. xxxvii. 12, "the sons of Eden" are mentioned with Gōzan, Haran, and Rezep, as victims of the Assyrian greed of conquest. According to Bochart, it may be Addan, or Addana, which geographers place on the Euphrates: Michaelis is in favour of the modern Aden, as the Edēz of Ezekiel. In the absence of positive evidence, probability seems to point to the N.W. of Mesopotamia as the locality of Eden.—2. BETH-EDEN, "house of pleasure;" probably the name of a country residence of the kings of Damascus (Am. i. 5). Michaelis, misled by an apparent resemblance in name, identified it with Ehden, about a day's journey from Baalbek. But Grotius, with greater appearance of probability, pointed to the Paradisus of Ptolemy as the locality of Eden. The ruins of the village of Jásieh el-Kadimeh, now a paradise no longer, are supposed by Dr. Robinson to mark its site. Others have conjectured that Beth Eden is no other than Beit-Jenn, "the house of Paradise," not far to the south-west of Damascus, on the eastern slope of the Helmon, and a short distance from Medjel.

Eden, 1. A Geshonite Levite, son of Joah, in the days of Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxix. 12).—2. Also a Levite, contemporary and probably identical with the preceding (2 Chr. xxxi. 15).

Eder, 1. One of the towns of Judah in the extreme south, and on the borders of Edom (Josh. xv. 21). No trace of it has been discovered in modern times, unless, as has been suggested, it is identical with ARAD, by a transposition of letters.—2. A Levite of the family of Merari, in the time of David (1 Chr. xxiii. 23, xxiv. 30).

Edes, 1 Eder. ix. 35. [JADAU.]

Edna, the wife of Raguel (Tob. vii. 2, 8, 14, 16; x. 12; xi. 1).

Edom, Idume'a, or Idumæa. The name Edom was given to Esau, the first-born son of Isaac, and twin brother of Jacob, when he sold his birthright to the latter for a meal of lentile pottage. The peculiar colour of the pottage gave rise to the name Edom, which signifies "red" (Gen. xxv. 29-34). The country which the Lord subsequently gave to Esau was hence called the "field of Edom" (Gen. xxiii. 3), or "land of Edom" (Gen. xxxvi. 16; Num. xxxiii. 37). Probably its physical aspect may have had something to do with this. Edom was previously called Mount Seir (Gen. xxxii. 3, xxxvi. 8), from Seir the progenitor of the Horites (Gen. xiv. 6, xxxvi. 20-22). The name Seir was perhaps adopted on account of its being descriptive of the "rugged" character of the territory. The original inhabitants of the country were called Horites, from Hori, the grandson of Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 20, 22), because that name was descriptive of their habits as "Troglydites," or "dwellers in caves." The boundaries of Edom, though not directly, are yet incidentally defined with tolerable distinctness in the Bible. The country lay along the route pursued by the Israelites from the peninsula of Sinai to Kadesh-barnea, and thence back again to Elath (Deut. i. 2, ii. 1-8); that is, along the east side of the great valley of Arabia. It reached southward as far as Elath, which stood at the northern end of the gulf of Elath, and was the seaport of the Edomites; but it does not seem to have extended farther, as the Israelites on passing Elath struck out eastward into the desert, so as to pass round the land of Edom (Deut. ii. 8). On the north of Edom lay the territory of Moab, through which the Israelites were also prevented from going, and were therefore compelled to go from Kadesh by the southern extremity of Edom (Judg. xi. 17, 18; 2 K. iii. 6-9). The boundary between Moab and Edom appears to have been the "brook Zered" (Deut. ii. 13, 14, 18), probably the modern Wady-el-Ahry, which still divides the provinces of Kerak (Moab) and Jebél (Gabalene). But Edom was wholly a mountainous country. It only embraced the narrow mountainous tract (about 100 miles long by 20 broad) extending along the eastern side of the Arabah from the northern end of the gulf of Elath to near the southern end of the Dead Sea. The mountain-range of Edom is at present divided into two districts. The northern is called Jebél. It begins at Wady-el-Ahry, which separates it from Kerak, and it terminates at or near Petra. The southern district is called esh-Sherah, a name which, though it resembles, bears no radical relation to the Hebrew Seir. The physical geography of Edom is somewhat peculiar. Along the western base of the mountain-range are low calcareous hills. To these succeed lofty masses of igneous rock, chiefly porphyry, over which lies red and variegated sandstone in irregular ridges and abrupt cliffs, with deep ravines between. The latter strata give the mountains their most striking features and remarkable colours. The average elevation of the summit is about 2000 feet above the sea. Along the eastern side runs an almost unbroken limestone ridge, a thousand feet or more higher than the other. This ridge sinks down with an easy slope into the plateau of the Arabian desert. While Edom is thus wild, rugged, and almost inaccessible, the deep glens and flat terraces along the mountain sides are covered with rich soil, from which trees, shrubs, and flowers now spring up luxuriantly. The ancient capital of Edom was Bozrah (Buseirah) near the northern border (Gen. xxxvi. 33; Is. xxxiv. 6, lxiii. 1; Jer. xlix. 13, 22). But Sela (Petra) appears to have been the principal stronghold in the days of Amaziah (B.C. 838; 2 K. xiv. 7); Elath, and Ezion-geber were the seaports (2 Sam. viii. 14; 1 K. ix. 26). When the kingdom of Israel began to decline, the Edomites not only reconquered their lost cities, but made frequent inroads upon southern Palestine (2 Chr. xxviii. 17). It was probably on account of these attacks, and of their uniting with the Chaldeans against the Jews, that the Edomites were so fearfully denounced by the later prophets (Obad. 1 sq.; Jer. xlix. 7 sq.; Ezek. xxv. 12 sq., xxxv. 3 sq.). During the Captivity they advanced westward, occupied the whole territory of their brethren the Amalekites (Gen. xxxvi. 12; 1 Sam. xv. 1 sq.), and even took possession of many towns in southern Palestine, including Hebron. The name Edom, or rather its Greek form, Idumaea, was now given to the country lying between the valley of Arabah and the shores of the Mediterranean. While Idumaea thus extended westward, Edom Proper was taken possession of by the Nabatheans. They were a powerful people, and held a great part of southern Arabia. They took Petra and established themselves there at least three centuries before Christ. Leaving off their nomad habits, they settled down amid the mountains of Edom, engaged in commerce, and founded the little kingdom called by Roman writers Arabia Petraea, which embraced nearly the same territory as the ancient Edom. To the Nabatheans Petra owes those great monuments which are still the wonder of the world. Early in the Christian era Edom Proper was included by geographers in Palestine, but in the fifth century a new division was made of the whole country into Palæstina Prima, Secunda, and Tertia. The last embraced Edom and some neighbouring provinces, and when it became an ecclesiastical division its metropolis was Petra.

Edomites, the descendants of Esau, or Edom. Their first form of government appears to have resembled that of the modern Bedawin; each tribe or clan having a petty chief or sheikh ("Duke" in the A. V., Gen. xxxvi. 15). The Horites, who inhabited Mount Seir from an early period, and among whom the Edomites still lived, had their sheikhs also (Gen. xxxvi. 29 sq.). At a later period, probably when the Edomites began a war of extermination against the Horites, they felt the necessity of united action under one competent leader, and then a king was chosen. Against the Horites the children of Edom were completely successful. Having either exterminated or expelled them they occupied their whole country (Deut. ii. 12). A statement made in Gen. xxxvi. 31, serves to fix the period of the dynasty of the eight kings. They "reigned in the land of Edom before there reigned any king over the children of Israel;" that is, before the time of Moses, who may be regarded as the first virtual king of Israel (comp. Deut. xxiii. 5; Ex. xviii. 16-19). Esau's bitter hatred to his brother Jacob for fraudulently obtaining his blessing appears to have been inherited by his latest posterity. The Edomites peremptorily refused to permit the Israelites to pass through their land (Num. xx. 18-21). For a period of 400 years we hear no more of the Edomites. They were then attacked and defeated by Saul (1 Sam. xiv. 47). Some forty years later David overthrew their army in the "Valley of Salt," and his general, Joab, following up the victory, destroyed nearly the whole male population (1 K. xi. 15, 16), and placed Jewish garrisons in all the strongholds of Edom (2 Sam. viii. 13, 14). Hadad, a member of the royal family of Edom, made his escape with a few followers to Egypt, where he was kindly received by Pharaoh. After the death of David he returned, and tried to excite his countrymen to rebellion against Israel, but failing in the attempt he went on to Syria, where he became one of Solomon's greatest enemies (1 K. xi. 14-22). In the reign of Jehoshaphat (B.C. 844) the Edomites attempted to invade Israel in conjunction with Ammon and Moab, but were miraculously destroyed in the valley of Berachah (2 Chr. xv. 22). A few years later they revolted against Jehoram, elected a king, and for half a century retained their independence (2 Chr. xxi. 8). They were then attacked by Amaziah, and Sela their great stronghold was captured (2 K. xiv. 7; 2 Chr. xxv. 11, 12). Yet the Israelites were never able again completely to subdue them (2 Chr. xxviii. 17). When Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem the Edomites joined him, and took an active part in the plunder of the city and slaughter of the Jews. Their cruelty at that time seems to be specially referred to in the 137th Psalm. It was on account of these acts of cruelty committed upon the Jews in the day of their calamity that the Edomites were so fearfully denounced by the later prophets (Is. xxxiv. 5-8, lxiii. 1-4; Jer. xlix. 17; Lam. iv. 21; Ez. xxv. 13, 14; Am. i. 11, 12; Obad. 10 sq.). On the conquest of Judah, the Edomites, probably in reward for their services during the war, were permitted to settle in southern Palestine, and the whole plateau between it and Egypt; but they were about the same time driven out of Edom Proper by the Nabatheans. For more than four centuries they continued to prosper. But during the warlike rule of the Maccabees they were again completely subdued, and even forced to conform to Jewish laws and rites, and submit to the government of Jewish prefects. The Edomites were now incorporated with the Jewish nation, and the whole province was often termed by Greek and Roman writers Idumæa. Immediately before the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, 20,000 Idumæans were admitted to the Holy City, which they filled with robbery and bloodshed. From this time the Edomites, as a separate people, disappear from the page of history. Little is known of their religion; but that little shows them to have been idolaters (2 Chr. xxv. 14, 15, 20). Josephus refers to both the idols and priests of the Idumæans. The habits of the Idumæans were singular. The Horites, their predecessors in Mount Seir, were, as their name implies, troglydites, or dwellers in caves; and the Edomites seem to have adopted their dwellings as well as their country. Everywhere we meet with caves and grottoes hewn in the soft sandstone strata. Those at Petra are well known. The nature of the climate, the dryness of the soil, and their great size, render them healthy, pleasant, and commodious habitations, while their security made them specially suitable to a country exposed in every age to incessant attacks of robbers.

Edrei, 1. One of the two capital cities of Bashan (Num. xxi. 33; Deut. i. 4, iii. 10; Josh. xii. 4). In Scripture it is only mentioned in connexion with the victory gained by the Israelites over the Amorites under Og their king, and the territory thus acquired. The ruins of this ancient city, still bearing the name Edr'a, stand on a rocky promontory which projects from the S.W. corner of the Lejah. The site is a strange one—without water, without access, except over rocks and through defiles all but impracticable. The ruins are nearly three miles in circumference, and have a strange wild look, rising up in black shattered masses from the midst of a wilderness of black rocks. A number of the old houses still remain; they are low, massive, and gloomy, and some of them are half buried beneath heaps of rubbish. The identity of this site with the Edrei of Scripture has been questioned by many writers, who follow the doubtful testimony of Eusebius, and place the capital of Bashan at the modern Der'a, a few miles farther south. — 2. A town of northern Palestine, allotted to the tribe of Naphtali, and situated near Kedesh (Josh. xix. 37). About two miles south of Kedesh is a conical rocky hill called Tell K'huribeh, the "Tell of the ruin." It is evidently an old site, and it may be that of the long-lost Edrei. The strength of the position, and its nearness to Kedesh, give probability to the supposition.

Education. Although nothing is more carefully inculcated in the Law than the duty of parents to teach their children its precepts and principles (Ex. xii. 26, xiii. 8, 14; Deut. iv. 5, 9, 10, vi. 2, 7, 20, &c.), yet there is little trace among the Hebrews in earlier times of education in any other subjects. The wisdom therefore and instruction, of which so much is said in the Book of Proverbs, are to be understood chiefly of moral and religious discipline, imparted, according to the direction of the Law, by the teaching and under the example of parents (Prov. i. 2, 8, ii. 2, 10, iv. 1, 7, 20, viii. 1, ix. 1, 10, xii. 1, xvi. 22, xviii. 24, &c.). Exceptions to this statement may perhaps be found in the instances of Moses himself, who was brought up in all Egyptian learning (Acts vii. 22); of the writer of the book of Job, who was evidently well versed in natural history and in the astronomy of the day (Job xxxviii. 31, xxxix. xl. xli.); of Daniel and his companions in captivity (Dan. i. 4, 17); and above all, in the intellectual gifts and acquirements of Solomon, which were even more renowned than his political greatness (1 K. iv. 29, 34, x. 1-9; 2 Chr. ix. 1-8), and the memory of which has, with much exaggeration, been widely preserved in Oriental tradition. In later times the prophecies, and comments on them as well as on the earlier Scriptures, together with other subjects, were studied. Jerome adds that Jewish children were taught to say by heart the genealogies. Parents were required to teach their children some trade. Previous to the captivity, the chief depositaries of learning were the schools or colleges, from which in most cases (see Am. vii. 14) proceeded that succession of public teachers, who at various times endeavoured to reform the moral and religious conduct of both rulers and people. Besides the prophetic schools instruction was given by the priests in the Temple and elsewhere, but their subjects were doubtless exclusively concerned with religion and worship (Lev. x. 11; Ez. xlv. 23, 24; 1 Chr. xxv. 7, 8; Mal. ii. 7). From the time of the settlement in Canaan there must have been among the Jews persons skilled in writing and in accounts. Perhaps the neighbourhood of the tribe of Zebulun to the commercial district of Phœnicia may have been the occasion of their reputation in this respect (Judg. v. 14). The municipal officers of the kingdom, especially in the time of Solomon, must have required a staff of well-educated persons in their various departments under the recorder or historiographer, whose business was to compile memorials of the reign (2 Sam. viii. 16, xx. 24; 2 K. xviii. 18; 2 Chr. xxiv. 8). To the schools of the Prophets succeeded, after the captivity, the synagogues, which were either themselves used as schools or had places near them for that purpose. After the destruction of Jerusalem, colleges were maintained for a long time at Japhne in Galilee, at Lydda, at Tiberias, the most famous of all, and Sepphoris. According to the principles laid down in the Mishna, boys at five years of age were to begin the Scriptures, at ten the Mishna, at thirteen they became subject to the whole law, at fifteen they entered the Gemara. Teachers were treated with great respect, and both pupils and teachers were exhorted to respect each other. Physical science formed part of the course of instruction. In the schools the Rabbins sat on raised seats, and the scholars, according to their age, sat on benches below or on the ground. Of female education we have little account in Scripture. Needlework formed a large but by no means the only subject of instruction imputed to females, whose position in society and in the household must by no means be considered as represented in modern Oriental usage (see Prov. xxxi. 16, 26; Luke viii. 2, 3, x. 39, &c.). Among the Mohammedans, education, even of boys, is of a most elementary kind, and of girls still more limited. In one respect it may be considered as the likeness or the caricature of the Jewish system, viz. that besides the most common rules of arithmetic, the Kur'an is made the staple, if not the only subject of instruction.

Eglah, one of David's wives during his reign in Hebron, and the mother of his son Ithream (2 Sam. iii. 5; 1 Chr. iii. 3). According to the ancient Hebrew tradition, she was Michal.

C.

Eglaim, a place named only in Is. xv. 8, and here apparently as one of the most remote points on the boundary of Moab. It is probably the same as EN-EGLAIM.

Eglon, a king of the Moabites (Judg. iii. 12 ff.), who, aided by the Ammonites and the Amalekites, crossed the Jordan and took "the city of palm-trees." Here, according to Josephus, he built himself a palace, and continued for eighteen years to oppress the children of Israel, who paid him tribute. The circumstances of his death are somewhat differently given in Judges and in Josephus. In Judges the Israelites send a present by Ehud (iii. 15); in Josephus Ehud wins his favour by repeated presents of his own. In Judges we have two scenes, the offering of the pre-ent and the death scene (18, 19); in Josephus there is but one scene. In Judges the place seems to change from the reception-room into the "summer-parlour," where Ehud found him upon his return (cf. 18, 20). In Josephus the entire action takes place in the summer-parlour. The obesity of Eglon, and the consequent impossibility of recovering the dagger, are not mentioned by Josephus. After this desperate achievement Ehud repaired to Seirah in the mountains of Ephraim (iii. 26, 27), or Mount Ephraim (Josh. xix. 50). To this wild central region, commanding, as it did, the plains E. and W., he summoned the Israelites by sound of horn. Descending from the hills they fell upon the Moabites, and not one of the fugitives escaped.

Eglon, a town of Judah in the low country (Josh. xv. 39). During the struggles of the conquest, Eglon was one of a confederacy of five towns, which under Jeusaleim attempted resistance, by attacking Gibeon after the treaty of the latter with Israel (Josh. x.). The name doubtless survives in the modern Ajlun, a shapeless mass of ruins, about 10 miles from Beit Jibrin (Eleutheropolis) and 14 from Gaza, on the S. of the great maritime plain.

Egypt, a country occupying the north-eastern angle of Africa, and lying between N. lat. 31° 37' and 24° 1', and E. long. 27° 13' and 34° 12'. Its limits appear always to have been very nearly the same. In Ezekiel (xxix. 10, xxx. 6) the whole country is spoken of as extending from Migdol to Syene, which indicates the same limits to the east and the south as at present.—Names. The common name of Egypt in the Bible is "Mizraim," or more fully "the land of Mizraim." In form Mizraim is a dual, and accordingly it is generally joined with a plural verb. When, therefore, in Gen. x. 6, Mizraim is mentioned as a son of Ham, we must not conclude that anything more is meant than that Egypt was colonized by descendants of Ham. The dual number doubtless indicates the natural division of the country into an upper and a lower region. The singular Mazar also occurs, and some suppose that it indicates Lower Egypt, but there is no sure ground for this assertion. The Arabic name of Egypt Misr signifies "red mud." Egypt is also called in the Bible "the land of Ham" (Ps. cv. 23, 27; comp. lxxviii. 51), a name most probably referring to Ham the son of Noah; and "Rahab," the proud or insolent: both these appear to be poetical appellations. The common ancient Egyptian name of the country is written in hieroglyphics KEM, which was perhaps pronounced Chem; the demotic form is KEMEE. This name signifies, alike in the ancient language and in Coptic, "black," and may be supposed to have been given to the land on account of the blackness of its alluvial soil. We may reasonably conjecture that Kem is the Egyptian equivalent of Ham, and also of Mazar, these two words being similar or even the same in sense. Under the Pharaohs Egypt was divided into Upper and Lower, "the two regions" TA-TEE? called respectively "the Southern Region" TA-RES, and "the Northern Region" TA-MEHEET. There were different crowns for the two regions. In subsequent times this double division obtained. In the time of the Greeks and Romans Upper Egypt was divided into the Heptanomis and the Thebais, making altogether three provinces, but the division of the whole country into two was even then the most usual.—Superficies. Egypt has a superficies of about 9582 square geographical miles of soil, which the Nile either does or can water and fertilize. This computation includes the river and lakes as well as sandy tracts which can be inundated; but the whole space either cultivated or fit for cultivation is no more than about 5626 square miles. Anciently 2735 square miles more may have been cultivated, and now it would be possible at once to reclaim about 1295 square miles.—Nomes. From a remote period Egypt was divided into Nomes HESPU, sing. HESP, each one of which had its special objects of worship. There is no distinct reference to them in the Bible.—General appearance, Climate, &c. The general appearance of the country cannot have greatly changed since the days of Moses. The Delta was always a vast level plain, although of old more perfectly watered than now by the branches of the Nile and numerous canals, while the narrow valley of Upper Egypt must have suffered still less alteration. Anciently, however, the rushes must have been abundant; whereas now they have almost disappeared, except in the lakes. The whole country is remarkable for its extreme fertility, which especially strikes the beholder when the rich green of the fields is contrasted with the utterly bare yellow mountains or the sand-strewn rocky desert on either side. The climate is equable and healthy. Rain is not very unfrequent on the northern coast, but inland very rare. Cultivation nowhere depends upon it. This absence of rain is mentioned in Deut. (xi. 10, 11) as rendering artificial irrigation necessary, unlike the case of Palestine, and in Zech. (xiv. 18) as peculiar to the country. Egypt has been visited in all ages by severe pestilences, but it cannot be determined that any of those of ancient times were of the character of the modern Plague. Famines are frequent, and one in the middle ages, in the time of the Fatimæ Khaleefeh El-Mustansir-billah, seems to have been even more severe than that of Joseph.—Geology. The fertile plain of the Delta and the valley of Upper Egypt are bounded by rocky deserts covered or strewn with sand. On either side of the plain they are low, but they overlook the valley, above which they rise so steeply as from the river to present the aspect of cliffs. The formation is limestone as far as a little above Thebes, where sandstone begins. The First Cataract, the southern limit of Egypt, is caused by granite and other primitive rocks, which rise through the sandstone and obstruct the river's bed. An important geological change has in the course of centuries raised the country near the head of the Gulf of Suez, and depressed that on the northern side of the isthmus. Since the Christian era the head of the Gulf has retired southwards.—The Nile. In Egyptian the Nile bore the sacred appellation HAPPE or HAPPE-MU, "the abyss," or "the abyss of waters." As Egypt was divided into two regions, we find two Niles, HAPPEE-RES, "the Southern Nile," and HAPPEE-MEHET "the Northern Nile," the former name being given to the river in Upper Egypt and in Nubia. The inundation fertilises and sustains the country, and makes the river its chief blessing. The Nile was on this account anciently worshipped. The rise begins in Egypt about the summer solstice, and the inundation commences about two months later. The greatest height is attained about or somewhat after the autumnal equinox. The inundation lasts about three months.—Cultivation, Agriculture, &c. The ancient prosperity of Egypt is attested by the Bible as well as by the numerous monuments of the country. As early as the age of the Great Pyramid it must have been densely populated. The contrast of the present state of Egypt to its former prosperity is more to be ascribed to political than to physical causes. Egypt is naturally an agricultural country. As far back as the days of Abraham, we find that when the produce failed in Palestine, Egypt was the natural resource. In the time of Joseph it was evidently the granary, at least during famines, of the nations around. The inundation, as taking the place of rain, has always rendered the system of agriculture peculiar; and the artificial irrigation during the time of low Nile is necessarily on the same principle. Watering with the foot (Deut. xi. 10, 11) may refer to some mode of irrigation by a machine, but the monuments do not afford a representation of it.

Shádóof, or pole and bucket for watering the garden. (Wilkinson.)

That now called the shádóof is depicted, and seems to have been the common means of artificial irrigation. There are detailed pictures of breaking up the earth, or ploughing, sowing, harvest, threshing, and storing the wheat in granaries. Vines were extensively cultivated. Of other fruit-trees, the date-palm was the most common and valuable. The gardens resembled the fields, being watered in the same manner by irrigation. On the tenure of land much light is thrown by the history of Joseph. Before the famine each city and large village had its field (Gen. xli. 48); but Joseph gained for Pharaoh all the land, except that of the priests, in exchange for food, and required for the right thus obtained a fifth of the produce, which became a law (xlvii. 20-26). The evidence of the monuments, though not very explicit, seems to show that this law was ever afterwards in force under the Pharaohs. The great lakes in the north of Egypt were anciently of high importance, especially for their fisheries and the growth of the papyrus. The canals are now far less numerous than of old, and many of them are choked and comparatively useless.—

Granary, showing how the grain was put in, and that the doors at b were intended for taking it out. (Wilkinson.)

Botany.—The cultivable land of Egypt consists almost wholly of fields, in which are very few trees. There are no forests and few groves, except of date-palms, and in Lower Egypt a few of orange and lemon-trees. There are also sycomores, mulberry-trees, and acacias, either planted on the sides of roads or standing singly in the fields. The Theban palm grows in the Thebais, generally in clumps. These were all, except perhaps the mulberry-tree, of old common in the country. The chief fruits are the date, grape, fig, sycamore-fig, pomegranate, banana, many kinds of melons, and the olive; and there are many others less common or important. These were also of old produced in the country. The vegetables are of many kinds and excellent, and form the chief food of the common people. The most important field-produce in ancient times was wheat; after it must be placed barley, millet, flax, and among the vegetables, lentils, peas, and beans. It is clear from the evidence of the monuments and of ancient writers that, of old, reeds were far more common in Egypt than now. The byblus or papyrus is almost or quite unknown. Anciently it was a common and most important plant: boats were made of its stalks, and of their thin leaves the famous paper was manufactured. The lotus was anciently the favourite flower, and at feasts it took the place of the rose among the Greeks and Arabs: it is now very rare.—Zoology.—Of old Egypt was far more a pastoral country than at present. The neat cattle are still excellent, but lean kine are more common among them than they seem to have been in the days of Joseph's Pharaoh (Gen. xli. 19). Sheep and goats have always been numerous. Anciently swine were kept, but not in great numbers; now there are none, or scarcely any. Under the Pharaohs the horses of the country were in repute among the neighbouring nations, who purchased them as well as chariots out of Egypt. Asses were anciently numerous: the breed at the present time is excellent. Dogs were formerly more prized than now, or being held by most of the Muslims to be extremely unclean, they are only used to watch the houses in the villages. The camel has nowhere been found mentioned in the inscriptions of Egypt, or represented on the monuments. It is probable that camels were not kept in Egypt, but only on the frontier. The deserts have always abounded in wild animals, especially of the canine and antelope kinds. Anciently the hippopotamus was found in the Egyptian Nile, and hunted. Now, this animal is rarely seen even in Lower Nubia. The elephant may have been, in the remotest historical period, an inhabitant of Egypt, and, as a land animal, have been driven further south than the hippopotamus. Bats abound in the temples and tombs. The birds of Egypt are not remarkable for beauty of plumage: in so open a country this is natural. The Rapaces are numerous, but the most common are scavengers, as vultures and the kite. The Grallatores and Anseres abound on the islands and sandbanks of the river and in the sides of the mountains which approach or touch the stream. Among the reptiles, the crocodile must be especially mentioned. In the Bible it is usually called tannin or tannim, "dragon," a generic word of almost as wide a signification as "reptile," and is used as a symbol of the king of Egypt (Ez. xxix. 3-5). But "leviathan" appears to be the special name of that animal. Frogs are very numerous in Egypt, and their loud and constant croaking in the autumn makes it not difficult to picture the Plague of Frogs. Serpents and snakes are also common, but the more venomous have their home, like the scorpion, in the desert (comp. Deut. viii. 15). The Nile and lakes have an abundance of fish. Among the insects the locusts must be mentioned, which sometimes come upon the cultivated land in a cloud. As to the lice and flies, they are still plagues of Egypt.—Ancient Inhabitants.—The old inhabitants of Egypt appear from their monuments and the testimony of ancient writers to have occupied in race a place between the Nigritians and the Caucasians. They were in character very religious and contemplative, but given to base superstition, patriotic, respectful to women, hospitable, generally frugal, but at times luxurious, very sensual, lying, thievish, treacherous and cringing, and intensely prejudiced, though pride of race, against strangers, although kind to them. This is very much the character of the modern inhabitants, except that Mohammedanism has taken away the respect for women.—Language.—The ancient Egyptian language, from the earliest period at which it is known to us, is an agglutinate monosyllabic form of speech. It is expressed by the signs which we call hieroglyphics. The character of the language is compound: it consists of elements resembling those of the Nigritian languages and the Chinese language on the one hand, and those of the Shemitic languages on the other. As early as the age of the xviii dynasty a vulgar dialect was expressed in the demotic or enchorial writing. This dialect forms the link connecting the old language with the Coptic, which does not very greatly differ from the monumental language, except in the presence of many Greek words.—Religion.—The basis of the religion was Nigritian fetishism, the lowest kind of nature-worship, differing in different parts of the country, and hence obviously indigenous. Upon this were engrafted, first, cosmic worship, mixed up with traces of primeval revelation, as in Babylonia; and then, a system of personifications of moral and intellectual abstractions. There were three orders of gods—the eight great gods, the twelve lesser, and the Osirian group. There was no prominent hero-worship, although deceased kings and other individuals often received divine honours. The great doctrines of the immortality of the soul, man's responsibility, and future rewards and punishments, were taught. Among the rites, circumcision is the most remarkable: it is as old as the time of the ivth dynasty. The Israelites in Egypt appear during the oppression, for the most part, to have adopted the Egyptian religion (Josh. xxiv. 14; Ez. xx. 7, 8). The golden calf, or rather steer, was probably taken from the bull Apis, certainly from one of the sacred bulls. Remphan and Chiun were foreign divinities adopted into the Egyptian Pantheon. Ashtoreth was worshipped at Memphis. Doubtless this worship was introduced by the Phœnician Shepherds.—Laws.—We have no complete account of the laws of the ancient Egyptians either in their own records or in works of ancient writers. The paintings and sculptures of the monuments indicate a very high degree of personal safety, showing us that the people of all ranks commonly went unarmed, and without military protection. Capital punishment appears to have been almost restricted, in practice, to murder. Crimes of violence were more severely treated than offences against religion and morals. Popular feeling seems to have taken the duties of the judge upon itself in the case of impiety alone (Ex. viii. 26).—Government.—The government was monarchical, but not of an absolute character. The sovereign was not superior to the laws, and the priests had the power to check the undue exercise of his authority. Nomes and districts were governed by officers whom the Greeks called nomarchs and toparchs. There seems to have been no hereditary aristocracy, except perhaps at the earliest period.—Foreign Policy.—The foreign policy of the Egyptians must be regarded in its relation to the admission of foreigners into Egypt and to the treatment of tributary and allied nations. In the former aspect it was characterized by an exclusiveness which sprang from a national hatred of the yellow and white races, and was maintained by the wisdom of preserving the institutions of the country from the influence of the pirates of the Mediterranean and the Indian Ocean, and the robbers of the deserts. Hence the jealous exclusion of the Greeks from the northern ports until Naucratis was opened to them, and hence too the restriction of Shemite settlers in earlier times to the land of Go-hen, scarcely regarded as part of Egypt. The general policy of the Egyptians towards their eastern tributaries seems to have been marked by great moderation. The Pharaohs intermarried with them, and neither forced upon them Egyptian garrisons, except in some important positions, nor attempted those deportations that are so marked a feature of Asiatic policy. In the case of those nations which never attacked them they do not appear to have even exacted tribute. So long as their general supremacy was uncontested they would not be unwise enough to make favourable or neutral powers their enemies. Of their relation to the Israelites we have for the earlier part of this period no direct information. The explicit account of the later part is fully consistent with the general policy of the Pharaohs. Shishak and Zerah are the only exceptions in a series of friendly kings, and they were almost certainly of Assyrian or Babylonian extraction.—With respect to the African nations a different policy appears to have been pursued. The Rebu (Lebu) or Lubim, to the west of Egypt, on the north coast, were reduced to subjection, and probably employed, like the Shayretana or Cherethim, as mercenaries. Ethiopia was made a purely Egyptian province, ruled by a viceroy, "the Prince of Kesh (Cush)," and the assimilation was so complete that Ethiopian sovereigns seem to have been received by the Egyptians as native rulers. Further south, the Negroes were subject to predatory attacks like the slave-hunts of modern times.—Army.—There are some notices of the Egyptian army in the O. T. They show, like the monuments, that its most important branch was the chariot-force. The Pharaoh of the Exodus led 600 chosen chariots besides his whole chariot-force in pursuit of the Israelites. The warriors fighting in chariots are probably the "horsemen" mentioned in the relation of this event and elsewhere, for in Egyptian they are called the "horse" or "cavalry." We have no subsequent indication in the Bible of the constitution of an Egyptian army until the time of the xxiid dynasty, when we find that Shishak's invading force was partly composed of foreigners; whether mercenaries or allies, cannot as yet be positively determined, although the monuments make it most probable that they were of the former character. The army of Necho, defeated at Carchemish, seems to have been similarly composed, although it probably contained Greek mercenaries, who soon afterwards became the most important foreign element in the Egyptian forces.—Domestic Life.—The sculptures and paintings of the tombs give us a very full insight into the domestic life of the ancient Egyptians, as may be seen in Sir G. Wilkinson's great work. What most strikes us in their manners is the high position occupied by women, and the entire absence of the harem system of seclusion. Marriage appears to have been universal, at least with the richer class; and if polygamy were tolerated it was rarely practised. Concubinage was allowed, the concubines taking the place of inferior wives. There were no castes, although great classes were very distinct. The occupations of the higher class were the superintendence of their fields and gardens; their diversions, the pursuit of game in the deserts, or on the river, and fishing. The tending of cattle was left to the most despised of the lower class. The Egyptian feasts, and the dances, music, and feasts which accompanied them, for the diversion of the guests, as well as the common games, were probably introduced among the Hebrews in the most luxurious days of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah. The account of the noontide dinner of Joseph (Gen. xliii. 16, 31-34) agrees with the representations of the monuments. The funeral ceremonies were far more important than any events of the Egyptian life as the tomb was regarded as the only true home.—Literature and Art.—The Egyptians were a very literary people, and time has preserved to us, besides the inscriptions of their tombs and temples, many papyri, of a religious or historical character, and one tale. They bear no resemblance to the books of the O. T., except such as arises from their sometimes enforcing moral truths in a manner not wholly different from that of the Book of Proverbs. The moral and religious system is, however, essentially different in its principles and their application. In science, Egyptian influence may be distinctly traced in the Pentateuch. Moses was "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians" (Acts vii. 22), and probably derived from them the astronomical knowledge which was necessary for the calendar. The Egyptians excelled in geometry and mechanics. In medicine and surgery, high proficiency was probably of but little use to the Hebrews after the Exodus. In the arts of architecture, sculpture, and painting, the former of which was the chief, there seems to have been but a very slight influence.—Magicians.—We find frequent reference in the Bible to the magicians of Egypt (Gen. xli. 8; Ex. vii. 11, &c.). The monuments do not recognise any such art, and we must conclude that magic was secretly practised, not because it was thought to be unlawful, but in order to give it importance.—Industrial Arts.—The industrial arts held an important place in the occupations of the Egyptians. The workers in fine flax and the weavers of white linen are mentioned in a manner that shows they were among the chief contributors to the riches of the country (Is. xix. 9). The fine linen of Egypt found its way to Palestine (Prov. vii. 16). Pottery was a great branch of the native manufactures, and appears to have furnished employment to the Hebrews during the bondage (Ps. lxxxi. 6, lxviii. 13; comp. Ex. i. 14).—Festivals.—The religious festivals were numerous, and some of them were, in the days of Herodotus, kept with great merry-making and license. The feast which the Israelites celebrated when Aaron had made the golden calf seems to have been very much of the same character.—Manners of Modern Inhabitants.—The manners of the modern inhabitants are more similar to those of the ancient Hebrews, on account of Arab influence, than the manners of their predecessors.—CHRONOLOGY AND HISTORY.—The subject may be divided into three main branches, technical chronology, historical chronology, and history:—1. Technical Chronology.—That the Egyptians used various periods of time, and made astronomical observations from a remote age, is equally attested by ancient writers, and by their monuments. There appear to have been at least three years-in use with the Egyptians before the Roman domination, the Vague Year, the Tropical Year, and the Sothic Year; but it is not probable that more than two of these were employed at the same time. The Vague Year contained 367 days without any additional fraction, and therefore passed through all the seasons in about 1500 years. It was both used for civil and for religious purposes. The Vague Year was divided into twelve months, each of thirty days, with five additional days, after the twelfth. The months were assigned to three seasons, each comprising four months, called respectively the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and 4th of those seasons. The names by which the Egyptian month are commonly known, Thoth, Paophi, &c., are taken from the divinities to which they were sacred. The seasons are called, according to our rendering, those of Vegetation, Manifestation, and the Waters or the Inundation: the exact meaning of their names has however been much disputed. They evidently refer to the phenomena of a Tropical Year, and such a year we must therefore conclude the Egyptians to have had, at least in a remote period of their history. The Sothic Year was a supposed sidereal year of 365½ days, commencing with the so-called heliacal rising of Sothis. The Vague Year, having no intercalation, constantly retreated through the Sothic Year, until a period of 1461 years of the former kind, and 1460 of the latter had elapsed, from one coincidence of commencements to another. The Egyptians are known to have used two great cycles, the Sothic Cycle and the Tropical Cycle. The former was a cycle of the coincidence of the Sothic and Vague Years, and therefore consisted of 1460 years of the former kind. The Tropical Cycle was a cycle of the coincidence of the Tropical and Vague Years. It has been supposed by M. Biot to have a duration of 1505 years; but the length of 1500 Vague Years is preferable. The monuments make mention of Panegyric Months, which can only, we believe, be periods of thirty years each, and divisions of a year of the same kind.—2. Historical Chronology.—The materials for historical chronology are the monuments and the remains of the historical work of Manetho. The remains of Manetho's historical work consist of a list of the Egyptian dynasties and two considerable fragments, one relating to the Shepherds, the other to a tale of the Exodus. The list is only known to us in the epitome given by Africanus, preserved by Syncellus, and that given by Eusebius. These present such great differences that it is not reasonable to hope that we can restore a correct text. The series of dynasties is given as if they were successive, in which case the commencement of the first would be placed full 5000 years B.C., and the reign of the king who built the Great Pyramid 4000. The monuments do not warrant so extreme an antiquity, and the great majority of Egyptologists have therefore held that the dynasties were partly contemporary. The evidence of the monuments leads to the same conclusion. Kings who unquestionably belong to different dynasties are shown by them to be contemporary. The monuments will not, in our opinion, justify any great extension of the period assigned to the first seventeen dynasties (B.C. 2700-1500). The last date, that of the commencement of the xviii dynasty, cannot be changed more than a few years. The date of the beginning of the 1st dynasty, which we are disposed to place a little before B.C. 2700, is more doubtful, but a concurrence of astronomical evidence points to the twenty-eighth century. Some have supposed a much greater antiquity for the commencement of Egyptian history. Lepsius places the accession of Menes B.C. 3892, and Bunsen, two hundred years later. Their system is founded upon a passage in the chronological work of Syncellus, which assigns a duration of 3555 to the thirty dynasties. It is by no means certain that this number is given on the authority of Manetho, but apart from this, the whole statement is unmistakeably not from the true Manetho.—3. History.—That Egypt was colonised by the descendants of Noah in a very remote age is shown by the mention of the migration of the Philistines from Caphtor, which had taken place before the arrival of Abraham in Palestine. Before this migration could occur the Caphtorim and other Mizraites must have occupied Egypt for some time. A remarkable passage points to a knowledge of the date at which an ancient city of Egypt was founded. The evidence of the Egyptians as to the primeval history of their race and country is extremely indefinite. They seem to have separated mankind into two great stocks, and each of these again into two branches, for they appear to have represented themselves and the Negroes, the red and black races, as the children of the god Horus, and the Shemites and Europeans, the yellow and white races, as the children of the goddess Pesht. They seem therefore, to have held a double origin of the species. The absence of any important traditional period is very remarkable in the fragments of Egyptian history. These commence with the divine dynasties, and pass abruptly to the human dynasties. The indications are of a sudden change of seat, and the settlement in Egypt of a civilized race, which, either wishing to be believed autochthonous, or having lost all ties that could keep up the traditions of its first dwelling-place, filled up the commencement of its history with materials drawn from mythology. There is no trace of the tradition of the Deluge which is found in almost every other country of the world. The priests are indeed reported to have told Solon when he spoke of one deluge that many had occurred, but the reference is more likely to have been to great floods of the Nile than to any extraordinary catastrophes. The history of the dynasties preceding the xviii is not told by any continuous series of monuments. Except those of the ivth and xiii dynasties there are scarcely any records of the age left to the present day, and thence in a great measure arises the difficulty of determining the chronology. From the time of Menes, the first king, until the Shepherd-invasion, Egypt seems to have enjoyed perfect tranquillity. During this age the Memphite line was the most powerful, and by it, under the ivth dynasty, were the most famous pyramids raised. The Shepherds were foreigners who came from the East, and, in some manner unknown to Manetho, gained the rule of Egypt. Those whose kings composed the xvth dynasty were the first and most important. They appear to have been Phœnicians. Most probably the Pharaoh of Abraham was of this line. The period of Egyptian history to which the Shepherd-invasion should be assigned is a point of dispute. It is generally placed after the xiiith dynasty, for it is argued that this powerful line could not have reigned at the same time as one or more Shepherd-dynasties. We are of opinion that this objection is not valid, and that the Shepherd-invasion was anterior to the xiiith dynasty. The rule of the xiiith dynasty, which was of Thebans, lasting about 160 years, was a period of prosperity to Egypt, but after its close those calamities appear to have occurred which made the Shepherds hated by the Egyptians. During the interval to the xviith dynasty there seems to have been no native line of any importance but that of the Thebans, and more than one Shepherd dynasty exercised a severe rule over the Egyptians.—We must here notice the history of the Israelites in Egypt with reference to the dynasty of the Pharaohs who favoured them, and that of their oppressors. According to the scheme of Biblical Chronology which we believe to be the most probable, the whole sojourn in Egypt would belong to the period before the xviith dynasty. The Israelites would have come in and gone forth during that obscure age for the history of which we have little or no monumental evidence. This would explain the absence of any positive mention of them on the Egyptian monuments. Since the Pharaoh of Joseph must have been a powerful ruler and held Lower Egypt, there can be no question that he was, if the dates be correct, a shepherd of the xvth dynasty. The "new king" "which knew not Joseph," is generally thought by those who hold with us as to the previous history, to have been an Egyptian, and head of the xviith dynasty. It seems at first sight extremely probable that the king who crushed, if he did not expel the Shepherds, would be the first oppressor of the nation which they protected. If we conclude that the Exodus most probably occurred before the xviith dynasty, we have to ascertain, if possible, whether the Pharaohs of the oppression appear to have been Egyptians or Shepherds. The change of policy is in favour of their having been Egyptians, but is by no means conclusive. If the chronology be correct we can only decide in favour of the Shepherds. During the time to which the events are assigned there were no important lines but the Theban, and one or more of Shepherds. Manetho, according to the transcript of Africanus, speaks of three Shepherd-dynasties, the xvth, xviith, and xviith, the last of which, according to the present text, was of Shepherds and Thebans, but this is probably incorrect, and the dynasty should rather be considered as of Shepherds alone. A passage in Isaiah (lii. 4) indicates that the oppressor was an Assyrian, and therefore not of the xvth dynasty, which, according to Manetho, in the epitomes, was of Phœnicians, and opposed to the Assyrians. Among the names of kings of this period in the Royal Turin Papyrus, are two which appear to be Assyrian, so that we may reasonably suppose that some of the foreign rulers were of that race. It is not possible at present to decide whether they were of the xvth or the xviith dynasty. The history of the xviith, xviith, and xviith dynasties is that of the Egyptian capture. Ahmes, the head of the first of these

(B.C. cir. 1525), overthrew the power of the Shepherds, and probably expelled them. Queen Amenemhat and Thothmes II. and III. are the earliest sovereigns of whom great monuments remain in the temple of El-Karnak, the chief sanctuary of Thebes. The last of these rulers was a great foreign conqueror, and reduced Nineveh, and perhaps Babylon also, to his sway. Amenoph III., his great-grandson, states on scarabæi, struck apparently to commemorate his marriage, that his northern boundary was in Mesopotamia, his southern in Kara (Cholô?) The head of the xixth dynasty, Sathes I., or Sathes, B.C. cir. 1340, waged great foreign wars, particularly with the Hittites of the valley of the Orontes, whose capital Ketch, situate near Emsa, he captured. His son Rameses II. was the most illustrious of the Pharaohs. If he did not exceed all others in foreign conquests, he far outshone them in the grandeur and beauty of the temples with which he adorned Egypt and Nubia. His chief campaign was against the Hittites and a great confederacy they had formed. Menptah, the son and successor of Rameses II., is supposed by the advocates of the Rabbinical date of the Exodus to have been the Pharaoh in whose time the Israelites went out. One other king of this period must be noticed, Rameses III., of the xxth dynasty, B.C. cir. 1200, whose conquests, recorded on the walls of his great temple of Medinet Habou in western Thebes seem to have been not less important than those of Rameses II. Under his successors the power of Egypt evidently declined, and towards the close of the dynasty the country seems to have fallen into anarchy, the high-priests of Amen having usurped regal power at Thebes and a Lower Egyptian dynasty, the xxiith, arisen at Tanis. Probably the Egyptian princess who became Solomon's wife was a daughter of a late king of the Tanite dynasty. The head of the xxiith dynasty, Sheshonk I., the Shishak of the Bible, restored the unity of the kingdom, and revived the credit of the Egyptian arms, B.C. cir. 990. Probably his successor, Osorkon I., is the Zerah of Scripture, defeated by Asa. Egypt makes no figure in Asiatic history during the xxiith and xxiith dynasties: under the xxvth it regained, in part at least, its ancient importance. This was an Ethiopian line, the warlike sovereigns of which strove to the utmost to repel the onward stride of Assyria. So, whom we are disposed to identify with Shebek II. or Sebichus, the second Ethiopian, rather than with Shebek I. or Sabaco, the first, made an alliance with Hoshea the last king of Israel. Tehrak or Tirhakah, the third of this house, advanced against Sennacherib in support of Hezekiah. After this, a native dynasty again occupied the throne, the xxviith, of Salte kings. Psammetek I. or Psammetichus I. (B.C. 664), who may be regarded as the head of this dynasty, warred in Palestine, and took Ashdod, Azotus, after a siege of twenty-nine years. Neku or Necho, the son of Psammetichus, continued the war in the East, and marched along the coast of Palestine to attack the king of Assyria. At Megiddo Josiah encountered him (B.C. 608-7), notwithstanding the remonstrance of the Egyptian king, which is very illustrative of the policy of the Pharaohs in the east (2 Chr. xxxv. 21), no less than is his lenient conduct after the defeat and death of the king of Judah. The army of Necho was after a short space routed at Carchemish by Nebuchadnezzar, B.C. 605-4 (Jer. xli. 2). The second successor of Necho, Apries, or Pharaoh-Hophra, sent his army into Palestine to the aid of Zedekiah (Jer. xxxvii. 5, 7, 11), so that the siege of Jerusalem was raised for a time, and kindly received the fugitives from the captured city. He seems to have been afterwards attacked by Nebuchadnezzar in his own country. There is, however, no certain account of a complete subjugation of Egypt by the king of Babylon. Amasis, the successor of Apries, had a long and prosperous reign, and somewhat restored the weight of Egypt in the East. But the new power of Persia was to prove even more terrible to his house than Babylon had been to the house of Psammeticus, and the son of Amasis had reigned but six months when Cambyses reduced the country to the condition of a province of his empire B.C. 525. It is not necessary here to give an outline of the subsequent history of Egypt. Its connexion with the history and literature of the Jews is discussed in the articles on the Greek kings of Egypt [PTOLEMY] and ALEXANDRIA.

Egyptian, Egyptians. Natives of Egypt. The word most commonly rendered Egyptians (Misraim) is the name of the country, and might be appropriately so translated in many cases.

Ehi, head of one of the Benjamite houses according to the list in Gen. xli. 21. He seems to be the same as Ahi-ram in the list in Num. xvi. 38, and if so, Ahiram is probably the right name, as the family were called Ahiramites. In 1 Chr. viii. 1, the same person seems to be called Aharah, and perhaps also Ahoah, in ver. 4, Ahiah, ver. 7, and Aher. 1 Chr. vii. 12.

Ehud. 1. Ehud, the son of Bilhan, and great-grandson of Benjamin the Patriarch (1 Chr. vii. 10, viii. 6).—2. Ehud, the son of Gera of the tribe of Benjamin (Judg. iii. 15), the second Judge of the Israelites (B.C. 1338). In the Bible he is not called a Judge but a deliverer (1. c.): so Othniel (Judg. iii. 9) and all the Judges (Neh. ix. 27). As a Benjamite he was specially chosen to destroy Eglon, who had established himself in Jericho, which was included in the boundaries of that tribe. He was very strong, and left-handed. So A. V.; but the more literal rendering is, as in margin, "shut of his right hand." The words are differently rendered:—1. left-handed, and unable to use his right; 2. using his left hand as readily as his right. The fact of drawing the dagger from the right thigh (Judg. iii. 21) is consistent with either opinion.

Eker, a descendant of Judah through the families of Hezron and Jerahmeel (1 Chr. ii. 27).

Ekrebel, a place named in Jud. vii. 18 only, apparently somewhere in the hill country to the south-east of the Plain of Esdraelon and of Dothain. The Syriac reading of the word points to the place Acrabbein, mentioned by Eusebius in the Onomasticon as the capital of a district called Acrabattine, and still standing as Akrabih, about 6 miles south-east of Nablûs.

Ekron, one of the five towns belonging to the lords of the Philistines, and the most northerly of the five (Josh. xiii. 3). Like the other Philistine cities its situation was in the lowlands. It fell to the lot of Judah (Josh. xv. 45, 46; Judg. i. 18), and indeed formed one of the landmarks on his north border, the boundary running from thence to the sea at JABNEEL. We afterwards, however, find it mentioned among the cities of Dan (Josh. xix. 43). But it mattered little to which tribe it nominally belonged, for before the monarchy it was again in full possession of the Philistines (1 Sam. v. 10). Aht, the modern representative of Ekron, lies at about 5 miles S.W. of Ramleh, and 3 due E. of Yelma, on the northern side of the important valley Wady Swar. In the Apocrypha it appears as ACCARON (1 Macc. x. 89, only), bestowed with its borders by Alexander Balas on Jonathan Macca-baeus as a reward for his services. It was known in the middle ages by the same name.

Ekronites. This word appears in Josh. xiii. 3, and 1 Sam. v. 10. In the former it should be singular—"the Ekronite."

Elā, 1 Esd. ix. 27. [ELAM.]

El'adah, a descendant of Ephraim through Shu-telah (1 Chr. vii. 20).

Elah. 1. The son and successor of Baasha, king of Israel (1 K. xvi. 8-10); his reign lasted for little more than a year (comp. ver. 8 with 10). He was killed, while drunk, by Zimri, in the house of his steward Arsa, who was probably a confederate in the plot.—2. Father of Hoshea, the last king of Israel (2 K. xv. 30, xvii. 1).

Elah. 1. One of the dukes of Edom (Gen. xxxv. 41; 1 Chr. i. 52).—2. Shimei ben-Elah, was Solomon's commissariat officer in Benjamin (1 K. iv. 18).—3. A son of Caleb the son of Jephunneh (1 Chr. iv. 15).—4. Son of Uzzi, a Benjamite (1 Chr. ix. 8), and one of the chiefs of the tribe at the settlement of the country.

Elah, the Valley of (= Valley of the Terebinth), a valley in (not "by," as the A. V. has it) which the Israelites were encamped against the Philistines when David killed Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 2, 19). It is once more mentioned in the same connexion (xxi. 9). We have only the most general indications of its position. It lay somewhere near Socoh of Judah, and Azekah, and was nearer Ekron than any other Philistine town. So much may be gathered from the narrative of 1 Sam. xvii. Socoh has been with great probability identified with Suweikeh, near to Beit Netf, some 14 miles S.W. of Jerusalem, on the road to Beit jibrin and Gaza. The village stands on the south slopes of the Wady es Sumt, or valley of the acacia. There seems no reason to doubt that this is the Valley of the Terebinth. It has changed its name and is now called after another kind of tree, but the terebinth appears to be plentiful in the neighbourhood. The traditional "Valley of the Terebinth" is the Wady Beit Ilanina, which lies about 4 miles to the N. W. of Jerusalem, and is crossed by the road to Nebi Samwil.

Elam seems to have been originally the name of a man, the son of Shem (Gen. x. 22; 1 Chr. i. 17). Commonly, however, it is used as the appellation of a country (Gen. xiv. 1, 9; Is. xi. 11; xxi. 2; Jer. xxv. 25; xlix. 34-39; Ez. xxxii. 24; Dan. vii. 2). The Elam of Scripture appears to be the province lying south of Assyria and east of Persia Proper, to which Herodotus gives the name of Cissia (iii. 91, v. 49, &c.), and which is termed Susis or Susiana by the geographers. It includes a portion of the mountainous country separating between the Mesopotamian plain and the high table-land of Iran, together with a fertile and valuable low tract at the foot of the range, between it and the Tigris. It appears from Gen. x. 22, that this country was originally peopled by descendants of Shem, closely allied to the Aramaeans (Syrians) and the Assyrians; and from Gen. xiv. 1-12, it is evident that by the time of Abraham a very firm nt power had been built up in the same region. It is plain that at this early time the predominant power in Lower Mesopotamia was Elam, which for a while held the place possessed earlier by Babylon (Gen. x. 10), and later by either Babylon or Assyria. Discoveries made in the country itself confirm this view. The Elamitic empire established at this time was, however, but of short duration. Towards the close of the Assyrian period she is found allied with Babylon and engaged in hostilities with Assyria; but she seems to have declined in strength after the Assyrian empire was destroyed. It is uncertain at what time the Persians added Elam to their empire. Possibly it only fell under their dominion together with Babylon; but there is some reason to think that it may have revolted and joined the Persians before the city was besieged (see Is. xxi. 2, xxii. 6). She now became merged in the Persian empire, forming a distinct satrapy. Susa, her capital, was made the ordinary residence of the court, and the metropolis of the whole empire.—2. A Korhite Levite, fifth son of Meshelemlah; one of the Bene-Asaph, in the time of king David (1 Chr. xxvi. 3).—3. A chief man of the tribe of Benjamin, one of the sons of Shishak (1 Chr. viii. 24).—4. "Children of Elam," to the number of 1254, returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezr. ii. 7; Neh. vii. 12; 1 Esd. v. 12), and a further detachment of 71 men with Ezra in the second caravan (Ezr. viii. 7; 1 Esd. viii. 33). Elam occurs amongst the names of those, the chief of the people, who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 14).—5. In the same lists is a second Elam, whose sons, to the same number as in the former case, returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 31; Neh. vii. 34), and which for the sake of distinction is called "the other Elam."—6. One of the priests who accompanied Nehemiah at the dedication of the new wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 42).

Elamites. This word is found only in Ezr. iv. 9; and is omitted in that place by the Septuagint writers, who probably regarded it as a gloss upon "Susanchites," which had occurred only a little before. The Elamites were the original inhabitants of the country called Elam; they were descendants of Shem, and perhaps drew their name from an actual man Elam (Gen. x. 22). In Jud. i. 6 the name is given in the Greek form as ELYMAEANS.

El'asah. 1. One of the Bene-Pashur, a priest, in the time of Ezra, who had married a Gentile wife (Ezr. x. 22).—2. Son of Shaphan; one of the two men who were sent on a mission by King Zedekiah to Nebuchadnezzar at Babylon (Jer. xxix. 3).

El'ath, E'loth, the name of a town of the land of Edom, commonly mentioned together with Ezion-geber, and situate at the head of the Arabian Gulf, which was thence called the Elanitic Gulf. It first occurs in the account of the wanderings (Deut. ii. 8), and in later times must have come under the rule of David in his conquest of the land of Edom (2 Sam. viii. 14). We find the place named again in connexion with Solomon's navy (1 K. ix. 26; comp. 2 Chr. viii. 17). It was apparently included in the revolt of Edom against Joram recorded in 2 K. viii. 20; but it was taken by Azariah (xiv. 22). After this, however, "Rezin king of Syria recovered Elath, and drove out the Jews from Elath, and the Syrians came to Elath and dwelt there to this day" (xvi. 6). From this time the place is not mentioned until the Roman period, during which it became a frontier town of the south, and the residence of a Christian bishop. The Arabic name is Eyloah. Under the rule of the Greeks and Romans it lost its former importance; but in Mohammadan times it again became a place of some note. It is now quite insignificant.

El-Beth'el, the name which Jacob is said to have bestowed on the place at which God appeared to him when he was flying from Esau (Gen. xxv. 7).

El'cia, one of the forefathers of Judith, and therefore belonging to the tribe of Simeon (Jud. viii. 1).

El'dash (Gen. xxv. 4; 1 Chr. i. 33), the last, in order, of the sons of Midian. No satisfactory trace of the tribe which we may suppose to have taken the appellation has yet been found.

El'dad and Me'dad, two of the 70 elders to whom was communicated the prophetic power of Moses (Num. xi. 16, 26). Although their names were upon the list which Moses had drawn up (xi. 26), they did not repair with the rest of their brethren to the tabernacle, but continued to prophesy in the camp. Moses being requested by Joshua to forbid this, refused to do so, and expressed a wish that the gift of prophecy might be diffused throughout the people. The mode of prophecy in the case of Eldad and Medad was probably the extempore production of hymns, chanted forth to the people (Hammond): comp. the case of Saul, 1 Sam. x. 11.

Elder. The term elder or old man, as the Hebrew literally imports, was one of extensive use, as an official title, among the Hebrews and the surrounding nations. It had reference to various offices (Gen. xxiv. 2, 1. 7; 2 Sam. xii. 17; Ex. xxvii. 9). As betokening a political office, it applied not only to the Hebrews, but also to the Egyptians (Gen. l. 7), the Moabites and Midianites (Num. xxii. 7). Wherever a patriarchal system is in force, the office of the elder will be found, as the keystone of the social and political fabric; it is so at the present day among the Arabs, where the Sheikh (=the old man) is the highest authority in the tribe. The earliest notice of the elders acting in concert as a political body is at the time of the Exodus. They were the representatives of the people, so much so that elders and people are occasionally used as equivalent terms (comp. Josh. xiv. 1 with 2, 19, 21; 1 Sam. viii. 4 with 7, 10, 19). Their authority was undefined, and extended to all matters concerning the public weal. When the tribes became settled the elders were distinguished by different titles according as they were acting as national representatives, as district governors over the several tribes (Deut. xxxi. 28; 2 Sam. xix. 11), or as local magistrates in the provincial towns, whose duty it was to sit in the gate and administer justice (Deut. xxi. 12; Ruth iv. 9, 11; 1 K. xxi. 8). Their number and influence may be inferred from 1 Sam. xxx. 26 ff. They retained their position under all the political changes which the Jews underwent: under the Judges (Judg. ii. 7; 1 Sam. iv. 3); under the kings (2 Sam. xvii. 4); during the captivity (Jer. xxix. 1; Ez. viii. 1); subsequently to the return (Ezr. v. 5, vi. 7, 14, x. 8, 14); under the Maccabees, when they were described sometimes as the senate (i. Macc. xii. 6; 2 Macc. i. 10, iv. 44, xi. 27), sometimes by their ordinary title (1 Macc. vii. 33, xi. 23, xii. 35); and, lastly, at the commencement of the Christian era, when they are noticed as a distinct body from the Sanhedrim. St. Luke describes the whole order by the collective term πρεσβυτήριον (Luke xxii. 66; Acts xxii. 5). [BISHOP.]

El'ead, a descendant of Ephraim (1 Chr. vii. 21).

El'ealeh, a place on the east of Jordan, in the pastoral country, taken possession of and rebuilt by the tribe of Reuben (Num. xxii. 3, 37). By Isaiah and Jeremiah it is mentioned as a Moabite town (Is. xv. 4, xvi. 9; Jer. xlviii. 34). The extensive ruins of the place are still to be seen, bearing very nearly their ancient name, El-A'al, a little more than a mile N. of Heshbon.

El'easa, a place at which Judas Maccabaeus encamped before the fatal battle with Bacchides, in which he lost his life (1 Macc. ix. 5). It was apparently not far from Azotus (comp. 15).

El'easah. 1. Son of Helez, one of the descendants of Judah, of the family of Hezron (1 Chr. ii. 39).—2. Son of Rapha, or Rephiai; a descendant of Saul through Jonathan and Merib-baal or Mephibosheth (1 Chr. viii. 37, ix. 43).

El'eazar. 1. Third son of Aaron, by Elisheba, daughter of Amminadab. After the death of Nadab and Abihu without children (Lev. x. 1; Num. iii. 4), Eleazar was appointed chief over the principal Levites (Num. iii. 32). With his brother Ithamar he ministered as a priest during their father's lifetime, and immediately before his death was invested on Mount Hor with the sacred garments, as the successor of Aaron in the office of High-priest (Num. xx. 28). One of his first duties was in conjunction with Moses to superintend the census of the people (Num. xvi. 3). After the conquest of Canaan by Joshua he took part in the distribution of the land (Josh. xiv. 1). The time of his death is not mentioned in Scripture.—2. The son of Abinadab, of the hill of Kijath-jearim (1 Sam. vii. 1).—3. The son of Dodo the Aholite, i. e. possibly a descendant of Ahoah of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chr. viii. 4); one of the three principal mighty men of David's army (2 Sam. xxiii. 9; 1 Chr. xi. 12).—4. A Merarite Levite, son of Mahli, and grandson of Merari (1 Chr. xxi. 21, 22; xxiv. 28).—5. A priest who took part in the feast of dedication under Nehemiah (Neh. xii. 42).—6. One of the sons of Purosh; an Ismelite (i. e. a layman) who had married a foreign wife, and had to put her away (Ezr. x. 25; 1 Esdr. ix. 26).—7. Son of Phinehas a Levite (Ezr. viii. 33; 1 Esdr. viii. 63).—8. ELEAZAR surnamed AVARAN (1 Macc. ii. 5). The fourth son of Matathias, who fell by a noble act of self-devotion in an engagement with Antiochus Eupator, B.C. 164 (1 Macc. vi. 43 ff.). In a former battle with Nicanor, Eleazar was appointed by Judas to read "the holy book" before the attack, and the watchword in the fight—"The help of God"—was his own name (2 Macc. viii. 23).—9. A distinguished scribe (2 Macc. vi. 18) of great age, who suffered martyrdom during the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc. vi. 18-31).—10. The father of Jason, ambassador from Judas Maccabaeus to Rome (1 Macc. viii. 18).—11. The son of Eliud, in the genealogy of Jesus Christ (Matt. i. 15).

Eleazu'rus, (1 Esd. ix. 24), Eliashib 4.

El-El'oh-e-Is'ra'el, the name bestowed by Jacob on the altar which he erected facing the city of Shechem (Gen. xxxiii. 19, 20).

El'eph, one of the towns allotted to Benjamin, and named next to Jerusalem (Josh. xviii. 28).

Elephant. The word does not occur in the text of the canonical Scriptures of A. V., but is found as the marginal reading to Behemoth, in Job xl. 15. "Elephants' teeth" is the marginal reading for "teary" in 1 K. x. 22; 2 Chr. ix. 41. Elephants however are repeatedly mentioned in the 1st and 2nd books of Maccabees, as being used in warfare (1 Macc. vi.).

Eleutherus, a river of Syria mentioned in 1 Macc. xi. 7; xii. 30. In early ages it was a noted border stream. According to Strabo it separated Syria from Phoenicia, and formed the northern limit of Coele-syria. Of the identity of the Eleutherus with the modern Nahr-el-Kob'r, "Great River," there cannot be a doubt: Its highest source is at the north-eastern base of Lebanon; it sweeps round the northern end of the range, through the opening called in Scripture "the entrance of Hamath" (Num. xxiv. 8); and falls into the Mediterranean about 18 miles north of Tripolis.

Eli'hanan. 1. A distinguished warrior in the time of King David, who performed a memorable exploit against the Philistines, though in what that exploit exactly consisted, and who the hero himself was, it is not easy to determine.—(a.) 2 Sam. xxi. 19 says that he was the "son of Jaare Oregim the Bethlehemite," and that he "slew Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver's beam." Here, in the A. V. the words "the brother of" are inserted, to bring the passage into agreement with,—(b.) 1 Chr. xx. 5, which states that "Elhanan son of Jair (or Jaor) slew Lahmi the brother of Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear," &c. Of these two statements the latter is probably the more correct—the differences between them being much smaller in the original than in English.—2. The son of Dodo of Bethlehem, one of "the thirty" of David's guard, and named first on the list (2 Sam. xxiii. 24; 1 Chr. xi. 26).

Eli was descended from Aaron through Ithamar, the youngest of his two surviving sons (Lev. x. 1, 2, 12; comp. 1 K. ii. 27 with 2 Sam. viii. 17; 1 Chr. xxiv. 3). As the history makes no mention of any high-priest of the line of Ithamar before Eli, he is generally supposed to have been the first of that line who held the office. From him, his sons having died before him, it appears to have passed to his grandson, Ahitub (1 Sam. xiv. 3), and it certainly remained in his family till Abiathar, the grandson of Ahitub, was "thrust out from being priest unto the Lord" by Solomon for his share in Adonijah's rebellion (1 K. ii. 26, 27; i. 7), and the high-priesthood passed back again to the family of Eleazar in the person of Zadok (1 K. ii. 35). Its return to the elder branch was one part of the punishment which had been denounced against Eli during his lifetime, for his culpable negligence (1 Sam. ii. 22-25) when his sons by their rapacity and licentiousness profaned the priesthood, and brought the rites of religion into abhorrence among the people (1 Sam. ii. 27-36, with 1 K. ii. 27). Notwithstanding this one great blemish, the character of Eli is marked by eminent piety, as shown by his meek submission to the divine judgment (1 Sam. iii. 18), and his supreme regard for the ark of God (iv. 18). In addition to the office of high-priest he held that of judge, being the immediate predecessor of his pupil Samuel (1 Sam. vii. 6, 15-17), the last of the judges. He died at the advanced age of 98 years (1 Sam. iv. 15), overcome by the disastrous intelligence that the ark of God had been taken in battle by the Philistines, who had also slain his sons Hophni and Phinehas.

Eli'ab. 1. Son of Heloh and leader of the tribe of Zebulun at the time of the census in the wilderness of Sinai (Nurr. i. 9, ii. 7, vii. 24, 29, x. 16).—2. A Reubenite, son of Pallu or Phallu, father or progenitor of Dathan and Abiram (Num. xxvi. 8, 9, xvi. 1, 12; Deut. xi. 6).—3. One of David's brothers, the eldest of the family (1 Chr. ii. 13; 1 Sam. xvi. 6, xvii. 13, 28). His daughter Abigail married her second cousin Rehoboam, and bore him three children (2 Chr. xi. 18); although it is difficult not to suspect that the word "daughter" is here used in the less strict sense of granddaughter or descendant.—4. A Levite in the time of David, who was both a "porter" and a musician on the "psaltery" (1 Chr. xv. 18, 20, xvi. 5).—5. One of the warlike Gadite leaders who came over to David when he was in the wilderness taking refuge from Saul (1 Chr. xii. 9).—6. An ancestor of Samuel the Prophet; a Kohathite Levite, son of Nahath (1 Chr. vi. 27).—7. Son of Nathanael, one of the forefathers of Judith, and therefore belonging to the tribe of Simeon (Jud. viii. 1).

Eliada. 1. One of David's sons; according to the lists, the youngest but one of the family born to him after his establishment in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 16; 1 Chr. iii. 8). From the latter passage it appears that he was the son of a wife and not of a concubine.—2. A mighty man of war, a Benjaminite, who led 200,000 of his tribe to the army of Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xvii. 17).

Eliadah. Father of Rezon, the captain of a marauding band of Zobah which annoyed Solomon (1 K. xi. 23).

Eliadas, 1 Esd. ix. 28. [ELIOENAI.]

Eliadun, 1 Esd. v. 58. Possibly altered from HENADAD.

Eliah. 1. A Benjaminite; one of the sons of Jeroham, and a chief man of the tribe (1 Chr. viii. 27).—2. One of the Bene-Elam; an Israelite (i. e. a layman) in the times of Ezra, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 26).

Eli'ahba, a Shaalbonite, one of the Thirty of David's guard (2 Sam. xxii. 32; 1 Chr. xi. 33).

Eliakim. 1. Son of Hilkiah; master of Hezekiah's household ("over the house," as Is. xxxvi. 3), 2 K. xviii. 18, 26, 37. He succeeded Shebna in this office, after he had been ejected from it as a punishment for his pride (Is. xxii. 15-20). Eliakim was a good man, as appears by the title emphatically applied to him by God, "my servant Eliakim" (Is. xxii. 20), and as was evinced by his conduct on the occasion of Sennacherib's invasion (2 K. xviii. 37, xix. 1-5), and also in the discharge of the duties of his high station, in which he acted as a "father to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and to the house of Judah" (Is. xxii. 21). It was a special mark of the Divine approbation of his character and conduct, of which however no further details have been preserved to us, that he was raised to the post of authority and dignity which he held at the time of the Assyrian invasion. What this office was has been a subject of some perplexity to commentators. The ancients, including the LXX. and Jerome, understood it of the priestly office. But it is certain from the description of the office in Is. xxii., and especially from the expression in ver. 22, that it was the King's house, and not the House of God, of which Eliakim was prefect.—2. The original name of Jehoikim king of Judah (2 K. xxiii. 34; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 4).—3. A priest in the days of Nehemiah, who assisted at the dedication of the new wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 41).—4. Eldest son of Abiud, or Judah; brother of Joseph, and father of Asor (Matt. i. 13).—5. Son of Melea, and father of Jonan (Luke iii. 30, 31).

Eli'ail, 1 Esd. ix. 34. [BINNUI.]

Eli'iam. 1. Father of Bathsheba, the wife of David (2 Sam. x. 3). In the list of 1 Chr. iii. 5, the names of both father and daughter are altered, the former to AMMIEL and the latter to BATH-SHUA.—2. Son of Ahithophel the Gilonite; one of David's "thirty" warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 34). The name is omitted in the list of 1 Chr. xi., but is now probably dimly discernible as "Ahijuh the Pelonite." The ancient Jewish tradition preserved by Jerome is that the two Eliams are one and the same person.

Eliao'nia's, 1 Esd. viii. 31. [ELIHOENAI.]

Eli'as, the form in which the name of ELIJAH is given in the A. V. of the Apocrypha and N. Test.: Eccles. xlviii. 1, 4, 12; 1 Macc. ii. 58; Matt. xi. 14, xvi. 14, xvii. 3, 4, 10, 11, 12, xviii. 47, 49; Mark vi. 15, viii. 28, ix. 4, 5, 11, 12, 13, xv. 35, 36; Luke i. 17, iv. 25, 26, ix. 8, 19, 30, 33, 54; John i. 21, 25; Rom. xi. 2; James v. 17. In Rom. xi. 2, the reference is not to the prophet, but to the portion of Scripture designated by his name, the words being "in Elias," not as in A. V. of Elias."

Eli'asaph. 1. Son of Deuel; head of the tribe of Dan at the time of the census in the Wilderness of Sinai (Num. i. 14, ii. 14, vii. 42, 47, x. 20).—2. Son of Lael; a Levite, and "chief of the house of the father of the Gerishonite" at the same time (Num. iii. 24).

Eli'ashib. 1. A priest in the time of King David, eleventh in the order of the "governors" of the sanctuary (1 Chr. xxiv. 12).—2. A son of Elioenai; one of the latest descendants of the royal family of Judah (1 Chr. iii. 24).—3. High-priest at Jerusalem at the time of the rebuilding of the walls under Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 1, 20, 21). His genealogy is given in xii. 10, 22, 23.—4. A singer in the time of Ezra who had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 24).—5. A son of Zattu (Ezr. x. 27); and—6. A son of Bani (x. 36), both of whom had transgressed in the same manner.

Eli'asis, 1 Esd. ix. 34. This name answers to MATTENAI in Ezr. x. 33; but is probably merely a repetition of Enasibos, just preceding it.

Eli'athah, one of the sons of Heman, a musician in the Temple in the time of King David (1 Chr. xxv. 4), who with twelve of his sons and brethren had the twentieth division of the temple-service (xxv. 27).

Eli'ad, son of Chislon; the man chosen to represent the tribe of Benjamin in the division of the land of Canaan (Num. xxiv. 21).

E'liel. 1. One of the heads of the tribe of Manasseh on the east of Jordan (1 Chr. v. 24).—2. Son of Toah; a forefather of Samuel the Prophet (1 Chr. vi. 34).—3. One of the Bene-Shimhi; a chief man in the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chr. viii. 20).—4. Like the preceding, a Benjaminite, but belonging to the Bene-Shashak (1 Chr. viii. 22).—5. "The Mahavite;" one of the heroes of David's guard in the extended list of 1 Chr. (xi. 46).—6. Another of the same guard, but without any express designation (xi. 47).—7. One of the Gadite heroes who came across Jordan to David when he was in the wilderness of Judah hiding from Saul (1 Chr. xii. 11).—8. A Kohathite Levite, at the time of the transportation of the Ark from the House of Obed-edom to Jerusalem (1 Chr. xv. 8 11).—9. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah; one of the overseers of the offerings made in the Temple (2 Chr. xxxi. 13).

Eliena¹, one of the Bene-Shimhi; a descendant of Benjamin, and a chief man in the tribe (1 Chr. viii. 20).

Eli²ser. 1. Abraham's chief servant, called by him, as the passage is usually translated, "Eli²zer of Damascus," or "that Damascene, Eli²zer" (Gen. xv. 2). There is a contradiction in the A. V., for it does not appear how, if he was "of Damascus," he could be "born in Abraham's house" (ver. 3). But the phrase "son of my house," only imports that he was one of Abraham's household, not that he was born in his house. In the preceding verse, "the steward of my house," &c., should probably be rendered "the son of possession," i. e. possessor "of my house, shall be . . . Eli²zer." It was, most likely, this same Eli²zer who is described in Gen. xxiv. 2.—2. Second son of Moses and Zipporah, to whom his father gave this name, "because, said he, the God of my father was my help, that delivered me from the sword of Pharaoh" (Ex. xviii. 4; 1 Chr. xxiii. 15, 17). He remained with his mother and brother Gershom, in the care of Jethro his grandfather, when Moses returned to Egypt (Ex. iv. 18), she having been sent back to her father by Moses (Ex. xviii. 2), though she set off to accompany him, and went part of the way with him.—3. One of the sons of Becher, the son of Benjamin (1 Chr. vii. 8).—4. A priest in the reign of David (1 Chr. xv. 24).—5. Son of Zichri, ruler of the Reubenites in the reign of David (1 Chr. xxvii. 16).—6. Son of Dodavah, of Marreshah in Judah (2 Chr. xx. 37), a prophet, who rebuked Jehoshaphat for joining himself with Ahaziah king of Israel.—7. A chief Israelite—a "man of understanding"—whom Ezra sent with others from Abadva to Casiphia, to induce some Levites and Nethinim to accompany him to Jerusalem (Ezr. viii. 16).—8, 9, 10. A Priest, a Levite, and an Israelite of the sons of Harim, who, in the time of Ezra, had married foreign wives (Ezr. x. 18, 23, 31).—11. Son of Jorim, in the genealogy of Christ (Luke ii. 29).

Elihoena¹, son of Zerabiah, one of the Bene-Pahath-moab, who with 200 men returned from the Captivity with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 4).

Eliho²reph, son of Shisha, and one of Solomon's scribes (1 K. iv. 3).

Elihu. 1. One of the interlocutors in the book of Job. He is described as the "son of Barachel the Buzite," and thus apparently referred to the family of Buz, the son of Nahor, and nephew of Abraham (Gen. xxii. 21).—2. Son of Tohu; a forefather of Samuel the Prophet (1 Sam. i. 1).—3. In 1 Chr. xxvii. 18, Elihu "of the brethren of David" is mentioned as the chief of the tribe of Judah.—4. One of the captains of the thousands of Manasseh (1 Chr. xii. 20) who followed David to Ziklag after he had left the Philistine army on the eve of the battle of Gilboa, and who assisted him against the marauding band of the Amalekites (comp. 1 Sam. xxx.).—5. A Korhite Levite in the time of David; one of the doorkeepers of the house of Jehovah. He was a son of Shennaiah, and of the family of Obed-edom (1 Chr. xxvi. 7).

Eli²jah. 1. ELIJAH THE TISHBITE has been well entitled "the grandest and the most romantic character that Israel ever produced." Certainly there is no personage in the O. T. whose career is more vividly portrayed, or who exercises on us a more remarkable fascination. His rare, sudden, and brief appearances—his undaunted courage and fiery zeal—the brilliancy of his triumphs—the pathos of his despondency—the glory of his departure, and the calm beauty of his reappearance on the Mount of Transfiguration—throw such a halo of brightness around him as is equalled by none of his compeers in the sacred story. The ignorance in which we are left of the circumstances and antecedents of the man who did and who suffered so much, doubtless contributes to enhance our interest in the story and the character. "Elijah the Tishbite of the inhabitants of Gilead," is literally all that is given us to know of his parentage and locality. To an Israelite of the tribes west of Jordan the title "Gileadite" must have conveyed a similar impression, though in a far stronger degree, to that which the title "Celt" does to us. What the Highlands were a century ago to the towns in the Lowlands of Scotland, that, and more than that, must Gilead have been to Samaria or Jerusalem. One of the most famous heroes in the early annals of Israel was "Jephthah the Gileadite," in whom all these characteristics were prominent; and Professor Stanley has well remarked how impossible it is rightly to estimate his character without recollecting this fact. With Elijah, of whom so much is told, and whose part in the history was so much more important, this is still more necessary. It is seen at every turn. Of his appearance as he "stood before" Ahab, with the suddenness of motion to this day characteristic of the Bedouins from his native hills, we can perhaps realise something from the touches, few, but strong, of the narrative. Of his height little is to be inferred; that little is in favour of its being beyond the ordinary size. His chief characteristic was his hair, long and thick, and hanging down his back; which, if not betokening the immense strength of Samson, yet accompanied powers of endurance no less remarkable. His ordinary clothing consisted of a girdle of skin round his loins, which he tightened when about to move quickly (1 K. xviii. 46). But in addition to this he occasionally wore the "mantle," or cape, of sheep-skin, which has supplied us with one of our most familiar figures of speech. In this mantle, in moments of emotion, he would hide his face (1 K. xix. 13), or when excited would roll it up as into a kind of staff. On one occasion we find him bending himself down upon the ground with his face between his knees. The solitary life in which these external peculiarities had been assumed had also nurtured that fierceness of zeal and that directness of address which so distinguished him. It was in the wild loneliness of the hills and ravines of Gilead that the knowledge of Jehovah, the living God of Israel, had been impressed on his mind, which was to form the subject of his mission to the idolatrous court and country of Israel. The northern kingdom had at this time forsaken almost entirely the faith in Jehovah. The worship of the calves had been a departure from Him, it was a violation of His command against material resemblances; but still it would appear that even in the presence of the calves Jehovah was acknowledged, and they were at any rate a national institution, not one imported from the idolatries of any of the surrounding countries. But the case was quite different when Ahab introduced the foreign religion of his wife's family, the worship of the Phœnician Baal. It is as a witness against these two evils that Elijah comes forward.—1. What we may call the first Act in his life embraces between three and four years—three years and six months for the duration of the drought, according to the statements of the New Testament (Luke iv. 25; James v. 17), and three or four months more for the journey to Horeb, and the return to Gilead (1 K. xvii. 1—xix. 21). His introduction is of the most startling description: he suddenly appears before Ahab, as with the unrestrained freedom of eastern manners he would have no difficulty in doing, and proclaims the vengeance of Jehovah for the apostasy of the king. What immediate action followed on this we are not told; but it is plain that Elijah had to fly before some threatened vengeance either of the king, or more probably of the queen (comp. xix. 2). Perhaps it was at this juncture that Jezebel “cut off the prophets of Jehovah” (1 K. xviii. 4). He was directed to the brook Cherith. There in the hollow of the torrent-bed he remained, supported in the miraculous manner with which we are all familiar, till the failing of the brook obliged him to forsake it. His next refuge was at Zarephath, a Phœnician town lying between Tyre and Sidon, certainly the last place at which the enemy of Baal would be looked for. The widow woman in whose house he lived seems, however, to have been an Israelite, and no Baal-worshipper, if we may take her adjuration by “Jehovah thy God” as an indication. Here Elijah performed the miracles of prolonging the oil and the meal; and restored the son of the widow to life after his apparent death. In this, or some other retreat, an interval of more than two years must have elapsed. The drought continued, and at last the full horrors of famine, caused by the failure of the crops, descended on Samaria. The king and his chief domestic officer divided between them the mournful duty of ascertaining that neither round the springs, which are so frequent a feature of central Palestine, nor in the nooks and crannies of the most shaded torrent-beds, was there any of the herbage left, which in those countries is so certain an indication of the presence of moisture. It is the moment for the reappearance of the prophet. He shows himself first to the minister. There, suddenly planted in his path, is the man whom he and his master have been seeking for more than three years. Before the sudden apparition of that wild figure, and that stern, unbroken countenance, Obadiah could not but fall on his face. Elijah, however, soon calms his agitation—“As Jehovah of hosts liveth, before whom I stand, I will surely show myself to Ahab;” and thus relieved of his fear that, as on a former occasion, Elijah would disappear before he could return with the king, Obadiah departs to inform Ahab that the man they seek is there. Ahab arrived, Elijah makes his charge—“Thou hast forsaken Jehovah and followed the Baals.” He then commands that all Israel be collected to Mount Carmel with the four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal, and the four hundred of Asherah (Ashtaroth), the latter being under the especial protection of the queen. There are few more sublime stories in history than this. On the one hand the solitary servant of Jehovah, accompanied by his one attendant; with his wild shaggy hair, his scanty garb and sheepskin cloak, but with calm dignity of demeanour and the minutest regularity of procedure, repairing the ruined altar of Jehovah with twelve stones,—on the other hand the 850 prophets of Baal and Ashtaroth, doubtless in all the splendour of their vestments (2 K. x. 22), with the wild din of their vain repetitions and the maddened fury of their disappointed hopes, and the silent people surrounding all. The conclusion of the long day need only be glanced at. The fire of Jehovah consuming both sacrifice and altar—the prophets of Baal killed, it would seem by Elijah’s own hand (xviii. 40)—the king, with an apathy almost unintelligible, eating and drinking in the very midst of the carnage of his own adherents—the rising storm—the ride across the plain to Jezreel, a distance of at least 16 miles; the prophet, with true Arab endurance, running before the chariot, but also with true Arab instinct stopping short of the city, and going no further than the “entrance of Jezreel.” So far the triumph had been complete; but the spirit of Jezebel was not to be so easily overcome, and her first act is a vow of vengeance against the author of this destruction. Elijah takes refuge in flight. The danger was great, and the refuge must be distant. The first stage on the journey was Beersheba. Here Elijah halted. His servant he left in the town; while he himself set out alone into the wilderness. His spirit is quite broken, and he wanders forth over the dreary sweeps of those rocky hills wishing for death. But God, who had brought His servant into this difficulty, provided him with the means of escaping from it. The prophet was awakened from his dream of despondency beneath the solitary bush of the wilderness, was fed with the bread and the water which to this day are all a Bedouin’s requirements, and went forward, in the strength of that food, a journey of forty days to the mount of God, even to Horeb. Here, in the cave, one of the numerous caverns in those awful mountains, he remained for certainly one night. In the morning came the “word of Jehovah”—the question, “what doest thou here, Elijah?” In answer to this invitation the Prophet opens his griefs. The reply comes in that ambiguous and indirect form in which it seems necessary that the deepest communications with the human mind should be couched, to be effectual. He is directed to leave the cavern and stand on the mountain in the open air, face to face with Jehovah. Then, as before with Moses (Ex. xxxiv. 6), “The Lord passed by,” passed in all the terror of His most appalling manifestations; and penetrating the dead silence which followed these, came the mysterious symbol—the “still small voice,” and still as it was it spoke in louder accents to the wounded heart of Elijah than the roar and blaze which had preceded it. To him no less unmistakably than to Moses, centuries before, it was proclaimed that Jehovah was “merciful and gracious, long-suffering and abundant in goodness and truth.” Elijah knew the call, and at once stepping forward and hiding his face in his mantle, stood waiting for the Divine communication. Three commands were laid on him—three changes were to be made. Of these three commands the two first were reserved for Elisha to accomplish, the last only was executed by Elijah himself. His first search was for Elisha. Apparently he soon found him; we must conclude at his native place, Abel-meholah. Elisha was ploughing at the time, and Elijah “passed over to him”—possibly crossed the river—and cast his mantle, the well-known sheepskin cloak, upon him, as if, by that familiar action, claiming him for his son. A moment of hesitation, and then even mened that long period of service and intercourse which continued till Elijah's removal, and which after that time procured for Elisha one of the best titles to esteem and reverence—"Elisha the son of Shaphat, who poured water on the hands of Elijah."

—2. Ahab and Jezebel now probably believed that their threats had been effectual, and that they had seen the last of their tormentor. After the murder of Naboth, Ahab loses no time in entering on his new acquisition. But his triumph was a short one. Elijah had received an intimation from Jehovah of what was taking place, and rapidly as the accusation and death of Naboth had been hurried over, he was there to meet his ancient enemy on the very scene of his crime. And then follows the curse, in terms fearful to any Oriental—peculiarly terrible to a Jew—and most of all significant to a successor of the apostate princes of the northern kingdom. The whole of Elijah's denunciation may possibly be recovered by putting together the words recalled by Jehu, 2 K. ix. 26, 36, 37, and those given in 1 K. xxi. 19-25.—3. A space of three or four years now elapses (comp. 1 K. xxii. 1, 51; 2 K. i. 17) before we again catch a glimpse of Elijah. Ahaziah has met with a fatal accident, and is on his death-bed (2 K. i. 1, 2; 1 K. xxii. 51). In his extremity he sends to an oracle or shrine of Baal at the Philistine town of Ekron, to ascertain the issue of his illness. But the oracle is nearer at hand than the distant Ekron. An intimation is conveyed to the prophet, probably at that time inhabiting one of the recesses of Carmel, and, as on the former occasions, he suddenly appears on the path of the messengers, without preface or inquiry utters his message of death, and as rapidly disappears. But this check only roused the wrath of Ahaziah. A captain was de-patched, with a party of fifty, to take Elijah prisoner. "And there came down fire from heaven and consumed him and his fifty." A second party was sent, only to meet the same fate. The altered tone of the leader of a third party brought Elijah down. But the king gained nothing. The message was delivered to his face in the same words as it had been to the messengers, and Elijah was allowed to go harmless.—4. It must have been shortly after the death of Ahaziah that Elijah made a communication with the southern kingdom. When Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat began "to walk in the ways of the kings of Israel," Elijah sent him a letter denouncing his evil doings, and predicting his death (2 Chr. xxi. 12-15). In its contents the letter bears a strong resemblance to the speeches of Elijah, while in the details of style it is very peculiar, and quite different from the narrative in which it is imbedded.—5. The closing transaction of Elijah's life introduces us to a locality heretofore unconnected with him. It was at GILGAL—probably on the western edge of the hills of Ephraim—that the prophet received the divine intimation that his departure was at hand. He was at the time with Elisha, who seems now to have become his constant companion, and whom he endeavours to persuade to remain behind while he goes on an errand of Jehovah. But Elisha will not so easily give up his master. They went together to Bethel. Again Elijah attempts to escape to Jericho, and again Elisha protests that he will not be separated from him. At Jericho he makes a final effort to avoid what they both so much dread. But Elisha is not to be conquered, and the two set off across the undulating plain of burning sand, to the distant river,—Elijah in his mantle or cape of sheep-skin, Elisha in ordinary clothes. Fifty men of the sons of the prophets ascend the abrupt heights behind the town to watch what happens in the distance. Talking as they go, the two reach the river, and stand on the shelving bank beside its swift brown current. But they are not to stop even here. It is as if the aged Gileadite cannot rest till he again sets foot on his own side of the river. He rolls up his mantle as into a staff, and with his old energy strikes the waters as Moses had done before him,—strikes them as if they were an enemy; and they are divided hither and thither, and they two go over on dry ground. "And it came to pass as they still went on and talked, that, behold, a chariot of fire and horses of fire, and parted them both asunder, and Elijah went up by the whirlwind into the skies."—And here ends all the direct information which is vouchsafed to us of the life and work of this great Prophet. How deep was the impression which he made on the mind of the nation may be judged of from the fixed belief which many centuries after prevailed that Elijah would again appear for the relief and restoration of his country. But on the other hand, the deep impression which Elijah had thus made on his nation only renders more remarkable the departure which the image conveyed by the later references to him evinces, from that so sharply presented in the records of his actual life. With the exception of the eulogiums contained in the catalogues of worthies in the book of Jesus the son of Sirach (xlviii.) and 1 Macc. ii. 58, and the passing allusion in Luke ix. 54, none of these later references allude to his works of destruction or of portent. They all set forth a very different side of his character to that brought out in the historical narrative. They speak of his being a man of like passions with ourselves (James v. 17); of his kindness to the widow of Sarepta (Luke iv. 25); of his "restoring all things" (Matt. xvii. 11); "turning the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just" (Mal. iv. 5, 6; Luke i. 17).—2. A priest of the sons of Harin, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 21).

Elim (Ex. xv. 27; Num. xxxiii. 9), the second station where the Israelites encamped after crossing the Red Sea. It is distinguished as having had "twelve wells (rather 'fountains') of water, and threescore and ten palm-trees." Laborde supposed Wady Usit to be Elim, the second of four wadis lying between 29° 7', and 29° 20', which descend from the range of et-Tih (here nearly parallel to the shore), towards the sea. Dean Stanley says "Elim must be Ghurundel, Usit, or Taiyibeh." Lepsius takes another view, that Elim is to be found in W Shubeikah.

Elim'elech, a man of the tribe of Judah, and of the family of the Hezronites, who dwelt in Bethlehem-Ephrath in the days of the Judges. In consequence of a great dearth in the land he went with his wife Naomi, and his two sons, Mahlon and Chilion, to dwell in Moab, where he and his sons died without posterity (Ruth i. 2, 3, &c.).

Elioena'i. 1. Eldest son of Neaniah, the son of Shemaiah (1 Chr. iii. 23, 24).—2. Head of a family of the Simeonites (1 Chr. iv. 36).—3. Head of one of the families of the sons of Becher, the son of Benjamin (1 Chr. vii. 6).—4. Seventh son of Meshelemiah, the son of Kore. of the sons of Asaph, a Korhiite Levite, and one of the doorkeepers of the "house of Jehovah" (1 Chr. xvi. 3).—5. A priest of the sons of Pashur, in the days of Ezra, one of those who had married foreign wives (Ezr. x. 22). He is possibly the same as—6. who is mentioned in Neh. xii. 41, as one of the priests who accompanied Nehemiah with trumpets at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem.—7. An Israelite, of the sons of Zattu, who had also married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 27).

2. 1 Esd. ix. 32. [ELIEZER, 10.]

Eliphal'at, 1 Esd. ix. 33. [ELIPHELET, 6.]

Eliphal'et. 1. The last of the thirteen sons born to David, after his establishment in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 16; 1 Chr. xiv. 7). [ELIPHELET, 2].—2. 1 Esdr. viii. 39. [ELIPHELET, 5.]

El'iphas. 1. The son of Esau and Adah, and father of Teman (Gen. xxxvi. 4; 1 Chr. i. 35, 36).

—2. The chief of the "three friends" of Job. He is called "the Temanite;" hence it is naturally inferred that he was a descendant of Teman. On him falls the main burden of the argument, that God's retribution in this world is perfect and certain, and that consequently suffering must be a proof of previous sin (Job iv. v. xv. xxii.). The great truth brought out by him is the unapproachable majesty and purity of God (iv. 12-21, v. 12-16).

Eliph'eleh, a Meauite Levite; one of the gatekeepers appointed by David to play on the harp "on the Scheminith" on the occasion of bringing up the Ark to the city of David (1 Chr. xv. 18, 21).

Eliphe'et. 1. The name of a son of David, one of the children born to him after his establishment in Jerusalem (1 Chr. iii. 6).—2. Another son of David, belonging also to the Jerusalem family, and apparently the last of his sons (1 Chr. iii. 8).—3. Son of Ahashai, son of the Maachathite. One of the thirty warriors of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 34).—4. Son of Eshek, a descendant of king Saul through Jonathan (1 Chr. viii. 39).—5. One of the leaders of the Bene-Adonikam, who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 13).—6. A man of the Bene-Hashum in the time of Ezra who had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 33).

Eli'sabeth, the wife of Zacharias and mother of John the Baptist. She was herself of the priestly family, and a relation (Luke i. 36) of the mother of our Lord.

Eli'esu, the form in which the name ELISHA appears in the A. V. of the Apocrypha and the N. T. (Ecclus. xlviii. 12; Luke iv. 27).

Eli'sha, son of Shaphat of Abel-meholah. The attendant and disciple of Elijah, and subsequently his successor as prophet of the kingdom of Israel. The earliest mention of his name is in the command to Elijah in the cave at Horeb (1 K. xix. 16, 17). But our first introduction to the future prophet is in the fields of his native place. Abel-meholah was probably in the valley of the Jordan. Elijah, on his way from Sinai to Damascus by the Jordan valley, lights on his successor engaged in the labours of the field. To cross to him, to throw over his shoulders the rough mantle—a token at once of investiture with the prophet's office, and of adoption as a son—was to Elijah but the work of an instant, and the prophet strode on as if what he had done were nothing—"Go back again, for what have I done unto thee?" Elisha was not a man who, having put his hand to the plough, was likely to look back; he delayed merely to give the farewell kiss to his father and mother, and preside at a parting feast with his people, and then followed the great prophet on his northward road. Seven or eight years must have passed between the call of Elisha and the removal of his master, and during the whole of that time we hear nothing of him. But when that period had elapsed he reappears, to become the most prominent figure in the history of his country during the rest of his long life. In almost every respect Elisha presents the most complete contrast to Elijah. The copious collection of his sayings and doings which are preserved from the 3rd to the 9th chapter of the 2nd book of Kings, though in many respects deficient in that remarkable vividness which we have noticed in the records of Elijah, is yet full of testimonies to this contrast. Elisha was a true Bedouin child of the desert. The clefts of the Cherith, the wild shrubs of the desert, the cave at Horeb, the top of Carmel, were his haunts and his resting-places. If he enters a city, it is only to deliver his message of fire and be gone. Elisha, on the other hand, is a civilised man, an inhabitant of cities. And as with his manners so with his appearance. The touches of the narrative are very slight, but we can gather that his dress was the ordinary garment of an Israelite, the beged, probably similar in form to the long abneyeh of the modern Syrians (2 K. ii. 12), that his hair was worn trimmed behind, in contrast to the disordered locks of Elijah (ii. 23, as explained below), and that he used a walking-staff (iv. 29) of the kind ordinarily carried by grave or aged citizens (Zech. viii. 4). If from these external peculiarities we turn to the internal characteristics of the two, and to the results which they produced on their contemporaries, the differences which they present are highly instructive. In considering these differences the fact must not be lost sight of that, notwithstanding their greater extent and greater detail, the notices of Elisha really convey a much more imperfect idea of the man than those of Elijah. The prophets of the nation of Israel—both the predecessors of Elisha, like Samuel and Elijah, and his successors, like Isaiah and Jeremiah—are represented to us as preachers of righteousness, or champions of Jehovah against false gods, or judges and deliverers of their country, or counsellors of their sovereign in times of peril and difficulty. Their miracles and wonderful acts are introduced as means towards these ends, and are kept in the most complete subordination thereto. But with Elisha, as he is pictured in these narratives, the case is completely reversed. With him the miracles are everything, the prophet's work nothing. The man who was for years the intimate companion of Elijah, on whom Elijah's mantle descended, and who was gifted with a double portion of his spirit, appears in these records chiefly as a worker of prodigies, a predictor of future events, a revealer of secrets, and things happening out of sight or at a distance. The call of Elisha seems to have taken place about four years before the death of Ahab. He died in the reign of Joash, the grandson of Jehu. This embraces a period of not less than 65 years, for certainly 55 of which he held the office of "prophet in Israel" (2 K. v. 8).—After the departure of his master, Elisha returned to dwell at Jericho (2 K. ii. 18). The town had been lately rebuilt (2 K. xvi. 34), and was the residence of a body of the

"sons of the prophets" (2 K. ii. 5, 15). No one who has visited the site of Jericho can forget how prominent a feature in the scene are the two perennial springs which rise at the base of the steep hills of Quarantania behind the town. One of the springs was noxious at the time of Elisha's visit. At the request of the men of Jericho he remedied this evil. He took salt in a new vessel, and cast it into the water at its source in the name of Jehovah. From the time of Josephus to the present, the tradition of the cure has been attached to the large spring N.W. of the present town, which now bears, probably in reference to some later event, the name of Ain es-Sultan.—2. We next meet with Elisha at Bethel, in the heart of the country, on his way from Jericho to Mount Carmel (2 K. ii. 23). His last visit had been made in company with Elijah on their road down to the Jordan (ii. 2). The road to the town winds up the defile of the Wady Suweinî. Here the boys of the town were clustered, waiting, as they still wait at the entrance of the villages of Palestine, for the chance passer-by. In the short-trimmed locks of Elisha, how were they to recognise the successor of the prophet, with whose shaggy hair streaming over his shoulders they were all familiar? So with the license of the Eastern children they scoff at the new comer as he walks by—"Go up, roundhead! go up, roundhead!" For once Elisha assumed the sternness of his master. He turned upon them and cursed them in the name of Jehovah, and we all know the catastrophe which followed.—3. Elisha extricates Jehoram king of Israel, and the kings of Judah and Edom, from their difficulty in the campaign against Moab, arising from want of water (iii. 4-27). This incident probably took place at the S.E. end of the Dead Sea.—4. The widow of one of the sons of the prophets is in debt, and her two sons are about to be taken from her and sold as slaves. She has no property but a pot of oil. This Elisha causes (in his absence, iv. 5) to multiply, until the widow has filled with it all the vessels which she could borrow.—5. The next occurrence is at Shunem and Mount Carmel (iv. 8-37). The story divides itself into two parts, separated from each other by several years. (a.) Elisha, probably on his way between Carmel and the Jordan valley, calls accidentally at Shunem. Here he is hospitably entertained by a woman of substance, apparently at that time ignorant of the character of her guest. There is no occasion here to quote the details of this charming narrative. (b.) An interval has elapsed of several years. The boy is now old enough to accompany his father to the corn-field, where the harvest is proceeding. The fierce rays of the morning sun are too powerful for him, and he is carried home to his mother only to die at noon. She says nothing of their loss to her husband, but depositing her child on the bed of the man of God, at once starts in quest of him to Mount Carmel. No explanation is needed to tell Elisha the exact state of the case. The heat of the season will allow of no delay in taking the necessary steps, and Gehazi is at once despatched to run back to Shunem with the utmost speed. He takes the prophet's walking-staff in his hand which he is to lay on the face of the child. The mother and Elisha follow in haste. Before they reach the village the sun of that long, anxious, summer afternoon must have set. Gehazi meets them on the road, but he has no reassuring report to give, the placing of the staff on the face of the dead boy had called forth no sign of life. Then Elisha enters the house, goes up to his own chamber, "and he shut the door on them twain, and prayed unto Jehovah." The child is restored to life.—6. The scene now changes to Gilgal, apparently at a time when Elisha was residing there (iv. 38-41). The sons of the prophets are sitting round him. It is a time of famine. The food of the party must consist of any herbs that can be found. The great caldron is put on at the command of Elisha, and one of the company brings his blanket full of such wild vegetables as he has collected, and empties it into the pottage. But no sooner have they begun their meal than the taste betrays the presence of some noxious herb, and they cry out, "there is death in the pot, oh man of God!" In this case the cure was effected by meal which Elisha cast into the stew in the caldron.—7. (iv. 42-44). This in all probability belongs to the same time, and also to the same place as the preceding. A man from Baal-shalisha brings the man of God a present of the first-fruits, which under the law (Num. xviii. 8, 12; Deut. xviii. 3, 4) were the perquisite of the ministers of the sanctuary.—8. The simple records of these domestic incidents amongst the sons of the prophets are now interrupted by an occurrence of a more important character (v. 1-27). The chief captain of the army of Syria, to whom his country was indebted for some signal success, was afflicted with leprosy (v. 27). One of the members of his establishment is an Israelite girl, kidnapped by the marauders of Syria in one of their forays over the border, and she brings into that Syrian household the fame of the name and skill of Elisha. The news is communicated by Naaman himself to the king. Ben-hadad had yet to learn the position and character of Elisha. He writes to the king of Israel a letter very characteristic of a military prince. With this letter, and with a present, and a full retinue of attendants (13, 15, 23), Naaman proceeds to Samaria, to the house of Elisha. Elisha still keeps in the background, and while Naaman stands at the doorway, contents himself with sending out a messenger with the simple direction to bathe seven times in the Jordan. The independent behaviour of the prophet, and the simplicity of the prescription all combined to enrage Naaman. His slaves, however, knew how to deal with the quick but not ungenerous temper of their master, and the result is that he goes down to the Jordan and dips himself seven times, "and his flesh came again like the flesh of a little child, and he was clean." His first business after his cure is to thank his benefactor. He returns with his whole following, and this time he will not be denied the presence of Elisha, but making his way in, and standing before him, he gratefully acknowledges the power of the God of Israel, and entreats him to accept the present which he has brought from Damascus. Elisha is firm, and refuses the offer, though repeated with the strongest adjuration. But Gehazi cannot allow such treasures thus to escape him. So he frames a story by which the generous Naaman is made to send back with him to Elisha's house a considerable present in money and clothes. He then went in and stood before his master as if nothing had happened. But the prophet was not to be so deceived. His heart had gone after his servant through the whole transaction, even to its minutest details, and he visits Gehazi with the tremendous punishment of the leprosy, from which he has just relieved Naaman.—9. (vi. 1-7). We now return to the sons of the prophets, but this time the scene appears to be changed, and is probably at Jericho, and during the residence of Elisha there. As one of them was cutting at a tree overhanging the stream, the iron of his axe flew off and sank into the water. His cry soon brought the man of God to his aid. The stream of the Jordan is deep up to the very bank, especially when the water is so low as to leave the wood dry, and is moreover so turbid that search would be useless. But the place at which the lost axe entered the water is shown to Elisha; he breaks off a stick and casts it into the stream, and the iron appears on the surface, and is recovered by its possessor.—10. (vi. 8-23). Elisha is now residing at Dothan, halfway on the road between Samaria and Jezreel. The incursions of the Syrian marauding bands (comp. v. 2) still continue; but apparently with greater boldness. Their manoeuvres are not hid from the man of God, and by his warnings he saves the king "not once nor twice." A strong party with chariots is despatched to effect the capture of Elisha. They march by night, and before morning take up their station round the base of the eminence on which the ruins of Dothan still stand. Elisha's servant is the first to discover the danger. But Elisha remains unmoved by his fears. He prays to Jehovah, and the whole of the Syrian warriors are struck blind. Then descending, he offers to lead them to the person and the place which they seek. He conducts them to Samaria. There, at the prayer of the prophet, their sight is restored, and they find themselves not in a retired country village, but in the midst of the capital of Israel, and in the presence of the king and his troops. After such a repulse it is not surprising that the marauding forays of the Syrian troops ceased.—11. (vi. 24—vii. 2). But the king of Syria could not rest under such dishonour. He abandons his marauding system, and gathers a regular army, with which he lays siege to Samaria. The awful extremities to which the inhabitants of the place were driven need not here be recalled.—12. (viii. 1-6). We now go back several years to an incident connected with the lady of Shunem, at a period antecedent to the cure of Naaman and the transfer of his leprosy to Gehazi (v. 1, 27). Elisha had been made aware of a famine which Jehovah was about to bring upon the land for seven years; and he had warned his friend the Shunammite thereof that she might provide for her safety. At the end of the seven years she returned to her native place, to find that during her absence her house with the field-land attached to it had been appropriated by some other person. To the king therefore the Shunammite had recourse. And now occurred one of those rare coincidences which it is impossible not to ascribe to something more than mere chance. At the very moment of the entrance of the woman and her son, the king was listening to a recital by Gehazi of "all the great things which Elisha had done." The woman was instantly recognized by Gehazi. From her own mouth the king hears the repetition of the wonderful tale, and, whether from regard to Elisha, or struck by the extraordinary coincidence, orders her land to be restored with the value of all its produce during her absence.—13. (viii. 7-15). Hitherto we have met with the prophet only in his own country. We now find him at Damascus. He is there to carry out the command given to Elijah on Horeb to anoint Hazael to be king over Syria. At the time of his arrival Benhadad was prostrate with his last illness. The king's first desire is naturally to ascertain his own fate; and Hazael is commissioned to be the bearer of a present to the prophet, and to ask the question on the part of his master, "Shall I recover of this disease?" The present is one of royal dimensions; a caravan of 40 camels, laden with the riches and luxuries which that wealthy city could alone furnish. The reply, probably originally ambiguous, is doubly uncertain in the present doubtful state of the Hebrew text; but the general conclusion was unmistakable:—"Jehovah hath showed me that he shall surely die." But this was not all that had been revealed to the prophet. If Benhadad died, who would be king in his stead but the man who now stood before him? The prospect was one which drew forth the tears of the man of God. At Hazael's request Elisha confesses the reason of his tears. But the prospect is one which has no sorrow for Hazael. His only doubt is the possibility of such good fortune for one so mean. "But what is thy slave, dog that he is, that he should do this great thing?" To which Elisha replies, "Jehovah hath showed me that thou wilt be king over Syria." Returning to the king, Hazael tells him only half the dark saying of the man of God—"He told me that thou shouldst surely recover." But that was the last day of Benhadad's life.—14. (ix. 1-10). Two of the injunctions laid on Elijah had now been carried out; the third still remained. The time was come for the fulfilment of the curse upon Ahab by anointing Jehu king over Israel. Elisha's personal share in the transaction was confined to giving directions to one of the sons of the prophets. [Jehu].—15. Beyond this we have no record of Elisha's having taken any part in the revolution of Jehu, or the events which followed it. He does not again appear till we find him on his deathbed in his own house (xiii. 14-19).—16. (xiii. 20-22). The power of the prophet, however, does not terminate with his death. Even in the tomb he restores the dead to life. Before closing this account of Elisha we must not omit to notice the parallel which he presents to our Lord—the more necessary because, unlike the resemblance between Elijah and John the Baptist, no attention is called to it in the New Testament. It is not merely because he healed a leper, raised a dead man, or increased the loaves, that Elisha resembled Christ, but rather because of that loving gentle temper and kindness of disposition—characteristic of him above all the saints of the O. T.—ever ready to soothe, to heal, and to conciliate, which attracted to him women and simple people, and made him the universal friend and "father," not only consulted by kings and generals, but resorted to by widows and poor prophets in their little troubles and perplexities.

Eli'shah, the eldest son of Javan (Gen. x. 4). The residence of his descendants is described in Ex. xxvii. 7, as the "isles of Elishah," whence the Phoenicians obtained their purple and blue dyes. Josephus identified the race of Elishah with the Aeolians. His view is adopted by Knobel in preference to the more generally received opinion that Elishah = Elis, and in a more extended sense Peloponnesus, or even Hellas. It appears correct to treat it as the designation of a race rather than of a locality.

Eliah'ama. 1. Son of Ammihud, the "priest" or "captain" of the tribe of Ephraim in the Wilderness of Sinai (Num. i. 10, ii. 18, vii. 48, x. 22). From 1 Chr. vii. 26, we find that he was grandfather to the great Joshua.—2. A son of King David, born to him of his wives after his establishment in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 16; 1 Chr. iii. 8, xiv. 7).—3. Another son of David (1 Chr. iii. 6), who in the other lists is called ELISHUA.—4. A descendant of Judah; the son of Jekamiah (1 Chr. ii. 41).—5. The father of Nathaniah and grandfather of Ishmael (2 K. xxv. 25; Jer. xli. 1).—6. Scribe to King Jehoiakim (Jer. xxxv. 12, 20, 21).—7. A priest in the time of Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xvii. 8).

Eliah'aphat, son of Zichri; one of the captains of hundreds in the time of Jehoiaada (2 Chr. xxiii. 1).

Elishe'ba, the wife of Aaron (Ex. vi. 23). She was the daughter of Aminadab, and sister of Naashon the captain of the host of Judah (Num. ii. 3).

Elishu'a, one of David's sons, born after his settlement in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 15; 1 Chr. xiv. 5).

Elisimus, 1 Esd. ix. 28. [ELTASHIB.]

El'u, one of the forefathers of Judith (Jud. viii. 1).

El'ud, son of Achim in the genealogy of Christ (Matt. i. 15).

Eliz'aphan. 1. A Levite, son of Uzziel, chief of the house of the Kohathites at the time of the census in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. iii. 30).—2. Son of Parnach; prince of the tribe of Zebulun (Num. xxxiv. 25).

El'isur, son of Shedeur; prince of the tribe, and over the host of Reuben (Num. i. 5, ii. 10, vii. 30, 35, x. 18).

El'kanah. 1. Son, or rather grandson (see 1 Chr. vi. 22, 23 [7, 8]) of Korah, according to Ex. vi. 24.—2. A descendant of the above in the line of Ahimoth, otherwise Mahath, 1 Chr. vi. 26, 35 (Hebr. 11, 20).—3. Another Kohathite Levite, in the line of Heman the singer. He was son of Jeroham, and father of Samuel the illustrious Judge and Prophet (1 Chr. vi. 27, 34). All that is known of him is contained in the above notices and in 1 Sam. i. 1, 4, 8, 19, 21, 23, and ii. 2, 20.—4. A Levite (1 Chr. ix. 16).—5. A Korhite who joined David while he was at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 6).—6. An officer in the household of Ahaz, king of Judah, who was slain by Zichri the Ephraimite, when Pekah invaded Judah. He seems to have been the second in command under the prefect of the palace (2 Chr. xxviii. 7).

El'kosh, the birthplace of the prophet Nahum, hence called "the Elkoshite," Nah. i. 1. Two widely differing Jewish traditions assign as widely different localities to this place. In the time of Jerome it was believed to exist in a small village of Galilee. According to Schwartz, the grave of Nahum is shown at Kefr Tanchum, a village 2½ English miles north of Tiberias. But mediaeval tradition attached the fame of the prophet's burial place to Alkush, a village on the east bank of the Tigris near the monastery of Rabban Hormuzd, and about two miles north of Mosul. The former is more in accordance with the internal evidence afforded by the prophecy, which gives no sign of having been written in Assyria.

El'lasar, the city of Arioch (Gen. xiv. 1), seems to be the Hebrew representative of the old Chaldean town called in the native dialect Larsa or Laranacha. Larsa was a town of Lower Babylonia or Chaldaea, situated nearly half-way between Ur (Mugheir) and Erech (Warka), on the left bank of the Euphrates. It is now Senkerah.

Elm, Hos. iv. 13. See OAK.

Elmo'dam, son of Er, in the genealogy of Joseph (Luke iii. 28).

Elna'am, the father of Jeribai and Joshaviah, two of David's guard, according to 1 Chr. xi. 46.

El'nathan. 1. The maternal grandfather of Jehoiachin, distinguished as "E. of Jerusalem" (2 K. xxiv. 8). He is doubtless the same man with Elnathan the son of Achbor (Jer. xxvi. 22, xxxvi. 12, 25).—2. The name of three persons, apparently Levites, in the time of Ezra (Ezr. vii. 16).

E'lon. 1. A Hittite, whose daughter was one of Esau's wives (Gen. xxvi. 34, xxxvi. 2).—2. The second of the three sons attributed to Zebulun (Gen. xli. 14; Num. xxvi. 26); and the founder of the family of the ELONITES.—3. Elon the Zebulonite, who judged Israel for ten years, and was buried in Aijalon in Zebulun (Judg. xii. 11, 12).

E'lon, one of the towns in the border of the tribe of Dan (Josh. xix. 43). No town corresponding in name has yet been discovered.

E'lon-beth-hanan, is named with two Danite towns as forming one of Solomon's commissariat districts (1 K. iv. 9).

E'lonites, the. Num. xxvi. 26. [ELON, 2.]

E'loth. 1 K. ix. 26; 2 Chr. viii. 17, xxvi. 2. [ELATH.]

Elpa'al, a Benjamite, son of Hushim and brother of Abitub (1 Chr. viii. 11). He was the founder of a numerous family.

Elpa'let, one of David's sons born in Jerusalem (1 Chr. xiv. 5).

El-pa'ran. Literally "the terebinth of Paran" (Gen. xiv. 6). [PARAN.]

El'takeh, one of the cities in the border of Dan (Josh. xix. 44), which with its suburbs was allotted to the Kohathite Levites (xxi. 23).

El'tekon, one of the towns of the tribe of Judah, in the mountains (Josh. xv. 59). It has not yet been identified.

El'tolad, one of the cities in the south of Judah (Josh. xv. 30) allotted to Simeon (Josh. xix. 4); and in possession of that tribe until the time of David (1 Chr. iv. 29).

Elu'l, Neh. vi. 15; 1 Macc. xiv. 27. [MONTHS.]

Elusa'i, one of the warriors of Benjamin, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 5).

El'ymas, the Arabic name of the Jewish magus or sorcerer Barjesus (Acts xiii. 6 ff.).

El'zabad. 1. One of the Gadite heroes who came across the Jordan to David (1 Chr. xii. 12). 2. A Korhite Levite (1 Chr. xxvi. 7).

El'zaphan, second son of Uzziel, who was the son of Kohath son of Levi (Ex. vi. 22).

Embalming, the process by which dead bodies are preserved from putrefaction and decay. It was most general among the Egyptians, and it is in connexion with this people that the two instances which we meet with in the O. T. are mentioned (Gen. i. 2, 26). Of the Egyptian method of embalming there remain two minute accounts, which have a general kind of agreement, though they differ in details. Herodotus (ii. 86-89) describes three modes, varying in completeness and expense, and practised by persons regularly trained to the profession, who were initiated into the mysteries of the art by their ancestors. The most costly mode, which is estimated by Diodorus Siculus (l. 91) at a talent of silver, was said by the Egyptian priests to belong to him whose name in such a matter it was not lawful to mention, viz. Osiris. The embalmers first removed part of the brain through the nostrils, by means of a crooked iron, and destroyed the rest by injecting caustic drugs. An incision was then made along the flank with a sharp Ethiopian stone, and the whole of the intestines removed. The cavity was rinsed out with palm-wine, and afterwards scoured with pounded perfumes. It was then filled with pure myrrh pounded, cassia, and other aromatics, except frankincense. This done, the body was sewn up and steeped in natron for seventy days. When the seventy days were accomplished, the embalmers washed the corpse and swathed it in bandages of linen, cut in strips and smeared with gum. They then gave it up to the relatives of the deceased, who provided for it a wooden case, made in the shape of a man, in which the dead was placed, and deposited in an erect position against the wall of the sepulchral chamber. Diodorus Siculus gives some particulars of the process which are omitted by Herodotus. The second mode of embalming cost about 20 minae. In this case no incision was made in the body, nor were the intestines removed, but cedar-oil was injected into the stomach by the rectum. The oil was prevented from escaping, and the body was then steeped in natron for the appointed number of days. On the last day the oil was withdrawn, and carried off with it the stomach and intestines in a state of solution, while the flesh was consumed by the natron, and nothing was left but the skin and bones. The body in this state was returned to the relatives of the deceased. The third mode, which was adopted by the poorer classes, and cost but little, consisted in rinsing out the intestines with syrrmaea, an infusion of senna and cassia, and steeping the body for the usual number of days in natrum. The medicaments employed in embalming were various. From a chemical analysis of the substances found in mummies, M. Rouelle detected three modes of embalming—1. with asphaltum, or Jew's pitch, called also funeral gum, or gum of mummies; 2. with a mixture of asphaltum and cedar, the liquor distilled from the cedar; 3. with this mixture together with some resinous and aromatic ingredients. The powdered aromatics mentioned by Herodotus were not mixed with the bituminous matter, but sprinkled into the cavities of the body. It does not appear that embalming, properly so called, was practised by the Hebrews.

Embroiderer. This term is given in the A. V. as the equivalent of rôkêm, the productions of the art being described as "needlework" (rikmah). In Exodus the embroiderer is contrasted with the "cunning workman" (chôshêb). Various explanations have been offered as to the distinction between them, but most of these overlook the distinction marked in the Bible itself, viz. that the rôkêm wore simply a variegated texture, without gold thread or figures, and that the chôshêb interwove gold thread or figures into the variegated texture. The distinction, as given by the Talmudists, is this—that rikmah, or "needlework," was where a pattern was attached to the stuff by being sewn on to it on one side, and the work of the chôshêb when the pattern was worked into the stuff by the loom, and so appeared on both sides. This view appears to be entirely inconsistent with the statements of the Bible, and with the sense of the word rikmah elsewhere. The absence of the figure or the gold thread in the one, and its presence in the other, constitute the essence of the distinction. Again, looking at the general sense of the words, we shall find that chôshêb involves the idea of invention, or designing patterns; rikmah the idea of texture as well as variegated colour. Further than this, rikmah involves the idea of a regular disposition of colours, which demanded no inventive genius. We have lastly to notice the incorrect rendering of the Heb. word shâbats in the A. V.—"broider," "embroider" (Ex. xxviii. 4, 39). It means stuff worked in a tessellated manner, i. e. with square cavities such as stones might be set in (comp. ver. 20). The art of embroidery by the loom was extensively practised among the nations of antiquity. In addition to the Egyptians, the Babylonians were celebrated for it; but embroidery in the proper sense of the term, i. e. with the needle, was a Phrygian invention of later date (Plin. viii. 48).

Emerald, a precious stone, first in the second row on the breastplate of the high-priest (Ex. xxviii. 18, xxxix. 11), imported to Tyre from Syria (Ex. xxvii. 16), used as a seal or signet (Ecclus. xxii. 6), as an ornament of clothing and bedding (Ex. xxviii. 13; Jud. x. 21), and spoken of as one of the foundations of Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 19; Tob. xiii. 16). The rainbow round the throne is compared to emerald in Rev. iv. 3.

Emerods (Heb. 'aphêlîm, têchôrîm; Deut. xxviii. 27; 1 Sam. v. 6, 9, 12, vi. 4, 5, 11). The probabilities as to the nature of the disease are mainly dependent on the probable roots of these two Hebrew words. It appears that the former word means the disease, and the latter the part affected, which must necessarily have been included in the actually existing image, and have struck the eye as the essential thing represented, to which the disease was an incident. As some morbid swelling, then, seems the most probable nature of the disease, so no more probable conjecture has been advanced than that hemorrhoidal tumours, or bleeding piles, are intended. These are very common in Syria at present, oriental habits of want of exercise and improper food, producing derangement of the liver, constipation, &c., being such as to cause them.

Emims, a tribe or family of gigantic stature which originally inhabited the region along the eastern side of the Dead Sea. They were related to the Anakim, and were generally called by the same name; but their conquerors the Moabites termed them Emim—that is “terrible men” (Deut. ii. 11)—most probably on account of their fierce aspect.

Emman'uel, Matt. i. 23. [IMMANUEL.]

Emma'us, the village to which the two disciples were going when our Lord appeared to them on the way, on the day of His resurrection (Luke xxiv. 13). Luke makes its distance from Jerusalem sixty stadia (A. V. “threescore furlongs”), or about $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and Josephus mentions “a village called Emmaus” at the same distance. From the earliest period of which we have any record, the opinion prevailed among Christian writers that the Emmaus of Luke was identical with the Emmaus on the border of the plain of Philistia, afterwards called Nicopolis, and which was some 20 miles from Jerusalem. Then, for some reason unknown to us, it began to be supposed that the site of Emmaus was at the little village of Kubeibeh, about 3 miles west of Neby Samw'el (the ancient MIZPEH), and 9 miles from Jerusalem. There is not, however, a shadow of evidence for this supposition. In fact the site of Emmaus remains yet to be identified.

Emma'us, or Nicopolis (1 Macc. iii. 40), a town in the plain of Philistia, at the foot of the mountains of Judah, 22 Roman miles from Jerusalem, and 10 from Lydda. It was fortified by Bacchides, the general of Antiochus Epiphanes, when he was engaged in the war with Jonathan Maccabaeus (1 Macc. ix. 50). It was in the plain beside this city that Judas Maccabaeus so signally defeated the Syrians with a mere handful of men, as related in 1 Macc. iii. 57, iv. 3, &c. A small miserable village called 'Amwās still occupies the site of the ancient city.

Em'mer, 1 Esd. ix. 21. [IMMER.]

Em'mor, the father of Sychem (Acts vii. 16). [HAMOR.]

E'nam, one of the cities of Judah in the Shefelah or lowland (Josh. xv. 34). From its mention with towns which are known to have been near Timnath, this is very probably the place in the “doorway” of which Tamar sat before her interview with her father-in-law (Gen. xxxviii. 14).

E'nan. Ahira ben-Enan was “prince” of the tribe of Naphtali at the time of the numbering of Israel in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. i. 15).

Ena'sibus, 1 Esd. ix. 34. [ELIASHIB.]

Encampment (Heb. machānah, in all places except 2 K. vi. 8, where tachānāth is used). The word primarily denoted the resting-place of an army or company of travellers at night (Ex. xvi. 13; Gen. xxxii. 21), and was hence applied to the army or caravan when on its march (Ex. xiv. 19; Josh. x. 5, xi. 4; Gen. xxxii. 7, 8). “Among nomadic tribes war never attained to the dignity of a science, and their encampments were consequently devoid of all the appliances of more systematic warfare. The description of the camp of the Israelites, on their march from Egypt (Num. ii., iii.), supplies the greatest amount of information on the subject: whatever else may be gleaned is from scattered hints. The tabernacle, corresponding to the chieftain's tent of an ordinary encampment, was placed in the centre, and around and facing it (Num. ii. 1), arranged in four grand divisions, corresponding to the four points of the compass, lay the host of Israel, according to their standards (Num. i. 52, ii. 2). In the centre, round the tabernacle, and with no standard but the cloudy or fiery pillar which rested over it, were the tents of the priests and Levites. The former, with Moses and Aaron at their head, were encamped on the eastern side. The order of encampment was preserved on the march (Num. ii. 17), the signal for which was given by a blast of the two silver trumpets (Num. x. 5). In this description of the order of the encampment no mention is made of sentinels, who, it is reasonable to suppose, were placed at the gates (Ex. xxxii. 26, 27) in the four quarters of the camp. This was evidently the case in the camp of the Levites (comp. 1 Chr. ix. 18, 24; 2 Chr. xxxi. 2). The sanitary regulations of the camp of the Israelites were for the twofold purpose of preserving the health of the vast multitude and the purity of the camp as the dwelling-place of God (Num. v. 3; Deut. xxiii. 14). The execution of criminals took place without the camp (Lev. xxiv. 14; Num. xv. 35, 36; Josh. vii. 24), as did the burning of the young bullock for the sin-offering (Lev. iv. 12). These circumstances combined explain Heb. xiii. 12, and John xix. 17, 20. High ground appears to have been uniformly selected for the position of a camp, whether it were on a hill or mountain side, or in an inaccessible pass (Judg. vii. 18). The carelessness of the Midianites in encamping in the plain exposed them to the night surprise by Gideon, and resulted in their consequent discomfiture (Judg. vi. 33, vii. 8, 12). But another important consideration in fixing upon a position for a camp was the propinquity of water: hence it is found that in most instances camps were pitched near a spring or well (Judg. vii. 3; 1 Macc. ix. 33). The camp was surrounded by the ma'gālāh (1 Sam. xvii. 20), or ma'gāl (1 Sam. xxvi. 5, 7), which some explain as an earthwork thrown up round the encampment, others as the barrier formed by the baggage-waggons. We know that, in the case of a siege, the attacking army, if possible, surrounded the place attacked (1 Macc. xiii. 43), and drew about it a line of circumvallation (2 K. xxv. 1), which was marked by a breastwork of earth (Is. lvi. 10; Ez. xxi. 27 [22]; comp. Job xix. 12) for the double purpose of preventing the escape of the besieged and of protecting the besiegers from their sallies. But there was not so much need of a formal entrenchment, as but few instances occur in which engagements were fought in the camps themselves, and these only when the attack was made at night. To guard against these attacks, sentinels were posted (Judg. vii. 20; 1 Macc. xii. 27) round the camp, and the neglect of this precaution by Zebah and Zalmunna probably led to their capture by Gideon, and the ultimate defeat of their army (Judg. vii. 19). The valley which separated the hostile camps was generally selected as the fighting ground (1 Sam. iv. 2, xiv. 15; 2 Sam. xviii. 6), upon which the contest was decided, and hence the valleys of Palestine have played so conspicuous a part in its history (Josh. viii. 13; Judg. vi. 33; 2 Sam. v. 22, viii. 13, &c.). When the fighting men went forth to the place of marshalling (1 Sam. xvii. 20), a detachment was left to protect the camp and baggage (1 Sam. xvii. 22, xxx. 24). The beasts of burden were probably tethered to the tent-pegs (2 K. vii. 10; Zech. xiv. 15).

Enchantments. 1. Heb. lāḥim or lāḥāṭim (Ex. vii. 11, 22, viii. 7), secret arts.—2. Chāshāphim

WILDERNESS OF ENGELMAN

(2 K. ix. 22; Mic. v. 12; Nah. iii. 4), "muttered spells." The belief in the power of certain formulae was universal in the ancient world.—3. Léchashim (Eccl. x. 11). This word is especially used of the charming of serpents, Jer. viii. 17 (cf. Ps. lvi. 5; Eccl. xii. 13; Eccl. x. 11).—4. The word néchéshim is used of the enchantments sought by Balaam (Num. xxiv. 1). It properly alludes to ophiomancy, but in this place has a general meaning of endeavouring to gain omens.—5. Cheber is used for magic (Is. xlvii. 9, 12). Any resort to these methods of imposture was strictly forbidden in Scripture (Lev. xix. 26; Is. xlvii. 9, &c.), but to eradicate the tendency is almost impossible (2 K. xvii. 17; 2 Chr. xxxiii. 6), and we find it still flourishing at the Christian era (Acts xiii. 6, 8, viii. 9, 11; Gal. v. 20; Rev. ix. 21).

En-dor, a place in the territory of Issachar, and yet possessed by Manasseh (Josh. xvii. 11). Endor was long held in memory by the Jewish people as connected with the great victory over Sisera and Jabin. It was known to Eusebius, who describes it as a large village 4 miles S. of Tabor. Here to the N. of Jebel Duhy the name still lingers, attached to a considerable but now deserted village. The distance from the slopes of Gilboa to Endor is 7 or 8 miles, over difficult ground.

En-egla'im, a place named only by Ezekiel (xlvii. 10), apparently as on the Dead Sea; but whether near to or far from Engedi, on the west or east side of the Sea, it is impossible to ascertain from the text.

Enemes'sar is the name under which Shalmaneser appears in the book of Tobit (i. 2, 15, &c.).

En-e-ni-us, one of the leaders of the people who returned from captivity with Zerobabel (1 Esdr. v. 8).

Engad'di, Ecclus. xxiv. 14. [ENGEDI.]

En-gan'nim. 1. A city in the low country of Judah, named between Zanoah and Tappuah (Josh. xv. 34).—2. A city on the border of Issachar (Josh. xix. 21), allotted with its "suburbs" to the Gershonite Levites (xxi. 29). There is great probability in the conjecture of Robinson (ii. 315) that it is identical with the Ginea of Josephus (Ant. xx. 6, §1), which again, there can be little doubt, survives in the modern Jenin, the first village encountered on the ascent from the great plain of Esdraelon into the hills of the central country.

Enged'i, a town in the wilderness of Judah (Josh. xv. 62), on the western shore of the Dead Sea (Ez. xlvii. 10). Its original name was Hazazon-Tamar, doubtless, as Josephus says, on account of the palm-groves which surrounded it (2 Chr. xx. 2; Ecclus. xxiv. 14). Its site is now well known. It is about the middle of the western shore of the lake. Here is a rich plain, half a mile square, sloping very gently from the base of the mountains to the water, and shut in on the north by a lofty promontory. About a mile up the western acclivity, and at an elevation of some 400 feet above the plain, is the fountain of Ain Jidy, from which the place gets its name. Its banks are now cultivated by a few families of Arabs, who generally pitch their tents near this spot. Traces of the old city exist upon the plain and lower declivity of the mountain, on the south bank of the brook. The history of Engedi, though it reaches back nearly 4000 years, may be told in a few sentences. It was immediately after an assault upon the "Amorites, that dwelt in Hazazon-Tamar," that the five Mesopotamian kings were attacked by the rulers of the plain of Sodom (Gen. xiv. 7; comp. 2 Chr. xx. 2). Saul was told that David was in the "wilderness of Engedi;" and he took "3000 men, and went to seek David and his men upon the rocks of the wild goats" (1 Sam. xxiv. 1-4). At a later period Engedi was the gathering-place of the Moabites and Ammonites who went up against Jerusalem, and fell in the valley of Berachah (2 Chr. xx. 2). The vineyards of Engedi were celebrated by Solomon (Cant. i. 14), its balsam by Josephus, and its palms by Pliny.

Engine, a term exclusively applied to military affairs in the Bible. The engines to which the term is applied in 2 Chr. xxvi. 15, were designed to propel various missiles from the walls of a besieged town: one, like the balista, was for stones, consisting probably of a strong spring and a tube to give the right direction to the stone; another, like the catapulta, for arrows, an enormous stationary bow. Another war-engine, with which the Hebrews were acquainted, was the battering-ram, described in Ez. xxvi. 9, and still more precisely in Ez. iv. 2, xxi. 22. The marginal rendering, "engines of shot" (Jer. vi. 6, xxxii. 24; Ez. xxvi. 8), is incorrect.

Assyrian war-engine. (From Botti, pl. 160.)

Engraver. The specific description of an engraver was chârash eben (Ex. xxviii. 11), and his chief business was cutting names or devices on rings and seals; the only notices of engraving are in connexion with the high-priest's dress—the two onyx-stones, the twelve jewels, and the mitre-plate having inscriptions on them (Ex. xxviii. 11, 21, 36).

En-had'dah, one of the cities on the border of Issachar named next to Engannim (Josh. xix. 21). Van de Velde would identify it with Ain-haud on the western side of Carmel, and about 2 miles only from the sea; but this is surely out of the limits of the tribe of Issachar, and rather in Asher or Manasseh.

En-hak'kore, the spring which burst out in answer to the cry of Samson after his exploit with the jawbone (Judg. xv. 19). Van de Velde endeavours to identify Lechi with Tell-el-Lahiyeh 4 miles N. of Beersheba, and Enhakkore with the large spring between the Tell and Khewelfeh.

En-ha'sor, one of the fenced cities in the inheritance of Naphtali, distinct from Hazor (Josh. xix. 37). It has not yet been identified.

En-mish'pat, Gen. xiv. 7. [KADESH.]

E'noch. 1. The eldest son of Cain (Gen. iv. 17), who called the city which he built after his name (18). Ewald fancies that there is a reference to the Phrygian Iconium. Other places have been identified with the site of Enoch with little probability: e.g. Anachta in Susiana, the Heniokhi in the Caucasus, &c.—2. The son of Jared and father of Methuselah (Gen. v. 21 ff.; Luke iii. 28). In the Epistle of Jude (v. 24) he is described as "the seventh from Adam;" and the number is probably noticed as conveying the idea of divine completion and rest, while Enoch was himself a type of perfected humanity. The other numbers connected with his history appear too symmetrical to be without meaning. After the birth of Methuselah it is said (Gen. v. 22-4) that Enoch "walked with God 300 years . . . and he was not; for God took him." The phrase "walked with God" is elsewhere only used of Noah (Gen. vi. 9; cf. Gen. xvii. 1, &c.), and is to be explained of a prophetic life spent in immediate converse with the spiritual world. In the epistle to the Hebrews the spring and issue of Enoch's life are clearly marked. The biblical notices of Enoch were a fruitful source of speculation in later times. Some theologians disputed with subtlety as to the place to which he was removed. Both the Latin and Greek fathers commonly coupled Enoch and Elijah as historic witnesses of the possibility of a resurrection of the body and of a true human existence in glory; and the voice of early ecclesiastical tradition is almost unanimous in regarding them as "the two witnesses" (Rev. xi. 3 ff.) who should fall before "the beast."—3. In 2 Esdr. vi. 49, 51, Enoch stands in the Latin (and Eng.) Version for Behemoth in the Aethiopic.

Enoch, the Book of, is one of the most important remains of that early apocalyptic literature of which the book of Daniel is the great prototype. 1. The history of the book is remarkable. The first trace of its existence is generally found in the Epistle of St. Jude (14, 15; cf. Enoch i. 9), but the words of the Apostle leave it uncertain whether he derived his quotation from tradition or from writing, though the wide spread of the book in the second century seems almost decisive in favour of the latter supposition. It appears to have been known to Justin, Irenaeus, and Anatolius. Clement of Alexandria and Origen both make use of it. Tertullian expressly quotes the book as one which was "not received by some, nor admitted into the Jewish canon." Considerable fragments are preserved in the Chronographia of Georgius Syncellus (c. 792 A.D.), and these, with the scanty notices of earlier writers, constituted the sole remains of the book known in Europe till the close of the last century. Meanwhile, however, a report was current that the entire book was preserved in Abyssinia; and at length, in 1773, Bruce brought with him on his return from Egypt three MSS. containing the complete Aethiopic translation.—2. The Aethiopic translation was made from the Greek, and probably towards the middle or close of the fourth century. The general coincidence of the translation with the patristic quotations of corresponding passages shows satisfactorily that the text from which it was derived was the same as that current in the early Church. But it is still uncertain whether the Greek text was the original, or itself a translation. One of the earliest references to the book occurs in the Hebrew Book of Jubilees, and the names of the angels and winds are derived from Aramaic roots. In addition to this a Hebrew book of Enoch was known and used by Jewish writers till the thirteenth century, so that on these grounds, among others, many have supposed that the book was first composed in Hebrew (Aramaean).—3. In its present shape the book consists of a series of revelations supposed to have been given to Enoch and Noah, which extend to the most varied aspects of nature and life, and are designed to offer a comprehensive vindication of the action of Providence. It is divided into five parts. The first part (Cc. 1-36), after a general introduction, contains an account of the fall of the angels (Gen. vi. 1) and of the judgment to come upon them and upon the giants, their offspring (6-16); and this is followed by the description of the journey of Enoch through the earth and lower heaven in company with an angel, who showed to him many of the great mysteries of nature, the treasure-houses of the storms and winds, and fires of heaven, the prison of the fallen and the land of the blessed (17-36). The second part (37-71) is styled "a vision of wisdom," and consists of three "parables," in which Enoch relates the revelations of the higher secrets of heaven and of the spiritual world which were given to him. The first parable (38-44) gives chiefly a picture of the future blessings and manifestations of the righteous, with further details as to the heavenly bodies: the second (45-57) describes in splendid imagery the coming of Messiah, and the results which it should work among "the elect" and the gainsayers: the third (58-69) draws out at further length the blessedness of "the elect and holy," and the confusion and wretchedness of the sinful rulers of the world. The third part (72-82) is styled "the book of the course of the lights of heaven," and deals with the motions of the sun and moon, and the changes of the seasons; and with this the narrative of the journey of Enoch closes. The fourth part (83-91) is not distinguished by any special name, but contains the record of a dream which was granted to Enoch in his youth, in which he saw the history of the kingdoms of God and of the world up to the final establishment of the throne of Messiah. The fifth part (92-105) contains the last addresses of Enoch to his children, in which the teaching of the former chapters is made the groundwork of earnest exhortation. The signs which attended the birth of Noah are next noticed (106-7); and another short "writing of Enoch" (108) forms the close to the whole book.—4. The general unity which the book possesses in its present form marks it, in the main, as the work of one man; but internal coincidence shows with equal clearness that different fragments were incorporated by the author into his work, and some additions have been probably made afterwards. The whole book appears to be distinctly of Jewish origin, and it may be regarded as describing an important phase of Jewish opinion shortly before the coming of Christ. Notwithstanding the quotation in St. Jude, and the wide circulation of the book itself, the apocalypse of Enoch was uniformly and distinctly separated from the canonical scriptures.

E'noh. [ÆNON.]

E'nos. The son of Seth; properly called Enosh, as in 1 Chr. i. 1 (Gen. iv. 26, v. 6, 7, 9, 10, 11; Luke iii. 38).

E'noah. The same as the preceding (1 Chr. i. 1).

En-rim'mon, one of the places which the men of Judah re-inhabited after their return from the Captivity (Neh. xi. 28). Perhaps the same as "Ain and Rimmon" (Josh. xv. 32), and "Ain, Remmon" (xix. 7; and see 1 Chr. iv. 32).

En-ro'gel, a spring which formed one of the landmarks on the boundary-line between Judah (Josh. xv. 7) and Benjamin (xviii. 16). Here, apparently concealed from the view of the city, Jonathan and Ahimanz remained, after the flight of David, awaiting intelligence from within the walls (2 Sam. xvii. 17); and here, by the stone Zohaleth, which is close to En-rogel, Adonijah held the feast, which was the first and last act of his attempt on the crown (1 K. i. 9). These are all the occurrences of the name in the Bible. By Josephus on the last incident its situation is given as "without the city, in the royal garden." In more modern times, a tradition, apparently first recorded by Brocardus, would make En-rogel the well of Job or Nehemiah (Btr Eyub), below the junction of the valleys of Kedron and Hinnom, and south of the Pool of Siloam. Against this general belief, some strong arguments are urged by Dr. Bonar in favour of identifying En-rogel with the present "Fountain of the Virgin," 'Ain Umm ed-Daraj—the perennial source from which the Pool of Siloam is supplied.

En-shem'esh, a spring which formed one of the landmarks on the north boundary of Judah (Josh. xv. 7) and the south boundary of Benjamin (xviii. 17). The Ain-Haud or Ain-Chôt—the "Well of the Apostles,"—about a mile below Bethany, is generally identified with En-Shemesh.

Ensign (nés; in the A. V. generally "ensign," sometimes "standard;" degel, "standard," with the exception of Cant. ii. 4, "banner;" ôth, "ensign").

Egyptian standards. (From Wilkinson.)

The distinction between these three Hebrew terms is sufficiently marked by their respective uses: nés is a signal; degel a military standard for a large division of an army; and ôth, the same for a small one. Neither of them, however, expresses the idea which "standard" conveys to our minds, viz. a flag; the standards in use among the Hebrews probably resembled those of the Egyptians and Assyrians—a figure or device of some kind elevated on a pole. (1.) The notices of the nés or "ensign" are most frequent; it consisted of some well understood signal which was exhibited on the top of a pole from a bare mountain top (Is. xlii. 2, xviii. 3). What the nature of the signal was, we have no means of stating. The important point to be observed is, that the nés was an occasional signal, and not a military standard. (2.) The term degel is used to describe the standards which were given to each of the four divisions of the Israelite army at the time of the Exodus (Num. i. 52, ii. 2 ff., x. 14 ff.). The character of the Hebrew military standards is quite a matter of conjecture; they probably resembled the Egyptian, which consisted of a sacred emblem such as an animal, a boat, or the king's name.

En-tappu'ah. It is probably identical with Tappuah, the position of which will be elsewhere examined (Josh. xvii. 7).

Eph'e'natus, a Christian at Rome, greeted by St. Paul in Rom. xvi. 5, and designated as his beloved, and the first fruit of Asia unto Christ.

Eph'aphras, a fellow-labourer with the Apostle Paul, mentioned Col. i. 7, as having taught the Colossian church the grace of God in truth, and designated a faithful minister of Christ on their behalf. He was at that time with St. Paul at Rome (Col. iv. 12), and seems by the expression there used to have been a Colossian by birth. We find him again mentioned in the Epistle to Philemon (ver. 23), which was sent at the same time as that to the Colossians. Ephaphras may be the same as Epaphroditus, but the notices in the N. T. do not enable us to speak with any confidence.

Ephaphrodi'tus (Phil. ii. 25, iv. 18). See above under EPAPHRAS.

E'phah, the first, in order, of the sons of Midian (Gen. xxv. 4; 1 Chr. i. 33), afterwards mentioned by Isaiah (lx. 6, 7). No satisfactory identification of this tribe has been discovered.

E'phah. 1. Concubine of Caleb, in the line of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 46).—2. Son of Jahdai; also in the line of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 47).

E'phah. [MEASURES.]

E'phai, a Netophathite, whose sons were among the "captains of the forces" left in Judah after the deportation to Babylon (Jer. xl. 8, xli. 3, comp. xl. 13).

E'pher, the second, in order, of the sons of Midian (Gen. xxv. 4; 1 Chr. i. 33). His settlements have not been identified with any probability.

E'pher. 1. A son of Ezra, among the descendants of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 17).—2. One of the heads of the families of Manasseh on the east of Jordan (1 Chr. v. 24).

E'phes-dam'mim, a place between Socoh and Azekah, at which the Philistines were encamped before the affray in which Goliath was killed (1 Sam. xvii. 1). Under the shorter form of PAs-DAMMIM it occurs once again in a similar connexion (1 Chr. xi. 13). [ELAH.]

Ephesians, the Epistle to the, was written by the Apostle St. Paul during his first captivity at Rome (Acts xxviii. 16), apparently immediately after he had written the Epistle to the Colossians [COLOSSIANS, EP. TO], and during that period (perhaps the early part of A.D. 62) when his imprisonment had not assumed the severer character which seems to have marked its close. This sublime epistle was addressed to the Christian church at the ancient and famous city of Ephesus, that church which the Apostle had himself founded (Acts xix. 1 sq., comp. xviii. 19), with which he abode so long (Acts xx. 31), and from the elders of which he parted with such a warm-hearted and affecting farewell (Acts xx. 18-35). The contents of this epistle easily admit of being divided into two portions, the first mainly doctrinal (ch. i.—iii.), the second hortatory and practical. With regard to the authenticity and genuineness of this epistle, it is not too much to say that there are no just grounds for doubt. The testimonies of antiquity are unusually strong. Even if we do not press the supposed allusions in Ignatius and Polycarp, we can confidently adduce Irenaeus, Clem. Alex., Origen, Tertullian, and after them the constant and persistent tradition of the ancient Church. Even Marcion did not deny that the epistle was written by St. Paul, nor did heretics refuse occasionally to cite it as confessedly due to him as its author. In recent times, however, its genuineness has been somewhat vehemently called in question. De Wette labours to prove that it is a mere spiritless expansion of the Epistle to the Colossians, though compiled in the Apostolic age: Schwegler, Baur, and others advance a step further, and reject both epistles as of no higher antiquity than the age of Montanism and early Gnosticism. For a detailed reply to the arguments of De Wette and Baur, the student may be referred to Meyer, Einleit. z. Eph. p. 19 sq. (ed. 2); Davidson, Introduct. to N. T. ii. p. 352 sq.; and Alford, Prolegomena, p. 8. Two special points require a brief notice:—(1.) The readers for whom this epistle was designed. In the opening paragraph the words ἐν Ἐφέσῳ are omitted by M, B, 67, Basil, and possibly Tertullian. This, combined with the somewhat noticeable omission of all greetings to the members of a Church with which the Apostle stood in such affectionate relation, and some other internal objections, have suggested a doubt whether these words really formed a part of the original text. At first sight these doubts seem plausible; but when we oppose to them (a) the overwhelming weight of diplomatic evidence for the insertion of the words, (b) the testimony of all the versions, (c) the universal designation of this epistle by the ancient Church (Marcion standing alone in his assertion that it was written to the Laodiceans) as an epistle to the Ephesians, (d) the extreme difficulty in giving any satisfactory meaning to the isolated participle, and the absence of any parallel usage in the Apostle's writings,—we can scarcely feel any doubt as to the propriety of removing the brackets in which these words are enclosed in the 2nd edition of Tischendorf, and of considering them an integral part of the original text.—(2.) The question of priority in respect of composition between this epistle and that to the Colossians is very difficult to adjust. On the whole, both internal and external considerations seem somewhat in favour of the priority of the Epistle to the Colossians.

Ephesus, an illustrious city in the district of Ionia, nearly opposite the island of Samos, and about the middle of the western coast of the peninsula commonly called Asia Minor. Of the Roman province of Asia Ephesus was the capital.—1. Geographical Relations.—All the cities of Ionia were remarkably well situated for the growth of commercial prosperity, and none more so than Ephesus. In the time of Augustus it was the great emporium of all the regions of Asia within the Taurus: its harbour (named Panormus), at the mouth of the Cayster, was elaborately constructed. St. Paul's life alone furnishes illustrations of its mercantile relations with Achaia on the W., Macedonia on the N., and Syria on the E. As to the relations of Ephesus to the inland regions of the continent, these also are prominently brought before us in the Apostle's travels. The "upper coasts" (Acts xix. 1) through which he passed, when about to take up his residence in the city, were the Phrygian tablelands of the interior. Two great roads at least, in the Roman times, led eastward from Ephesus; one through the passes of Tmolus to Sardis (Rev. iii. 1) and thence to Galatia and the N.E., the other round the extremity of Pactyas to Magnesia, and so up the valley of the Maeander to Iconium, whence the communication was direct to the Euphrates and to the Syrian Antioch. There seem to have been Sardinian and Magnesian gates on the E. side of Ephesus corresponding to these roads respectively. There were also coast-roads leading northwards to Smyrna and southwards to Miletus. By the latter of these it is probable that the Ephesian elders travelled when summoned to meet Paul at the latter city (Acts xx. 17, 18).—2. Temple and Worship of Diana.—Conspicuous at the head of the harbour of Ephesus was the great temple of Diana or Artemis, the tutelary divinity of the city. This building was raised on immense substructions, in consequence of the swampy nature of the ground. The earliest temple, which had been begun before the Persian war, was burnt down in the night when Alexander the Great was born; and another structure, raised by the enthusiastic co-operation of all the inhabitants of "Asia" had taken its place. The magnificence of this sanctuary was a proverb throughout the civilised world. In consequence of this devotion the city of Ephesus was called νεώκοπος (Acts xix. 35) or "warden" of Diana. Another consequence of the celebrity of Diana's worship at Ephesus was, that a large manufactory grew up there of portable shrines, which strangers purchased, and devotees carried with them on journeys or set up in their houses. Of the manufacturers engaged in this business, perhaps Alexander the "coppersmith" (2 Tim. iv. 14) was one. The case of Demetrius the "silversmith" is explicit.—3. Study and Practice of Magic.—Not unconnected with the preceding subject was the remarkable prevalence of magical arts at Ephesus. In illustration of the magical books which were publicly burnt (ver. 19) under the influence of St. Paul's preaching, it is enough here to refer to the ἑφῆστια γράμματα (mentioned by Plutarch and others), which were regarded as a charm when pronounced, and when written down were carried about as amulets.—4. Provincial and Municipal Government.—It is well known that Asia was a proconsular province; and in harmony with this fact we find proconsuls (A. V. "deputies," specially mentioned (ver. 38). Again we learn from Pliny (v. 31) that Ephesus was an assize-town, and in the sacred narrative (ver. 38) we find the court-days alluded to as actually being held (A. V. "the law is open") during the uproar. Ephesus itself was a "free city," and had its own assemblies and its own magistrates. The senate is mentioned by Josephus; and St. Luke, in the narrative before us, speaks of the δῆμος (ver. 30, 33, A. V. "the people") and of its customary assemblies (ver. 39, A. V. "a lawful assembly"). We even find conspicuous mention made of one of the most important municipal officers of Ephesus, the "Town-Clerk" or keeper of the records, whom we know from other sources to have been a person of great influence and responsibility. It is remarkable how all these political and religious characteristics of Ephesus, which appear in the sacred narrative, are illustrated by inscriptions and coins. The coins of Ephesus are full of allusions to the worship of Diana in various aspects. That Jews were established there in considerable numbers is known from Josephus (l. c.), and might be inferred from its mercantile eminence; but it is also evident from Acts ii. 9, vi. 9. It is here, and here only, that we find disciples of John the Baptist explicitly mentioned after the ascension of Christ (Acts xvii. 25, xix. 3). The case of Apollos (xviii. 24) is an exemplification further of the intercourse between this place and Alexandria. The first seeds of Christian truth were possibly sown at Ephesus immediately after the Great Pentecost (Acts ii.). In St. Paul's stay of more than two years (xix. 8, 10, xx. 31), which formed the most important passage of his third circuit, and during which he laboured, first in the synagogue (xix. 8), and then in the school of Tyrannus (ver. 9), and also in private houses (xx. 20), and during which he wrote the First Epistle to the Corinthians, we have the period of the chief evangelization of this shore of the Aegean. The address at Miletus shows that the church at Ephesus was thoroughly organised under its presbyters. At a later period TIMOTHY was set over them, as we learn from the two epistles addressed to him. Among St. Paul's other companions, two, Trophimus and Tychicus, were natives of Asia (xx. 4), and the latter probably (2 Tim. iv. 12), the former certainly (Acts xxi. 29), natives of Ephesus. In the same connexion we ought to mention Onesiphorus (2 Tim. i. 16-18) and his household (iv. 19). On the other hand must be noticed certain specified Ephesian antagonists of the Apostle, the sons of Seva and his party (Acts xix. 14), Hymenaeus and Alexander (1 Tim. i. 20; 2 Tim. iv. 14), and Phygellus and Hermogenes (2 Tim. i. 15). The site of ancient Ephesus has been visited and examined by many travellers during the last 200 years. The whole place is now utterly desolate, with the exception of the small Turkish village at Ayasuluk. The ruins are of vast extent, both on Corceus and on the plain; but there is great doubt as to many topographical details. It is satisfactory, however, that the position of the theatre on Mount Priou is absolutely certain.

Eph'al, a descendant of Judah, of the family of Hezron and of Jerahmeel (1 Chr. ii. 37).

Ephod, a sacred vestment originally appropriate to the high-priest (Ex. xxviii. 4), but afterwards worn by ordinary priests (1 Sam. xxii. 18), and deemed characteristic of the office (1 Sam. ii. 28, xiv. 3; Hos. iii. 4). For a description of the robe itself see HIGH-PRIEST. The importance of the ephod as the receptacle of the breastplate led to its adoption in the idolatrous forms of worship instituted in the time of the Judges (Judg. viii. 27, xvii. 5, xviii. 14 ff.).

Ephod. Father of Hauniel of the tribe of Manasseh (Num. xxxiv. 23).

Ephraim, the second son of JOSEPH by his wife Asenath. The first indication we have of that ascendancy over his elder brother Manasseh, which at a later period the tribe of Ephraim so unmistakably possessed, is in the blessing of the children by Jacob, Gen. xlviii.—a passage on the age and genuineness of which the severest criticism has cast no doubt. Ephraim would appear at that time to have been about 21 years old. He was born before the beginning of the seven years of famine, towards the latter part of which Jacob had come to Egypt, 17 years before his death (Gen. xlvii. 28). Before Joseph's death Ephraim's family had reached the third generation (Gen. i. 25), and it must have been about this time that the affray mentioned in 1 Chr. vii. 21 occurred. To this early period too must probably be referred the circumstance alluded to in Ps. lxxviii. 9. The numbers of the tribe do not at once fulfil the promise of the blessing of Jacob. At the census in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. i. 32, 33, ii. 19) its numbers were 40,500, placing it at the head of the children of Rachel; Manasseh's number being 32,200, and Benjamin's 35,400. But 40 years later, on the eve of the conquest (Num. xxvi. 37), without any apparent cause, while Manasseh had advanced to 52,700, and Benjamin to 45,600, Ephraim had decreased to 32,500, the only smaller number being that of Simeon, 22,200. It is at the time of the sending of the spies that we are first introduced to the great hero to whom the tribe owed much of its subsequent greatness. Under Joshua, and in spite of the smallness of its numbers, the tribe must have taken a high position in the nation, to judge from the tone which the Ephraimites assumed on occasions shortly subsequent to the conquest. The boundaries of the portion of Ephraim are given in Josh. xvi. 1-10. The south boundary was coincident for part of its length with the north boundary of Benjamin. Commencing at the Jordan, at the reach opposite Jericho, it ran to the "water of Jericho," probably the Ain Dâk or Ain Sultân: thence by one of the ravines, the Wady Harith or W. Suweint, it ascended through the wilderness—Midbar, the uncultivated waste hills—to Mount Bethel and Luz; and thence by Ataroth, "the Japhletite," Bethoron the lower, and Gezer—all with one exception unknown—to the Mediterranean, probably about Joppa. The general direction of this line is N.E. by E. In Josh. xvi. 8 we probably have a fragment of the northern boundary (comp. xvii. 10), the torrent Kanah being the Nahr el Akhdar just below the ancient Caesarea. But it is very possible that there never was any definite subdivision of the territory assigned to the two brother tribes. Among the towns named as Manasseh's were Bethshean in the Jordan Valley, Endor on the slopes of the "Little Hermon," Tanach on the north side of Carmel, and Dor on the sea-coast south of the same mountain. Here the boundary—the north boundary—joined that of Asher, which dipped below Carmel to take in an angle of the plain of Sharon: N. and N.W. of Manasseh lay Zebulun and Issachar respectively. The territory thus allotted to the "house of Joseph" may be roughly estimated at 55 miles from E. to W. by 70 from N. to S., a portion about equal in extent to the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk combined. But though similar in size, nothing can be more different in its nature from those level counties than this broken and hilly tract. Central Palestine consists of an elevated district which rises from the flat ranges of the wilderness on the south of Judah, and terminates on the north with the slopes which descend into the great plain of Esdraelon. On the west a flat strip separates it from the sea, and on the east another flat strip forms the valley of the Jordan. Of this district the northern half was occupied by the great tribe we are now considering. This was the Har-Ephraim, the "Mount Ephraim," a district which seems to extend as far south as Ramah and Bethel (1 Sam. i. 1, vii. 17; 2 Chr. xiii. 4, 19, compared with xv. 8), places but a few miles north of Jerusalem, and within the limits of Benjamin. In structure it is limestone—rounded hills separated by valleys of denudation, but much less regular and monotonous than the part more to the south, about and below Jerusalem; with wide plains in the heart of the mountains, streams of running water, and continuous tracts of vegetation. The wealth of their possession had not the same immediately degrading effect on this tribe that it had on some of its northern brethren. Various causes may have helped to avert this evil. 1. The central situation of Ephraim, in the highway of all communications from one part of the country to another. 2. The position of Shechem, with the two sacred mountains of Ebal and Gerizim, and of Shiloh, and further of the tomb and patrimony of Joshua. 3. There was a spirit about the tribe itself which may have been both a cause and a consequence of these advantages of position. That spirit, though sometimes taking the form of noble remonstrance and reparation (2 Chr. xxviii. 9-15), usually manifests itself in jealous complaint at some enterprise undertaken or advantage gained in which they had not a chief share. The unsettled state of the country in general, and of the interior of Ephraim in particular (Judg. ix.), and the continual incursions of foreigners, prevented the power of the tribe from manifesting itself in a more formidable manner than by these murmurs, during the time of the Judges and the first stage of the monarchy. But the reign of Solomon, splendid in appearance but oppressive to the people, developed both the circumstances of revolt, and the leader who was to turn them to account. Solomon saw through the and if he could have succeeded in killing Jeroboam as he tried to do (1 K. xi. 40), the disruption might have been postponed for another century. As it was, the outbreak was deferred for a time, but the irritation was not allayed, and the insane folly of his son brought the mischief to a head. From the time of the revolt in two senses the history of Ephraim is the history of the kingdom of Israel, since not only did the tribe become a kingdom, but the kingdom embraced little besides the tribe. This is not surprising, and quite susceptible of explanation. North of Ephraim the country appears never to have been really taken possession of by the Israelites. And in addition to this original defect there is much in the physical formation and circumstances of the upper portion of Palestine to explain why those tribes never took any active part in the kingdom. But on the other hand the position of Ephraim was altogether different. It was one at once of great richness and great security. Her fertile plains and well watered valleys could only be reached by a laborious ascent through steep and narrow ravines, all but impassable for an army. There is no record of any attack on the central kingdom, either from the Jordan valley or the maritime plain. On the north side, from the plain of Esdraelon, it was more accessible, and it was from this side that the final invasion appears to have been made.

Ephraim. In "Baal-hazor which is by Ephraim" was Absalom's sheep-farm, at which took place the murder of Amnon, one of the earliest precursors of the great revolt (2 Sam. xiii. 23). There is unfortunately no clue to its situation.

Ephraim, a city "in the district near the wilderness" to which our Lord retired with his disciples when threatened with violence by the priests (John xi. 54). Dr. Robinson conjectures that Ophrah and Ephraim are identical, and that their modern representative is et-Taiyibeh. It is situated 4 or 5 miles east of Bethel, and 16 from Jerusalem.

Ephraim Gate of, one of the gates of the city of Jerusalem (2 K. xiv. 13; 2 Chr. xxv. 23; Neh. viii. 16, xii. 39), probably at or near the position of the present "Damascus gate."

Ephraim, the Wood of, a wood, or rather a forest on the E. of Jordan, in which the fatal battle was fought between the armies of David and of Absalom (2 Sam. xviii. 6). The suggestion is due to Grotius that the name was derived from the slaughter of Ephraim at the fords of Jordan by the Gileadites under Jephthah (Judg. xii. 1, 4, 5). Is it not at least equally probable that the forest derived its name from this very battle?

Ephraimite. Of the tribe of Ephraim; elsewhere called "Ephrathite" (Judg. xii. 5).

Ephraim, a city of Israel, which with its dependent hamlets Abijah and the army of Judah captured from Jeroboam (2 Chr. xiii. 19). It has been conjectured that this Ephraim or Ephron is identical with the Ephraim by which Absalom's sheep-farm of Baal-hazor was situated; with the city called Ephraim near the wilderness in which our Lord lived for some time; and with Ophrah, a city of Benjamin, apparently not far from Bethel. But nothing more than conjecture can be arrived at on these points.

Ephrathah, or Ephrath. 1. Second wife of Caleb the son of Hezron, mother of Hur, and grandmother of Caleb the spy, according to 1 Chr. ii. 19, 50, and probably 24, and iv. 4.—2. The ancient name of Bethlehem-Judah, as is manifest from Gen. xxxv. 16, 19, xlviii. 7. It cannot therefore have derived its name from Ephrathah, the mother of Hur. It seems obvious therefore to infer that, on the contrary, Ephrathah, the mother of Hur, was so called from the town of her birth, and that she probably was the owner of the town and district. Another possible explanation is, that Ephrathah may have been the name given to some daughter of Benjamin to commemorate the circumstance of Rachel his mother having died close to Ephrath. But it would not account for Ephrathah's descendants being settled at Bethlehem.—3. Gesenius thinks that in Ps. cxxii. 6, Ephrathah means Ephraim.

Ephrathite. 1. An inhabitant of Bethlehem (Ruth i. 2).—2. An Ephraimite (1 Sam. i. 1; 1 K. xi. 26.).

Ephron, the son of Zochar, a Hittite, from whom Abraham bought the field and cave of Machpelah (Gen. xxiii. 8-17; xiv. 9, xlix. 29, 30, i. 13).

Ephron, a very strong city on the east of Jordan between Carnaim (Ashteroth-Karnaim) and Bethshean, attacked and demolished by Judas Macabaeus (1 Macc. v. 46-52; 2 Macc. xii. 27).

Ephron, Mount. The "cities of Mount Ephron" formed one of the landmarks on the northern boundary of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 9). Ephron is probably the range of hills on the west side of Wady Beit-Hanna, opposite Lifta.

Epicureans, the, derived their name from Epicurus (342-271 B.C.), a philosopher of Attic descent, whose "Garden" at Athens rivalled in popularity the "Porch" and the "Academy." The doctrines of Epicurus found wide acceptance in Asia Minor and Alexandria, and they gained a brilliant advocate at Rome in Lucretius (95-50 B.C.). The object of Epicurus was to find in philosophy a practical guide to happiness. True pleasure and not absolute truth was the end at which he aimed; experience and not reason the test on which he relied. It is obvious that a system thus framed would degenerate by a natural descent into mere materialism; and in this form Epicureism was the popular philosophy at the beginning of the Christian era (cf. Diog. L. x. 5, 9). When St. Paul addressed "Epicureans and Stoics" (Acts xvii. 18) at Athens, the philosophy of life was practically reduced to the teaching of those two antagonistic schools.

Epiphanes (1 Macc. i. 10, x. 1). [ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES.]

Epiphi (3 Macc. vi. 38), name of the eleventh month of the Egyptian Vague year, and the Alexandrian or Egyptian Julian year.

Epistle. It is proposed in the present article to speak of the Epistle or letter as a means of communication. The use of written letters implies, it needs hardly be said, a considerable progress in the development of civilised life. In the early nomadic stages of society accordingly, we find no traces of any but oral communications. The first recorded letter in the history of the O. T. was that which David wrote to Joab, and sent by the hand of Uriah (2 Sam. xi. 14), and this must obviously have been sealed with the king's seal. The material used for the impression of the seal was probably the "clay" of Job xxxviii. 14. Written communications become more frequent in the later history. The king of Syria sends a letter to the king of Israel (2 K. v. 5, 6). Elijah the prophet sends a writing to Jehoram (2 Chr. xxi. 12). The books of Ezra and Nehemiah contain or refer to many such documents (Ezr. iv. 6, 7, 11, v. 6, vii. 11; Neh. ii. 7, 9, vi. 5). The Epistles of the N. T. in their outward form are such as might be expected from men who were brought into contact with Greek and Roman customs, themselves belonging to a different race, and so reproducing the imported style with only partial accuracy. They begin (the Epistle to the Hebrews and 1 John excepted) with the names of the writer, and of those to whom the Epistle is addressed. Then follows the formula of salutation. Then the letter itself commences, in the first person, the singular and plural being used indiscriminately. When the substance of the letter has been completed, come the individual messages. The conclusion in this case was probably modified by the fact that the letters were dictated to an amanuensis. When he had done his work, the Apostle took up the pen or reed, and added, in his own large characters (Gal. vi. 11), the authenticating autograph. In one instance, Rom. xvi. 22, the amanuensis in his own name adds his salutation. An allusion in 2 Cor. iii. 1 brings before us another class of letters which must have been in frequent use in the early ages of the Christian Church, by which travellers or teachers were commended by one church to the good offices of others.

Er. 1. First-born of Judah. Er "was wicked in the sight of the Lord; and the Lord slew him." It does not appear what the nature of his sin was, but, from his Canaanitish birth on the mother's side, it was probably connected with the abominable idolatries of Canaan (Gen. xxxviii. 3-7; Num. xxvi. 19).—2. Descendant of Shelah the son of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 21).—3. Son of Jose, and father of Elmodam (Luke iii. 28).

Eran, son of Shuthelah, eldest son of Ephraim (Num. xxvi. 36). Eran was the head of the family of Eranites, the, Num. xxvi. 36.

Er'ech, one of the cities of Nimrod's kingdom in the land of Shinar (Gen. x. 10). It is doubtless the same as Orchoß, 82 miles S., and 43 E. of Babylon, the modern designations of the site, Warka, Irka, and Irak, bearing a considerable affinity to the original name. This place appears to have been the necropolis of the Assyrian kings.

Erastus. 1. One of the attendants or deacons of St. Paul at Ephesus, who with Timothy was sent forward into Macedonia while the Apostle himself remained in Asia (Acts xix. 22). He is probably the same with Erastus who is again mentioned in the salutations to Timothy (2 Tim. iii. 20), though not the same with Erastus the chamberlain of Corinth (Rom. xvi. 23).—2. Erastus the chamberlain, or rather the public treasurer of Corinth, who was one of the early converts to Christianity (Rom. xvi. 23). According to the traditions of the Greek Church, he was first treasurer to the Church at Jerusalem, and afterwards Bishop of Panceas.

Eri, son of Gad (Gen. xli. 16), and ancestor of the ERITES (Num. xvi. 16).

Esa'ias. The form of the name of the prophet Isaiah in the N. T.

Esar-haddon. One of the greatest of the kings of Assyria. He was the son of Sennacherib (2 K. xix. 37) and the grandson of Sargao who succeeded Shalmaneser. Nothing is really known of Esar-haddon until his accession (ab. B.C. 680; 2 K. xix. 37; Is. xxxvii. 38). He appears by his monuments to have been one of the most powerful—if not the most powerful—of all the Assyrian monarchs. He carried his arms over all Asia between the Persian Gulf, the Armenian mountains, and the Mediterranean. In consequence of the disaffection of Babylon, and its frequent revolts from former Assyrian kings, Esar-haddon, having subdued the sons of Merodach-Baladan who headed the national party, introduced the new policy of substituting for the former government by viceroys, a direct dependence upon the Assyrian crown. He is the only Assyrian monarch whom we find to have actually reigned at Babylon, where he built himself a palace, bricks from which have been recently recovered bearing his name. His Babylonian reign lasted thirteen years, from B.C. 680 to B.C. 667. As a builder of great works Esar-haddon is particularly distinguished. Besides his palace at Babylon, which has been already mentioned, he built at least three others in different parts of his dominions, either for himself or his son; while in a single inscription he mentions the erection by his hands of no fewer than thirty temples in Assyria and Mesopotamia. The south-west palace at Nimrud is the best preserved of his constructions. It is impossible to fix the length of Esar-haddon's reign or the order of the events which occurred in it. It has been conjectured that he died about B.C. 660, after occupying the throne for twenty years.

Esau, the eldest son of Isaac, and twin-brother of Jacob. The singular appearance of the child at his birth originated the name (Gen. xxv. 25). This was not the only remarkable circumstance connected with the birth of the infant. Even in the womb the twin-brothers struggled together (xxv. 22). Esau's robust frame and "rough" aspect were the types of a wild and daring nature. The peculiarities of his character soon began to develop themselves. He was, in fact, a thorough Bedawiy, a "son of the desert," who delighted to roam free as the wind of heaven, and who was impatient of the restraints of civilized or settled life. His old father, by a caprice of affection not uncommon, loved his wilful, vagrant boy; and his keen relish for savoury food being gratified by Esau's venison, he liked him all the better for his skill in hunting (xxv. 28). An event occurred which exhibited the reckless character of Esau on the one hand, and the selfish, grasping nature of his brother on the other. There is something revolting in this whole transaction. Jacob takes advantage of his brother's distress to rob him of that which was dear as life itself to an Eastern patriarch. Esau married at the age of 40, and contrary to the wish of his parents. His wives were both Canaanites; and they "were bitterness of spirit unto Isaac and to Rebekah" (Gen. xxvi. 34, 35). The next episode in the history of Esau and Jacob is still more painful than the former. Jacob, through the craft of his mother, is again successful, and secures irrevocably the covenant blessing. Esau vows vengeance. But he knew not a mother's watchful care. By a characteristic piece of domestic policy Rebekah succeeded both in exciting Isaac's anger against Esau, and obtaining his consent to Jacob's departure. When Esau heard that his father had commanded Jacob to take a wife of the daughters of his kinsman Laban, he also resolved to try whether by a new alliance he could propitiate his parents. He accordingly married his cousin Mahalath, the daughter of Ishmael (xxviii. 8, 9). This marriage appears to have brought him into connexion with the Ishmaelitic tribes beyond the valley of Arabah. He soon afterwards established himself in Mount Seir; still retaining, however, some interest in his father's property in Southern Palestine. He was residing in Mount Seir when Jacob returned from Padan-aram, and had then become so rich and powerful that the impressions of his brother's early offences seem to have been almost completely effaced. It does not appear that the brothers again met until the death of their father about 20 years afterwards. They united in laying Isaac's body in the cave of Machpelah. Of Esau's subsequent history nothing is known; for that of his descendants see EDOM and EDOMITES.

Esau, 1 Esd. v. 29. [ZIBA.]

Esay, Ecclus. xlviii. 20, 22; 2 Esd. ii. 18. [ISAIAH.]

Esdraelon. This name is merely the Greek form of the Hebrew word JEZREEL. It occurs in this exact shape only twice in the A. V. (Jud. iii. 9, iv. 6). In Jud. iii. 3 it is ESDRAELON, and in i. 8 ESDRELOM, with the addition of "the great plain." In the O. T. the plain is called the VALLEY OF JEZREEL; by Josephus "the great plain." The name is derived from the old royal city of JEZREEL, which occupied a commanding site, near the eastern extremity of the plain, on a spur of Mount Gilboa.

"The Great plain of Esdraelon" extends across Central Palestine from the Mediterranean to the Jordan, separating the mountain ranges of Carmel and Samaria from those of Galilee. The western section of it is properly the plain of ACCCHO, or 'Akka'. The main body of the plain is a triangle. Its base on the east extends from Jenin (the ancient Engannim) to the foot of the hills below Nazareth, and is about 15 miles long; the north side, formed by the hills of Galilee, is about 12 miles long; and the south side, formed by the Samaria range, is about 18 miles. The apex on the west is a narrow pass opening into the plain of 'Akka'. From the base of this triangular plain three branches stretch out eastward, like fingers from a hand, divided by two bleak, grey ridges—one bearing the familiar name of Mount Gilboa; the other called by Franks Little Heymon, but by natives Jebel ed-Duhy. The central branch is the richest as well as the most celebrated. This is the "Valley of Jezreel" proper—the battle-field on which Gideon triumphed, and Saul and Jonathan were overthrown (Judg. vii. 1, sq.; 1 Sam. xxix. and xxxi.). Two things are worthy of special notice in the plain of Esdraelon. 1. its wonderful richness. 2. its desolation. If we except the eastern branches, there is not a single inhabited village on its whole surface, and not more than one-sixth of its soil is cultivated. It is the home of the wild wandering Bedawin.

Esdras. The form of the name of Ezra the scribe in 1 and 2 Esdr.

Esdras, First Book of, the first in order of the Apocryphal books in the English Bible. In the Vatican and other quasi-modern editions of the LXX., our 1st Esdr. is called the first book of Esdras, in relation to the canonical Book of Ezra which follows it, and is called the second Esdras. But in the Vulgate, 1st Esdr. means the canonical Book of Ezra, and 2nd Esdr. means Nehemiah, according to the primitive Hebrew arrangement, mentioned by Jerome, in which Ezra and Nehemiah made up two parts of the one book of Ezra; and 3rd and 4th Esdr. are what we now call 1 and 2 Esdras. In all the earlier editions of the English Bible the books of Esdras are numbered as in the Vulgate. The Geneva Bible first adopted the classification used in our present Bibles. As regards the antiquity of this book and the rank assigned to it in the early Church, it may suffice to mention that Josephus quotes largely from it, and follows its authority. It is quoted also by Clemens Alexandrinus, by Cyprian, Augustine, Athanasius, and other fathers. Nothing can be clearer on the other hand than that it is rightly included by us among the Apocrypha. That it was never known to exist in Hebrew and formed no part of the Hebrew Canon, is admitted by all. As regards the contents of the book, and the author or authors of it—the first chapter is a transcript of the two last chapters of 2 Chr. for the most part verbatim, and only in one or two parts slightly abridged and paraphrased, and showing some corruptions of the text, the use of a different Greek version, and some various readings. Chapters iii., iv., and v., to the end of v. 6, are the original portions of the book, and the rest is a transcript more or less exact of the book of Ezra, with the chapters transposed and quite otherwise arranged, and a portion of Nehemiah. Hence a two-fold design in the compiler is discernible. One to introduce and give Scriptural sanction to the legend about Zerubbabel; the other to explain the great obscurities of the book of Ezra, in which however he has signally failed. As regards the time and place when the compilation was made, the original portion is that which alone affords much clue. This seems to indicate that the writer was thoroughly conversant with Hebrew, even if he did not write the book in that language. He was well acquainted too with the books of Esther and Daniel (1 Esdr. iii. 1, 2 sqq.), and other books of Scripture (ib. 20, 21, 39, 41, &c., and 45 compared with Ps. cxxxvii. 7). But that he did not live under the Persian kings, appears by the indiscriminating way in which he uses promiscuously the phrase Medes and Persians, or, Persians and Medes, according as he happened to be imitating the language of Daniel or of the book of Esther.

Esdra's, the Second Book of, in the English Version of the Apocrypha, and so called by the author (2 Esdr. i. 1), is more commonly known, according to the reckoning of the Latin Version, as the fourth book of Ezra. The original title, "the Apocalypse of Ezra," is far more appropriate.—1. For a long time this Book of Ezra was known only by an old Latin version, which is preserved in some MSS. of the Vulgate. A second Arabic text was discovered by Mr. Gregory about the middle of the 17th century in two Bodleian MSS. A third Aethiopic text was published in 1820 by [Archbp.] Lawrence with English and Latin translations, likewise from a Bodleian MS.—2. The three versions were all made directly from a Greek text; and in default of direct evidence to the contrary, it must be supposed that the book was composed in Greek.—3. The common Latin text, which is followed in the English version, contains two important interpolations (Ch. i. ii.; xv. xvi.) which are not found in the Arabic and Aethiopic versions, and are separated from the genuine Apocalypse in the best Latin MSS. Both of these passages are evidently of Christian origin. Another smaller interpolation occurs in the Latin version in vii. 28, where filius meus Jesus answers to "My Messiah" in the Aethiopic, and to "My Son Messiah" in the Arabic. On the other hand, a long passage occurs in the Aethiopic and Arabic versions after vii. 35, which is not found in the Latin.—4. The original Apocalypse (iii.-xiv.) consists of a series of angelic revelations and visions in which Ezra is instructed in some of the great mysteries of the moral world, and assured of the final triumph of the righteous. The subject of the first revelation (iii.-v. 15) is the unsearchableness of God's purposes, and the signs of the last age. The second revelation (v. 20.-vi. 34) carries out this teaching yet further, and lays open the gradual progress of the plan of Providence, and the nearness of the visitation before which evil must attain its most terrible climax. The third revelation (vi. 35.-ix. 25) answers the objections which arise from the apparent narrowness of the limits within which the hope of blessedness is confined, and describes the coming of Messiah and the last scene of Judgment. After this follow three visions. The first vision (ix. 26.-x. 59) is of a woman (Sion) in deep sorrow, lamenting the death, upon his bridal day, of her only son (the city built by Solomon), who had been born to her after she had had no child for thirty years. But while Ezra looked, her face "upon a sudden shined exceedingly," and "the woman appeared no more, but there was a city builded." The second vision (xi. xii.), in a dream, is of an eagle (Rome), which "came up from the sea" and "spread her wings over all the earth." The third vision (xiii.), in a dream, is of a man (Messiah) "flying with the clouds of heaven," against whom the nations of the earth are gathered, till he destroys them with the blast of his mouth, and gathers together the lost tribes of Israel and offers Sion, "prepared and builded," to his people. The last chapter (xiv.) recounts an appearance to Ezra of the Lord who showed Himself to Moses in the bush.—5. The date of the book is much disputed, though the limits within which opinions vary are narrower than in the case of the book of Enoch. Lücke places it in the time of Caesar; Van der Vlis shortly after the death of Caesar. Lawrence brings it down somewhat lower, to 28-25 B.C. On the other hand Gfrörer assigns the book to the time of Domitian.—6. The chief characteristics of the "three-headed eagle," which refer apparently to historic details, are "twelve feathered wings" (duodecim alae penarum), "eight counter-feathers" (contrariae penae), and "three heads"; but though the writer expressly interprets these of kings (xii. 14, 20) and "kingdoms" (xii. 23), he is, perhaps intentionally, so obscure in his allusions, that the interpretation only increases the difficulties of the vision itself. One point only may be considered certain,—the eagle can typify no other empire than Rome. But when it is established that the interpretation of the vision is to be sought in the history of Rome, the chief difficulties of the problem begin. All is evidently as yet vague and uncertain, and will probably remain so till some clearer light can be thrown upon Jewish thought and history during the critical period 100 B.C.-100 A.C.—7. But while the date of the book must be left undetermined, there can be no doubt that it is a genuine product of Jewish thought. The Apocalypse was probably written in Egypt; the opening and closing chapters certainly were.—8. In tone and character the Apocalypse of Ezra offers a striking contrast to that of Enoch. Triumphant anticipations are overshadowed by gloomy forebodings of the destiny of the world. The idea of victory is lost in that of revenge.—9. One tradition which the book contains, obtained a wide reception in early times, and served as a pendant to the legend of the origin of the I.X.X. Ezra, it is said, for forty days and forty nights dictated to his scribes, who wrote ninety-four books, of which twenty-four were delivered to the people in place of the books which were lost (xiv. 20-48). This strange story probably owed its origin to the tradition which regarded Ezra as the representative of the men of the "Great Synagogue."—10. Though the book was assigned to the "prophet" Ezra by Clement of Alexandria, it did not maintain its ecclesiastical position in the Church. Jerome speaks of it with contempt, and it is rarely found in MSS. of the Latin Bible. It is found, however, in the printed copies of the Vulgate older than the Council of Trent. On the other hand, though this book is included among those which are "read for examples of life" by the English Church, no use of it is there made in public worship.

E'sebon, Jud. v. 15. [HESBON.]

E'sebri'as, 1 Esd. viii. 54. [SHEREBIAH.]

E'sek, a well, which the herdsmen of Isaac dug in the valley of Gerar (Gen. xvi. 20).

Esh-ba'al, the fourth son of Saul, according to the genealogies of 1 Chr. viii. 33 and ix. 39. He is doubtless the same person as ISH-BOSHETH.

Esh'ban, a Horite; one of the four sons of DISHAN (Gen. xxvi. 26; 1 Chr. i. 41).

Esh'col, brother of Mamre the Amorite, and of Aner; and one of Abraham's companions in his pursuit of the four kings who had carried off Lot (Gen. xiv. 13, 24).

Esh'col, the Valley, or the Brook, of, a wady in the neighbourhood of Hebron, explored by the spies who were sent by Moses from Kadesh-barnea. From the terms of two of the notices of this transaction (Num. xxxiii. 9; Deut. i. 24) it might be gathered that Eshcol was the furthest point to which the spies penetrated. But this would be to contradict the express statement of Num. xiii. 21, that they went as far as Rehob. The name has been lately observed still attached to a spring of remarkably fine water called Ain-Eshkol, in a valley which crosses the vale of Hebron N.E. and S.W., and about two miles north of the town.

Esh'kalonites, the, Josh. xiii. 3. [ASHKE-LON.]

Esh'tal, a town in the low country—the Shefelah—of Judah. It is the first of the first group of cities in that district (Josh. xv. 33) enumerated with Zoreah, in company with which it is commonly mentioned. Zoreah and Eshtal were two of the towns allotted to the tribe of Dan out of Judah (Josh. xix. 41). Here, among the old warriors of the tribe, Samson spent his boyhood, and hither after his last exploit his body was brought (Judg. xiii. 25, xvi. 31, xviii. 2, 8, 11, 12). In the Onomasticon of Eusebius and Jerome Eshtal is twice mentioned—(1) as Astael of Judah, described as then existing between Azotus and Ascalon under the name of Astho; (2) as Esthal of Dan, ten miles N. of Eleutheropolis. In more modern times, however, the name has vanished.

Esh'taulites, the, with the Zareathites, were among the families of Kirjath-jearim (1 Chr. ii. 53).

Esh'temo'a, and in shorter form Esh'temo'h, a town of Judah, in the mountains (Josh. xv. 50). With its suburbs Eshtemoa was allotted to the priests (xvi. 14; 1 Chr. vi. 57). It was one of the places frequented by David and his followers during the long period of their wanderings (1 Sam. xxx. 28, comp. 31). The place was known in the time of Eusebius and Jerome. There is little doubt that it has been discovered by Dr. Robinson at Som'u'a, a village seven miles south of Hebron. Eshtemoa appears to have been founded by the descendants of the Egyptian wife of a certain Mered (1 Chr. iv. 17).

Esh'ton, a name which occurs in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 11, 12).

Es'li, son of Nagre or Nagni, in the genealogy of Christ (Luke iii. 25).

Eso'ra, a place fortified by the Jews on the approach of the Assyrian army under Holofernes (Jud. iv. 4). Perhaps Hazor, or Zorah, but it is not certain.

Es'ril, 1 Esd. ix. 34. [AZARHEL, or SHARAL.]

Es'rom, Matt. i. 3; Luke iii. 33. [HEZRON.]

Es'senes. 1. In the description of Josephus the Essenes appear to combine the ascetic virtues of the Pythagoreans and Stoics with a spiritual knowledge of the Divine Law. 2. The name Essene or Essaean is itself full of difficulty. Various derivations have been proposed for it, and all are more or less open to objection. It seems probable that Essene signifies "seer," or "the silent, the mysterious." 3. The obscurity of the Essenes as a distinct body arises from the fact that they represented originally a tendency rather than an organization. As a sect they were distinguished by an aspiration after ideal purity rather than by any special code of doctrines. From the Maccabaean age there was a continuous effort among the stricter Jews to attain an absolute standard of holiness. Each class of devotees was looked upon as practically impure by their successors, who carried the laws of purity still further; and the Essenes stand at the extreme limit of the mystic asceticism which was thus gradually reduced to shape. To the Pharisees they stood nearly in the same relation as that in which the Pharisees themselves stood with regard to the mass of the people. 4. The traces of the existence of Essenes in common society are not wanting nor confined to individual cases. Not only was a gate at Jerusalem named from them, but a later tradition mentions the existence of a congregation there which devoted "one third of the day to study, one third to prayer, and one third to labour." The isolated communities of Essenes furnished the type which is preserved in the popular descriptions. These were regulated by strict rules, analogous to those of the monastic institutions of a later date. 5. The order itself was regulated by an internal jurisdiction. Excommunication was equivalent to a slow death, since an Essene could not take food prepared by strangers for fear of pollution. All things were held in common, without distinction of property or house; and special provision was made for the relief of the poor. Self-denial, temperance, and labour—especially agriculture—were the marks of the outward life of the Essenes; purity and divine communion the objects of their aspiration. Slavery, war, and commerce were alike forbidden. 6. In doctrine, as has been seen already, they did not differ essentially from strict Pharisees. Moses was honoured by them next to God. They observed the Sabbath with singular strictness, turned their attention specially to the mysteries of the spiritual world, and looked upon the body as a mere prison of the soul. 7. The number of the Essenes is roughly estimated by Philo at 4000. Their best-known settlements were on the N.W. shore of the Dead Sea. 8. In the Talmudic writings there is, as has been already said, no direct mention of the Essenes, but their existence is recognised by the notice of peculiar points of practice and teaching. 9. The character of Essenism limited its spread. Out of Palestine Levitical purity was impossible, for the very land was impure; and thus there is no trace of the sect in Babylonia. The case was different in Egypt, and the tendency which gave birth to the Essenes found a fresh development in the pure speculation of the Therapeutae. 10. From the nature of the case Essenism in its extreme form could exercise very little influence on Christianity. In all its practical bearings it was diametrically opposed to the Apostolic teaching. The only real similarity between Essenism and Christianity lay in the common element of true Judaism. Nationally, however, the Essenes occupy the same position as that to which John the Baptist was personally called. They mark the close of the old, the longing for the new, but in this case without the promise. At a later time traces of Essenism appear in the Clementines.

Esther, the Persian name of HADASSAH, daughter of Abihail the son of Shimei, the son of Kish, a Benjamite. Esther was a beautiful Jewish maiden, whose ancestor Kish had been among the captives led away from Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar when Jehoiachin was taken captive. She was an orphan without father or mother, and had been brought up by her cousin Mordecai, who had an office in the household of Ahasuerus king of Persia, and dwelt at "Shushan the palace." When Vashti was dismissed from being queen, and all the fairest virgins of the kingdom had been collected at Shushan for the king to make choice of a successor to her from among them, the choice fell upon Esther. The king was not aware, however, of her race and parentage; and so, on the representation of Haman the Agagite that the Jews scattered through his empire were a pernicious race, he gave him full power and authority to kill them all, young and old, women and children, and take possession of all their property. The means taken by Esther to avert this great calamity from her people and her kindred are fully related in the book of Esther. History is wholly silent both about Vashti and Esther. Herodotus only happens to mention one of Xerxes' wives; Scripture only mentions two, if indeed either of them were wives at all. It seems natural to conclude that Esther, a captive, and one of the harem, was not of the highest rank of wives, but that a special honour, with the name of queen, may have been given to her, as to Vashti before her, as the favourite concubine or inferior wife, whose offspring, however, if she had any, would not have succeeded to the Persian throne.

Esther, Book of, one of the latest of the canonical books of Scripture, having been written late in the reign of Xerxes, or early in that of his son Artaxerxes Longimanus. The author is not known, but may very probably have been Mordecai himself. Those who ascribe it to Ezra, or the men of the Great Synagogue, may have merely meant that Ezra edited and added it to the canon of Scripture, which he probably did. The book of Esther appears in a different form in the LXX., and the translations therefrom, from that in which it is found in the Hebrew Bible. In speaking of it we shall first speak of the canonical book found in Hebrew, to which also the above observations refer; and next of the Greek book with its apocryphal additions. The canonical ESTHER then is placed among the hagiographa by the Jews, and in that first portion of them which they call "the five rolls." It is sometimes emphatically called Megillah ("roll"), without other distinction, and is read through by the Jews in their synagogues at the feast of Purim. It has often been remarked as a peculiarity of this book that the name of God does not once occur in it. It was always reckoned in the Jewish canon, and is named of implied in almost every enumeration of the books composing it, from Josephus downwards. Jerome mentions it by name, as do Augustine, Origen, and many others. The style of writing is remarkably chaste and simple. It does not in the least savour of romance. The Hebrew is very like that of Ezra and parts of the Chronicles; generally pure, but mixed with some words of Persian origin, and some of Chaldaic affinity. In short it is just what one would expect to find in a work of the age to which the book of Esther professes to belong. As regards the LXX. version of the book, it consists of the canonical Esther with various interpolations prefixed, interspersed, and added at the close. Though, however, the interpolations of the Greek copy are thus manifest, they make a consistent and intelligible story. But the Apocryphal additions as they are inserted in some editions of the Latin Vulgate, and in the English Bible, are incomprehensible; the history of which is this:—When Jerome translated the Book of Esther, he first gave the version of the Hebrew alone as being alone authentic. He then added at the end a version in Latin of those several passages which he found in the LXX., and which were not in the Hebrew, stating where each passage came in, and marking them all with an obelus. Having annexed this conclusion, he then gives the Prooemium, which he says forms the beginning of the Greek Vulgate, beginning with what is now verse 2 of chapter xi.; and so proceeds with the other passages. But in subsequent editions all Jerome's explanatory matter has been swept away, and the disjointed portions have been printed as chapters xi., xii., xiii., xiv., xv., xvi., as if they formed a narrative in continuance of the canonical book. As regards the place assigned to Esther in the LXX., in the Vatican edition, and most others, it comes between Judith and Job. Tobit and Judith have been placed between it and Nehemiah, doubtless for chronological reasons. But in the very ancient Codex published by Tischendorf, and called C. Friderico-Augustanus, Esther immediately follows Nehemiah, and precedes Tobit.

Etam. 1. A village of the tribe of Simeon, specified only in the list in 1 Chr. iv. 32 (comp. Josh. xix. 7).—2. A place in Judah, fortified and garrisoned by Rehoboam (2 Chr. xi. 6). From its position in this list we may conclude that it was near Bethlehem and Tekoah. Here, according to the statements of Josephus and the Talmudists, were the sources of the water from which Solomon's gardens and pleasure-grounds were fed, and Bethlehem and the Temple supplied.—3. A name occurring in the lists of Judah's descendants (1 Chr. iv. 3), but probably referring to the last mentioned place.

Etam, the Rock, a cliff or lofty rock, into a cleft or chasm of which Samson retired after his slaughter of the Philistines (Judg. xv. 8, 11). This natural stronghold was in the tribe of Judah; and near it, probably at its foot, was Lehi or Ramath-lehi, and En-hakkore (xv. 9, 14, 17, 19). The name Etam was held by a city in the neighbourhood of Bethlehem (2 Chr. xi. 6), which is known to have been situated in the extremely uneven and broken country round the modern Urtas. Here is a fitting scene for the adventure of Samson. In the abundant springs and the numerous eminences of the district round Urtas, the cliff Etam, Ramath-lehi, and En-hakkore may be yet discovered.

E'tham. [EXODUS, THE, p. 262.]

E'than. 1. ETHAN THE EZRAHITE, one of the four sons of Mahol, whose wisdom was excelled by Solomon (1 K. iv. 31; 1 Chr. ii. 6). His name is in the title of Ps. lxxxix.—2. Son of Kishi or Kushaiah; a Merarite Levite, head of that family in the time of king David (1 Chr. vi. 44; Heb. 29), and spoken of as a "singer." With Heman and Asaph, the heads of the other two families of Levites, Ethan was appointed to sound with cymbals (xv. 17, 19). It has been conjectured that the two names Ethan and Jehutham belonged to one man, or are identical, but there is no direct evidence of this.—3. A Gershonite Levite, one of the ancestors of Asaph the singer (1 Chr. vi. 42, Heb. 27).

Eth'anim. [MONTHS.]

Ethba'al, king of Sidon and father of Jezebel (1 K. xvi. 31). Josephus represents him as king of the Tyrians as well as the Sidonians. We may thus identify him with Eithobalus, noticed by Menander, a priest of Astarte, who, after having assassinated Phœles, usurped the throne of Tyre for 32 years. The date of Ethba'al's reign may be given as about B.C. 940-908.

Ether, one of the cities of Judah in the low country, the Shefelah (Josh. xv. 42), allotted to Simeon (xix. 7). The name of Ether has not yet been identified with any existing remains; but Van de Velde heard of a Tel Athar in the desert country below Hebron.

Ethiopia. The country which the Greeks and Romans described as "Aethiopia" and the Hebrews as "Cush" lay to the S. of Egypt, and embraced, in its most extended sense, the modern Nubia, Sennar, Kordofin, and northern Abyssinia, and in its more definite sense the kingdom of Meroë. The only direction in which a clear boundary can be fixed is in the N., where Syene marked the division between Ethiopia and Egypt (Ez. xxix. 10): in other directions the boundaries can be only generally described as the Red Sea on the E., the Libyan desert on the W., and the Abyssinian highlands on the S. The name "Ethiopia" is probably an adaptation of the native Egyptian name "Ethaush," which bears a tolerably close resemblance to the Gentile form "Aethiops." The Hebrews do not appear to have had much practical acquaintance with Ethiopia itself, though the Ethiopians were well known to them through their intercourse with Egypt. They were, however, perfectly aware of its position (Ez. xxix. 10) and its tropical characteristics, and they carried on commercial intercourse with it. The country is for the most part mountainous, the ranges gradually increasing in altitude towards the S., until they attain an elevation of about 8000 feet in Abyssinia. The inhabitants of Ethiopia were a Hamitic race (Gen. x. 6). They were divided into various tribes, of which the Sabæans were the most powerful. The history of Ethiopia is closely interwoven with that of Egypt. The two countries were not unfrequently united under the rule of the same sovereign. Esarhaddon is stated in the Assyrian inscriptions to have conquered both Egypt and Ethiopia. At the time of the conquest of Egypt, Cambyzes advanced against Meroë and subdued it; but the Persian rule did not take any root there, nor did the influence of the Ptolemies generally extend beyond northern Ethiopia. Shortly before our Saviour's birth a native dynasty of females, holding the official title of Candace (Plin. vi. 35), held sway in Ethiopia, and even resisted the advance of the Roman arms. One of these is the queen noticed in Acts viii. 27.

Ethiopian. Properly "Cushite" (Jer. xiii. 23); used of Zerah (2 Chr. xiv. 9 [8]), and Ebed-melech (Jer. xxxviii. 7, 10, 12, xxxix. 16).

Ethiopian Woman. The wife of Moses is so described in Num. xii. 1. She is elsewhere said to have been the daughter of a Midianite, and in consequence of this some have supposed that the allusion is to another wife whom Moses married after the death of Zipporah.

CON. D. B.

Ethi'opians. Properly "Cush" or "Ethiopia" in two passages (Is. xx. 4; Jer. xlv. 9). Elsewhere "Cushites," or inhabitants of Ethiopia (2 Chr. xii. 3, xiv. 12 [11], 13 [12], xv. 8, xxi. 16 Dan. xi. 43; Am. ix. 7; Zeph. iii. 12).

Eth'ma, 1 Esd. ix. 35; apparently a corruption of NEMO in the parallel list of Ezra x. 43.

Eth'nan, one of the sons of Helah the wife of Ashur (1 Chr. iv. 7).

Eth'ni, a Gershonite Levite (1 Chr. vi. 41; Heb. 26).

Eubulus, a Christian at Rome mentioned by St. Paul (2 Tim. iv. 21).

Euergetes, a common surname and title of honour in Greek states. The title was borne by two of the Ptolemies, Ptol. III., Euergetes I., B.C. 247-222, and Ptol. VII., Euergetes II., B.C. (170) 146-117. The Euergetes mentioned in the prologue to Ecclesiasticus has been identified with each of these.

Eu'menes II., king of Pergamus, succeeded his father Attalus I., B.C. 197. In the war with Antiochus the Great he rendered the most important services to the growing republic. After peace was made (B.C. 189) he repaid to Rome to claim the reward of his loyalty; and the Senate conferred on him the provinces of Mysia, Lydia, and Ionia (with some exceptions), Phrygia, Lycæonia, and the Thracian Chersonese. The exact date of his death is not mentioned, but it must have taken place in B.C. 159.

Eu'natan, 1 Esd. viii. 44. [ELNATHAN.]

Euni'ce, mother of Timothy (2 Tim. i. 5).

Eunuch. The original Hebrew word clearly implies the incapacity which mutilation involves, and perhaps includes all the classes mentioned in Matt. xix. 12, not signifying an office merely. The law (Deut. xxiii. 1; comp. Lev. xxii. 24) is repugnant to thus treating any Israelite; and Samuel, when describing the arbitrary power of the future king (1 Sam. viii. 15, marg-), mentions "his eunuchs," but does not say that he would make "their sons" such. This, if we compare 2 K. xx. 18, ls. xxxix. 7, possibly implies that these persons would be foreigners. It was a barbarous custom of the East thus to treat captives (Herod. iii. 49, vi. 32), not only of tender age, but, it should seem, when past puberty. The "officer" Potiphar (Gen. xxxvii. 36, xxxix. 1, marg. "eunuch") was an Egyptian, was married, and was the "captain of the guard;" and in the Assyrian monuments a eunuch often appears, sometimes armed, and in a warlike capacity, or as a scribe, noting the number of heads and amount of spoil, as receiving the prisoners, and even as officiating in religious ceremonies. The origination of the practice is ascribed to Semiramis, and is no doubt as early, or nearly so, as Eastern despotism itself. The complete assimilation of the kingdom of Israel, and latterly of Judah, to the neighbouring models of despotism, is traceable in the rank and prominence of eunuchs (2 K. viii. 6, ix. 32, xxiii. 11, xxv. 19; Is. lvi. 3, 4; Jer. xxix. 2, xxxiv. 19, xxxviii. 7, xli. 16, lii. 25). They mostly appear in one of two relations, either military as "set over the men of war," greater trustworthiness possibly counterbalancing inferior courage and military vigour, or associated, as we mostly recognise them, with women and children. We find the Assyrian Rab-Saris, or chief eunuch (2 K. xviii. 17), employed together with other high officials as ambassador. It is probable that Daniel and his companions were thus treated, in fulfilment of 2 K. xv. 17, 18; Is. xxxix. 7; comp. Dan. i. 3, 7. The court of Herod of course had its eunuchs, as had also that of Queen Candace (Acts viii. 27.)

Euodias, a Christian woman at Philippi (Phil. iv. 2). The name is correctly EUODIA.

Euphrates is probably a word of Aryan origin, signifying "the good and abounding river." It is most frequently denoted in the Bible by the term "the river." The Euphrates is the largest, the longest, and by far the most important of the rivers of Western Asia. It rises from two chief sources in the Armenian mountains, one of them at Damli, 25 miles N.E. of Erzeroum, and little more than a degree from the Black Sea; the other on the northern slope of the mountain range called Ala-Tagh, near the village of Diyaadin, and not far from Mount Ararat. Both branches flow at first towards the W. or S.W., passing through the wildest mountain districts of Armenia; they meet at Kebban-Maden, nearly in long. 39° E. from Greenwich, having run respectively 400 and 270 miles. Here the stream formed by their combined waters is 120 yards wide, rapid, and very deep; it now flows nearly southward, but in a tortuous course, forcing a way through the ranges of Taurus and Anti-Taurus, and still seeming as if it would empty itself into the Mediterranean; but prevented from so doing by the longitudinal ranges of Amanus and Lebanon, which here run parallel to the Syrian coast, and at no great distance from it: the river at last desists from its endeavour, and in about lat. 36° turns towards the S.E., and proceeds in this direction for above 1000 miles to its embouchure in the Persian Gulf. The entire course is calculated at 1780 miles, and of this distance more than two-thirds (1200 miles) is navigable for boats. The width of the river is greatest at the distance of 700 or 800 miles from its mouth—that is to say, from its junction with the Khabour to the village of Weraï. It there averages 400 yards. The annual inundation of the Euphrates is caused by the melting of the snows in the Armenian highlands. It occurs in the month of May. The great hydraulic works ascribed to Nebuchadnezzar had for their great object to control the inundation. The Euphrates has at all times been of some importance as furnishing a line of traffic between the East and the West. Herodotus speaks of persons, probably merchants, using it regularly on their passage from the Mediterranean to Babylon. There are sufficient grounds for believing that throughout the Babylonian and Persian periods this route was made use of by the merchants of various nations, and that by it the East and West continually interchanged their most important products. The Euphrates is first mentioned in Scripture as one of the four rivers of Eden (Gen. ii. 14). Its celebrity is there sufficiently indicated by the absence of any explanatory phrase, such as accompanies the names of the other streams. We next hear of it in the covenant made with Abraham (Gen. xv. 18), where the whole country from "the great river, the river Euphrates" to the river of Egypt is promised to the chosen race. During the reigns of David and Solomon the dominion of Israel actually attained to the full extent both ways of the original promise, the Euphrates forming the boundary of their empire to the N.E., and the river of Egypt to the S.W. This widespread territory was lost upon the disruption of the empire under Rehoboam; and no more is heard in Scripture of the Euphrates until the expedition of Necho against the Babylonians in the reign of Josiah. The river still brings down as much water as of old, but the precious element is wasted by the neglect of man; the various watercourses along which it was in former times claved are dry; the main channel has shrunk; and the water stagnates in unwholesome marshes.

Eupol'emus, the "son of John, the son of Accos," one of the envoys sent to Rome by Judas Maccabaeus, cir. B.C. 161 (1 Macc. viii. 17; 2 Macc. iv. 11). He has been identified with the historian of the same name, but it is by no means clear that the historian was of Jewish descent.

Euroclydon, the name given (Acts xxvii. 14) to the gale of wind which off the south coast of Crete seized the ship in which St. Paul was ultimately wrecked on the coast of Malta. It came down from the island, and therefore must have blown, more or less, from the northward. Next, the wind is described as being like a typhoon or whirlwind. The long duration of the gale, the overclouded state of the sky, and even the heavy rain which concluded the storm (xxviii. 2), could easily be matched with parallel instances in modern times. We have seen that the wind was more or less northerly. The context gives us full materials for determining its direction with great exactitude. We come to the conclusion that it blew from the N.E. or E.N.E. This is quite in harmony with the natural sense of Εὐρακύνων (Euroaquilo, Vulg.), which is regarded as the true reading by Bentley, and is found in some of the best MSS.; but we are disposed to adhere to the Received Text.

Eu'tychus, a youth at Trons (Acts xx. 9), who sitting in a window, and having fallen asleep while St. Paul was discoursing far into the night, fell from the third story, and being taken up dead, was miraculously restored to life by the Apostle.

Evangelist. The constitution of the Apostolic Church included an order or body of men known as Evangelists. The meaning of the name, "The publishers of glad tidings," seems common to the work of the Christian ministry generally, yet in Eph. iv. 11, the "evangelists" appear on the one hand after the "apostles" and "prophets;" on the other before the "pastors" and "teachers." This passage accordingly would lead us to think of them as standing between the two other groups—sent forth as missionary preachers of the Gospel by the first, and as such preparing the way for the labours of the second. The same inference would seem to follow the occurrence of the word as applied to Philip in Acts xxi. 8. It follows from what has been said that the calling of the Evangelist is the proclamation of the glad tidings to those who have not known them, rather than the instruction and pastoral care of those who have believed and been baptised. It follows also that the name denotes a work rather than an order. The Evangelist might or might not be a Bishop-Elder or a Deacon. The Apostles, so far as they evangelized (Acts viii. 25, xiv. 7; 1 Cor. i. 17), might claim the title, though there were many Evangelists who were not Apostles. Theodoret describes the Evangelists as travelling missionaries. The account given by Eusebius, though somewhat rhetorical and vague, gives prominence to the idea of itinerant missionary preaching. If the Gospel was a written book, and the office of the Evangelists was to read or distribute it, then the writers of such books were car ἑξῆς the Evangelists. In later liturgical language the word was applied to the reader of the Gospel for the day.

Eve, the name given in Scripture to the first woman. The account of Eve's creation is found at Gen. ii. 21, 22. Various explanations of this narrative have been offered. Perhaps that which we are chiefly intended to learn from it is the foundation upon which the union between man and wife is built, viz. identity of nature and oneness of origin. Through the subtlety of the serpent, Eve was beguiled into a violation of the one commandment which had been imposed upon her and Adam. The different aspects under which Eve regarded her mission as a mother are seen in the names of her sons. The Scripture account of Eve closes with the birth of Seth.

Evi, one of the five kings or princes of Midian, slain by the Israelites (Num. xxxi. 8; Josh. xiii. 21).

Evil-Mer'odach (2 K. xxv. 27) according to Berosus and Abydenus, was the son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar. He reigned but a short time, having ascended the throne on the death of Nebuchadnezzar in B.C. 561, and being himself succeeded by Neriglissar in B.C. 559. At the end of this brief space Evil-Merodach was murdered by Neriglissar.

Excommunication. Excommunication is a power founded upon a right inherent in all religious societies, and is analogous to the powers of capital punishment, banishment, and exclusion from membership, which are exercised by political and municipal bodies.—I. Jewish Excommunication.—The Jewish system of excommunication was threefold. For a first offence a delinquent was subjected to the penalty of Niddui. The twenty-four offences for which it was inflicted are various, and range in heinousness from the offence of keeping a fierce dog to that of taking God's name in vain. The offender was first cited to appear in court; and if he refused to appear or to make amends, his sentence was pronounced. The term of this punishment was thirty days; and it was extended to a second and to a third thirty days when necessary. If at the end of that time the offender was still contumacious, he was subjected to the second excommunication termed Cherem, a word meaning something devoted to God (Lev. xxvii. 21, 28; Ex. xxii. 20 [19]; Num. xviii. 14). Severe penalties were now attached. The sentence was delivered by a court of ten, and was accompanied by a solemn malediction. Lastly followed Shammâthâ, which was an entire cutting off from the congregation. It has been supposed by some that these two latter forms of excommunication were undistinguishable from each other. The punishment of excommunication is not appointed by the Law of Moses. It is founded on the natural right of self-protection which all societies enjoy. The case of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram (Num. xvi.), the curse denounced on Meroz (Judg. v. 23), the commission and proclamation of Ezra (vii. 26, x. 8), and the reformation of Nehemiah (xiii. 25), are appealed to by the Talmudists as precedents by which their proceedings are regulated. In the New Testament, Jewish excommunication is brought prominently before us in the case of the man that was born blind (John ix.). The expressions here used refer, no doubt, to the first form of excommunication, or Niddui. In Luke vi. 22, it has been thought that our Lord referred specifically to the three forms of Jewish excommunication: "Blessed are ye when men shall hate you, and when they shall separate you from their company, and shall reproach you, and cast out your name as evil, for the Son of Man's sake." The three words very accurately express the simple separation, the additional malediction, and the final exclusion of niddui, cherem, and shammâthâ.—II. Christian Excommunication.—Excommunication, as exercised by the Christian Church, is not merely founded on the natural right possessed by all societies, nor merely on the example of the Jewish Church and nation. It was instituted by our Lord (Matt. xviii. 15, 18), and it was practised and commanded by St. Paul (1 Tim. i. 20; 1 Cor. v. 11; Tit. iii. 10). In the Epistles we find St. Paul frequently claiming the right to exercise discipline over his converts (comp. 2 Cor. i. 23, xiii. 10). In two cases we find him exercising this authority to the extent of cutting off offenders from the Church. What is the full meaning of the expression, "deliver unto Satan," is doubtful. All agree that excommunication is contained in it, but whether it implies any further punishment, inflicted by the extraordinary powers committed specially to the Apostles, has been questioned. Introduction into the Church is, in St. Paul's mind, a translation from the kingdom and power of Satan to the kingdom and government of Christ. This being so, he could hardly more naturally describe the effect of excluding a man from the Church than by the words, "deliver him unto Satan."—Apostolic Precept.—In addition to the claim to exercise discipline, and its actual exercise in the form of excommunication, by the Apostles, we find Apostolic precepts directing that discipline should be exercised by the rulers of the Church, and that in some cases excommunication should be resorted to (2 Thess. iii. 14; Rom. xvi. 17; Gal. v. 12; 1 Tim. vi. 3; Tit. iii. 10; 2 John 10; 3 John 10; Rev. ii. 20). There are two passages still more important to our subject (Gal. i. 8, 9; 1 Cor. xvi. 22). It has been supposed that these two expressions, "let him be Anathema," "let him be Anathema Maranatha," refer respectively to the two later stages of Jewish excommunication—the cherem and the shammâthâ.—Restoration to Communion.—Two cases of excommunication are related in Holy Scripture; and in one of them the restitution of the offender is specially recounted (2 Cor. ii.).—The Nature of Excommunication is made more evident by these acts of St. Paul than by any investigation of Jewish practice or of the etymology of words. We thus find, (1) that it is a spiritual penalty, involving no temporal punishment, except accidentally; (2) that it consists in separation from the communion of the Church; (3) that its object is the good of the sufferer (1 Cor. v. 5), and the protection of the sound members of the Church (2 Tim. iii. 17); (4) that its subjects are those who are guilty of heresy (1 Tim. i. 20), or gross immorality (1 Cor. v. 1); (5) that it is inflicted by the authority of the Church at large (Matt. xviii. 18), wielded by the highest ecclesiastical officer (1 Cor. v. 3; Tit. iii. 10); (6) that this officer's sentence is promulgated by the congregation to which the offender belongs (1 Cor. v. 4), in deference to his superior judgment and command (2 Cor. ii. 9), and in spite of any opposition on the part of a minority (Is. 6); (7) that the exclusion may be of indefinite duration, or for a period; (8) that its duration may be abridged at the discretion and by the indulgence of the person who has imposed the penalty (b. 8); (9) that penitence is the condition on which restoration to communion is granted (ib. 7); (10) that the sentence is to be publicly reversed as it was publicly promulgated (ib. 10).

Executioner. The Hebrew word describes, in the first instance, the office of executioner, and, secondarily, the general duties of the body-guard of a monarch. Thus Potiphar was "captain of the executioners" (Gen. xxxvii. 36; see margin). That the "captain of the guard" himself occasionally performed the duty of an executioner appears from 1 K. ii. 25, 34. Nevertheless the post was one of high dignity. The Greek σπεκουλάτωρ (Mark vi. 27) is borrowed from the Latin speculator; originally a military spy or scout, but under the emperors transferred to the body-guard.

Exile. [CAPTIVITY.]

Exodus, the second book of the Law or Pentateuch.—A. Contents.—The book may be divided into two principal parts: I. Historical, i. 1–xviii. 27; and II. Legislative, xix. 1–xl. 38. The former of these may be subdivided into (1.) the preparation for the deliverance of Israel from their bondage in Egypt; (2.) the accomplishment of that deliverance. I. (1.) The first section (i. 1–xii. 36) contains an account of the following particulars:—The great increase of Jacob's posterity in the land of Egypt, and their oppression under a new dynasty, which occupied the throne after the death of Joseph (ch. i.); the birth, education, and flight of Moses (ii.); his solemn call to be the deliverer of his people (iii. 1–iv. 17), and his return to Egypt in consequence (iv. 18–31); his first ineffectual attempt to prevail upon Pharaoh to let the Israelites go, which only resulted in an increase of their burdens (v. 1–21); a further preparation of Moses and Aaron for their office, together with the account of their genealogies (v. 22–vi. 7); the successive signs and wonders, by means of which the deliverance of Israel from the land of bondage is at length accomplished, and the institution of the Passover (vii. 8–xii. 36). (2.) A narrative of events from the departure out of Egypt to the arrival of the Israelites at Mount Sinai. II. The solemn establishment of the Theocracy on Mount Sinai. This book in short gives a sketch of the early history of Israel as a nation: and the history has three clearly marked stages. First we see a nation enslaved; next a nation redeemed; lastly a nation set apart, and through the blending of its religious and political life consecrated to the service of God.—B. Integrity.—According to von Lengerke (Kenaan, lxxxviii. xc.) the following portions of the book belong to the original or Elohist document:—Chap. i. 1–14, ii. 23–25, vi. 2–vii. 7, xii. 1–28, 37, 38, 40–51 (xiii. 1–2, perhaps), xvi., xix. 1, xx., xxv.–xxxi., xxxv.–xl. Knobel, the most recent writer on the subject, in the introduction to his commentary on Exodus and Leviticus, has sifted these books still more carefully, and with regard to many passages has formed a different judgment. A mere comparison of the two lists of passages selected by these different writers as belonging to the original document is sufficient to show how very uncertain all such critical processes must be. On the whole there seems much reason to doubt whether critical acumen will ever be able plausibly to distinguish between the original and the supplement in the book of Exodus. There is nothing indeed forced or improbable in the supposition, either that Moses himself incorporated in his memoirs ancient tradition whether oral or written, or that a writer later than Moses made use of materials left by the great legislator in a somewhat fragmentary form. We shall give reasons hereafter for concluding that the Pentateuch in its present form was not altogether the work of Moses. [PENTATEUCH.] For the present it is sufficient to remark that, even admitting the hand of an editor or compiler to be visible in the book of Exodus, it is quite impossible accurately to distinguish the documents from each other, or from his own additions.—C. Credibility.—Almost every historical fact mentioned in Exodus has at some time or other been called in question. But it is certain that all investigation has hitherto tended only to establish the veracity of the narrator. A comparison with other writers and an examination of the monuments confirm, or at least do not contradict, the most material statements of this book. Thus, for instance, Manetho's story of the Hyksos points at least to some early connexion between the Israelites and the Egyptians, and is corroborative of the fact implied in the Pentateuch that, at the time of the Israelitish sojourn, Egypt was ruled by a foreign dynasty. Manetho speaks, too, of strangers from the east who occupied the eastern part of Lower Egypt. And his account shows that the Israelites had become a numerous and formidable people. According to Ex. xii. 37, the number of men, besides women and children, who left Egypt was 600,000. This would give for the whole nation about two millions and a half. There is no doubt some difficulty in accounting for this immense increase, if we suppose (as on many accounts seems probable) that the actual residence of the children of Israel was only 215 years. We must remember indeed that the number who went into Egypt with Jacob was considerably more than "threescore and ten souls" [see CHRONOLOGY]; we must also take into account the extraordinary fruitfulness of Egypt (concerning which all writers are agreed), and especially of that part of it in which the Israelites dwelt. Still it would be more satisfactory if we could allow 430 years for the increase of the nation rather than, any shorter period. According to De Wette the story of Moses' birth is mythical, and arises from an attempt to account etymologically for his name. As regards the etymology of the name, there can be very little doubt that it is Egyptian, and if so, the author has either played upon the name or is mistaken in his philology. Other objections are of a very arbitrary kind. The ten plagues are physically, many of them, what might be expected in Egypt, although in their intensity and in their rapid succession they are clearly supernatural. The institution of the Passover (ch. xii.) has been subjected to severe criticism. This has also been called a mythic fiction. The critics rest mainly on the difference between the directions given for the observance of this the first, and those given for subsequent passovers. But there is no reason why, considering the very remarkable circumstances under which it was instituted, the first Passover should not have had its own peculiar solemnities, or why instructions should not then have been given for a somewhat different observance for the future. [PASSOVER.] In minor details the writer shows a remarkable acquaintance with Egypt. Many other facts have been disputed, such as the passage of the Red Sea, the giving of the manna, &c. But respecting these it may suffice to refer to other articles in which they are discussed. [THE EXODUS · MANNA,

THE RED SEA.]—D. The authorship and date of the book are discussed under PENTATEUCH.

Exodus, the. 1. Date.—A preponderance of evidence is in favour of the year B.C. 1652. The historical questions connected with this date are noticed under EGYPT. Hales places the Exodus B.C. 1648, Usher B.C. 1491, and Bunsen B.C. 1320. —2. History.—The history of the Exodus itself commences with the close of that of the Ten Plagues. [PLAGUES OF EGYPT.] In the night in which, at midnight, the firstborn were slain (Ex. xii. 29), Pharaoh urged the departure of the Israelites (ver. 31, 32). They at once set forth from Rameses

(ver. 37, 39), apparently during the night (ver. 42), but towards morning, on the 15th day of the first month (Num. xxxiii. 3). They made three journeys and encamped by the Red Sea. Here Pharaoh overtook them, and the great miracle occurred by which they were saved, while the pursuer and his army were destroyed.—3. Geography.—The following points must be settled exactly or approximately:—the situation of the Land of Goshen, the length of each day's march, the position of the first station (Rameses), and the direction of the journey. The Land of Goshen must have been an outer eastern province of Lower Egypt. The Israelites, setting out from a town of Goshen, made two days' journey towards the Red Sea, and then entered the wilderness, a day's journey or less from the sea. They could only therefore have gone by the valley now called the Wadi-t-Tuneylât, for every other cultivated or cultivable tract is too far from the Red Sea. It is not difficult to fix very nearly the length of each day's march of the Israelites. As they had with them women, children, and cattle, it cannot be supposed that they went more than fifteen miles daily; at the same time it is unlikely that they fell far short of this. The three journeys would therefore give a distance of about forty-five miles. There seems, however, to have been a deflexion from a direct course, so that we cannot consider the whole distance from the starting-point, Rameses, to the shore of the Red Sea as much more than about thirty miles in a direct line. Measuring from the ancient western shore of the Arabian Gulf due east of the Wadi-t-Tuneylât, a distance of thirty miles in a direct line places the site of Rameses near the mound called in the present day El-'Abdaseeyeh, not far from the western end of the valley. After the first day's journey the Israelites encamped at Succoth (Ex. xii. 37, xiii. 20; Num. xxxiii. 5, 6). This was probably a mere resting-place of caravans, or a military station, or else a town named from one of the two. Obviously such a name is very difficult of identification. The next camping-place was Etham, the position of which may be very nearly fixed in consequence of its being described as "in the edge of the wilderness" (Ex. xiii. 20; Num. xxxiii. 6, 7). It is reasonable to place Etham where the cultivable land ceases, near the Seba Biâr, or Seven Walls, about three miles from the western side of the ancient head of the gulf. After leaving Etham the direction of the route changed. The Israelites were commanded "to turn and encamp before Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal-zephon" (Ex. xiv. 2). We do not venture to attempt the identification of the places mentioned in the narrative with modern sites. Nothing but the discovery of ancient Egyptian names, and their positive appropriation to such sites, could enable us to do so. The actual passage of the sea forms the subject of another article. There can be no doubt that the direction was from the west to the east, and that the breadth at the place of crossing was great, since the whole Egyptian army perished. Prof. Lepsius attempts to identify Rameses with the ancient Egyptian site now called Abou-Kesheyd, about eight miles from the old head of the gulf. [RAMESSES.]

Exorcist. The use of the term exorcists in Acts xix. 13 confirms what we know from other sources as to the common practice of exorcism amongst the Jews. That some, at least, of them not only pretended to, but possessed, the power of exorcising, appears by our Lord's admission when he asks the Pharisees, "If I by Beelzebub cast out devils, by whom do your disciples cast them out?" (Matt. xii. 27). What means were employed by real exorcists we are not informed. David, by playing skilfully on a harp, procured the temporary departure of the evil spirit which troubled Saul (1 Sam. xvi. 23). Justin Martyr has an interesting suggestion as to the possibility of a Jew successfully exorcising a devil, by employing the name of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. But he goes on to say that the Jewish exorcists, as a class, had sunk down to the superstitious rites and usages of the heathen. It was the profane use of the name of Jesus as a mere charm or spell which led to the disastrous issue recorded in the Acts of the Apostles (xix. 13-16). The power of casting out devils was bestowed by Christ while on earth upon the apostles (Matt. x. 8) and the seventy disciples (Luke x. 17-19), and was, according to His promise (Mark xvi. 17), exercised by believers after His Ascension (Acts xvi. 18); but to the Christian miracle, whether as performed by our Lord himself or by His followers, the N. T. writers never apply the terms "exorcise" or "exorcist."

Ezekiel, one of the four greater prophets. He was the son of a priest named Buzi. The Rabbis absurdly identify Buzi with Jeremiah. Another tradition makes Ezekiel the servant of Jeremiah. Unlike his predecessor in the prophetic office, who gives us the amplest details of his personal history, Ezekiel rarely alludes to the facts of his own life, and we have to complete the imperfect picture by the colours of late and dubious tradition. He was taken captive in the captivity of Jehoiachin, eleven years before the destruction of Jerusalem. He was a member of a community of Jewish exiles who settled on the banks of the Chebar, a "river" or stream of Babylonia. It was by this river "in the land of the Chaldeans" that God's message first reached him (i. 3). His call took place "in the fifth year of king Jehoiachin's captivity," B.C. 595 (i. 2), "in the thirtieth year in the fourth month." The latter expression is very uncertain. It now seems generally agreed that it was the 30th year from the new era of Nabopolassar, father of Nebuchadnezzar, who began to reign B.C. 625. The use of this Chaldee epoch is the more appropriate as the prophet wrote in Babylonia, and he gives a Jewish chronology in ver. 2. The decision of the question is the less important because in all other places Ezekiel dates from the year of Jehoiachin's captivity (xxix. 17, xxx. 20, et passim). We learn from an incidental allusion (xxiv. 18)—the only reference which he makes to his personal history—that he was married, and had a house (viii. 1) in his place of exile, and lost his wife by a sudden and unforeseen stroke. He lived in the highest consideration among his companions in exile, and their elders consulted him on all occasions (viii. 1, xi. 25, xiv. 1, xx. 1, &c.). The last date he mentions is the 27th year of the captivity (xxix. 17), so that his mission extended over twenty-two years, during part of which period Daniel was probably living, and already famous (Ez. xiv. 14, xxviii. 3). He is said to have been murdered in Babylon by some Jewish prince whom he had convicted of idolatry, and to have been buried in the tomb of Shen and Arphaxad, on the banks of the Euphrates. The tomb, said to have been built by Jehoiachin, was shown a few days' journey from Bagdad. But, as Hävernick remarks, "by the side of the scattered data of his external life, those of his internal life appear so much the richer." He was distinguished by his stern and inflexible energy of will and character; and we also observe a devoted adherence to the rites and ceremonies of his national religion. Ezekiel is no cosmopolite, but displays everywhere the peculiar tendencies of a Hebrew educated under Levitical training. The priestly bias is always visible. We may also note in Ezekiel the absorbing recognition of his high calling which enabled him cheerfully to endure any deprivation or misery, if thereby he may give any warning or lesson to his people (iv., xxiv. 15, 16, &c.), whom he so ardently loved (ix. 8, xi. 13). His predictions are marvellously varied. He has instances of visions (viii.-xi.), symbolical actions (as iv. 8), similitudes (xii., xv.), parables (as xvii.), proverbs (as xii. 22, xviii. 1 sq.), poems (as xix.), allegories (as xxiii., xxiv.), open prophecies (as vi., vii., xx., &c.). The depth of his matter, and the marvellous nature of his visions, make him occasionally obscure. Hence his prophecy was placed by the Jews among the "treasures," those portions of Scripture which (like the early part of Genesis, and the Canticles) were not allowed to be read till the age of thirty. The Jews classed him in the very highest rank of prophets.—Of the authenticity of Ezekiel's prophecy there has been no real dispute.

although a few rash critics have raised questions about the last chapters, even suggesting that they might have been written by a Samaritan, to incite the Jews to suffer the co-operation in rebuilding the Temple. The book is divided into two great parts—of which the destruction of Jerusalem is the turning-point; chapters i.-xxiv. contain predictions delivered before that event, and xxv.-xlviii. after it, as we see from xxvi. 2. Again, chapters i.-xxii. are mainly occupied with correction, denunciation, and reproof, while the remainder deal chiefly in consolation and promise. A parenthetical section in the middle of the book (xxv.-xxxii.) contains a group of prophecies against seven foreign nations, the septenary arrangement being apparently intentional. Hävernicks divides the book into nine sections, distinguished by their superscriptions, as follows:—I. Ezekiel's call, i.-iii. 15. II. The general carrying out of the commission, iii. 16-vii. III. The rejection of the people because of their idolatrous worship, viii.-xi. IV. The sins of the age rebuked in detail, xii.-xix. V. The nature of the judgment, and the guilt which caused it, xx.-xxiii. VI. The meaning of the now commencing punishment, xxiv. VII. God's judgment denounced on seven heathen nations, xxv.-xxxii. VIII. Prophecies, after the destruction of Jerusalem, concerning the future condition of Israel, xxxiii.-xxxix. IX. The glorious consummation, xl.-xlviii. There are no direct quotations from Ezekiel in the New Testament, but in the Apocalypse there are many parallels and obvious allusions to the later chapters (xl.-xlviii.).

Ezer. 1. A son of Ephraim, who was slain by the aboriginal inhabitants of Gath, while engaged in a foray on their cattle (1 Chr. vii. 21).—2. A priest who assisted in the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. xii. 42).—3. Father of Hushah of the sons of Hur (1 Chr. iv. 4).

E'zion-ga'ber, or Ezion-ge'ber (Num. xxxiii. 35; Deut. ii. 8; 1 K. ix. 26, xxii. 48; 2 Chr. viii. 17), the last station named for the encampment of the Israelites before they came to the wilderness of Zin. According to the latest map of Kiepert it stands at Ain el-Ghudyân, about ten miles up what is now the dry bed of the Arabah, but, as he supposed, was then the northern end of the gulf, which may have anciently had, like that of Suez, a further extension.

Eznite, the. According to the statement of 2 Sam. xxiii. 8, "Adino the Eznite" was another name for "Josheb-basshebeth a Tachemonite (1 Chr. xi. 11; A. V. 'the Tachmonite that sat in the seat'), chief among the captains." The passage is most probably corrupt.

Ezra. 1. The head of one of the twenty-two courses of priests which returned from captivity with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Neh. xii. 2).—2. A man of Judah. The name occurs in the obscure genealogy of 1 Chr. iv. 17.—3. The famous Scribe and Priest, descended from Hilkiah the high-priest in Josiah's reign, from whose younger son Azariah sprang Seraiah, Ezra's father, quite a different person from Seraiah the high-priest (Ezr. vii. 1). All that is really known of Ezra is contained in the four last chapters of the book of Ezra and in Neh. viii. and xii. 26. From these passages we learn that he was a learned and pious priest residing at Babylon in the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus. The origin of his influence with the king does not appear, but in the seventh year of his reign, in spite of the unfavourable report which had been sent by Rehum and Shimshai, he obtained leave to go to Jerusalem, and to take with him a company of Israelites, together with priests, Levites, singers, porters, and Nethinim. The journey of Ezra and his companions from Babylon to Jerusalem took just four months; and they brought up with them a large free-will offering of gold and silver, and silver vessels. It appears that his great design was to effect a religious reformation among the Palestine Jews, and to bring them back to the observation of the Law of Moses, from which they had grievously declined. His first step, accordingly, was to enforce a separation from their wives upon all who had made heathen marriages, in which number were many priests and Levites, as well as other Israelites. This was effected in little more than six months after his arrival at Jerusalem. With the detailed account of this important transaction Ezra's autobiography ends abruptly, and we hear nothing more of him till, 13 years afterwards, in the 20th of Artaxerxes, we find him again at Jerusalem with Nehemiah "the Tishathah." It seems probable that after he had effected the above-named reformation, and had appointed competent judges and magistrates, with authority to maintain it, he himself returned to the king of Persia. The functions he executed under Nehemiah's government were purely of a priestly and ecclesiastical character. But in such he filled the first place. As Ezra is not mentioned after Nehemiah's departure for Babylon in the 32nd Artaxerxes, and as everything fell into confusion during Nehemiah's absence (Neh. xiii.), it is not unlikely that Ezra may have died or returned to Babylon before that year. Josephus, who should be our next best authority after Scripture, evidently knew nothing about the time or the place of his death. There was a strong Jewish tradition that he was buried in Persia. The principal works ascribed to him by the Jews are:—1. The institution of the Great Synagogue. 2. The settling the canon of Scripture, and restoring, correcting, and editing the whole sacred volume. 3. The introduction of the Chaldee character instead of the old Hebrew or Samaritan. 4. The authorship of the books of Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, and, some add, Esther; and, many of the Jews say, also of the books of Ezekiel, Daniel, and the twelve prophets. 5. The establishment of synagogues.

Ezra, Book of. The book of Ezra is manifestly a continuation of the books of Chronicles. Like these books, it consists of the contemporary historical journals kept from time to time, which were afterwards strung together, and either abridged or added to, as the case required, by a later hand. That later hand, in the book of Ezra, was doubtless Ezra's own, as appears by the four last chapters, as well as by other matter inserted in the previous chapters. It has already been suggested [CHRONICLES] that the chief portion of the last chapter of 2 Chr. and Ezr. i. may probably have been written by Daniel. The evidences of this in Ezr. i. must now be given more fully. Daniel passes over in utter silence the first year of Cyrus, to which pointed allusion is made in Dan. i. 21, and proceeds in ch. x. to the third year of Cyrus. But Ezr. i., if placed between Dan. ix. and x., exactly fills up the gap, and records the event of the first year of Cyrus, in which Daniel was so deeply interested. And not only so, but the manner of the record is exactly Daniel's. The giving the text of the decree, ver. 2-4 (cf. Dan. iv.), the mention of the name of "Mithredath the treasurer," ver. 8 (cf. Dan. i. 3, 11), the allusion to the sacred vessels plundered by Nebuchadnezzar in the house of his god, ver. 7 (cf. Dan. i. 2), the giving the Chaldee name of Zerubbabel, ver. 8, 11 (cf. Dan. i. 7), and the whole locus standi of the narrator, who evidently wrote at Babylon, not at Jerusalem, are all circumstances which in a marked manner point to Daniel as the writer of Ezr. i. As regards Ezr. ii., and as far as iii. 1, it is found (with the exception of clerical errors) in the 7th ch. of Nehemiah, where it belongs beyond a shadow of doubt. The next portion extends from iii. 2 to the end of ch. vi. With the exception of one large explanatory addition by Ezra, extending from iv. 6 to 23, this portion is the work of a writer contemporary with Zerubbabel and Jeshua, and an eye-witness of the rebuilding of the Temple in the beginning of the reign of Darius Hystaspis. That it was the prophet Haggai becomes tolerably sure when we observe further the remarkable coincidences in style. Ezr. iv. 6-23 is a parenthetic addition by a much later hand, and, as the passage most clearly shows, made in the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus. The compiler who inserted ch. ii., a document drawn up in the reign of Artaxerxes to illustrate the return of the captives under Zerubbabel, here inserts a notice of two historical facts—of which one occurred in the reign of Xerxes, and the other in the reign of Artaxerxes—to illustrate the opposition offered by the heathen to the rebuilding of the Temple in the reign of Cyrus and Cambyses. The last four chapters, beginning with ch. vii., are Ezra's own, and continue the history after a gap of fifty-eight years—from the sixth of Darius to the seventh of Artaxerxes. The text of the book of Ezra is not in a good condition. There are a good many palpable corruptions both in the names and numerals, and perhaps in some other points. It is written partly in Hebrew, and partly in Chaldee. The Chaldee begins at iv. 8, and continues to the end of vi. 18. The letter or decree of Artaxerxes, vii. 12-26, is also given in the original Chaldee. There has never been any doubt about Ezra being canonical, although there is no quotation from it in the N. T. The period covered by the book is eighty years, from the first of Cyrus, B.C. 536, to the beginning of the eighth of Artaxerxes, B.C. 456.

Ezrahite, the, a title attached to two persons—Ethan (1 K. iv. 31; Ps. lxxxix. title) and Heman (Ps. lxxxviii. title).

Ezri, son of Chelub, superintendent of King David's farm-labourers (1 Chr. xxvii. 26).

Fable. Taking the words fable and parable, not in their strict etymological meaning, but in that which has been stamped upon them by current usage, looking, i. e. at the Aesopic fable as the type of the one, at the Parables of the N. T. as the type of the other, we have to ask (1.) in what relation they stand to each other, as instruments of moral teaching? (2.) what use is made in the Bible of this or of that form? Perhaps the most satisfactory summing up of the chief distinctive features of each is to be found in the following extract from Neander:—"The parable is distinguished from the fable by this, that, in the latter, qualities, or acts of a higher class of beings may be attributed to a lower (e. g. those of men to brutes); while in the former, the lower sphere is kept perfectly distinct from that which it seems to illustrate. The beings and powers thus introduced always follow the law of their nature, but their acts, according to this law, are used to figure those of a higher race." Of the fable, as thus distinguished from the Parable, we have but two examples in the Bible, (1.) that of the trees choosing their king, addressed by Jotham to the men of Shechem (Judg. ix. 8-15); (2.) that of the cedar of Lebanon and the thistle, as the answer of Jehoshaphat to the challenge of Amaziah (2 K. xiv. 9). The appearance of the fable thus early in the history of Israel, and its entire absence from the direct teaching both of the O. and N. T. are, each of them in its way, significant. Taking the received chronology, the fable of Jotham was spoken about 1209 B.C. The Arabian traditions of Lokman do not assign to him an earlier date than that of David. The first example in the history of Rome is the apologue of Menenius Agrippa B.C. 494, and its genuineness has been questioned on the ground that the fable could hardly at that time have found its way to Latium. The land of Canaan is, so far as we have any data to conclude from, the fatherland of fable. The absence of fables from the teaching of the O. T. must be ascribed to their want of fitness to be the media of the truths which that teaching was to convey. The points in which brutes or inanimate objects present analogies to man are chiefly those which belong to his lower nature, his pride, indolence, cunning, and the like. Hence the fable, apart from the associations of a grotesque and ludicrous nature which gather round it, is inadequate as the exponent of the higher truths which belong to man's spiritual life. It may serve to exhibit the relations between man and man; it fails to represent those between man and God. To do that is the office of the PARABLE. The fables of false teachers claiming to belong to the Christian church, alluded to by writers of the N. T. (1 Tim. i. 4, iv. 7; Tit. i. 14; 2 Pet. i. 16), do not appear to have had the character of fables, properly so called.

Fair Havens, a harbour in the island of CRETE (Acts xxvii. 8), not mentioned in any other ancient writing. Though not mentioned by classical writers, it is still known by its own Greek name, LASAFA too has recently been most explicitly discovered. In fact Fair Havens appears to have been practically its harbour. These places are situated four or five miles to the E. of Cape Matala, which is the most conspicuous headland on the S. coast of Crete, and immediately to the W. of which the coast trends suddenly to the N.

Fairs, a word which occurs only in Ez. xxvii. and there no less than seven times (ver. 12, 14, 16, 19, 22, 27, 33): in the last of these verses it is rendered "wares," and this we believe to be the true meaning of the word throughout.

Fallow-deer (Hab. yachmâr). The Heb. word, which is mentioned only in Dent. xiv. 5 and in 1 K. iv. 23, appears to point to the Antelope bubalis. Kitto refers the name to the Oryx leucoryx. We have little doubt but that the yachmâr of the Heb. Scriptures denotes the bekker-el-wash, or "wild ox," of Barbary and N. Africa. (See drawing on p. 266.)

Famine. When the sweet influences of the Pleiades are bound, and the hands of Scorpio cannot be loosed, then it is that famines generally prevail in the lands of the Bible. In Egypt a deficiency in the rise of the Nile, with drying winds, produces the same results. The famines recorded in the Bible are traceable to both these phenomena; and we generally find that Egypt was resorted to when scarcity afflicted Palestine. In the whole of Syria and Arabia, the fruits of the earth must ever be dependent on rain; the watersheds having few large springs, and the small rivers not being sufficient for the irrigation of even the level lands. If therefore the heavy rains of November and December fail, the sustenance of the people is cut off in the parching drought of harvest-time, when the country is almost devoid of moisture. Egypt, again, owes all its fertility—a fertility that gained for it the striking comparison to the “garden of the Lord”—to its mighty river, whose annual rise inundates nearly the whole land and renders its cultivation an easy certainty. The causes of dearth and famine in Egypt are occasioned by defective inundation, preceded and accompanied and followed by prevalent easterly and southerly winds. The first famine recorded in the Bible is that of Abraham after he had pitched his tent on the east of Bethel (Gen. xii. 10). We may conclude that this famine was extensive, although this is not quite proved by the fact of Abraham's going to Egypt; for on the occasion of the second famine, in the days of Isaac, this patriarch found refuge with Abimelech king of the Philistines in Gerar (Gen. xxvi. 1 sq.). We hear no more of times of scarcity until the great famine of Egypt which “was over all the face of the earth.” The famine of Joseph is discussed in art. EGYPT, so far as Joseph's history and policy is concerned. It is only necessary here to consider its physical characteristics. We have mentioned the chief causes of famines in Egypt: this instance differs in the providential recurrence of seven years of plenty, whereby Joseph was enabled to provide against the coming dearth, and to supply not only the population of Egypt with corn, but those of the surrounding countries (Gen. xli. 53-57). The modern history of Egypt throws some curious light on these ancient records of famines; and instances of their recurrence may be cited to assist us in understanding their course and extent. The most remarkable famine was that of the reign of the Fātimee Khaleefeh, El-Mustansir billāh, which is the only instance on record of one of seven years' duration in Egypt since the time of Joseph (A.H. 457-464, A.D. 1064-1071). This famine exceeded in severity all others of modern times, and was aggravated by the anarchy which then ravaged the country. Vexatious drought and pestilence continued for seven consecutive years, so that they [the people] ate corpses, and animals that died of themselves; the cattle perished; a dog was sold for 5 deenārs, and a cat for three deenārs . . . and an ardebb (about 5 bushels) of wheat for 100 deenārs, and then it failed altogether. The historian adds, that all the horses of the Khaleefeh, save three, perished, and gives numerous instances of the straits to which the wretched inhabitants were driven, and of the organised bands of kidnappers who infested Cairo and caught passengers in the streets by ropes furnished with hooks and let down from the houses. The famine of Samarra resembled it in many particulars; and that very briefly recorded in 2 K. viii. 1, 2, affords another instance of one of seven years. In Arabia, famines are of frequent occurrence.

Farthing. Two names of coins in the N. T. are rendered in the A. V. by this word.—1. κοδράντης, quadrans (Matt. v. 26; Mark xii. 42), a coin current in Palestine in the time of Our Lord. It was equivalent to two lepta (A. V. “mites”). The name quadrans was originally given to the quarter of the Roman as, or piece of three unciae, therefore also called teruncius.—2. ἀσάριον (Matt. x. 29; Luke xii. 6), properly a small as, assarium, but in the time of Our Lord used as the Gr. equivalent of the Lat. as. The rendering of the Vulg. in Luke xii. 6 makes it probable that a single coin is intended by two assaria.

Fasts.—I. One fast only was appointed by the law, that on the day of Atonement. There is no mention of any other periodical fast in the O. T., except in Zech. vii. 1-7, viii. 19. From these passages it appears that the Jews, during their captivity, observed four annual fasts, in the fourth, fifth, seventh, and tenth months. Zechariah simply distinguishes the fasts by the months in which they were observed; but the Mishna and S. Jerome give statements of certain historical events which they were intended to commemorate:—The fast of the fourth month.—The breaking of the tables of the law by Moses (Ex. xxxii.), and the storming of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. lii.). The fast of the fifth month.—The return of the spies, &c. (Num. xiii. xiv.), the temple burnt by Nebuchadnezzar, and again by Titus; and the ploughing up of the site of the temple, with the capture of Bether. The fast of the seventh month.—The complete sack of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar and the death of Gedaliah (2 K. xxv.). The fast of the tenth month.—The receiving by Ezekiel and the other captives in Babylon of the news of the destruction of Jerusalem. Some other events mentioned in the Mishna are omitted as unimportant. Of those here stated several could have had nothing to do with the fasts in the time of the prophet. The number of annual fasts in the present Jewish Calendar has been multiplied to twenty-eight, a list of which is given by Reland.—II. Public fasts were occasionally proclaimed to express national humiliation, and to supplicate divine favour. In the case of public danger, the proclamation appears to have been accompanied with the blowing of trumpets (Joel ii. 1-15; cf. Taanith, i. 6). The following instances are recorded of strictly national fasts:—Samuel gathered “all Israel” to Mizpeh and proclaimed a fast (1 Sam. vii. 8); Jehoshaphat appointed one “throughout all Judah” when he was preparing for war against Moab and Ammon (2 Chr. xx. 3); in the reign of Jehoiaakim, one was proclaimed for “all the people in Jerusalem and all who came thither out of the cities of Judah,” when the prophecy of Jeremiah was publicly read by Baruch (Jer. xxxvi. 6-10; cf. Baruch i. 5); three days after the feast of Tabernacles, when the second temple was completed,

"the children of Israel assembled with fasting and with sackclothes and earth upon them" to hear the law read, and to confess their sins (Neh. ix. 1). There are references to general fasts in the Prophets (Joel i. 14, ii. 15; Is. lviii.), and two are noticed in the books of the Maccabees (1 Macc. iii. 46-47; 2 Macc. xiii. 10-12). There are a considerable number of instances of cities and bodies of men observing fasts on occasions in which they were especially concerned.—III. Private occasional fasts are recognised in one passage of the law (Num. xxx. 13). The instances given of individuals fasting under the influence of grief, vexation, or anxiety, are numerous.—IV. In the N. T. the only references to the Jewish fasts are the mention of "the Fast," in Acts xxvii. 9 (generally understood to denote the Day of Atonement), and the allusions to the weekly fasts (Matt. ix. 14; Mark ii. 18; Luke v. 33, xviii. 12; Acts x. 30). These fasts originated some time after the captivity. They were observed on the second and fifth days of the week, which being appointed as the days for public fasts, seem to have been selected for these private voluntary fasts.—V. The Jewish fasts were observed with various degrees of strictness. Sometimes there was entire abstinence from food (Esth. iv. 16, &c.). On other occasions, there appears to have been only a restriction to a very plain diet (Dan. x. 3). Rules are given in the Talmud as to the mode in which fasting is to be observed on particular occasions. Those who fasted frequently dressed in sackcloth or rent their clothes, put ashes on their head and went barefoot (1 K. xxi. 27; Neh. ix. 1; Ps. xxxv. 13).—VI. The sacrifice of the personal will, which gives to fasting all its value, is expressed in the old term used in the law, afflicting the soul.

Fat. The Hebrews distinguished between the suet or pure fat of an animal, and the fat which was intermixed with the lean (Neh. viii. 10). Certain restrictions were imposed upon them in reference to the former: some parts of the suet, viz., about the stomach, the entrails, the kidneys, and the tail of a sheep, which grows to an excessive size in many eastern countries, and produces a large quantity of rich fat, were forbidden to be eaten in the case of animals offered to Jehovah in sacrifice (Lev. iii. 3, 9, 17, vii. 3, 23). The ground of the prohibition was that the fat was the richest part of the animal, and therefore belonged to Him (iii. 16). The presentation of the fat as the richest part of the animal was agreeable to the dictates of natural feeling, and was the ordinary practice even of heathen nations. The burning of the fat of sacrifices was particularly specified in each kind of offering.

Fat, f. c. VAT. The word employed in the A. V. to translate the Hebrew term yekob, in Joel ii. 24, iii. 13 only. The word commonly used for yekob, indiscriminately with gath, is "winepress" or "winefat," and once "pressfat" (Hag. ii. 16); but the two appear to be distinct—gath the upper receptacle or "press" in which the grapes were trodden, and yekob the "vat," on a lower level, into which the juice or must was collected. The "winepress" and "vats" appear to have been excavated out of the native rock of the hills on which the vineyards lay.

Father. The position and authority of the father as the head of the family is expressly assumed and sanctioned in Scripture, as a likeness of that of the Almighty over His creatures. It lies of course at the root of that so-called patriarchal government

(Gen. iii. 16; 1 Cor. xi. 3), which was introductory to the more definite systems which followed, and which in part, but not wholly, superseded it. The father's blessing was regarded as conferring special benefit, but his malediction special injury, on those on whom it fell (Gen. ix. 25, 27, xxvii. 27-40, xlviii. 15, 20, xlix.); and so also the sin of a parent was held to affect, in certain cases, the welfare of his descendants (2 K. v. 27). The command to honour parents is noticed by St. Paul as the only one, of the Decalogue which bore a distinct promise (Ex. xx. 12; Eph. vi. 2), and disrespect towards them was condemned by the Law as one of the worst of crimes (Ex. xxi. 15, 17; 1 Tim. i. 9). It is to this well recognised theory of parental authority and supremacy that the very various uses of the term "father" in Scripture are due. "Fathers" is used in the sense of seniors (Acts vii. 2, xxii. 1), and of parents in general, or ancestors (Dan. v. 2; Jer. xxvii. 7; Matt. xxiii. 30, 32). Among Mohammedans parental authority has great weight during the time of pupilage.

Feasts. [FESTIVALS.]

Felix, a Roman procurator of Judaea, appointed by the Emperor Claudius, whose freedman he was, on the banishment of Ventidius Cumanus in A.D. 53. Tacitus states that Felix and Cumanus were joint procurators; Cumanus having Galilee, and Felix, Samaria. Felix was the brother of Claudius's powerful freedman Pallas. He ruled the province in a mean, cruel, and profligate manner. His period of office was full of troubles and seditions. St. Paul was brought before Felix in Caesarea. He was remanded to prison and kept there two years, in hopes of extorting money from him (Acts xxiv. 26, 27). At the end of that time Porcius Festus [FESTUS] was appointed to supersede Felix, who, on his return to Rome, was accused by the Jews in Caesarea, and would have suffered the penalty due to his atrocities, had not his brother Pallas prevailed with the Emperor Nero to spare him. This was probably in the year 60 A.D. The wife of Felix was Drusilla, daughter of Herod Agrippa I., the former wife of Azizus King of Emesa.

Fenced cities. The broad distinction between a city and a village in Biblical language consisted in the possession of walls. The city had walls, the village was unwallled, or had only a watchman's tower, to which the villagers resorted in times of danger. A threefold distinction is thus obtained—1. cities; 2. unwallled villages; 3. villages with castles or towers (1 Chr. xxvii. 25). The district east of the Jordan, forming the kingdoms of Moab and Bashan, is said to have abounded from very early times in castles and fortresses, such as were built by Uzziah to protect the cattle, and to repel the inroads of the neighbouring tribes, besides unwallled towns (Amm. Marc. xiv. 9; Deut. iii. 5; 2 Chr. xxvi. 10). The fortifications of the cities of Palestine, thus regularly "fenced," consisted of one or more walls crowned with battlemented parapets, having towers at regular intervals (2 Chr. xxxii. 5; Jer. xxxi. 38), on which in later times engines of war were placed, and watch was kept by day and night in time of war (2 Chr. xxvi. 9, 15; Judg. ix. 45; 2 K. ix. 17). The gateways of fortified towns were also fortified and closed with strong doors (Neh. ii. 8, iii. 3, 6, &c.). In advance of the wall there appears to have been sometimes an outwork (1 K. xxi. 23; 2 Sam. xx. 15), which was perhaps either a palisade or wall lining the ditch, or a wall raised midway within the ditch itself. In many towns there was a keep or citadel for a last resource to the defenders. These forts were well furnished with cisterns (Acts xxi. 34; 2 Macc. v. 5). But the fortified places of Palestine served only in a few instances to check effectually the progress of an invading force, though many instances of determined and protracted resistance are on record, as of Samaria for three years (2 K. xviii. 10), Jerusalem (2 K. xxv. 3) for four months, and in later times of Jotapata, Gamala, Machaerus, Masada, and above all Jerusalem itself, the strength of whose defences drew forth the admiration of the conqueror Titus. The earlier Egyptian fortifications consisted usually of a quadrangular and sometimes double wall of sun-dried brick, fifteen feet thick, and often fifty feet in height, with square towers at intervals, of the same height as the walls, both crowned with a parapet, and a round-headed battlement in shape like a shield. A second lower wall with towers at the entrance was added, distant 13 or 20 feet from the main wall, and sometimes another was made of 70 or 100 feet in length, projecting at right angles from the main wall, to enable the defenders to annoy the assailants in flank.

Ferret, one of the unclean creeping things mentioned in Lev. xi. 30. The animal referred to was probably a reptile of the lizard tribe. The Rabbinical writers seem to have identified this animal with the hedgehog.

Festivals.—I. The religious times ordained in the Law fall under three heads:—(1.) Those formally connected with the institution of the Sabbath; (2.) The historical or great festivals; (3.) The Day of Atonement.—(1.) Immediately connected with the institution of the Sabbath are—(a) The weekly Sabbath itself. (b) The seventh new moon or Feast of Trumpets. (c) The Sabbatical Year. (d) The Year of Jubilee.—(2.) The great feasts are:—(a) The Passover. (b) The Feast of Pentecost, of Weeks, of Wheat-harvest, or, of the First-fruits. (c) The Feast of Tabernacles, or of Ingathering. On each of these occasions every male Israelite was commanded "to appear before the Lord," that is, to attend in the court of the tabernacle or the temple, and to make his offering with a joyful heart (Deut. xxvii. 7; Neh. viii. 9-12). The attendance of women was voluntary, but the zealous often went up to the Passover. On all the days of Holy Convocation there was to be an entire suspension of ordinary labour of all kinds (Ex. xii. 16; Lev. xvi. 29, xxiii. 21, 24, 25, 35). But on the intervening days of the longer festivals work might be carried on. Besides their religious purpose, the great festivals must have had an important bearing on the maintenance of a feeling of national unity. The frequent recurrence of the sabbatical number in the organization of these festivals is too remarkable to be passed over, and seems when viewed in connexion with the sabbatical sacred times, to furnish a strong proof that the whole system of the festivals of the Jewish law was the product of one mind. The agricultural significance of the three great festivals is clearly set forth in the account of the Jewish sacred year contained in Lev. xxiii. The times of the festivals were evidently ordained in wisdom, so as to interfere as little as possible with the industry of the people.—(3.) For the Day of Atonement see that article.—II. After the captivity, the Feast of Purim (Esth. ix. 20 sq.) and that of the Dedication (1 Macc. iv. 56) were instituted. The Festivals of Wood-carrying, as they were called, are mentioned by Josephus and the Mishna. The term, "the Festival of the Basket" is applied by Philo to the offering of the First-fruits described in Deut. xxvi. 1-11 (Philo, vol. v. p. 51, ed. Tanch.).

Festus, Porcius, successor of Felix as procurator of Judaea (Acts xxiv. 27), sent by Nero, probably in the autumn of the year 60 A.D. A few weeks after Festus reached his province he heard the cause of St. Paul, who had been left a prisoner by Felix in the presence of Herod Agrippa II. and Bernice his sister (Acts xxv. 11, 12). Judaea was in the same disturbed state during the procuratorship of Festus, which had prevailed through that of his predecessor. He died probably in the summer of 62 A.D., having ruled the province less than two years.

Fetters. 1. The Hebrew word, nechushtaim, expresses the material of which fetters were usually made, viz. brass, and also that they were made in pairs, the word being in the dual number (Judg. xvi. 21; 2 Sam. iii. 34; 2 K. xxv. 7; 2 Chr. xxxiii. 11, xxxvi. 6; Jer. xxxix. 7, lii. 11). Iron was occasionally employed for the purpose (Ps. cv. 18, cxlix. 8). 2. Cebel may perhaps apply to the link which connected the fetters. 3. Zikkim ("fetters," Job xxxvi. 8) is more usually translated "chains" (Ps. cxlix. 8; Is. xlv. 14; Nah. iii. 10), but its radical sense appears to refer to the contraction of the feet by a chain.

Fever (kaddachuth, dalleketh, charchur; Lev. xvi. 16; Deut. xxviii. 22). These words, from various roots signifying heat or inflammation, are rendered in the A. V. by various words suggestive of fever, or a feverish affection. The third word may perhaps be erysipelas. Fever constantly accompanies the bloody flux, or dysentery (Acts xxviii. 8). Fevers of an inflammatory character are mentioned as common at Mecca, and putrid ones at Djidda. Intermittent fever and dysentery, the latter often fatal, are ordinary Arabian diseases.

Field. The Hebrew sadeh is applied to any cultivated ground, and in some instances in marked opposition to the neighbouring wilderness. On the other hand the sadeh is frequently contrasted with what is enclosed, whether a vineyard, a garden, or a walled town. In many passages the term implies what is remote from a house (Gen. iv. 8, xxiv. 63; Deut. xxii. 25) or settled habitation, as in the case of Esau (Gen. xxv. 27). The separate plots of ground were marked off by stones, which might easily be removed (Deut. xix. 14, xxvii. 17; cf. Job xxiv. 2; Prov. xxi. 28, xxiii. 10): the absence of fences rendered the fields liable to damage from straying cattle (Ex. xxii. 5) or fire (ver. 6; 2 Sam. xiv. 30): hence the necessity of constantly watching flocks and herds. From the absence of enclosures, cultivated land of any size might be termed a field. It should be observed that the expressions "fruitful field" (Is. x. 18, xxix. 17, xxxii. 15, 16), and "plentiful field" (Is. xvi. 10; Jer. xviii. 33), are not connected with sadeh, but with carmel, meaning a park or well-kept wood, as distinct from a wilderness or a forest. Another word, shademoth, is translated "fields," and connected by Gesenius with the idea of enclosure. It is doubtful, however, whether the notion of burning does not rather lie at the bottom of the word. This gives a more consistent sense throughout. In Is. xvi. 8, it would thus mean the withered grape; in Hab. iii. 17, blasted corn; in Jer. xxi. 40, the burnt parts of the city (no "fields" intervened between the south-eastern angle of Jerusalem and the Kidron); while in 2 K. xiii. 4, and Deut. xxxii. 32, the sense of a place of burning is appropriate.

Fig, Fig-tree (Heb. tēnāh), a word of frequent occurrence in the O. T., where it signifies the tree Ficus Carica of Linnaeus, and also its fruit. The fig-tree is very common in Palestine (Deut. viii. 8). Mount Olivet was famous for its fig-trees in ancient times, and they are still found there. "To sit under one's own vine and one's own fig-tree" became a proverbial expression among the Jews to denote peace and prosperity (1 K. iv. 25; Mic. iv. 4; Zech. iii. 10). When figs are spoken of as distinguished from the fig-tree, the plur. form tēnīm is used (see Jer. viii. 13). 2. There are also the words (a) biccārah (Hos. ix. 10), signifying the first ripe of the fig-tree. (b) pug (Cant. ii. 13), the unripe fig, which hangs through the winter. (c) dēbēlāh, a cake of figs compressed into that form for the sake of keeping them (2 K. x. 7).

Fir (Heb. bērosh, bērōth). As the term "cedar" is in all probability applicable to more than one tree, so also "fir" in A. V. represents more than one sort of wood. The opinion of Celsius that Berosh exclusively means "cedar" is probably incorrect. On the whole it seems likely that by Berosh or Berōth is intended one or other of the following trees:—1. Pinus sylvestris, or Scotch fir; 2. larch; 3. Cupressus sempervirens, or cypress, all which are at this day found in the Lebanon.

Fire.—1. Religions. (1.) That which consumed the burnt sacrifice, and the incense-offering, beginning with the sacrifice of Noah (Gen. viii. 20), and continued in the ever burning fire on the altar, first kindled from heaven (Lev. vi. 9, 13, ix. 24), and rekindled at the dedication of Solomon's Temple (2 Chr. vii. 1, 3). (2.) The symbol of Jehovah's presence, and the instrument of his power, in the way either of approval or of destruction (Ex. iii. 2, xiv. 19, &c.). Parallel with this application of fire and with its symbolical meaning is to be noted the similar use for sacrificial purposes, and the respect paid to it, or to the heavenly bodies as symbols of deity, which prevailed among so many nations of antiquity, and of which the traces are not even now extinct: e.g. the Sabæan and Magian systems of worship, and their alleged connexion with Abraham; the occasional relapse of the Jews themselves into sun-, or its corrupted form of fire-worship (Is. xxvii. 9; Deut. xvii. 3, &c.), the worship or deification of heavenly bodies or of fire, prevailing to some extent, as among the Persians, so also even in Egypt. Fire for sacred purposes obtained elsewhere than from the altar was called "strange fire," and for use of such Nadab and Abihu were punished with death by fire from God (Lev. x. 1, 2; Num. iii. 4, xvi. 61). (3.) In the case of the spoil taken from the Midianites, such articles as could bear it were purified by fire as well as in the water appointed for the purpose (Num. xxxi. 23). The victims slain for sin-offerings were afterwards consumed by fire outside the camp (Lev. iv. 12, 21, vi. 30, xvi. 27; Heb. xiii. 11).—II. Domestic. Besides for cooking purposes, fire is often required in Palestine for warmth (Jer. xxxvi. 22; Mark xiv. 54; John xviii. 18). For this purpose a hearth with a chimney is sometimes constructed, on which either lighted wood or pans of charcoal are placed. On the Sabbath, the Law forbade any fire to be kindled even for cooking (Ex. xxxv. 3; Num. xv. 32).—III. The dryness of the land in the hot season in Syria, of course increases liability to accident from fire. The Law therefore ordered that any one kindling a fire which caused damage to corn in a field should make restitution (Ex. xxii. 6; comp. Judg. xv. 4, 5; 2 Sam. xiv. 30).—IV. Punishment of death by fire was awarded by the Law only in the cases of incest with a mother-in-law, and of unchastity on the part of a daughter of a priest (Lev. xx. 14, xxi. 9). In certain cases the bodies of executed criminals and of infamous persons were subsequently burnt (Josh. vii. 25; 2 K. xxiii. 16).

Firepan, one of the vessels of the Temple service (Ex. xxvii. 3, xxxviii. 3; 2 K. xxv. 15; Jer. iii. 19). The same word is elsewhere rendered "snuff-dish" (Ex. xxv. 38, xxxvii. 23; Num. iv. 22) and "censer" (Lev. x. 1, xvi. 12; Num. xvi. 6 ff.). There appear, therefore, to have been two articles so called: one, like a chafing-dish, to carry live coals for the purpose of burning incense; another, like a snuffer-dish, to be used in trimming the lamps, in order to carry the snuffers and convey away the snuff.

Firkin. [WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.]

Firmament. The Hebrew term rāḥta, so translated, is generally regarded as expressive of simple expansion, and is so rendered in the margin of the A. V. (Gen. i. 6). The root means to expand by beating, whether by the hand, the foot, or any instrument. It is especially used of beating out metals into thin plates (Ex. xxxix. 3; Num. xvi. 39). The sense of solidity, therefore, is combined with the ideas of expansion and tenuity in the term. The same idea of solidity runs through all the references to the rāḥta. In Ex. xxiv. 10, it is represented as a solid floor. So again, in Ez. i. 22-26, the "firmament" is the floor on which the throne of the Most High is placed. Further, the office of the rāḥta in the economy of the world demanded strength and substance. It was to serve as a division between the waters above and the waters below (Gen. i. 7). In keeping with this view the rāḥta was provided with "windows" (Gen. vii. 11; Is. xxiv. 18; Mal. iii. 10) and "doors" (Ps. lxxviii. 23), through which the rain and the snow might descend. A secondary purpose which the rāḥta served was to support the heavenly bodies, sun, moon, and stars (Gen. i. 14), in which they were fixed as nails, and from which, consequently, they might be said to drop off (Is. xiv. 12, xxiv. 4; Matt. xxiv. 29). In all these particulars we recognise the same view as was entertained by the Greeks and, to a certain extent, by the Latins. If it be objected to the Mosaic account that the view embodied in the word rāḥta does not harmonise with strict philosophical truth, the answer to such an objection is, that the writer describes things as they appear rather than as they are.

First-born. That some rights of primogeniture existed in very early times is plain, but it is not so clear in what they consisted. They have been classed as, a. authority over the rest of the family; b. priesthood; c. a double portion of the inheritance. Under the Law, in memory of the Exodus, the eldest son was regarded as devoted to God, and was in every case to be redeemed by an offering not exceeding 5 shekels, within one month from birth.

If he died before the expiration of 30 days, the Jewish doctors held the father excused, but liable to the payment if he outlived that time (Ex. xiii. 12-15, xxii. 29; Num. viii. 17, xviii. 15, 16; Lev. xxvii. 6). This devotion of the first-born was believed to indicate a priesthood belonging to the eldest sons of families, which being set aside in the case of Reuben, was transferred to the tribe of Levi. The eldest son received a double portion of the father's inheritance (Deut. xxi. 17), but not of the mother's. Under the monarchy, the eldest son usually, but not always, as appears in the case of Solomon, succeeded his father in the kingdom (1 K. i. 30, ii. 22). The male first-born of animals was also devoted to God (Ex. xiii. 2, 12, 13, xxii. 29, xxiv. 19, 20). Unclean animals were to be redeemed with the addition of one-fifth of the value, or else put to death; or, if not redeemed, to be sold, and the price given to the priests (Lev. xxvii. 13, 27, 28).

First-fruits. 1. The Law ordered in general, that the first of all ripe fruits and of liquors, or, as it is twice expressed, the first of first-fruits, should be offered in God's house (Ex. xxii. 29, xxiii. 19, xxxiv. 26). 2. On the morrow after the Passover sabbath, i. e. on the 16th of Nisan, a sheaf of new corn was to be brought to the priest, and waved before the altar, in acknowledgment of the gift of fruitfulness (Lev. xxiii. 5, 6, 10, 12, ii. 12). 3. At the expiration of 7 weeks from this time, i. e. at the Feast of Pentecost, an oblation was to be made of 2 loaves of leavened bread made from the new flour, which were to be waved in like manner with the Passover sheaf (Ex. xxxiv. 22; Lev. xxiii. 15, 17; Num. xxviii. 26). 4. The feast of ingathering, i. e. the Feast of Tabernacles in the 7th month, was itself an acknowledgment of the fruits of the harvest (Ex. xxiii. 16, xxxiv. 22; Lev. xxiii. 39). These four sorts of offerings were national. Besides them, the two following were of an individual kind. 5. A cake of the first dough that was baked, was to be offered as a heave-offering (Num. xv. 19, 21). 6. The first-fruits of the land were to be brought in a basket to the holy place of God's choice, and there presented to the priest, who was to set the basket down before the altar (Deut. xvi. 2-11). The offerings, both public and private, resolve themselves into 2 classes, a. produce in general, b. offerings, prepared produce. a. Of the public offerings of first-fruits, the Law defined no place from which the Passover sheaf should be chosen, but the Jewish custom, so far as it is represented by the Mishna, prescribed that the wave-sheaf or sheaves should be taken from the neighbourhood of Jerusalem. The offering made at the feast of the Pentecost, was a thanksgiving for the conclusion of wheat harvest. It consisted of 2 loaves (according to Josephus one loaf) of new flour baked with leaven, which was waved by the priest as at the Passover. No private offerings of first-fruits were allowed before this public oblation of the 2 loaves. The private oblations of first-fruits may be classed in the same manner as the public. No offerings were to be made before Pentecost, nor after the feast of the Dedication, on the 25th of Cisleu (Ex. xxiii. 16; Lev. xxiii. 16, 17). After passing the night at Jerusalem, the pilgrims returned on the following day to their homes (Deut. xvi. 7). b. The first-fruits prepared for use were not required to be taken to Jerusalem. They consisted of wine, wool, bread, oil, date-honey, onions, cucumbers (Num.

xv. 19, 21, Deut. xviii. 4). They were to be made, according to some, only by dwellers in Palestine; but according to others, by those also who dwelt in Moab, in Ammonitis, and in Egypt. The offerings were the perquisite of the priests (Num. xviii. 11; Deut. xviii. 4). Nehemiah, at the Return from Captivity, took pains to reorganize the offerings of first-fruits of both kinds, and to appoint places to receive them (Neh. x. 35, 37, xii. 44). An offering of first-fruits is mentioned as an acceptable one to the prophet Elisha (2 K. iv. 42).

Fish; Fishing. The Hebrews recognized fish as one of the great divisions of the animal kingdom, and, as such, gave them a place in the account of the creation (Gen. i. 21, 28), as well as in other passages where an exhaustive description of living creatures is intended (Gen. ix. 2; Ex. xx. 4; Deut. iv. 18; 1 K. iv. 33). They do not, however, appear to have acquired any intimate knowledge of this branch of natural history. The Mosaic law (Lev. xi. 9, 10) pronounced unclean such fish as were devoid of fins and scales: these were and are regarded as unwholesome in Egypt. Of the various species found in the Sea of Galilee, the silurus would be classed among the unclean, while the aparus Galilaicus, a species of bream, and the mugil, chub, would be deemed "clean" or "good." In Gen. i. 21 (as compared with verse 28), the great marine animals are distinguished from "every living creature that creepeth," a description applying to fish, along with other reptiles, as having no legs. The Hebrews were struck with the remarkable fecundity of fish. Doubtless they became familiar with this fact in Egypt, where the abundance of fish in the Nile, and the lakes and canals, rendered it one of the staple commodities of food (Num. xi. 5). The destruction of the fish was on this account a most serious visitation to the Egyptians (Ex. vii. 21; Is. xix. 8). Among the Philistines, Dagon was represented by a figure, half man and half fish (1 Sam. v. 4). On this account the worship of fish is expressly prohibited (Deut. iv. 18). In Palestine, the Sea of Galilee was and still is remarkably well stored with fish, and the value attached to the fishery by the Jews is shown by the traditional belief that one of the ten laws of Joshua enacted that it should be open to all comers. Jerusalem derived its supply chiefly from the Mediterranean (comp. Ex. xlvii. 10). The existence of a regular fish-market is implied in the notice of the fish-gate, which was probably contiguous to it

An Egyptian Landing-Net. (Wilkinson.)

(2 Chr. xxxiii. 14; Neh. iii. 3, xii. 39; Zeph. i. 10). Numerous allusions to the art of fishing occur in the Bible. The most usual method of catching fish was by the use of the net, either the casting net (Hab. i. 15; Ez. xxvi. 5, 14, xlvii. 10), probably resembling the one used in Egypt, as shown in Wilkinson (iii. 55), or the draw or drag net (Is. xix. 8; Hab. i. 15), which was larger and required the use of a boat: the latter was probably most used on the Sea of Galilee, as the number of boats kept on it was very considerable. Angling was a favourite pursuit of the wealthy in Egypt, as well as followed by the poor who could not afford a net. A still more scientific method was with the trident or the spear, as practised in Egypt in taking the crocodile (Job xli. 7) or the hippopotamus.

Fitches (i. e. VETCHES), the representative in the A. V. of the two Heb. words cussemeth and ketsach. As to the former see RYE. Ketsach denotes without doubt the Nigella sativa, an herbaceous annual plant belonging to the natural order Ranunculaceae, and sub-order Helleboreae, which grows in the S. of Europe and in the N. of Africa.

Nigella sativa.

Flag, the representative in the A. V. of the two Heb. words áchá and súph. 1. Áchá, a word, according to Jerome, of Egyptian origin, and denoting "any green and coarse herbage, such as rushes and reeds, which grows in marshy places." It seems probable that some specific plant is denoted in Job viii. 11. The word occurs once again in Gen. xli. 2, 18, where it is said that the seven well-favoured kine came up out of the river and fed in an áchá. Royle and Kitto are inclined to think that the áchá denotes the Cyperus esculentus. Kalisch says that the áchá "is unquestionably either the Cyperus esculentus or the Butomus umbellatus." We are quite unable to satisfy ourselves so easily on this point. 2. Súph occurs frequently in the O. T. in connexion with yam, "sea," to denote the "Red Sea." The term here appears to be used in a very wide sense to denote "weeds of any kind." The yam súph therefore is the "sea of weeds," and perhaps, as Stanley observes, súph "may be applied to any aqueous vegetation."

Flagon, a word employed in the A. V. to render two distinct Hebrew terms: 1. Asúshah (2 Sam. vi. 19; 1 Chr. xvi. 3; Cant. ii. 5; Hos. iii. 1).

The real meaning of this word is a cake of pressed raisins. 2. Nebel (Is. xxii. 24 only). Nebel is commonly used for a bottle or vessel, originally probably a skin, but in later times a piece of pottery (Is. xxx. 14).

Flax. Two Hebrew words are used for this plant in O. T., or rather the same word slightly modified. Eliminating all the places where the words are used for the article manufactured in the thread, the piece, or the made up garment, we reduce them to two: Ex. ix. 31, certain, and Josh. ii. 6, disputed. In the former the flax of the Egyptians is recorded to have been damaged by the plague of hail. It seems probable that the cultivation of flax for the purpose of the manufacture of linen was by no means confined to Egypt; but that originating in India it spread over the whole continent of Asia at a very early period of antiquity. That it was grown in Palestine even before the conquest of that country by the Israelites appears from Josh. ii. 6. The various processes employed in preparing the flax for manufacture into cloth are indicated:—1. The drying process. 2. The peeling of the stalks, and separation of the fibres. 3. The hackling (Is. xix. 9). That flax was anciently one of the most important crops in Palestine appears from Hos. ii. 5, 9.

Flea, an insect twice only mentioned in Scripture, viz. in 1 Sam. xxiv. 14, xxvi. 20. Fleas are abundant in the East, and afford the subject of many proverbial expressions.

Flesh. [FOOD.]

Flint. The Heb. challámish is rendered flint in Deut. viii. 15, xxxii. 13; Ps. cxiv. 8; and Is. i. 7. In Job xxviii. 9 the same word is rendered rock in the text, and flint in the margin. In Ez. iii. 9 the English word "flint" occurs in the same sense, but there it represents the Heb. Tzor.

Flood. [NOAH.]

Floor. [PAVEMENT.]

Flour. [BREAD.]

Flowers. [PALESTINE, BOTANY OF.]

Flute (1 K. i. 4, marg. [PIPE]), a musical instrument, mentioned amongst others (Dan. iii. 5, 7, 10, 15) as used at the worship of the golden image which Nebuchadnezzar had set up.

Flux, Bloody (Acts xxviii. 8), the same as our dysentery, which in the East is, though sometimes sporadic, generally epidemic and infectious, and then assumes its worst form.

Fly, Flies. 1. Zébáb occurs only in Eccl. x. 1 and in Is. vii. 18. The Heb. name is probably a generic one for any insect. The zébáb from the rivers of Egypt has by some writers, as by Oedmann, been identified with the zimb of which Bruce gives a description, and which is evidently some species of Tabanus. Sir G. Wilkinson has given some account of an injurious fly under the name of Dihéhab, a term almost identical with zébáb. 2. Aráb ("swarms of flies," "divers sorts of flies," A. V.), the name of the insect, or insects, which God sent to punish Pharaoh; see Ex. viii. 21-31; Ps. lxxviii. 45, cv. 31. As the aráb are said to have filled the houses of the Egyptians it seems not improbable that common flies (Muscidae) are more especially intended. The identification of the aráb with the cockroach is purely gratuitous.

Food. The diet of Eastern nations has been in all ages light and simple. As compared with our own habits, the chief points of contrast are the small amount of animal food consumed, the variety of articles used as accompaniments to bread, the substitution of milk in various forms for our liquors, and the combination of what we should deem heterogeneous elements in the same dish, or the same meal. The chief point of agreement is the large consumption of bread, the importance of which in the eyes of the Hebrew is testified by the use of the term lechem (originally food of any kind) specifically for bread, as well as by the expression "staff of bread" (Lev. xvi. 26; Ps. cv. 16; Ez. iv. 16 xiv. 13). Simpler preparations of corn were, however, common; sometimes the fresh green ears were eaten in a natural state, the husks being rubbed off by the hand (Lev. xxiii. 14; Deut. xxiii. 25. 2 K. iv. 42; Matt. xii. 1; Luke vi. 1); more frequently, however, the grains, after being carefully picked, were roasted in a pan over a fire (Lev. ii. 14), and eaten as "parched corn," in which form they were an ordinary article of diet, particularly among labourers, or others who had not the means of dressing food (Lev. xxiii. 14; Ruth ii. 14 1 Sam. xvii. 17, xiv. 18; 2 Sam. xvii. 28): this practice is still very usual in the East. Sometimes the grain was bruised (A. V. "beaten," Lev. ii. 14, 16), and then dried in the sun; it was eaten either mixed with oil (Lev. ii. 15), or made into a soft cake (A. V. "dough;" Num. xv. 20; Neh. x. 37; Ez. xlv. 30). The Hebrews used a great variety of articles (John xxi. 5) to give a relish to bread. Sometimes salt was so used (Job vi. 6), as we learn from the passage just quoted; sometimes the bread was dipped into the sour wine (A. V. "vinegar") which the labourers drank (Ruth ii. 14); or, where meat was eaten, into the gravy, which was either served up separately for the purpose, as by Gideon (Judg. vi. 19), or placed in the middle of the meat-dish, as done by the Arabs. Milk and its preparations hold a conspicuous place in Eastern diet, as affording substantial nourishment; sometimes it was produced in a fresh state (Gen. xviii. 8), but more generally in the form of the modern leben, i. e. sour milk (A. V. "butter;" Gen. xviii. 8; Judg. v. 25; 2 Sam. xvii. 29). Fruit was another source of subsistence: figs stand first in point of importance; they were generally dried and pressed into cakes. Grapes were generally eaten in a dried state as raisins. Fruit-cake forms a part of the daily food of the Arabians. Of vegetables we have most frequent notice of lentils (Gen. xiv. 34; 2 Sam. xvii. 28, xxiii. 11; Ez. iv. 9), which are still largely used by the Bedouins in travelling; beans (2 Sam. xvii. 28; Ez. iv. 9), leeks, onions, and garlic, which were and still are of a superior quality in Egypt (Num. xi. 5). The modern Arabians consume but few vegetables: radishes and leeks are most in use, and are eaten raw with bread. The spices or condiments known to the Hebrews were numerous. In addition to these classes we have to notice some other important articles of food: in the first place, honey, whether the natural product of the bee (1 Sam. xiv. 25; Matt. iii. 4), which abounds in most parts of Arabia, or of the other natural and artificial productions included under that head, especially the dhûs of the Syrians and Arabians, i. e. grape-juice boiled down, which is still extensively used in the East; the latter is supposed to be referred to in Gen. xliii. 11, and Ez. xxvii. 17. With regard to oil, it does not appear to have been used to the extent we might have anticipated. Eggs are not often noticed, but were evidently known as articles of food (Is. x. 14, lix. 5; Luke xi. 12). The Orientals have been at all times sparing in the use of animal food: not only does the excessive heat of the climate render it both unwholesome to eat much meat, and expensive from the necessity of immediately consuming a whole animal, but beyond this the ritual regulations of the Mosaic law in ancient, as of the Koran in modern times, have tended to the same result. The prohibition expressed against consuming the blood of any animal (Gen. ix. 4) was more fully developed in the Levitical law, and enforced by the penalty of death (Lev. iii. 17, vii. 26, xix. 26; Deut. xii. 16; 1 Sam. xiv. 32 ff.; Ez. xlv. 7, 15). Certain portions of the fat of sacrifices were also forbidden (Lev. iii. 9, 10), as being set apart for the altar (Lev. iii. 16, vii. 25; cf. 1 Sam. ii. 16 ff.; 2 Chr. vii. 7). In addition to the above, Christians were forbidden to eat the flesh of animals, portions of which had been offered to idols. All beasts and birds classed as unclean (Lev. xi. 1 ff.; Deut. xiv. 4 ff.) were also prohibited. Under these restrictions the Hebrews were permitted the free use of animal food: generally speaking they only availed themselves of it in the exercise of hospitality (Gen. xviii. 7), or at festivals of a religious (Ex. xii. 8), public (1 K. i. 9; 1 Chr. xii. 40), or private character (Gen. xxvii. 4; Luke xv. 23): it was only in royal households that there was a daily consumption of meat (1 K. iv. 23; Neh. v. 18). The animals killed for meat were—calves (Gen. xviii. 7; 1 Sam. xxviii. 24; Am. vi. 4); lambs (2 Sam. xii. 4; Am. vi. 4); oxen, not above three years of age (1 K. i. 9; Prov. xv. 17; Is. xxii. 13; Matt. xxii. 4); kids (Gen. xvii. 9; Judg. vi. 19; 1 Sam. xvi. 20); harts, roebucks, and fallow-deer (1 K. iv. 23); birds of various kinds; fish, with the exception of such as were without scales and fins (Lev. xi. 9; Deut. xiv. 9). Locusts, of which certain species only were esteemed clean (Lev. xi. 22), were occasionally eaten (Matt. iii. 4), but considered as poor fare. Meat does not appear ever to have been eaten by itself; various accompaniments are noticed in Scripture, as bread, milk, and sour milk (Gen. xviii. 8); bread and broth (Judg. vi. 19); and with fish either bread (Matt. xiv. 19, xv. 36; John xxi. 9) or honeycomb (Luke xxiv. 42). With regard to the beverages used by the Hebrews, we have already mentioned milk, and the probable use of barley-water, and of a mixture, resembling the modern sherbet, formed of fig-cake and water. It is almost needless to say that water was most generally drunk. In addition to these the Hebrews were acquainted with various intoxicating liquors.

Footman, a word employed in the Auth. Version in two senses. 1. Generally, to distinguish those of the people or of the fighting-men who went on foot from those who were on horseback or in chariots. But, 2. The word occurs in a more special sense (in 1 Sam. xxii. 17 only), and as the translation of a different term from the above. This passage affords the first mention of the existence of a body of swift runners in attendance on the king, though such a thing had been foretold by Samuel (1 Sam. viii. 11). This body appear to have been afterwards kept up, and to have been distinct from the body-guard—the six hundred and the thirty—who were originated by David. See 1 K. xiv. 27, 28; 2 Chr. ii. 10, 11; 2 K. xi. 4, 6, 11, 13, 19. In each of these cases the word is the same as the above, and is rendered "guard;" but the translators were evidently aware of its signification, for they have put the word "runners" in the margin in two instances (1 K. xiv. 27; 2 K. xi. 13).

Forehead. The practice of veiling the face in public for women of the higher classes, especially married women, in the East, sufficiently stigmatizes with reproach the unveiled face of women of bad character (Gen. xxiv. 65; Jer. iii. 3). An especial force is thus given to the term "hard of forehead" as descriptive of audacity in general (Ez. iii. 7, 8, 9). The custom among many Oriental nations both of colouring the face and forehead, and of impressing on the body marks indicative of devotion to some special deity or religious sect is mentioned elsewhere. The "jewels for the forehead," mentioned by Ezekiel (xvi. 12), and in margin of A. V. (Gen. xxiv. 22), were in all probability nose-rings (Is. iii. 21).

Forest. The corresponding Hebrew terms are ya'ar, chôresh, and pardés. The first of these most truly expresses the idea of a forest. The second is seldom used, and applies to woods of less extent: it is only twice (1 Sam. xxiii. 15 ff.; 2 Chr. xxvii. 4) applied to woods properly so called. The third, pardés, occurs only once in reference to forest-trees (Neh. ii. 8). Elsewhere the word describes an orchard (Eccl. ii. 5; Cant. iv. 13). Although Palestine has never been in historical times a woodland country, yet there can be no doubt that there was much more wood formerly than there is at present. (1.) The wood of Ephraim clothed the slopes of the hills that bordered the plain of Jezreel, and the plain itself in the neighbourhood of Bethshan (Josh. xvii. 15 ff.). (2.) The wood of Bethel (2 K. ii. 23, 24) was situated in the ravine which descends to the plain of Jericho. (3.) The forest of Hareth (1 Sam. xxii. 5) was somewhere on the border of the Philistine plain, in the southern part of Judah. (4.) The wood through which the Israelites passed in their pursuit of the Philistines (1 Sam. xiv. 25) was probably near Ajalon (comp. v. 31). (5.) The "wood" (Ps. cxxxii. 6) implied in the name of Kirjath-jearim (1 Sam. vii. 2) must have been similarly situated, as also (6.) were the "forests" in which Jotham placed his forts (2 Chr. xxvii. 4). (7.) The plain of Sharon was partly covered with wood (Is. lxv. 10). (8.) The wood in the wilderness of Ziph, in which David concealed himself (1 Sam. xxiii. 15 ff.), lay S.E. of Hebron. The house of the forest of Lebanon (1 K. vii. 2, x. 17, 21; 2 Chr. ix. 16, 20) was so called probably from being fitted up with cedar.

Fortifications. [FENCED CITIES.]

Fortunatus (1 Cor. xvi. 17), one of three Corinthians, the others being Stephanas and Achaicus, who were at Ephesus when St. Paul wrote his first Epistle. There is a Fortunatus mentioned at the end of Clement's first Epistle to the Corinthians, who was possibly the same person.

Fountain. Among the attractive features presented by the Land of Promise to the nation migrating from Egypt by way of the desert, none would be more striking than the natural gush of waters from the ground. The springs of Palestine, though short-lived, are remarkable for their abundance and beauty, especially those which fall into the Jordan and its lakes throughout its whole course. The spring or fountain of living water, the "eye" of the landscape, is distinguished in all Oriental languages from the artificially sunk and enclosed well. The volcanic agency which has opened rated so powerfully in Palestine, has from very early times given tokens of its working in the warm springs which are found near the sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea. Jerusalem appears to have possessed either more than one perennial spring, or one issuing by more than one outlet. In Oriental cities generally public fountains are frequent. Traces of such fountains at Jerusalem may perhaps be found in the names En-Rogel (2 Sam. xvii. 17), the "Dragon-well" or fountain, and the "gate of the fountain" (Neh. ii. 13, 14).

Fountain at Nazareth. (Roberts.)

Fowl. Several distinct Hebrew and Greek words are thus rendered in the A. V. of the Bible. Of these the most common is 'ôph, which is usually a collective term for all kinds of birds. In 1 K. iv. 23, among the daily provisions for Solomon's table, "fatted fowl" are included. In the N. T. the word translated "fowls" is most frequently that which comprehends all kinds of birds (including ravens, Luke xii. 24).

Fowl, Fowler. [SPARROW.]

Fox (Heb. shû'ân). We are inclined to think that the "jackal" is the animal more particularly signified in almost all the passages in the O. T. where the Hebrew term occurs. The shû'ân of Judg. xv. 4 are evidently "jackals," and not "foxes," for the former animal is gregarious, whereas the latter is solitary in its habits. With respect to the jackals and foxes of Palestine, there is no doubt that the common jackal of the country is the Canis aureus, which may be heard every night in the villages. Hemprich and Ehrenberg speak of a vulpine animal, under the name of Canis Syriacus, as occurring in Lebanon. The Egyptian Vulpes Niloticus, and doubtless the common fox of our own country, are Palestine species.

Vulpes Niloticus.

Frankincense, a vegetable resin, brittle, glittering, and of a bitter taste, used for the purpose of escaerifical fumigation (Ex. xxx. 34-36). It is obtained by successive incisions in the bark of a tree called the arbor thuris, the first of which yields the purest and whitest kind; while the produce of the after incisions is spotted with yellow, and as it becomes old loses its whiteness altogether. The Hebrews imported their frankincense from Arabia (Is. lx. 6; Jer. vi. 20), and more particularly from Saba; but it is remarkable that at present the Arabian Libanum, or Olibanum, is of a very inferior kind, and that the finest frankincense imported into Turkey comes through Arabia from the islands of the Indian Archipelago. There can be little doubt that the tree which produces the Indian frankincense is the Boswellia serrata of Roxburgh, or Boswellia thurifera of Colebrooke. It is still extremely uncertain what tree produces the Arab. Olibanum. Lamarck proposes the Amyris Gileadensis, but, as it would seem, upon inconclusive evidence.

Frog. The mention of this reptile in the O. T. is confined to the passage in Ex. vii. 2-7, &c., in which the plague of frogs is described, and to Ps. lxxviii. 45, cv. 30. In the N. T. the word occurs once only in Rev. xvi. 13. There is no question as to the animal meant. The only known species of frog which occurs at present in Egypt is the Rana esculenta, the edible frog of the continent.

Frontlets, or Phylacteries (Ex. xiii. 16; Deut. vi. 8, xi. 18; Matt. xxiii. 5). These "frontlets" or "phylacteries" were strips of parchment, on which were written four passages of Scripture (Ex. xiii. 2-10, 11-17; Deut. vi. 4-9, 13-23) in an ink prepared for the purpose. They were then rolled up in a case of black calfskin, which was attached to a stiffer piece of leather, having a thong one finger broad, and one and a half cubits long. They were placed at the bend of the left arm. Those worn on the forehead were written on four strips of parchment, and put into four little cells within a square case, on which the letter Φ was written. The square had two thongs, on which Hebrew letters were inscribed. That phylacteries were used as amulets is certain, and was very natural. Scaliger even supposes that phylacteries were designed to supersede those amulets, the use of which had been already learnt by the Israelites in Egypt. The expression "they make broad their phylacteries" (Matt. xxiii. 5) refers not so much to the phylactery itself, which seems to have been of a prescribed breadth, as to the case in which the parchment was kept, which the Pharisees, among their other pretentious customs (Mark vii. 3, 4; Luke v. 33, &c.), made as conspicuous as they could. It is said that the Pharisees wore them always, whereas the common people only used them at prayers. The modern Jews only wear them at morning prayers, and sometimes at noon. In our Lord's time they were worn by all Jews, except the Karaites, women, and slaves. Boys, at the age of thirteen years and a day, were bound to wear them. The Karaites explained Deut. vi. 8, Ex. xiii. 9, &c., as a figurative command to remember the law, as is certainly the case in similar passages (Prov. iii. 3, vi. 21, vii. 3; Cant. viii. 6, &c.). It seems clear to us that the scope of these injunctions favours the Karaite interpretation. The Rabbis have many rules about their use.

Fuller. The trade of the fullers, so far as it is mentioned in Scripture, appears to have consisted chiefly in cleansing garments and whitening them. The process of fulling or cleansing cloth, so far as it may be gathered from the practice of other nations, consisted in treading or stamping on the garments with the feet or with bats in tubs of water, in which some alkaline substance answering the purpose of soap had been dissolved. The substances used for this purpose which are mentioned in Scripture are natrum (Prov. xxv. 20; Jer. ii. 22) and soap (Mal. iii. 2). Other substances also are mentioned as being employed in cleansing, which, together with alkali, seem to identify the Jewish with the Roman process, as urine and chalk. The process of whitening garments was performed by rubbing into them chalk or earth of some kind. Creta Cimolia (Cimolite) was probably the earth most frequently used. The trade of the fullers, as causing offensive smells, and also as requiring space for drying clothes, appears to have been carried on at Jerusalem outside the city.

Fuller's Field, the, a spot near Jerusalem (2 K. xviii. 17; Is. vii. 3, xxxvi. 2) so close to the walls that a person speaking from there could be heard on them (2 K. xviii. 17, 26). One resort of the fullers of Jerusalem would seem to have been below the city on the south-east side. But Rabshakeh and his "great host" must have come from the north; and the Fuller's Field was therefore, to judge from this circumstance, on the table-land on the northern side of the city.

Frontlets or Phylacteries.

Funerals. [BURIAL.]Furlong. [MEASURES.]

Furnace. Various kinds of furnaces are noticed in the Bible. (1.) Tannûr is so translated in the A. V. in Gen. x. 17; Is. xxxi. 9; Neh. iii. 11, xii. 38. Generally the word applies to the baker's oven. (2.) Cibbân, a smelting or calcining furnace (Gen. xix. 28; Ex. ix. 8, 10, xix. 18), especially a lime-kiln (Is. xxxiii. 12; Am. ii. 1). (3.) Cûr, a refining furnace (Prov. xvii. 3, xxvii. 21; Ez. xxii. 18 ff.). (4.) Atûn, a large furnace built like a brick-kiln (Dan. iii. 22, 23). The Persians were in the habit of using the furnace as a means of inflicting capital punishment (Dan. i. c.; Jer. xxix. 22; 2 Macc. vii. 5; Hos. vii. 7). (5.) The potter's furnace (Ecclus. xxvii. 5, xxxviii. 30). (6.) The blacksmith's furnace (Ecclus. xxxviii. 28).

G

Ga'al, son of Ebed, aided the Shechemites in their rebellion against Abimelech (Judg. ix.). He does not seem to have been a native of Shechem, nor specially interested in the revolution, but rather one of a class of condottieri, who at such a period of anarchy would be willing to sell their services to the highest bidder.

Gaash. On the north side of "the hill of Gaash" was the city which was given to Joshua (Josh. xxiv. 30; Judg. ii. 9; comp. Josh. xix. 49, 50). It does not appear to have been recognized.

Ga'ba. The same name as GEBA. It is found in the A. V. in Josh. xviii. 24; Ezr. ii. 26; Neh. vii. 30.

Gab'aal.—1. An ancestor of Tobit (Tob. i. 1).—2. A poor Jew (Tob. i. 17, Vulg.) of "Rages in Media," to whom Tobias lent ten talents of silver (Tob. i. 14, iv. 1, 20, v. 6, ix., x. 2).

Gab'atha, Esth. xii. 1. [BIGTHAN.]

Gab'bai, apparently the head of an important family of Benjamin resident at Jerusalem (Neh. xi. 8).

Gab'batha, the Hebrew or Chaldee appellation of a place, also called "Pavement," where the judgment-seat or bema was planted, from his place on which Pilate delivered our Lord to death (John xix. 13). The place was outside the praetorium, for Pilate brought Jesus forth from thence to it. It is suggested by Lightfoot that Gabbatha is a mere translation of "pavement." It is more probably from an ancient root signifying height or roundness. In this case Gabbatha designated the elevated Bema; and the "pavement" was possibly some mosaic or tessellated work; either forming the bema itself, or the flooring of the court immediately round it.

Gab'dee, 1 Esd. v. 20. [GABA.]

Gab'rias, according to the present text of the LXX., the brother of Gabael, the creditor of Tobit (Tob. i. 14), though in another place (Tob. iv. 20) he is described as his father.

Gab'riel. The word, which is not in itself distinctive, but merely a description of the angelic office, is used as a proper name or title in Dan. viii. 16, ix. 21, and in Luke i. 19, 26. In the ordinary traditions, Jewish and Christian, Gabriel is spoken of as one of the archangels. In Scripture he is set forth only as the representative of the angelic nature in its ministration of comfort and sympathy to man.

Gad, Jacob's seventh son, the first-born of Zilpah, Leah's maid, and whole-brother to Asher (Gen. xxx. 11-13, xli. 16, 18). (a) The passage in which the bestowal of the name of Gad is preserved—like the others, an exclamation on his birth—is more than usually obscure: "And Leah said, 'In fortune,' and she called his name Gad" (Gen. xxx. 11). Such is supposed to be the meaning i. the old text of the passage. But in the marginal emendation of the Masorets the word is given, "Gad comes." (b) In the blessing of Jacob, however, we find the name played upon in a different manner: "Gad" is here taken as meaning a piratical band or troop (Gen. xlix. 19). (c) The force thus lent to the name has been by some partially transferred to the narrative of Gen. xxx., e. g. the Samaritan Version, the Veneto-Greek, and our own A. V.—"a troop (of children) cometh." Of the childhood and life of the patriarch GAD nothing is preserved. At the time of the descent into Egypt seven sons are ascribed to him, remarkable from the fact that a majority of their names have plural terminations, as if those of families rather than persons (Gen. xli. 16). The position of Gad during the march to the Promised Land was on the south side of the Tabernacle (Num. ii. 14). The alliance between the tribes of Reuben and Gad was doubtless induced by the similarity of their pursuits. Of all the sons of Jacob these two tribes alone returned to the land which their forefathers had left five hundred years before, with their occupations unchanged. At the halt on the east of Jordan we find them coming forward to Moses with the representation that they "have cattle"—"a great multitude of cattle," and the land where they now are is a "place for cattle." They did not, however, attempt to evade taking their proper share of the difficulties of subduing the land of Canaan, and after that task had been effected they were dismissed by Joshua "to their tents," to their "wives, their little ones, and their cattle," which they had left behind them in Gilead. The country allotted to Gad appears, speaking roughly, to have lain chiefly about the centre of the land east of Jordan. The south of that district—from the Arnon (Wady Mojeb), about half way down the Dead Sea, to Heshbon, nearly due east of Jerusalem—was occupied by Reuben, and at or about Heshbon the possessions of Gad commenced. They embraced half Gilead, as the oldest record specially states (Deut. iii. 12), or half the land of the children of Ammon (Josh. xiii. 25), probably the mountainous district which is intersected by the torrent Jabbok—if the Wady Zárka be the Jabbok—including, as its most northern town, the ancient sanctuary of Mahanaim. On the east the furthest landmark given is “Arœr, that faces Rabbah,” the present Amman (Josh. xiii. 25). West was the Jordan (27). Such was the territory allotted to the Gadites, but there is no doubt that they soon extended themselves beyond these limits. The official records of the reign of Jotham of Judah (1 Chr. v. 11, 16) show them to have been at that time established over the whole of Gilead, and in possession of Bashan as far as Salcah, and very far both to the north and the east of the border given them originally, while the Manassites were pushed still further northwards to Mount Hermon (1 Chr. v. 23). The character of the tribe is throughout strongly marked—fierce and warlike—“strong men of might, men of war for the battle, that could handle shield and buckler, their faces the faces of lions, and like roes upon the mountains for swift-ness.” The history of Jephthah develops elements of a different nature and a higher order than the mere fierceness necessary to repel the attacks of the plunderers of the desert. In the behaviour of Jephthah throughout that affecting history, there are traces of a spirit which we may almost call chivalresque. If to this we add the loyalty, the generosity and the delicacy of Barzillai (2 Sam. xix. 32-39) we obtain a very high idea of the tribe at whose head were such men as these. Nor must we, while enumerating the worthies of Gad, forget that in all probability Elijah the Tishbite, “who was of the inhabitants of Gilead,” was one of them. But while exhibiting these high personal qualities, Gad appears to have been wanting in the powers necessary to enable him to take any active or leading part in the confederacy of the nation. The territory of Gad was the battle-field on which the long and fierce struggles of Syria and Israel were fought out, and, as an agricultural and pastoral country, it must have suffered severely in consequence (2 K. xx. 33). Gad was carried into captivity by Tiglath-Pileser (1 Chr. v. 26), and in the time of Jeremiah the cities of the tribe seem to have been inhabited by the Ammonites.

Gad, “the seer,” or “the king’s seer,” i. e. David’s (1 Chr. xxix. 29; 2 Chr. xxix. 25; 2 Sam. xxiv. 11; 1 Chr. xxi. 9), was a “prophet” who appears to have joined David when in the hold (1 Sam. xxii. 5). He re-appears in connexion with the punishment inflicted for the numbering of the people (2 Sam. xxiv. 11-19; 1 Chr. xxi. 9-19). He wrote a book of the Acts of David (1 Chr. xxix. 29), and also assisted in the arrangements for the musical service of the “house of God” (2 Chr. xxix. 25).

Gad. Properly “the Gad,” with the article. In the A. V. of Is. lrv. 11 the clause “that prepare a table for that troop” has in the margin instead of the last word the proper name “Gad,” which evidently denotes some idol worshipped by the Jews in Babylon, though it is impossible positively to identify it. That Gad was the deity Fortune, under whatever outward form it was worshipped, is supported by the etymology, and by the common assent of commentators. Gesenius is probably right in his conjecture that Gad was the planet Jupiter, which was regarded by the astrologers of the East as the star of greater good fortune. Movers is in favour of the planet Venus. Illustrations of the ancient custom of placing a banqueting table in honour of idols will be found in the table spread for the sun among the Ethiopians (Her. iii. 17, 18), and in the feast made by the Babylonians for their god Bel, which is described in the Apocrypha. history of Bel and the Dragon (comp. also Her. i. 181, &c.). A trace of the worship of Gad remains in the proper name Baal Gad.

Gad’ites, the. The descendants of Gad and members of his tribe.

Gad’ara, a strong city situated near the river Hieromax, east of the Sea of Galilee, over against Scythopolis and Tiberias, and sixteen Roman miles distant from each of those places. Josephus calls it the capital of Perea. A large district was attached to it. Gadara itself is not mentioned in the Bible, but it is evidently identical with the “country of the Gadarenes” (Mark v. 1; Luke viii. 26, 37). Of the site of Gadara, thus so clearly defined, there cannot be a doubt. On a partially isolated hill at the north-western extremity of the mountains of Gilead, about sixteen miles from Tiberias, lie the extensive and remarkable ruins of Uin Keis. The whole space occupied by the ruins is about two miles in circumference. The first historical notice of Gadara is its capture, along with Pella and other cities, by Antiochus the Great, in the year B.C. 218. The territory of Gadara, with the adjoining one of Hippos, was subsequently added to the kingdom of Herod the Great. Gadara, however, derives its greatest interest from having been the scene of our Lord’s miracle in healing the demoniacs (Matt. viii. 28-34; Mark v. 1-21; Luke viii. 26-40). The whole circumstances of the narrative are strikingly illustrated by the features of the country. Another thing is worthy of notice. The most interesting remains of Gadara are its tombs, which dot the cliffs for a considerable distance round the city. Gadara was captured by Vespasian on the first outbreak of the war with the Jews; all its inhabitants massacred; and the town itself, with the surrounding villages, reduced to ashes.

Gad’di, son of Susi; the Manassite spy sent by Moses to explore Canaan (Num. xiii. 11).

Gad’diel, a Zebulonite, one of the twelve spies (Num. xiii. 10).

Gad’i, father of Menahem (2 K. xv. 14, 17).

Gaham, son of Nahor, Abraham’s brother, by his concubine Reumah (Gen. xxii. 24).

Gahar. The Bene-Gahar were among the families of Nethinim who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 47; Neh. vii. 49).

Gai’us. [JOHN, SECOND AND THIRD EPISTLES OF.]

Galaad (1 Macc. v. 9, 55; Jud. i. 8, xv. 5; and THE COUNTRY OF GALAAD, 1 Macc. v. 17, 20, 25, 27, 36, 45, xiii. 22), the Greek form of the word GILEAD.

Ga’lal. 1. A Levite, one of the sons of Asaph (1 Chr. ix. 15).—2. Another Levite of the family of Elkanah (1 Chr. ix. 16).—3. A third Levite, son of Jeduthun (Neh. xi. 17).

Gala’tia. Galatia is literally the “Gallia” of the East. The Galatians were in their origin a stream of that great Celtic torrent which poured into Greece in the third century before the Christian era. Some of these invaders moved on into Thrace, and appeared on the shores of the Hellespont and Bosphorus, when Nicomedes I., king of Bithynia, being then engaged in a civil war, invited them across to help him. At the end of the Republic, Galatia appears as a dependent kingdom; at the beginning of the Empire as a province (A.D. 2). The Roman province of Galatia may be roughly described as the central region of the peninsula of Asia Minor, with the provinces of ASIA on the west, CAPPADOCIA on the east, PAMPHYLIA and CILICIA on the south, and BITHYNIA and PONTUS on the north. It would be difficult to define the exact limits. In fact they were frequently changing. At one time there is no doubt that this province contained Pisidia and Lycaonia, and therefore those towns of Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, which are conspicuous in the narrative of St. Paul's travels. But the characteristic part of Galatia lay northward from those districts. These Eastern Gauls preserved much of their ancient character, and something of their ancient language. The prevailing speech, however, of the district was Greek. The inscriptions found at Ancyra are Greek, and St. Paul wrote his Epistle in Greek. It is difficult at first sight to determine in what sense the word Galatia is used by the writers of the N. T., or whether always in the same sense. In the Acts of the Apostles the journeys of St. Paul through the district are mentioned in very general terms. On all accounts it seems most probable that Galatia is used by St. Luke as an ethnographical term, and not for the Roman province of that name. We must not leave unnoticed the view advocated by Böttger, that the Galatia of the Epistle is entirely limited to the district between Derbe and Colossae, i. e. the extreme southern frontier of the Roman province.

Galatians, The Epistle to the, was written by the Apostle St. Paul not long after his journey through Galatia and Phrygia (Acts xviii. 23), and probably in the early portion of his two years and a half stay at Ephesus, which terminated with the Pentecost of A.D. 57 or 58. The Epistle appears to have been called forth by the machinations of Judaizing teachers, who, shortly before the date of its composition, had endeavoured to seduce the churches of this province into a recognition of circumcision (v. 2, 11, 12, vi. 12, sq.), and had openly sought to depreciate the apostolic claims of St. Paul (comp. i. 1, 11). The scope and contents of the Epistle are thus—(1) apologetic (i., ii.) and polemical (iii., iv.); and (2) hortatory and practical (v., vi.): the positions and demonstrations of the former portion being used with great power and persuasiveness in the exhortations of the latter. With regard to the genuineness and authenticity of this Epistle, no writer of any credit or respectability has expressed any doubts. The testimony of the early church is most decided and unanimous. Besides express references to the Epistle we have one or two direct citations found as early as the time of the Apostolic Fathers, and several apparent allusions. Two historical questions require a brief notice:—1. The number of visits made by St. Paul to the churches of Galatia previous to his writing the Epistle. These seem certainly to have been two. The Apostle founded the churches of Galatia in the visit recorded Acts xvi. 6, during his second missionary journey, about A.D. 51, and revisited them at the period and on the occasion mentioned Acts xviii. 23, when he went through the country of Galatia and Phrygia. On this occasion it would seem probable that he found the leaven of Judaism beginning to work in the churches of Galatia. 2. Closely allied with the preceding question is that of the date, and the place from which the Epistle was written. Conybeare and Howson, and more recently Lightfoot, urge the probability of its having been written at about the same time as the Epistle to the Romans. They would therefore assign Corinth as the place where the Epistle was written, and the three months that the Apostle stayed there (Acts xx. 2, 3), apparently the winter of A.D. 57 or 58, as the exact period. But it seems almost impossible to assign a later period than the commencement of the prolonged stay in Ephesus (A.D. 54).

Galbanum, one of the perfumes employed in the preparation of the sacred incense (Ex. xxx. 34). The galbanum of commerce is brought chiefly from India and the Levant. It is a resinous gum of a brownish yellow colour, and strong, disagreeable smell, usually met with in masses, but sometimes found in yellowish tear-like drops. But, though galbanum itself is well known, the plant which yields it has not been exactly determined. Sprengel is in favour of the Ferula ferulago, L., which grows in North Africa, Crete, and Asia Minor. It was for some time supposed to be the product of the Bubon galbanum of Linnaeus, a native of the Cape of Good Hope. The Opoidia Galbanifera has been adopted by the Dublin College in their Pharmacopoeia as that which yields the galbanum. But the question remains undecided.

Gal'eed, the name given by Jacob to the heap which he and Laban made on Mount Gilead in witness of the covenant then entered into between them (Gen. xxxi. 47, 48; comp. 23, 25).

Gal'gala, the ordinary equivalent in the LXX. for Gilgal. In the A. V. it is named only in 1 Macc. ix. 2, and may there denote either the upper Gilgal near Bethel, or the lower one near Jericho.

Gal'ilee. This name, which in the Roman age was applied to a large province, seems to have been originally confined to a little "circuit" of country round Kedesh-Naphtali, in which were situated the twenty towns given by Solomon to Hiram, king of Tyre, as payment for his work in conveying timber from Lebanon to Jerusalem (Josh. xx. 7; 1 K. ix. 11). They were then, or subsequently, occupied by strangers, and for this reason Isaiah gives to the district the name "Galilee of the Gentiles" (Is. ix. 1). It is probable that the strangers increased in number, and became during the captivity the great body of the inhabitants; extending themselves also over the surrounding country, they gave to their new territories the old name, until at length Galilee became one of the largest provinces of Palestine. In the Maccabean period Galilee contained only a few Jews living in the midst of a large heathen population (1 Macc. v. 20-23). In the time of our Lord all Palestine was divided into three provinces, Judaea, Samaria, and Galilee (Acts ix. 31; Luke xvii. 11; Joseph. B. J. iii. 3). The latter included the whole northern section of the country, including the ancient territories of Issachar, Zebulun, Asher, and Naphtali. On the west it was bounded by the territory of Ptolemais, which probably included the whole plain of Akko to the foot of Carmel. The southern border ran along the base of Carmel and of the hills of Samaria to Mount Gilboa, and then descended the valley of Jezreel by Scythopolis to the Jordan. The river Jordan, the Sea of Galilee, and the upper Jordan to the fountain at Dan, formed the eastern border; and the northern ran from Dan westward across the mountain ridge till it touched the territory of the Phoenicians. Galilee was divided into two sections, "Lower" and "Upper." Lower Galilee included the great plain of Esdraelon with its offshoots, which run down to the Jordan and the Lake of Tiberias; and the whole of the hill-country adjoining it on the north to the foot of the mountain-range. It extended as far as the village of Ginea, the modern Jenin, on the extreme southern side of the plain, and included the whole region from the plain of Akka, on the west, to the shores of the lake on the east. It was thus one of the richest and most beautiful sections of Palestine. The chief towns of Lower Galilee were Tiberias, Tarichaea, at the southern end of the Sea of Galilee, and Sepphoris. The towns most celebrated in N. T. history are Nazareth, Cana, and Tiberias (Luke i. 26; John ii. 1, vi. 1). Upper Galilee embraced the whole mountain-range lying between the upper Jordan and Phoenicia. Its southern border ran along the foot of the Safed range from the north-west angle of the Sea of Galilee to the plain of Akka. To this region the name "Galilee of the Gentiles" is given in the O. and N. T. (Is. ix. 1; Matt. iv. 15). The town of Capernaum, on the north shore of the lake, was in upper Galilee. Galilee was the scene of the greater part of our Lord's private life and public acts. His early years were spent at Nazareth; and when He entered on His great work He made Capernaum His home (Matt. iv. 13, ix. 1). It is a remarkable fact that the first three Gospels are chiefly taken up with our Lord's ministrations in this province, while the Gospel of John dwells more upon those in Judaea. The nature of our Lord's parables and illustrations was greatly influenced by the peculiar features and products of the country. The Apostles were all either Galileans by birth or residence (Acts i. 11). After the destruction of Jerusalem, Galilee became the chief seat of Jewish schools of learning, and the residence of their most celebrated Rabbins.

Galilee, Sea of. [GENNESARETH.]

Gall, the representative in the A. V. of the Hebrew words mêrêrah, or mêrôrâh, and rôsh. 1. Mêrêrah or mêrôrâh denotes etymologically "that which is bitter;" see Job xiii. 26, "thou writest bitter things against me." Hence the term is applied to the "bile" or "gall" from its intense bitterness (Job xvi. 13, xx. 25); it is also used of the "poison" of serpents (Job xx. 14), which the ancients erroneously believed was their gall. 2. Rôsh, generally translated "gall" by the A. V., is in Hos. x. 4 rendered "hemlock;" in Deut. xxxii. 33, and Job xx. 16, rôsh denotes the "poison" or "venom" of serpents. From Deut. xxix. 18, and Lam. iii. 19, compared with Hos. x. 4, it is evident that the Heb. term denotes some bitter, and perhaps poisonous plant. Other writers have supposed, and with some reason (from Deut. xxxii. 32), that some berry-bearing plant must be intended. Gesenius understands "poppies." The capsules of the Papaveraceae may well give the name of rôsh ("head") to the plant in question, just as we speak of poppy heads. The various species of this family spring up quickly in corn-fields, and the juice is extremely bitter. A steeped solution of poppy heads may be "the water of gall" of Jer. viii. 14. The passages in the Gospels which relate the circumstance of the Roman soldiers offering our Lord, just before his crucifixion, "vinegar mingled with gall," according to St. Matthew (xxvii. 34), and "wine mingled with myrrh," according to St. Mark's account (xv. 23), require some consideration. "Matthew, in his usual way," as Hengstenberg remarks, "designates the drink theologically: always keeping his eye on the prophecies of the O. T., he speaks of gall and vinegar for the purpose of rendering the fulfilment of the Psalms more manifest. Mark again (xv. 23), according to his way, looks rather at the outward quality of the drink." "Gall" is not to be understood in any other sense than as expressing the bitter nature of the draught. Notwithstanding the almost concurrent opinion of ancient and modern commentators that the "wine mingled with myrrh" was offered to our Lord as an anodyne, we cannot readily come to the same conclusion. Had the soldiers intended a mitigation of suffering, they would doubtless have offered a draught drugged with some substance having narcotic properties. The drink in question was probably a mere ordinary beverage of the Romans.

Gallery, an architectural term, describing the porticos or verandahs, which are not uncommon in Eastern houses. It is doubtful, however, whether the Hebrew words, so translated, have any reference to such an object. (1.) In Cant. i. 17 the word râchit means "panelling," or "fretted work." (2.) In Cant. vii. 6, râhit is applied to the hair, the regularly arranged, flowing locks being compared by the poet to the channels of running water seen in the pasture-grounds of Palestine. (3.) In Ez. xli. 15, xlii. 3, the word attik seems to mean a pillar used for the support of a floor.

Galley. [SHIP.]

Gallim (= "heaps," or possibly "springs"), a place which is twice mentioned in the Bible:— (1.) As the native place of the man to whom Michal, David's wife, was given—"Phalti the son of Laish, who was from Gallim" (1 Sam. xxv. 44). There is no clue to the situation of the place. (2.) The name occurs again in the catalogue of places terrified at the approach of Sennacherib (Is. x. 30). It was perhaps a short distance N. of Jerusalem. The name of Gallim has not been met with in modern times.

Gallio. Junius Annaeus Gallio, the Roman pro-consul of Achaia when St. Paul was at Corinth, A.D. 53, under the Emperor Claudius. He was brother to Lucius Annaeus Seneca, the philosopher. He is said to have been put to death by Nero, "as well as his brother Seneca, but not at the same time" (Winer); but there is apparently no authority for this. Jerome in the Chronicle of Eusebius says that he committed suicide in the year 65 A.D.

Gallows. [PUNISHMENT.]

Gamael, 1 Esd. viii. 29. [DANIEL, 3.]

Gama'iel, son of Pedahzur; prince or captain of the tribe of Manasseh at the census at Sinai (Num. i. 10, ii. 20, vii. 54, 59), and at starting on the march through the wilderness (x. 23).

Gama'iel, a Pharisee and celebrated doctor of the law, who gave prudent worldly advice in the Sanhedrim respecting the treatment of the followers of Jesus of Nazareth (Acts v. 34 ff.). We learn from Acts xxii. 3 that he was the preceptor of St. Paul. He is generally identified with the very celebrated Jewish doctor Gamaliel. This Gamaliel was son of Rabbi Simeon, and grandson of the celebrated Hillel; he was president of the Sanhedrim under Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius, and is reported to have died eighteen years before the destruction of Jerusalem.*

With regard to juvenile games, the notices are very few. It must not, however, be inferred from this that the Hebrew children were without the amusements adapted to their age. The only recorded sports, however, are keeping tame birds (Job xii. 5) and imitating the proceedings of marriages or funerals (Matt. xi. 16). With regard to manly games, they were not much followed up by the Hebrews; the natural earnestness of their character and the influence of the climate alike indisposed them to active exertion. The chief amusement of the men appears to have consisted in conversation and joking (Jer. xv. 17; Prov. xxvi. 19). A military exercise seems to be noticed in 2 Sam. ii. 14. In Jerome's day the usual sport consisted in lifting weights as a trial of strength, as also practised in Egypt. Dice are mentioned by the Talmudists, probably introduced from Egypt. Public games were altogether foreign to the spirit of Hebrew institutions: the great religious festivals supplied the pleasurable excitement and the feelings of national union which rendered the games of Greece so popular, and at the same time inspired the persuasion that such gatherings should be exclusively connected with religious duties. Accordingly the erection of a gymnasium by Jason was looked upon as a heathenish proceeding (1 Macc. i. 14; 2 Macc. iv. 12-14). The entire absence of verbal or historical reference to this subject in the Gospels shows how little it entered into the life of the Jews. Among the Greeks the rage for theatrical exhibitions was such that every city of any size possessed its theatre and stadium. At Ephesus an annual contest was held in honour of Diana. It is probable that St. Paul was present when these games were proceeding. A direct reference to the exhibitions that took place on such occasions is made in 1 Cor. xv. 32. St. Paul's Epistles abound with allusions to the Greek contests, borrowed probably from the Isthmian games, at which he may well have been present during his first visit to Corinth. These contests (2 Tim. iv. 7; 1 Tim. vi. 12) were divided into two classes, the pancratium, consisting of boxing and wrestling, and the pentathlon, consisting of leaping, running, quoiting, hurling the spear, and wrestling. The competitors (1 Cor. ix. 25; 2 Tim. ii. 5) required a long and severe course of previous training (1 Tim. iv. 8), during which a particular diet was enforced (1 Cor. ix. 25, 27). In the Olympic contests these preparatory exercises extended over a period of ten months, during the last of which they were conducted under the supervision of appointed officers. The contests took place in the presence of a vast multitude of spectators (Heb. xii. 1), the competitors being the spectacle (1 Cor.

iv. 9, Heb. x. 33). The games were opened by the proclamation of a herald (1 Cor. ix. 27), whose office it was to give out the name and country of each candidate, and especially to announce the name of the victor before the assembled multitude. The judge was selected for his spotless integrity (2 Tim. iv. 8): his office was to decide any disputes (Col. iii. 15) and to give the prize (1 Cor. ix. 24; Phil. iii. 14), consisting of a crown (2 Tim. ii. 5, iv. 8) of leaves of wild olive at the Olympic games, and of pine, or at one period, ivy, at the Isthmian games. St. Paul alludes to two only out of the five contests, boxing and running, most frequently to the latter. In boxing (cf. 1 Cor. ix. 26) the hands and arms were bound with the cestus, a band of leather studded with nails. The foot-race (2 Tim. iv. 7) was run in the stadium (1 Cor. ix. 24), an oblong area, open at one end and rounded in a semicircular form at the other, along the sides of which were the raised tiers of seats on which the spectators sat. The judge was stationed by the goal (Phil. iii. 14), which was clearly visible from one end of the stadium to the other.

Gam'madims. This word occurs only in Ez. xxvii. 11. A variety of explanations of the term have been offered. (1.) One class renders it "pigmies." (2.) A second treats it as a geographical or local term. (3.) A third gives a more general sense to the word, "brave warriors." Hitziq suggests "deserters." After all, the rendering in the LXX., "guards," furnishes the simplest explanation.

Ga'mul, a priest; the leader of the 22nd course in the service of the sanctuary (1 Chr. xxiv. 17).

Gar. "Sons of Gar" are named among the "sons of the servants of Solomon" in 1 Esd. v. 34.

Garden. Gardens in the East, as the Hebrew word indicates, are inclosures, on the outskirts of towns, planted with various trees and shrubs. From the allusions in the Bible we learn that they were surrounded by hedges of thorn (Is. v. 5), or walls of stone (Prov. xxiv. 31). For further protection lodges (Is. i. 8; Lam. ii. 6) or watchtowers (Mark xii. 1) were built in them, in which sat the keeper (Job xxvii. 18) to drive away the wild beasts and robbers, as is the case to this day. The gardens of the Hebrews were planted with flowers and aromatic shrubs (Cant. vi. 2, iv. 16), besides olives, fig-trees, nuts, or walnuts (Cant. vi. 11), pomegranates, and others for domestic use (Ex. xxiii. 11; Jer. xxix. 5; Am. ix. 14). Gardens of herbs, or kitchen-gardens, are mentioned in Deut. xi. 10, and 1 K. xxi. 2. Cucumbers were grown in them (Is. i. 8; Bar.

vi. 70), and probably also melons, leeks, onions, and garlic, which are spoken of (Num. xi. 5) as the productions of a neighbouring country. The rose-garden in Jerusalem, said to have been situated westward of the temple mount, is remarkable as having been one of the few gardens which, from the time of the prophets, existed within the city walls. But of all the gardens of Palestine none is possessed of associations more sacred and imperishable than the garden of Gethsemane, beside the oil-presses on the slopes of Olivet. In addition to the ordinary productions of the country, we are tempted to infer from Is. xvii. 10 that in some gardens care was bestowed on the rearing of exotics. In a climate like that of Palestine the neighbourhood of water was an important consideration in selecting the site of a garden. To the old Hebrew poets "a well-watered garden," or "a tree planted by the waters," was an emblem of luxuriant fertility and material prosperity (Is. lviii. 11; Jer. xvii. 8, xxi. 12). From a neighbouring stream or cistern were supplied the channels or conduits, by which the gardens were intersected, and the water was thus conveyed to all parts (Ps. i. 3; Eccl. ii. 6; Eccles. xxiv. 30). It is matter of doubt what is the exact meaning of the expression "to water with the foot" in Deut. xi. 10. The orange, lemon, and mulberry groves which lie around and behind Jaffa supply, perhaps, the most striking peculiarities of oriental gardens—gardens which Maundrell describes as being "a confused miscellany of trees jumbled together, without either posts, walks, arbours, or anything of art or design, so that they seem like thickets rather than gardens." The kings and nobles had their country-houses surrounded by gardens (1 K. xxi. 1; 2 K. ix. 27), and these were used on festal occasions (Cant. v. 1). The garden of Ahasuerus was in a court of the palace (Esth. i. 5), adjoining the banqueting-hall (Esth. vii. 7). In Babylon the gardens and orchards were inclosed by the city walls. In large gardens the orchard was probably, as in Egypt, the inclosure set apart for the cultivation of date and sycamore trees, and fruit-trees of various kinds (Cant. iv. 13; Eccl. ii. 5). The ancient Hebrews made use of gardens as places of burial (John xix. 41). Manasseh and his son Amon were buried in the garden of their palace, the garden of Uzza (2 K. xxi. 18, 26). The retirement of gardens rendered them favourite places for devotion (Matt. xxvi. 36; John xviii. 1; cf. Gen. xxiv. 63). In the degenerate times of the monarchy they were selected as the scenes of idolatrous worship (Is. i. 29, lxx. 3, lxxi. 17) and images of the idols were probably erected in them. Gardeners are alluded to in Job xxvii. 18 and John xx. 15. But how far the art of gardening was carried among the Hebrews we have few means of ascertaining. That they were acquainted with the process of grafting is evident from Rom. xi. 17, 24, as well as from the minute prohibitions of the Mishna. The traditional gardens and pools of Solomon, supposed to be alluded to in Eccl. ii. 5, 6, are shown in the Wady Urds (i. e. Hortus), about an hour and quarter to the south of Bethlehem (cf. Jos. Ant. viii. 7, §3). The "king's garden," mentioned in 2 K. xxv. 4; Neh. iii. 15; Jer. xxxix. 4, lii. 7, was near the pool of Siloam, at the mouth of the Tyropoeon, north of Bir Eyub, and was formed by the meeting of the valleys of Jehoshaphat and Ben Hinnom.

Ga'reb, one of the heroes of David's army (2 Sam. xxi. 38).

Ga'reb, the Hill, in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, named only in Jer. xxxi. 39.

Gar'isim, 2 Macc. v. 23; vi. 2. [GERIZIM.]

Gariak (Num. xi. 5). It is the Allium Sativum of Linnaeus, which abounds in Egypt.

Garment. [DRESS.]

Gar'mite, the. Keilah the Garmite, i. e. the descendant of Gerem, is mentioned in the obscure genealogical lists of the families of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 19).

Garrison. The Hebrew words so rendered in the A. V. are derivatives from the root natsab to "place, erect," which may be applied to a variety of objects. (1.) Mattasab and mattasabah undoubtedly mean a "garrison," or fortified post (1 Sam. xiii. 23, xiv. 1, 4, 12, 15; 2 Sam. xxiii. 14). (2.) Natsab is also used for a "garrison" (in 1 Chr. xi. 16), but elsewhere for a "column" erected in an enemy's country as a token of conquest (1 Sam. xiii. 3). (3.) The same word elsewhere means "officers" placed over a vanquished people (2 Sam. viii. 6, 14; 1 Chr. xviii. 13; 2 Chr. xvii. 2). (4.) Mattasabah in Ez. xvi. 11 means a "pillar."

Gash'mu. A variation of the name GESHEM (Neh. vi. 6).

Ga'tam, the fourth son of Eliphaz the son of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 11; 1 Chr. i. 36), and one of the dukes" of Eliphaz (Gen. xxxvi. 16).

Gate. The gates and gateways of eastern cities anciently held, and still hold, an important part, not only in the defence but in the public economy of the place. They are thus sometimes taken as representing the city itself (Gen. xxii. 17, xxiv. 60; Deut. xii. 12; Judg. v. 8; Ruth iv. 10; Ps. lxxxvii. 2, cxxii. 2). Among the special purposes for which they were used may be mentioned—1. As places of public resort (Gen. xix. 1, xxiii. 10, xxxiv. 20, 24; 1 Sam. iv. 18, &c.). 2. Places for public deliberation, administration of justice, or of audience for kings and rulers, or ambassadors (Deut. xvi. 18, xxi. 19, xxv. 7; Josh. xx. 4; Judg. ix. 35, &c.). 3. Public markets (2 K. vii. 1). In heathen towns the open spaces near the gates appear to have been sometimes used as places for sacrifice (Acts xiv. 13; comp. 2 K. xxiii. 8). Regarded therefore as positions of great importance the gates of cities were carefully guarded and closed at nightfall (Deut. iii. 5; Josh. ii. 5, 7; Judg. ix. 40, 44). They contained chambers over the gateway (2 Sam. xviii. 24). The gateways of Assyrian cities were arched or square-headed entrances in the wall, sometimes flanked by towers. The doors themselves of the larger gates mentioned in Scripture were two-leaved, plated with metal, closed with locks and fastened with metal bars (Deut. iii. 5; Ps. cvii. 16; Is. xlv. 1, 2). Gates not defended by iron were of course liable to be set on fire by an enemy (Judg. ix. 52). The gateways of royal palaces and even of private houses were often richly ornamented. Sentences from the Law were inscribed on and above the gates (Deut. vi. 9; Is. liv. 12; Rev. xxi. 21). The gates of Solomon's Temple were very massive and costly, being overlaid with gold and carvings (1 K. vi. 34, 35; 2 K. xviii. 16). Those of the Holy Place were of olive-wood, two-leaved, and overlaid with gold; those of the temple of fir (1 K. vi. 31, 32, 34; Ez. xli. 23, 24). The figurative gates of pearl and precious stones (Is. liv. 12; Rev. xxi. 21) may be regarded as having their types in the massive stone doors which are found in some of the ancient houses in Syria. These are of single slabs several inches thick, sometimes 10 feet high, and turn on stone pivots above. Egyptian doorways were often richly ornamented. The parts of the doorway were the threshold (Judg. xix. 27); the side-posts, the lintel (Ex. xii. 7). In the Temple, Levites, and in houses of the wealthier classes, and in palaces, persons were especially appointed to keep the door (Jer. xxxv. 4: 2 K. xii. 9, xv. 18, &c.).

Ancient Egyptian door. (Wilkinson.)

Gath, one of the five royal cities of the Philistines (Josh. xiii. 3; 1 Sam. vi. 17); and the native place of the giant Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 4, 23). The site of Gath has for many centuries remained unknown. After a careful survey of the country, and a minute examination of the several passages of Scripture in which the name is mentioned, Mr. Porter came to the conclusion that it stood upon the conspicuous hill now called Tell-es-Sâfieh. This hill stands upon the side of the plain of Philistia, at the foot of the mountains of Judah; 10 miles E. of Ashdod, and about the same distance S. by E. of Ekron. It is irregular in form, and about 200 ft. high. Gath occupied a strong position (2 Chr. xi. 8) on the border of Judah and Philistia (1 Sam. xxi. 10; 1 Chr. xviii. 1); and from its strength and resources, forming the key of both countries, it was the scene of frequent struggles, and was often captured and recaptured (2 Chr. xi. 8, xxvi. 6; 2 K. xii. 17; Am. vi. 2). It was near Shooch and Adullam (2 Chr. xi. 8), and appears to have stood on the way leading from the former to Ekron; for when the Philistines fled on the death of Goliath, they went "by the way of Shaaraim, even unto Gath and unto Ekron" (1 Sam. xvii. 1, 52). All these notices combine in pointing to Tell-es-Sâfieh as the site of Gath. The ravages of war to which Gath was exposed appear to have destroyed it at a comparatively early period, as it is not mentioned among the other royal cities by the later prophets (Zeph. ii. 4; Zech. ix. 5, 6). It is familiar to the Bible student as the scene of one of the most romantic incidents in the life of king David (1 Sam. xxi. 10-15).

Gath-he'pher, or Gitt'ah-he'pher, a town on the border of the territory of Zebulun, not far from Japhia, now Yâfa, (Josh. xix. 12, 13), celebrated as the native place of the prophet Jonah (2 K. xiv. 25). There can scarcely be a doubt that el-Mashhad, a village 2 miles E. of Saffârieh, is the ancient Gath-hepher.

Gath-rimmon. 1. A city given out of the tribe of Dan to the Levites (Josh. xxi. 24; 1 Chr. vi. 69), situated on the plain of Philistia, apparently not far from Joppa (Josh. xix. 45). Its site is unknown.—2. A town of the half tribe of Manasseh west of the Jordan, assigned to the Levites (Josh. xxi. 25). The reading Gath-rimmon is probably an error of the transcribers.

Gaza (properly Azzah), one of the five chief cities of the Philistines. It is remarkable for its continuous existence and importance from the very earliest times. The secret of this unbroken history is to be found in the situation of Gaza. It is the last town in the S.W. of Palestine, on the frontier towards Egypt. The same peculiarity of situation has made Gaza important in a military sense. Its name means "the strong;" and this was well elucidated in its siege by Alexander the Great, which lasted five months. This city was one of the most important military positions in the wars of the Maccabees (1 Macc. xi. 61, 62, xiii. 43). Some of the most important campaigns of the crusaders took place in the neighbourhood. The Biblical history of Gaza may be traced through the following stages. In Gen. x. 19 it appears, even before the call of Abraham, as a "border" city of the Canaanites. In the conquest of Joshua the territory of Gaza is mentioned as one which he was not able to subdue (Josh. x. 41, xi. 22, xiii. 3). It was assigned to the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 47), and that tribe did obtain possession of it (Judg. i. 18); but they did not hold it long; for soon afterwards we find it in the hands of the Philistines (Judg. iii. 3, xiii. 1, xvi. 1, 21); indeed it seems to have been their capital; and apparently continued through the times of Samuel, Saul, and David to be a Philistine city (1 Sam. vi. 17, xiv. 52, xxxi. 1; 2 Sam. xxi. 15). Solomon became master of "Azzah" (1 K. iv. 24). But in after times the same trouble with the Philistines recurred (2 Chr. xxi. 16, xxvi. 6, xxviii. 18). The passage where Gaza is mentioned in the N. T. (Acts viii. 26) is full of interest. It is the account of the baptism of the Ethiopian eunuch on his return from Jerusalem to Egypt. The words "which is desert" have given rise to much discussion. The probability is, that they refer to the road, and are used by the angel to inform PHILIP, who was then in Samaria, on what route he would find the eunuch. Besides the ordinary road from Jerusalem by Ramleh to Gaza, there was another, more favourable for carriages (Acts viii. 28), further to the south through Hebron, and thence through a district comparatively without towns and much exposed to the incursions of people from the desert. The modern Ghuzzeh is situated partly on an oblong hill of moderate height, and partly on the lower ground. The climate of the place is almost tropical, but it has deep wells of excellent water. There are a few palm-trees in the town, and its fruit-orchards are very productive. But the chief feature of the neighbourhood is the wide-spread olive-grove to the N. and N.E.

Gazara, a place frequently mentioned in the wars of the Maccabees, and of great importance is the operations of both parties (1 Macc. ix. 52, xiii. 53, xiv. 7, 33, 34, 36, xv. 28, xvi. 1; 2 Macc. x. 32-36). There is every reason to believe that Gazara was the same place as the more ancient GEZER or GAZER.

Gazathites, the (Josh. xiii. 3), the inhabitants of GAZA.

Gazer, 2 Sam. v. 25; 1 Chr. xiv. 16. The same place as GEZER.

Gazera. 1. 1 Macc. iv. 15; vii. 45. The place elsewhere given as GAZARA.—2. One of the "servants of the temple," whose sons returned with Zerobabel (1 Esd. v. 31). [GAZZAM.]

Gazera, a name which occurs twice in 1 Chr. i. 46; (1) as son of Caleb by Ephah his concubine and (2) as son of Haran, the son of the same woman the second is possibly only a repetition of the first.

Gazites, the, inhabitants of Gaza (Judg. xvi. 2).

Gazzam, The Bene-Gazzam were among the families of the Nethinim who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 48; Neh. vii. 51).

Geba. 1. A city of Benjamin, with "suburbs, allotted to the priests (Josh. xxi. 17; 1 Chr. vi. 60). It is named amongst the first group of the Benjaminite towns, apparently those lying near to and along the north boundary (Josh. xviii. 24). Here the name is given as GABA. During the wars of the earlier part of the reign of Saul, Geba was held as a garrison by the Philistines (1 Sam. xiii. 3), but they were ejected by Jonathan. Later in the same campaign we find it referred to to define the position of the two rocks which stood in the ravine below the garrison of Michmash, in terms which fix Geba on the south and Michmash on the north of the ravine (1 Sam. xiv. 5: the A. V. has here Gibeah). Exactly in accordance with this is the position of the modern village of Jeba, which stands picturesquely on the top of its steep terraced hill on the very edge of the great Wady Suweinit, looking northwards to the opposite village, which also retains its old name of Mikhmas.—2. The Geba named in Jud. iii. 10, must be the place of the same name, Jeba, on the road between Samaria and Jenin, about three miles from the former.

Gebal, a proper name, occurring in Ps. lxxxiii. 7, in connexion with Edom and Moab, Ammon and Amalek, the Philistines and the inhabitants of Tyre. The contexts both of the psalm and of the historical records will justify our assuming the Gebal of the Psalms to be one and the same city with the Gebal of Ezekiel (xxvii. 9), a maritime town of Phoenicia, and not another, as some have supposed, in the district round about Petra, which is by Josephus, Eusebius, and St. Jerome called Gebalene. From the fact that its inhabitants are written "Gibilians" in the Vulg., and "Biblians" in the LXX., we may infer their identity with the Gblites, spoken of in connexion with Lebanon by Joshua (xiii. 5), and that of their city with the "Biblus" (or Byblus) of profane literature. It is called Jebal by the Arabs, thus reviving the old Biblical name.

Geber. 1. The son of Geber resided in the fortress of Ramoth-Gilead, and had charge of Havoth-Jair, and the district of Argob (1 K. iv. 13).—2. Geber the son of Uri had a district south of the former—the "land of Gilead" (1 K. iv. 19).

Ge'vim, a village north of Jerusalem (Is. x. 31), apparently between Anathoth (the modern Anata) and the ridge on which Nob was situated. El-Jawiyeh occupies about the right spot.

Gedaliah. 1. GEDALIAH, the son of Ahikam (Jeremiah's protector, Jer. xvi. 24), and grandson of Shaphan the secretary of king Josiah. After the destruction of the Temple, B.C. 588, Nebuchadnezzar departed from Judaea, leaving Gedaliah with a Chaldean guard (Jer. xl. 5) at Mizpah, to govern the vine-dressers and husbandmen (Jer. li. 16) who were exempted from captivity. Jeremiah joined Gedaliah; and Mizpah became the resort of Jews from various quarters (Jer. xl. 6, 11). He was murdered by Ishmael two months after his appointment.—2. A Levite, one of the six sons of Jeduthun who played the harp in the service of Jehovah (1 Chr. xxv. 3, 9).—3. A priest in the time of Ezra (Ezr. x. 18).—4. Son of Pashur (Jer. xxxviii. 1), one of those who caused Jeremiah to be imprisoned.—5. Grandfather of Zephaniah the prophet (Zeph. i. 1).

Ged'zur, 1 Esd. v. 30. [GAHAR.]

Ged'eon. 1. One of the ancestors of Judith (Jud. viii. 1).—2. The Greek form of the Hebrew name GIDEON (Heb. xi. 32).

Ged'er. The king of Geder was one of the 31 kings who were overcome by Joshua on the west of the Jordan (Josh. xii. 13). It is possible that it may be the same place as the Geder named in 1 Chr. iv. 39.

Ged'erah, a town of Judah in the lowland country (Josh. xv. 36), apparently in its eastern part. No town bearing this name has however been yet discovered in this hitherto little explored district.

Ged'erathite, the, the native of a place called 'ederah, apparently in Benjamin (1 Chr. xii. 4).

Ged'erite, the, the native of some place named Geder or Gederah (1 Chr. xxvii. 28).

Ged'eroth, a town in the low country of Judah (Josh. xv. 41; 2 Chr. xxviii. 18).

Gederotha'im, a town in the low country of Judah (Josh. xv. 36), named next in order to Gederah.

Ged'or. 1. A town in the mountainous part of Judah (Josh. xv. 58), a few miles north of Hebron. Robinson discovered a Jed'ur half way between Bethlehem and Hebron, about two miles west of the road.—2. The town, apparently of Benjamin, to which "Jehoram of Gedor" belonged (1 Chr. xii. 7).—3. An ancestor of Saul (1 Chr. vii. 31; x. 37).—4. The name occurs twice in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 4, 18).—5. In the records of the tribe of Simeon, in 1 Chr. iv. 39, certain chiefs of the tribe are said to have gone, in the reign of Hezekiah, "to the entrance of Gedor, unto the east side of the valley." If what is told in ver. 42 was a subsequent incident in the same expedition, then we should look for Gedor between the south of Judah and Mount Seir, i. e. Petra. No place of the name has yet been met with in that direction. The LXX. read Gerar for Gedor.

Geh'sai, the servant or boy of Elisha. He was sent as the prophet's messenger on two occasions to the good Shunammite (2 K. iv.); obtained fraudulently money and garments from Naaman, was miraculously smitten with incurable leprosy, and was dismissed from the prophet's service (2 K. v.). Later in the history he is mentioned as being engaged in relating to King Joram all the great things which Elisha had done (2 K. viii.).

Gehen'na, the "valley of Hinnom," or "of the son," or "children of H." (A. V.), a deep narrow den to the S. of Jerusalem, where, after the introduction of the worship of the fire-gods by Ahaz, the idolatrous Jews offered their children to Molech

2 Chr. xxviii. 3, xxxiii. 6; Jer. vii. 31, xix. 2-6). It became in later times the image of the place of everlasting punishment.

Gel'loth, a place named among the marks of the south boundary line of the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 17). The name Geliloth never occurs again in this locality, and it therefore seems probable that Gilgal is the right reading.

Gemal'li, the father of Ammiel, the Danite spy (Num. xiii. 12).

Gemari'ah. 1. Son of Shaphan the scribe, and father of Michaiah. He was one of the nobles of Judah, and had a chamber in the house of the Lord, from which Baruch read Jeremiah's alarming prophecy in the ears of all the people, B.C. 606 (Jer. xxxvi.).—2. Son of Hilkiah, was made the bearer of Jeremiah's letter to the captive Jews (Jer. xxix.).

Genealogy. In Hebrew the term for a genealogy or pedigree is "the book of the generations;" and because the oldest histories were usually drawn up on a genealogical basis, the expression often extended to the whole history. Nor is this genealogical form of history peculiar to the Hebrews, or the Semitic races. The earliest Greek histories were also genealogies. The promise of the land of Canaan to the seed of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob successively, and the separation of the Israelites from the Gentile world; the expectation of Messiah as to spring from the tribe of Judah; the exclusively hereditary priesthood of Aaron with its dignity and emoluments; the long succession of kings in the line of David; and the whole division and occupation of the land upon genealogical principles by the tribes, families, and houses of fathers, gave a deeper importance to the science of genealogy among the Jews than perhaps any other nation. With Jacob, the founder of the nation, the system of reckoning by genealogies was much further developed. In Gen. xxv. 22-26, we have a formal account of the sons of Jacob, the patriarchs of the nation, repeated in Ex. i. 1-5. In Gen. xlii. we have an exact genealogical census of the house of Israel at the time of Jacob's going down to Egypt. When the Israelites were in the wilderness of Sinai, their number was taken by Divine command "after their families, by the house of their fathers." According to these genealogical divisions they pitched their tents, and marched, and offered their gifts and offerings, chose the spies, and the whole land of Canaan was parcelled out amongst them. The tribe of Levi was probably the only one which had no admixture of foreign blood. In many of the Scripture genealogies it is quite clear that birth was not the ground of their incorporation into their respective tribes. However, birth was, and continued to be throughout their whole national course, the foundation of all the Jewish organization, and the reigns of the more active and able kings and rulers were marked by attention to genealogical operations. When David established the temple services on the footing which continued till the time of Christ, he divided the priests and Levites into courses and companies, each under the family chief. When Hezekiah reopened the temple, and restored the temple services which had fallen into disuse, he reckoned the whole nation by genealogies. When Zerubbabel brought back the captivity from Babylon, one of his first cares seems to have been to take a census of those that returned, and to settle them according to their genealogies. Passing on to the time of the birth of Christ, we have a striking incidental proof of the continuance of the Jewish genealogical economy in the fact that when Augustus ordered the census of the empire to be taken, the Jews in the province of Syria immediately went each one to his own city. Another proof is the existence of our Lord's genealogy in two forms as given by St. Matthew and St. Luke. The mention of Zacharias, as "of the course of Abia," of Elizabeth, as "of the daughters of Aaron," and of Anna the daughter of Phanuel, as "of the tribe of Aser," are further indications of the same thing. And this conclusion is expressly confirmed by the testimony of Josephus. From all this it is abundantly manifest that the Jewish genealogical records continued to be kept till near the destruction of Jerusalem. But there can be little doubt that the registers of the Jewish tribes and families perished at the destruction of Jerusalem, and not before. It remains to be said that just notions of the nature of the Jewish genealogical records are of great importance with a view to the right interpretation of Scripture. Let it only be remembered that these records have respect to political and territorial divisions, as much as to strictly genealogical descent, and it will at once be seen how erroneous a conclusion it may be, that all who are called "sons" of such or such a patriarch, or chief father, must necessarily be his very children. If any one family or house became extinct, some other would succeed to its place, called after its own chief father. Hence of course a census of any tribe drawn up at a later period, would exhibit different divisions from one drawn up at an earlier. The same principle must be borne in mind in interpreting any particular genealogy. Again, when a pedigree was abbreviated, it would naturally specify such generations as would indicate from what chief houses the person descended. But then as regards the chronological use of the Scripture genealogies, it follows from the above view that great caution is necessary in using them as measures of time, though they are invaluable for this purpose whenever we can be sure that they are complete. Another feature in the Scripture genealogies which it is worth while to notice is the recurrence of the same name, or modifications of the same name, such as Tobias, Tobit, Nathan, Mattatha, and even of names of the same signification, in the same family. The Jewish genealogies have two forms, one giving the generations in a descending, the other in an ascending scale. Examples of the descending form may be seen in Ruth iv. 18-22, or 1 Chr. iii. Of the ascending 1 Chr. vi. 33-43 (A. V.); Ezr. vii. 1-5. Females are named in genealogies when there is anything remarkable about them, or when any right or property is transmitted through them. See Gen. xi. 29, xlii. 23, xxv. 1-4, xxxv. 22-26; Ex. vi. 23; Num. xxvi. 33; 1 Chr. ii. 4, 19, 50, 35, &c.

Genealogy of Jesus Christ. The New Testament gives us the genealogy of but one person, that of our Saviour. The following propositions will explain the true construction of these genealogies:—1. They are both the genealogies of Joseph, i. e. of Jesus Christ, as the reputed and legal son of Joseph and Mary. 2. The genealogy of St. Matthew is, as Grotius most truly and unhesitatingly asserted, Joseph's genealogy as legal successor to the throne of David. St. Luke's is Joseph's private genealogy, exhibiting his real birth, as David's son, and thus showing why he was heir to Solomon's crown. The simple principle that one evangelist exhibits that genealogy which contained the successive heirs to David's and Solomon's throne, while the other exhibits the paternal stem of him who was the heir, explains all the anomalies of the two pedigrees, their agreements as well as their discrepancies, and the circumstance of their being two at all. 3. Mary, the mother of Jesus, was in all probability the daughter of Jacob, and first cousin to Joseph her husband. But besides these main difficulties, as they have been thought to be, there are several others which cannot be passed over in any account, however concise, of the genealogies of Christ. The most startling is the total discrepancy between them both and that of Zerubbabel in the O. T. (1 Chr. iii. 19-24). In this last, of seven sons of Zerubbabel not one bears the name, or anything like the name, of Rhesa or Abiud; and of the next generation not one bears the name, or anything like the name, of Eliakim or Joanna, which are in the corresponding generation in Matthew and Luke. Rhesa is in fact not a name at all, but it is the Chaldee title of the princes of the captivity. It is very probable therefore that this title should have been placed against the name of Zerubbabel by some early Christian Jew, and thence crept into the text. If this be so, St. Luke will then give Joanna as the son of Zerubbabel. But Joanna is the very same name as Hananiah, the son of Zerubbabel according to 1 Chr. iii. 19. [HANANIAH.] In St. Matthew this generation is omitted. In the next generation we identify Matthew's Ab-jud (Abiud) with Luke's Juda, and both with Hodaiah of 1 Chr. iii. 24, by the simple process of supposing the Shemaiah of 1 Chr. iii. 22 to be the same person as the Shimei of ver. 19. The next difficulty is the difference in the number of generations between the two genealogies. St. Matthew's division into three fourteens gives only 42, while St. Luke, from Abraham to Christ inclusive, reckons 56, or, which is more to the point (since the generations between Abraham and David are the same in both genealogies), while St. Matthew reckons 28 from David to Christ, St. Luke reckons 43, or 42 without Rhesa. But the genealogy itself supplies the explanation. In the second tessarodecade, including the kings, we know that three generations are omitted—Ahaziah, Joash, Amaziah—in order to reduce the generations from 17 to 14: the difference between these 17 and the 19 of St. Luke being very small. So in like manner it is obvious that the generations have been abridged in the same way in the third division to keep to the number 14. Another difficulty is the apparent deficiency in the number of the last tessarodecade, which seems to contain only 13 names; but the explanation of this is, that either in the process of translation, or otherwise, the names of Jehoiakim and Jehoiachin have got confused and expressed by the one name Jechonias. The last difficulty of sufficient importance to be mentioned here is a chronological one. In both the genealogies there are but three names between Salmon and David—Boaz, Obed, Jesse. But, according to the common chronology, from the entrance into Canaan (when Salmon was come to man's estate) to the birth of David was 405 years, or from that to 500 years and upwards. Now for about an equal period, from Solomon to Jehoiachin, St. Luke's genealogy contains 20 names. Obviously therefore either the chronology or the genealogy is wrong. It must suffice here to assert that the shortening the interval between the Exodus and David by about 200 years, which brings it to the length indicated by the genealogies, does in the most remarkable manner bring Israelitish history into harmony with Egyptian, with the traditional Jewish date of the Exodus, with the fragment of Edomitish history preserved in Gen. xxxvi. 31-39, and with the internal evidence of the Israelitish history itself. The following pedigree will exhibit the successive generations as given by the two Evangelists:—

Thus it will be seen that the whole number of generations from Adam to Christ, both inclusive, is 74, without the second Cainan and Rhesa.

Generation. 1. Abstract:—time, either definite or indefinite. The primary meaning of the Heb. dôr is revolution; hence period of time. From the general idea of a period comes the more special notion of an age or generation of men, the ordinary period of human life. In the long-lived Patriarchal age a generation seems to have been computed at 100 years (Gen. xv. 16; comp. 13, and Ex. xii. 40); the latter reckoning, however, was the same which has been adopted by other civilised nations, viz. from thirty to forty years (Job xlii. 16). For generation in the sense of a definite period of time, see Gen. xv. 16; Deut. xxiii. 3, 4, 8, &c. As an indefinite period of time:—for time past, see Deut. xxxii. 7; Is. lviii. 12; for time future, see Ps. xlv. 17, lxix. 5, &c. 2. Concrete:—the men of an age, or time. So generation = contemporaries (Gen. vi. 9; Is. liii. 8); posterity, especially in legal formulae (Lev. iii. 17, &c.); fathers, or ancestors (Ps. xlix. 19). Dropping the idea of time, generation comes to mean a race, or class of men. In A. V. of N. Test. three words are rendered by generation. For the abstract and indefinite, see Luke i. 50, Eph. iii. 21 (A. V. “ages”), future: Acts xv. 21 (A. V. “of old time”), Eph. iii. 5 (A. V. “ages”), past. For concrete, see Matt. xi. 16.

Genesareth. In this form the name appears in the edition of the A. V. of 1611, in Mark vi. 53, and Luke v. 1, following the spelling of the Vulgate. In Matt. xiv. 34 the A. V. originally followed the Received Greek Text—Genesaret.

Gen'esis, the first book of the Law or Pentateuch. A. The book of Genesis has an interest and an importance to which no other document of antiquity can pretend. If not absolutely the oldest book in the world, it is the oldest which lays any claim to being a trustworthy history. If the religious books of other nations make any pretensions to vie with it in antiquity, in all other respects they are immeasurably inferior. Genesis is neither like the Vedas, a collection of hymns more or less sublime; nor like the Zendavesta, a philosophic speculation on the origin of all things; nor like the Yih-king, an unintelligible jumble whose expositors could twist it from a cosmological essay into a standard treatise on ethical philosophy. It is a history, and it is a religious history. The earlier portion of the book, so far as the end of the eleventh chapter, may be properly termed a history of the world; the latter is a history of the fathers of the Jewish race. But from first to last it is a religious history. It is very important to bear in mind this religious aspect of the history, if we would put ourselves in a position rightly to understand it. Of course the facts must be treated like any other historical facts, sifted in the same way, and subjected to the same laws of evidence. But if we would judge of the work as a whole we must not forget the evident aim of the writer. It is only in this way we can understand, for instance, why the history of the Fall is given with so much minuteness of detail, whereas of whole generations of men we have nothing but a bare catalogue. And only in this way can we account for the fact that by far the greater portion of the book is occupied not with the fortunes of nations, but with the biographies of the three patriarchs.—B. Unity and Design.—That a distinct plan and method characterise the work is now generally admitted. What then is the plan of the writer? First, we must bear in mind that Genesis is after all but a portion of a larger work. The five books of the Pentateuch form a consecutive whole: they are not merely a collection of ancient fragments loosely strung together, but a well-digested and connected composition. The great subject of this history is the establishment of the Theocracy. Its central point is the giving of the Law on Sinai, and the solemn covenant there ratified, whereby the Jewish nation was constituted “a kingdom of priests and a holy nation to Jehovah.” The book of Genesis (with the first chapters of Exodus) describes the steps which led to the establishment of the Theocracy. It is a part of the writer's plan to tell us what the Divine preparation of the world was, in order to show, first, the significance of the call of Abraham, and next, the true nature of the Jewish theocracy. He begins with the creation of the world, because the God who created the world and the God who revealed Himself to the fathers is the same God. The book of Genesis has thus a character at once special and universal. It embraces the world; it speaks of God as the God of the whole human race. But as the introduction to Jewish history, it makes the universal interest subordinate to the national. Five principal persons are the pillars, so to speak, on which the whole superstructure rests, Adam, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. It will be seen that a specific plan is preserved throughout. The main purpose is never forgotten. God's relation to Israel holds the first place in the writer's mind. It is this which it is his object to convey. The history of that chosen seed, who were the heirs of the promise and the guardians of the Divine oracles, is the only history which interprets man's relation to God. By its light all others shine, and may be read when the time shall come. Meanwhile, as the different families drop off here and there from the principal stock, their course is briefly indicated. Beyond all doubt, then, we may trace in the book of Genesis in its present form a systematic plan. But does it follow from this that the book, as it at present stands, is the work of a single author?—C. Integrity.—This is the next question we have to consider. Granting that this unity of design, which we have already noticed, leads to the conclusion that the work must have been by the same hand, are there any reasons for supposing that the author availed himself in its composition of earlier documents?

and if so, are we still able by critical investigation to ascertain where they have been introduced into the body of the work? 1. Now it is almost impossible to read the book of Genesis with anything like a critical eye without being struck with the great peculiarities of style and language which certain portions of it present. Thus, for instance, chap. ii. 3-iii. 24 is quite different both from chap. i. and from chap. iv. Again, chap. xiv. and (according to Jahn) chap. xxiii. are evidently separate documents transplanted in their original form without correction or modification into the existing work. In fact there is nothing like uniformity of style till we come to the history of Joseph. 2. We are led to the same conclusion by the inscriptions which are prefixed to certain sections, as ii. 4, v. 1, vi. 9, x. 1, xi. 10, 27, and seem to indicate so many older documents. 3. Lastly, the distinct use of the Divine names, Jehovah in some sections, and Elohim in others, is characteristic of two different writers. Astruc, a Belgian physician, was the first who broached the theory that Genesis was based on a collection of older documents. Of these he professed to point out as many as twelve, the use of the Divine names, however, having in the first instance suggested the distinction. Subsequently Eichhorn adopted this theory, so far as to admit that two documents, the one Elohistic, and the other Jehovistic, were the main sources of the book, though he did not altogether exclude others. Since his time the theory has been maintained, but variously modified, by one class of critics, whilst another class has strenuously opposed it. The great weight of probability lies on the side of those who argue for the existence of different documents. Here and there throughout the book we meet with a later remark, intended to explain or supplement the earlier monument. And in some instances there seems to have been so complete a fusion of the two principal documents, the Elohistic and the Jehovistic, that it is no longer possible accurately to distinguish them. Of the two principal documents, the Elohistic is the earlier. Hupfeld, whose analysis is very careful, thinks that he can discover traces of three original records, an earlier Elohistic, a Jehovist, and a later Elohistic. These three documents were, according to him, subsequently united and arranged by a fourth person, who acted as editor of the whole.—D. Authenticity.—Luther used to say, “Nihil pulchrius Genesi, nihil utilius.” But hard critics have tried all they can to mar its beauty and to detract from its utility. Certain it is that no book has met with more determined and unsparing assailants. To enumerate and to reply to all objections would be impossible. We will only refer to some of the most important. (1.) The story of Creation, as given in the first chapter, has been set aside in two ways: first by placing it on the same level with other cosmogonies which are to be found in the sacred writings of all nations; and next, by asserting that its statements are directly contradicted by the discoveries of modern science. Let us glance at these two objections. (a.) Now when we compare the Biblical with all other known cosmogonies, we are immediately struck with the great moral superiority of the former. There is no confusion here between the Divine Creator and His work. God is before all things, God creates all things: this is the sublime assertion of the Hebrew writer. Whereas all the cosmogonies of the heathen world err in one of two directions. Either they are Dualistic, that is, they regard God and matter as two eternal co-existent principles; or they are Pantheistic, i.e. they confound God and matter, making the material universe a kind of emanation from the great Spirit which informs the mass. (b.) It would occupy too large a space to discuss at any length the objections which have been urged from the results of modern discovery against the literal truth of this chapter. One or two remarks of a general kind must suffice. It is argued, for instance, that light could not have existed before the sun, whereas the Mosaic narrative makes light created on the first day, and the sun on the fourth. But we do not know that the existing laws of creation were in operation when the creative fiat was first put forth. And again, it is not certain that the language of Genesis can only mean that the sun was created on the fourth day. It may mean that then only did that luminary become visible to our planet. With regard to the six days, no reasonable doubt can exist that they ought to be interpreted as six periods, without defining what the length of those periods is. No attempt, however, which has as yet been made to identify these six periods with corresponding geological epochs can be pronounced satisfactory. What we ought to maintain is, that no reconciliation is necessary. It is certain that the author of the first chapter of Genesis, whether Moses or some one else, knew nothing of geology or astronomy. It is certain that he made use of phraseology concerning physical facts in accordance with the limited range of information which he

It is also certain that the Bible was never intended to reveal to us knowledge of which our own faculties, rightly used, could put us in possession; and we have no business therefore to expect anything but popular language in the description of physical phenomena. (2.) To the description of Paradise, and the history of the Fall and of the Deluge very similar remarks apply. All nations have their own version of these facts. But if there be any one original source of these traditions, any root from which they diverged, we cannot doubt where to look for it. The earliest record of these momentous facts is that preserved in the Bible. Opinions have differed whether we ought to take the story of the Fall in Gen. iii. to be a literal statement of facts, or whether we should regard it as an allegory. But in the latter case we ought not to deny that spiritual truth. Neither should we overlook the very important bearing which this narrative has on the whole of the subsequent history of the world and of Israel. The universality of the Deluge, it may be proved, is quite at variance with the most certain facts of geology. But then we are not bound to contend for a universal deluge. The Biblical writer described it as universal, but that was only because it covered what was then the known world. (3.) When we come down to a later period in the narrative, where we have the opportunity of testing the accuracy of the historian, we find it in many of the most important particulars abundantly corroborated. One of the strongest proofs of the bona fide historical character of the earlier portion of Genesis is to be found in the valuable ethnological catalogue contained in chap. x. (4.) As to the fact implied in the dispersion, that all languages had one origin, philological research has not as yet been carried far enough to lead to any very certain result. The most that has been effected is a classification of languages in three great fami-

Bas. (5.) Another fact which rests on the authority of the earlier chapters of Genesis, the derivation of the whole human race from a single pair, has been abundantly confirmed by recent investigations. (6.) It is quite impossible, as has already been said, to notice all the objections made by hostile critics at every step as we advance. But it may be well to refer to one more instance in which suspicion has been cast upon the credibility of the narrative. Three stories are found in three distinct portions of the Book, which in their main features no doubt present a striking similarity to one another. See xii. 10-20, xx., xxvi. 1-11. These, it is said, are clearly only three different versions of the same story. There is a further difficulty about the age of Sarah at the time of the first occurrence. But it is a minute criticism, hardly worth answering, which tries to cast suspicion on the veracity of the writer, because of difficulties such as these. The positive evidence is overwhelming in favour of his credibility. The patriarchal tent beneath the shade of some spreading tree, the wealth of flocks and herds, the free and generous hospitality to strangers, the strife for the well, the purchase of the cave of Machpelah for a burial-place—we feel at once that these are no inventions of a later writer in more civilized times. So again, what can be more life-like, more touchingly beautiful, than the picture of Hagar and Ishmael, the meeting of Abraham's servant with Rebekah, or of Jacob with Rachel at the well of Haran? There is a fidelity in the minutest incidents which convinces us that we are reading history, not fable. Or can anything more completely transport us into patriarchal times than the battle of the kings and the interview between Abraham and Melchisedec? Passing on to a later portion of the Book, we find the writer evincing the most accurate knowledge of the state of society in Egypt.—E. Author and date of composition.—This subject is discussed under PENTATEUCH.

Gennes'ar, The Water of, 1 Macc. xi. 67. [GENNESARET.]

Gennes'aret, Land of. After the miracle or feeding the five thousand, our Lord and His disciples crossed the Lake of Gennesaret and came to the other side, at a place which is called "the land of Gennesaret" (Matt. xiv. 34; Mark vi. 53). It is generally believed that this term was applied to the fertile crescent-shaped plain on the western shore of the lake, extending from Khan Minyeh on the north to the steep hill behind Mejdol on the south, and called by the Arabs el-Ghuweir, "the little Ghor." Mr. Porter gives the length as three miles, and the greatest breadth as about one mile. Additional interest is given to the land of Gennesaret, or el-Ghuweir, by the probability that its scenery suggested the parable of the Sower.

Gennes'aret, Sea of, called in the O. T. "the Sea of Chinnereth," or "Cinneroth" (Num. xxxiv. 11; Josh. xii. 3), from a town of that name which stood on or near its shore (Josh. xix. 35). At its north-western angle was a beautiful and fertile plain called "Gennesaret" (Matt. xiv. 34), from which the name of the lake was taken. The lake is also called in the N. T. "the sea of Galilee," from the province of Galilee which bordered on its western side (Matt. iv. 18; Mark vii. 31; John vi. 1); and "the sea of Tiberias," from the celebrated city (John vi. 1). Its modern name is Bahr Tabariyeh. Most of our Lord's public life was spent in the environs of the Sea of Gennesaret. This region was then the most densely peopled in all Palestine. No less than nine cities stood on the very shores of the lake. The Sea of Gennesaret is of an oval shape, about thirteen geographical miles long, and six broad. The river Jordan enters it at its northern end, and passes out at its southern end. In fact the bed of the lake is just a lower section of the great Jordan valley. Its most remarkable feature is its deep depression, being no less than 700 feet below the level of the ocean. The scenery is bleak and monotonous. The great depression makes the climate of the shores almost tropical. This is very sensibly felt by the traveller in going down from the plains of Galilee. In summer the heat is intense, and even in early spring the air has something of an Egyptian balminess. The water of the lake is sweet, cool, and transparent; and as the beach is everywhere pebbly it has a beautiful sparkling look. It abounds in fish now as in ancient times.

Genna'us, father of Apollonius (2 Macc. xii. 2).

Gentiles. 1. Old Testament.—The Heb. gôyim signified the nations, the surrounding nations, foreigners as opposed to Israel (Neh. v. 8). Notwithstanding the disagreeable connotation of the term, the Jews were able to use it, even in the plural, in a purely technical, geographical sense. So Gen. x. 5; Gen. xiv. 1; Josh. xii. 23; Is. ix. 1.—II. New Testament.—I. The Greek ἔθνος in sing. means a people or nation (Matt. xxiv. 7; Acts ii. 5, &c.), and even the Jewish people (Luke vii. 5, xiii. 2, &c.). It is only in the pl. that it is used for heathen, gentiles. 2. "ΕΛΛΗΝ, John vii. 35; Rom. iii. 9. The A. V. is not consistent in its treatment of this word; sometimes rendering it by "Greek" (Acts xiv. 1, xvii. 4; Rom. i. 16, x. 12), sometimes by "Gentile" (Rom. ii. 9, 10, iii. 9; 1 Cor. x. 32). The latter use of the word seems to have arisen from the almost universal adoption of the Greek language.

Gen'ubath, the son of Hadad, an Edomite of the royal family, by an Egyptian princess, the sister of Tahpenes, the queen of the Pharaoh who governed Egypt in the latter part of the reign of David (1 K. xi. 20; comp. 16).

Ge'on, i. e. Gihon, one of the four rivers of Eden (Eccles. xxiv. 27).

Ge'ra, one of the "sons," i. e. descendants, of Benjamin, enumerated in Gen. xli. 21, as already living at the time of Jacob's migration into Egypt. He was son of Bela (1 Chr. viii. 3). The text of this last passage is very corrupt; and the different Geras there named seem to reduce themselves into one,—the same as the son of Bela. Gera, who is named (Judg. iii. 15) as the ancestor of Ehud, and in 2 Sam. xvi. 5 as the ancestor of Shimei who cursed David, is probably also the same person.

Gerah. [WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.]

Ge'rar, a very ancient city south of Gaza. It occurs chiefly in Genesis (x. 19, xi. 1, xvi. 16); also incidentally in 2 Chr. xiv. 13, 14. It must have trenched on the "south" or "south country" of later Palestine. From a comparison of xxi. 32 with xvi. 23, 26, Beersheba would seem to be just on the verge of this territory, and perhaps to be its limit towards the N.E. For its southern boundary, though very uncertain, seems more probable than the Wady El Arish ("River of Egypt") and El 'Ain; south of which the neighbouring "wilderness of Paran" (xx. 15, xli. 22, 34) may be probably reckoned to begin. Williams speaks of a Joorf el Gerar as now existing, three hours S.E. of Gaza, and this may probably indicate the northern limit of the territory, if not the site of the town. The valley of Gerar may be almost any important wady within the limits indicated.

Ger'asa. This name does not occur in the O. T., or in the Received Text of the N. T. But it is now generally admitted that in Matt. viii. 28, "Gerasenes" supersedes "Gadarenes." Gerasa was a celebrated city on the eastern borders of Perneus. It is situated amid the mountains of Gilead, 20 miles east of the Jordan, and 25 north of Philadelphia, the ancient Rabbath-Ammon. It is not known when or by whom Gerasa was founded. It is first mentioned by Josephus as having been captured by Alexander Jannæus (circ. B.C. 85). It is indebted for its architectural splendour to the age and genius of the Antonines (A.D. 138-80). The ruins of Gerasa are by far the most beautiful and extensive east of the Jordan. They are situated on both sides of a shallow valley that runs from north to south through a high undulating plain, and falls into the Zurka (the ancient Jabbok) at the distance of about 5 miles. The form of the city is an irregular square, each side measuring nearly a mile. Its modern name is Jerash.

Ger'esites, The, Jud. v. 16. [GIRGASHITES.]

Ger'izim, a mountain designated by Moses, in conjunction with Mount Ebal, to be the scene of a great solemnity upon the entrance of the children of Israel into the promised land. High places had a peculiar charm attached to them in these days of external observance. The law was delivered from Sinai: the blessings and curses affixed to the performance or neglect of it were directed to be pronounced upon Gerizim and Ebal (Deut. xxvii.; Josh. viii.). The next question is, Has Moses defined the localities of Ebal and Gerizim? Standing on the eastern side of the Jordan, in the land of Moab (Deut. i. 5), he asks: "Are they not on the other side Jordan, by the way where the sun goeth down (i. e. at some distance to the W.), in the land of the Canaanites, which dwell in the champaign over against Gilgal, beside the plains of Moreh?" There is no room for doubting the Scriptural position of Ebal and Gerizim to have been—where they are now placed—in the territory of the tribe of Ephraim; the latter of them overhanging the city of Shechem or Scima, as Josephus, following the Scriptural narrative, asserts. It is a far more important question whether Gerizim was the mountain on which Abraham was directed to offer his son Isaac (Gen. xxi. 2, and sq.). First, then, let it be observed that it is not the mountain, but the district which is there called Moriah (of the same root with Moreh: see Corn. a Lapid. on Gen. xii. 6), and that antecedently to the occurrence which took place "upon one of the mountains" in its vicinity—a consideration which of itself would naturally point to the locality, already known to Abraham, as the plain or plains of Moreh, "the land of vision," "the high land;" and therefore consistently "the land of adoration," or "religious worship," as it is variously explained. That all these interpretations are incomparably more applicable to the natural features of Gerizim and its neighbourhood, than to the hillock (in comparison) upon which Solomon built his temple, none can for a moment doubt who have seen both. The Samaritans, therefore, through whom the tradition of the true site of Gerizim has been preserved, are probably not wrong when they point out still—as they have done from time immemorial—Gerizim as the hill upon which Abraham's "faith was made perfect." Another tradition of the Samaritans is far less trustworthy: viz. that Mount Gerizim was the spot where Melchisedech met Abraham—though there certainly was a Salem or Shalem in that neighbourhood (Gen. xxiii. 18). Lastly, the altar which Jacob built was not on Gerizim, as the Samaritans contend, though probably about its base, at the head of the plain between it and Ebal, "in the parcel of a field" which that patriarch purchased from the children of Hamor, and where he spread his tent (Gen. xxxiii. 18-20). Here was likewise his well (John iv. 6), and the tomb of his son Joseph (Josh. xxiv. 32), both of which are still shown. We now enter upon the second phase in the history of Gerizim. According to Josephus, a marriage contracted between Manasseh, brother of Jaddus, the then high-priest, and the daughter of Sanballat the Cuthaean (comp. 2 K. xvii. 24), having created a great stir amongst the Jews, who had been strictly forbidden to contract alien marriages (Ezr. ix. 2; Neh. xiii. 23), Sanballat, in order to reconcile his son-in-law to this unpopular affinity, obtained leave from Alexander the Great to build a temple upon Mount Gerizim, and to inaugurate a rival priesthood and altar there to those of Jerusalem. "Samarita thenceforth," says Prideaux, "became the common refuge and asylum of the refractory Jews." Gerizim is likewise still to the Samaritans what Jerusalem is to the Jews, and Mecca to the Mahometans.

Gerrizites, 1 Sam. xxvii. 8. [GERIZITES.]

Gerrhenians, the, named in 2 Mac. xiii. 24 only. From the nature of the case the Gerrhenians must have been south of Ptolemais. Grotius seems to have been the first to suggest that the town Gerrhon or Gerrha was intended. Ewald, with greater probability, conjectures that the inhabitants of the ancient city of GERAR are meant.

Gerahom. 1. The first-born son of Moses and Zipporah (Ex. ii. 22, xviii. 3). The name is explained in these passages as "a stranger there," in allusion to Moses' being a foreigner in Midian—"For he said, I have been a stranger (Ger) in a foreign land." Its true meaning, taking it as a Hebrew word, is "expulsion." The circumcision of Gershon is probably related in Ex. iv. 25.—2. The form under which the name GERSHON—the eldest son of Levi—is given in several passages of Chronicles, viz. 1 Chr. vi. 16, 17, 20, 43, 62, 71, xv. 7.—3. The representative of the priestly family of Phinehas, among those who accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezr. viii. 2). In Esdras the name is GERSON.

Gershon, the eldest of the three sons of Levi, born before the descent of Jacob's family into Egypt (Gen. xvi. 11; Ex. vi. 16). But, though the eldest-born, the families of Gershon were outstripped in fame by their younger brethren of Kohath, from whom sprang Moses and the priestly line of Aaron. At the census in the wilderness of Sinai the whole number of the males of the Bene-Gershon was 7500 (Num. iii. 22), midway between the Kohathites and the Merarites. The sons of Gershon had charge of the fabrics of the Tabernacle—the coverings, curtains, hangings, and cords (Num. iii. 25, 26, iv. 25, 28); for the transport of these they had two covered wagons and four oxen (vii. 3, 7). In the encampment their station was behind the Tabernacle, on the west side (Num. iii. 23). In the apportionment of the Levitical cities thirteen fell to the lot of the Gershonites. There were in the northern tribes—two in Manasseh beyond Jordan, four in Issachar, four in Asher, and three in Naphtali.

CON. D. II.

Gershonites, the, the family descended from GERSHON or GERSHOM, the son of Levi (Num. iii. 21, 23, 24, iv. 24, 27, xxvi. 57; Josh. xxi. 83; 1 Chr. xxiii. 7; 2 Chr. xxix. 12). "THE GERSHONITE," as applied to individuals, occurs in 1 Chr. xxvi. 21 (Ladan), xxix. 8 (Jehiel).

Gerson, 1 Esd. viii. 29. [GERSHOM, 3.]

Gerzites, the, a tribe who with the Geshurites and the Amalekites occupied the land between the south of Palestine and Egypt in the time of Saul (1 Sam. xxvii. 8). The name is not found in the text of the A. V., but only in the margin. In the name of Mount Gerizim we have the only remaining trace of the presence of this old tribe of Bedouins in central Palestine.

Ge'sem, the Land of, the Greek form of the Hebrew name GOSHEN (Jud. i. 9).

Ge'sham (properly GESHAM, as in A. V. of 1611), one of the sons of JAHDAL, in the genealogy of Judah and family of Caleb (1 Chr. ii. 47).

Ge'shem, and Gash'mu, an Arabian, mentioned in Neh. ii. 19, and vi. 1, 2, 6. We may conclude that he was an inhabitant of Arabia Petraea, or of the Arabian Desert, and probably the chief of a tribe. The Arabic name corresponding to Geshem cannot easily be identified. Jâsim (or Gâsim) is one of very remote antiquity, and Jashum is the name of an historical tribe of Arabia Proper; the latter may more probably be compared with it.

Ge'shur, a little principality in the north-eastern corner of Bashan, adjoining the province of Argob (Deut. iii. 14), and the kingdom of Aram (Syria in the A. V.; 2 Sam. xv. 8; comp. 1 Chr. ii. 23). It is highly probable that Geshur was a section of the wild and rugged region now called el-Lejah. [ARGOB.]

Geash'uri and Geash'urites. 1. The inhabitants of Geshur (Deut. iii. 14; Josh. xii. 5, xiii. 11).—

2. An ancient tribe which dwelt in the desert between Arabia and Philistia (Josh. xiii. 2; 1 Sam. xxvii. 8).

Geth'er, the third in order of the sons of Aram (Gen. x. 23). No satisfactory trace of the people sprung from this stock has been found.

Gethsemane, a small "farm" (A. V. "place;" Matt. xxvi. 36; Mark xiv. 32), situated across the brook Kedron (John xviii. 1), probably at the foot of Mount Olivet (Luke xxii. 39), to the N.W., and about $\frac{1}{2}$ or $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile English from the walls of Jerusalem. There was a "garden," or rather orchard, attached to it, to which the olive, fig, and pomegranate doubtless invited resort by their hospitable shade. And we know from the Evangelists Luke (xxii. 39) and John (xviii. 2) that our Lord oftentimes resorted thither with his disciples. The suburbs of Jerusalem abounded with gardens. But Gethsemane has not come down to us as a scene of mirth; its inexhaustible associations are the offspring of a single event—the Agony of the Son of God on the evening preceding His Passion. A modern garden, in which are eight venerable olive-trees, and a grotto to the north, detached from it, and in closer connexion with the Church of the Sepulchre of the Virgin, are pointed out as the true Gethsemane. Against the contemporary antiquity of the olive-trees, it has been urged that Titus cut down all the trees round about Jerusalem. The probability would seem to be that they were planted by Christian hands to mark the spot; unless, like the sacred olive of the olive-tree, they may have reproduced themselves.

Geu'el, son of Machi, the Gadite spy (Num. xiii. 15).

Gezer, an ancient city of Canaan, whose king, Horam, or Elam, coming to the assistance of Lachish, was killed with all his people by Joshua (Josh. x. 33, xii. 12). The town, however, is not said to have been destroyed. It formed one of the landmarks on the south boundary of Ephraim, between the lower Beth-horon and the Mediterranean (xvi. 3), the western limit of the tribe (1 Chr. vii. 28). It was allotted with its suburbs to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. xxi. 21; 1 Chr. vi. 67); but the original inhabitants were not dispossessed (Judg. i. 29); and even down to the reign of Solomon the Canaanites were still dwelling there, and paying tribute to Israel (1 K. ix. 16). Ewald takes Gezer and Geshur to be the same. In one place Gob is given as identical with Gezer (1 Chr. xx. 4; comp. 2 Sam. xxi. 18). The exact site of Gezer has not been discovered, but its general position is not difficult to infer. Perhaps the strongest claims for identity with Gezer are put forward by a village called Yasur, 4 or 5 miles east of Joppa, on the road to Ramleh and Lydd.

Gerzites, the. The word "which the Jewish critics have substituted in the margin of the Bible for the ancient reading, "the Gerizite" (1 Sam. xvii. 8). [GERZITES, THE.]

Giah, a place named only in 2 Sam. ii. 24, to designate the position of the hill Ammah.

Giants. 1. They are first spoken of in Gen. vi. 4, under the name Nephilim. The word is derived either from pālāh or pālā (= "marvellous"), or, as is generally believed, from nāphal, either in the sense to throw down, or to fall (= "fallen angels," cf. Is. xiv. 12; Luke x. 18). That the word means "giant" is clear from Num. xiii. 32, 33. But we now come to the remarkable conjectures about the origin of these Nephilim in Gen. vi. 1-4. We are told that "there were Nephilim in the earth," and that afterwards the "sons of God" mingling with the beautiful "daughters of men" produced a race of violent and insolent Gibborim (A. V. "mighty men"). The genealogy of the Nephilim, or at any rate of the earliest Nephilim, is not recorded in Scripture, and the name itself is so mysterious that we are lost in conjecture respecting them.—2. The sons of the marriages mentioned in Gen. vi. 1-4 are called Gibborim, a general name meaning powerful. They were not necessarily giants in our sense of the word. Yet, as was natural, these powerful chiefs were almost universally represented as men of extraordinary stature. But who were the parents of these giants? who are "the sons of God"? The opinions are various:—(1.) Men of power. (2.) Men with great gifts, "in the image of God." (3.) Cainites arrogantly assuming the title; or (4.) the pious Sethites (comp. Gen. iv. 26). (5.) Worshippers of false gods. (6.) Devils, such as the Incubi and Succubi. (7.) Closely allied to this is the oldest opinion, that they were angels. The rare expression "sons of God" certainly means angels in Job xxxviii. 7, i. 6, ii. 1, and that such is the meaning in Gen. vi. 4 was also the most prevalent opinion both in the Jewish and early Christian Church. It was probably this very ancient view which gave rise to the spurious Book of Enoch, and the notion quoted from it by St. Jude (6), and alluded to by St. Peter (2 Pet. ii. 4; comp. 1 Cor. xi. 10). Every one will remember the allusions to the same interpretation in Milton, Par.

Reg. ii. 178.—The next race of giants, which we find mentioned in Scripture is, 3. THE REPHAIM, a name which frequently occurs, and in some remarkable passages. The earliest mention of them is the record of their defeat by Chedorlaomer and some allied kings at Ashteroth Karnaim (Gen. xiv. 5). Extirpated, however, from the east of Palestine, they long found a home in the west (2 Sam. xxi. 18, sq.; 1 Chr. xx. 4). It is probable that they had possessed districts west of the Jordan in early times, since the "Valley of Rephaim" (2 Sam. v. 18; 1 Chr. xi. 15; Is. xvii. 5), a rich valley S.W. of Jerusalem, derived its name from them. They were probably one of those aboriginal people to whose existence the traditions of many nations testify, and of whose genealogy the Bible gives us no information. Some suppose them to be Japhethites. In A. V. the words used for it are "Rephaim," "giants," and "the dead." That it has the latter meaning in many passages is certain (Ps. lxxxviii. 10; Prov. ii. 18, ix. 18, xxi. 16; Is. xxvi. 14, 19). An attentive consideration seems to leave little room for doubt that the dead were called Rephaim, from some notion of Sheol (A. V. "hell") being the residence of the fallen spirits or buried giants. Branches of this great unknown people were called Emim, Anakim, and Zuzim.—4. EMIM, smitten by Chedorlaomer at Shaveh Kiriathaim (Gen. xiv. 5), and occupying the country afterwards held by the Moabites (Deut. ii. 10).—5. ANAKIM. The imbecile terror of the spies exaggerated their proportions into something superhuman (Num. xiii. 28, 33), and their name became proverbial (Deut. ii. 10, ix. 2).—6. ZUZIM, whose principal town was Ham (Gen. xiv. 5), and who lived between the Arnon and the Jabbok, being a northern tribe of Rephaim. No one has yet proved by experience the possibility of giant races materially exceeding in size the average height of man. There is no great variation in the ordinary standard. The general belief (until very recent times) in the existence of fabulously enormous men arose from fancied giant-graves, and above all from the discovery of huge bones, which were taken for those of men, in days when comparative anatomy was unknown. On the other hand, isolated instances of monstrosity are sufficiently attested to prove that beings like Goliath and his kinsmen may have existed.

Gib'bar. Bene-Gibbar, to the number of ninety-five, returned with Zerubabel from Babylon (Ezr. ii. 20).

Gib'bethon, a town allotted to the tribe of Dan (Josh. xix. 44), and afterwards given with its "suburbs" to the Kohathite Levites (xxi. 23). In the Onomasticon (Gabathon) it is quoted as a small village called Gabe, in the 17th mile from Caesarea. No name at all resembling it has, however, been discovered in that direction.

Gib'ea. Sheva, "the father of Macbenah," and "father of Gibeah," is mentioned with other names unmistakably those of places and not persons, among the descendants of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 49, comp. 42). This would seem to point out Giben. On the other hand Madmanuah (ver. 49) recalls Madmenah, a town named in connexion with Gibeah of Benjamin (Is. x. 31), and therefore lying somewhere north of Jerusalem.

Gib'eah, a word employed in the Bible to denote a "hill." Like most words of this kind it gave its name to several towns and places in Palestine, which would doubtless be generally on or near a hill. They are—1. GIBEAH, a city in the mountain-district of Judah, named with Maon and the southern Carmel (Josh. xv. 57; and comp. 1 Chr. ii. 49, Am.). Its site is yet to seek.—2. GIBEATH. This is enumerated among the last group of the towns of Benjamin, next to Jerusalem (Josh. xviii. 28). It is generally taken to be the place which afterwards became so notorious as "Gibeah-of-Benjamin" or "of-Saul." But this was five or six miles north of Jerusalem. The name being in the "construct state"—Gibeath and not Gibeah—may it not belong to the following name Kirjath, and denote the hill adjoining that town?—3. The place in which the Ark remained from the time of its return by the Philistines till its removal by David (2 Sam. vi. 3, 4; comp. 1 Sam. vii. 1, 2).—4. GIBEAH-OF-BENJAMIN. This town does not appear in the lists of the cities of Benjamin in Josh. xviii. (1.) We first encounter it in the tragical story of the Levite and his concubine (Judg. xix. xx.). It was then a "city," with the usual open street or square (Judg. xix. 15, 17, 20), and containing 700 "chosen men" (xx. 15), probably the same whose skill as slingers is preserved in the next verse. In many particulars Gibeah agrees very closely with Tuleil-el-Ful, a conspicuous eminence just four miles north of Jerusalem, to the right of the road. (2.) We next meet with Gibeah of Benjamin during the Philistine wars of Saul and Jonathan (1 Sam. xiii., xiv.). It now bears its full title. The position of matters seems to have been this:—The Philistines were in possession of the village of Gaba, the present Jeba, on the south side of the Wady Saueiat. South of the Philistine camp, and about three miles in its rear, was Jonathan, in Gibeah-of-Benjamin, with a thousand chosen warriors (xiii. 2). (3.) As "Gibeah of Benjamin" this place is referred to in 2 Sam. xxiii. 29 (comp. 1 Chr. xi. 31), and as "Gibeah" it is mentioned by Hosea (v. 8, ix. 9, x. 9), but it does not again appear in the history. It is, however, almost without doubt identical with—5. GIBEAH-OF-SAUL. This is not mentioned as Saul's city till after his anointing (1 Sam. x. 26), when he is said to have gone "home" to Gibeah. In the subsequent narrative the town bears its full name (xi. 4). The name of Saul has not been found in connexion with any place of modern Palestine, but it existed as late as the days of Josephus, and an allusion of his has fortunately given the clue to the identification of the town with the spot which now bears the name of Tuleil-el-Ful. Josephus, describing Titus's march from Caesarea to Jerusalem, gives his route as through Samaria to Gophna, thence a day's march to a valley "called by the Jews the Valley of Thorns, near a certain village called Gabathsaul, distant from Jerusalem about thirty stadia, i. e. just the distance of Tuleil-el-Ful. Here he was joined by a part of his army from Emmaus (Nicompolis), who would naturally come up the road by Beth-horon and Gibeon, the same which still falls into the northern road close to Tuleil-el-Ful. In both these respects therefore the agreement is complete, and Gibeah of Benjamin must be taken as identical with Gibeah of Saul.—6. GIBEAH-IN-THE-FIELD, named only in Judg. xx. 31, as the place to which one of the "highways" led from Gibeah-of-Benjamin. It is probably the same as Gaba. The "meadows of Gaba" (A. V. Gibeah; Judg. xx. 33) have no connexion with the "field," the Hebrew words being entirely different.—7. There are several other names compounded of Gibeah, which are given in a translated form in the A. V., probably from their appearing not to belong to towns.

Gib'eahite, the, i. e. the native of Gibeah (1 Chr. xii. 3).

Gib'oon, one of the four cities of the Hivites, the inhabitants of which made a league with Joshua (ix. 3-15), and thus escaped the fate of Jericho and Ai (comp. xi. 19). Gibeon lay within the territory of Benjamin (xviii. 25), and with its "suburbs" was allotted to the priests (xxi. 17), of whom it became afterwards a principal station. The situation of Gibeon has fortunately been recovered with as great certainty as any ancient site in Palestine. The traveller who pursues the northern camel-road from Jerusalem, turning off to the left at Tuleil-el-Ful (Gibeah), on that branch of it which leads westward to Jaffa, finds himself, after crossing one or two stony and barren ridges, in a district of a more open character. The hills are rounder and more isolated than those through which he has been passing, and rise, in well-defined mamelons from broad undulating valleys of tolerable extent and fertile soil. This is the central plateau of the country, the "land of Benjamin;" and these round hills are the Gibeahs, Gebas, Gibeons, and Ramahs, whose names occur so frequently in the records of this district. Retaining its ancient name almost intact, El-Jib stands on the northernmost of a couple of these mamelons, just at the place where the road to the sea parts into two branches, the one by the lower level of the Wady Suleiman, the other by the heights of the Beth-horons, to Gimzo, Lydda, and Joppa. The "wilderness of Gibeon" (2 Sam. ii. 24)—i. e. rather the waste pasture-grounds—must have been to the east, beyond the circle or suburb of cultivated fields, and towards the neighbouring swells, which bear the names of Jadireh and Bir Neballah. Its distance from Jerusalem by the main road is as nearly as possible $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles; but there is a more direct road reducing it to 5 miles.

Gib'onites, the, the people of Gibeon, and perhaps also of the three cities associated with Gibeon (Josh. ix. 17)—Hivites; and who, on the discovery of the stratagem by which they had obtained the protection of the Israelites, were condemned to be perpetual bondmen, hewers of wood and drawers of water for the congregation, and for the house of God and altar of Jehovah (Josh. ix. 23, 27). Saul appears to have broken this covenant, and in a fit of enthusiasm or patriotism to have killed some and devised a general massacre of the rest (2 Sam. xxi. 1, 2, 5). This was expiated many years after by giving up seven men of Saul's descendants to the Gibeonites, who hung them or crucified them "before Jehovah"—as a kind of sacrifice.—22. Gibeah, Saul's own town (4, 6, 9).

Gib'lites, the. The "land of the Giblete" is mentioned in connexion with Lebanon in the enumeration of the portions of the Promised Land remaining to be conquered by Joshua (Josh. xiii. 5). There is no reason to doubt that the allusion is to the inhabitants of the city GEBAL.

Giddal'ti, one of the sons of Heman, the king's seer (1 Chr. xxv. 4).

Gid'del. 1. Children of Giddel were among the Nethinim who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 47; Neh. vii. 49).—2. Bene-Giddel were also among the "servants of Solomon" who returned to Judaea in the same caravan (Ezr. ii. 56; Neh. vii. 58).

Gideon, a Manassite, youngest son of Joash of the Abiezrites, an undistinguished family who lived at Ophrah, a town probably on the west of Jordan (Judg. vi. 15), although its exact position is unknown. He was the fifth recorded Judge of Israel, and for many reasons the greatest of them all. When we first hear of him he was grown up and had sons (Judg. vi. 11, viii. 20), and from the apostrophe of the angel (vi. 12) we may conclude that he had already distinguished himself in war against the roving bands of nomadic robbers who had oppressed Israel for seven years, and whose countless multitudes (compared to locusts from their terrible devastations, vi. 5) annually destroyed all the produce of Canaan, except such as could be concealed in mountain-fastnesses (vi. 2). It was probably during this disastrous period that the emigration of Elimelech took place (Ruth i. 1, 2). When the angel appeared, Gideon was threshing wheat with a flail in the winepress, to conceal it from the predatory tyrants. His call to be a deliverer, and his destruction of Baal's altar, are related in Judg. vi. After this begins the second act of Gideon's life. Clothed by the Spirit of God (Judg. vi. 34; comp. 1 Chr. xii. 18; Luke xxiv. 49), he blew a trumpet, and was joined by Zebulun, Naphtali, and even the reluctant Asher. Strengthened by a double sign from God, he reduced his army of 32,000 by the usual proclamation (Deut. xx. 8; comp. 1 Macc. iii. 56). By a second test at "the spring of trembling" he again reduced the number of his followers to 300 (Judg. vii. 5, sq.). The midnight attack upon the Midianites, their panic, and the rout and slaughter that followed, are told in Judg. vii. The memory of this splendid deliverance took deep root in the national traditions (1 Sam. xii. 11; Ps. lxxiii. 11; Is. ix. 4, x. 26; Heb. xi. 32). After this there was a peace of 40 years, and we see Gideon in peaceful possession of his well-earned honours, and surrounded by the dignity of a numerous household (viii. 29-31). It is not improbable that, like Saul, he had owed a part of his popularity to his princely appearance (Judg. viii. 18). In this third stage of his life occur alike his most noble and his most questionable acts, viz. the refusal of the monarchy on theocratic grounds, and the irregular consecration of a jewelled ephod formed out of the rich spoils of Midian, which proved to the Israelites a temptation to idolatry, although it was doubtless intended for use in the worship of Jehovah.

Gideon, a Benjamite, father of Abidan (Num. ii. 22, vii. 60, 65, x. 24).

Gidom, a place named only in Judg. xx. 45. It would appear to have been situated between Gibeah (Tulul el-Fil) and the cliff Rimmon; but no trace of the name has yet been met with.

Gier-Eagle, an unclean bird mentioned in Lev. xi. 13 and Deut. xiv. 17. There is no reason to doubt that the racham of the Heb. Scriptures is identical in reality as in name with the racham of the Arabs, viz. the Egyptian vulture (Neophron percnopterus).

Gift. The giving and receiving of presents has in all ages been not only a more frequent, but also a more formal and significant proceeding in the East than among ourselves. We cannot adduce a more remarkable proof of the important part which presents play in the social life of the East than the fact that the Hebrew language possesses no less than fifteen different expressions for the one idea. Many of these expressions have specific meanings: for instance, minchah applies to a present from an inferior to a superior, as from subjects to a king (Judg. iii. 15; 1 K. x. 25; 2 Chr. xvii. 5); masêh expresses the converse idea of a present from a superior to an inferior, as from a king to his subjects (Esth. ii. 18). Again, shochad is a gift for the purpose of escaping punishment, presented either to a judge (Ex. xxiii. 8; Deut. x. 17), or to a conqueror (2 K. xvi. 8). It is clear that the term "gift" is frequently used where we should substitute "tribute," or "fee." The tribute of subject states was paid not in a fixed sum of money, but in kind, each nation presenting its particular product; and hence the expression "to bring presents" = to own submission (Ps. lxxviii. 29, lxxvi. 11; Is. xviii. 7). Friends brought presents to friends on any joyful occasion (Esth. ix. 19, 22), those who asked for information or advice to those who gave it (2 K. viii. 8), the needy to the wealthy from whom any assistance was expected (Gen. xliii. 11; 2 K. xv. 19, xvi. 8); on the occasion of a marriage, the bridegroom not only paid the parents for his bride (A. V. "dowry"), but also gave the bride certain presents (Gen. xxiv. 12; comp. Gen. xxiv. 22). The nature of the presents was as various as were the occasions. The mode of presentation was with as much parade as possible. The refusal of a present was regarded as a high indignity. No less an insult was it, not to bring a present when the position of the parties demanded it (1 Sam. x. 27).

Gihon. 1. The second river of Paradise (Gen. ii. 13).—2. A place near Jerusalem, memorable as the scene of the anointing and proclamation of Solomon as king (1 K. i. 33, 38, 45). The locality of Gihon will be investigated under JERUSALEM.

Gileadi, one of the priests' sons at the consecration of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 36).

Gilboa, a mountain range on the eastern side of the plain of Esdraelon, rising over the city of Jezreel (comp. 1 Sam. xxviii. 4 with xxix. 1). It is only mentioned in Scripture in connexion with one event in Israelitish history, the defeat and death of Saul and Jonathan by the Philistines (1 Sam. xxxi. 1; 2 Sam. i. 6, xxi. 12; 1 Chr. x. 1, 8). Of the identity of Gilboa with the ridge which stretches eastward, from the ruins of Jezreel, no doubt can be entertained. The village is now called Jalbuu. The range of Gilboa extends in length some ten miles from W. to E. The greatest height is not more than 500 or 600 feet above the plain. Their modern local name is Jebel Fuhlah.

Gil'ead. 1. A mountainous region east of the Jordan; bounded on the north by Bashan, on the east by the Arabian plateau, and on the south by Moab and Ammon (Gen. xxxi. 21; Deut. iii. 12-17). It is sometimes called "Mount Gilead" (Gen. xxxi. 25), sometimes "the land of Gilead" (Num. xxxii. 1); and sometimes simply "Gilead" (Ps. lx. 7; Gen. xxxvii. 25); but a comparison of the several passages shows that they all mean the same thing. The name Gilead, as is usual in Palestine, describes the physical aspect of the country. It signifies "a hard rocky region." The statements in Gen. xxxi. 48, are not opposed to this etymology. The old name of the district was Gilead, but by a slight change in the pronunciation, the radical letters being retained, the meaning was made beautifully applicable to the "heap of stones" Jacob and Laban had built up—"the heap of witness." Those acquainted with the modern Arabs and their literature will see how intensely such a play upon the word would be appreciated by them. The extent of Gilead we can ascertain with tolerable exactness from incidental notices in the Holy Scriptures. The Jordan was its western border (1 Sam. xii. 7; 2 K. x. 33). A comparison of a number of passages shows that the river Hieromax, the modern Sheriat el-Mandhar, separated it from Bashan on the north. On the east the mountain range melts away gradually into the high plateau of Arabia. The boundary of Gilead is here not so clearly defined, but it may be regarded as running along the foot of the range. The valley of Heshbon may, in all probability, be the southern boundary of Gilead. Gilead thus extended from the parallel of the south end of the Sea of Galilee to that of the north end of the Dead Sea—about 60 miles; and its average breadth scarcely exceeded 20. The section of Gilead lying between the Jablok and the Hieromax is now called Jebel Ajlun; while that to the south of the Jablok constitutes the modern province of Belka. One of the most conspicuous peaks in the mountain range still retains the ancient name, being called Jebel Jil'ad, "Mount Gilead." The mountains of Gilead have a real elevation of from two to three thousand feet; but their apparent elevation on the western side is much greater, owing to the depression of the Jordan valley, which averages about 1000 feet. Their outline is singularly uniform, resembling a massive wall running along the horizon. The name Gilead occurs several times in the history of the Maccabees (1 Macc. v. 9 sq.).—2. Possibly the name of a mountain west of the Jordan, near Jezreel (Judg. vii. 3). We are inclined, however, to agree with the suggestion of Clericus and others, that the true reading in this place should be Gilboa.—3. Son of Machir, grandson of Manasseh (Num. xxvi. 29, 30).—4. The father of Jephthah (Judg. xi. 1, 2).

Gil'eadites, the, Judg. xii. 4, 5; Num. xxvi. 29; Judg. x. 3. A branch of the tribe of Manasseh, descended from Gilead. There appears to have been an old standing feud between them and the Ephraimites, who taunted them with being deserters. See Judg. xii. 4, which may be rendered, "And the men of Gilead smote Ephraim, because they said, Runagates of Ephraim are ye (Gilead is between Ephraim and Manasseh);" the last clause being added parenthetically.

Gil'gal. 1. The site of the first camp of the Israelites on the west of the Jordan, the place at which they passed the first night after crossing the river, and where the twelve stones were set up which had been taken from the bed of the stream (Josh. iv. 19, 20, comp. 3); where also they kept their first passover in the land of Canaan (v. 10). It was in the "end of the east of Jericho" (A. V. "in the east border of Jericho") apparently on a hillock or rising ground (v. 3, comp. 9) in the Arboth-Jericho (A. V. "the plains"), that is, the not depressed district of the Ghor which lay between the town and the Jordan (v. 10). (2.) We again encounter Gilgal in the time of Saul, when it seems to have exchanged its military associations for those of sanctity. (3.) We again have a glimpse of it, some sixty years later, in the history or David's return to Jerusalem (2 Sam. xix.). Beyond the general statements above quoted, the sacred text contains no indications of the position of Gilgal. Neither in the Apocrypha nor the N. T. is it mentioned. No modern traveller has succeeded in eliciting the name, or in discovering a probable site. In Van de Velde's map (1858) a spot named Mo-harfer, a little S.E. of er-Riha, is marked as possible; but no explanation is afforded either in his Syria, or his Memoir. But, 2. this was certainly a distinct place from the Gilgal which is connected with the last scene in the life of Elijah, and with one of Elisha's miracles (2 K. ii.). The mention of Baal-shalisha (iv. 42) gives a clue to its situation, when taken with the notice of Eusebius (Onom., Bethsarisia) that that place was fifteen miles from Diospolis (Lydda) towards the north. In that very position stand now the ruins bearing the name of Jiljileh, i. e. Gilgal.—3. The "KING OF THE NATIONS OF GILGAL," or rather perhaps the "king of Goim-at-Gilgal," is mentioned in the catalogue of the chiefs overthrown by Joshua (Josh. ii. 23). The name occurs next to DOR (29) in an enumeration apparently proceeding southwards, and therefore the position of the Jiljileh just named is not wholly inappropriate. A place of the same name has also been discovered nearer the centre of the country, to the left of the main north road, four miles from Shiloh (Seiltin), and rather more than the same distance from Bethel (Beitln). It may be the Beth-Gilgal of Neh. xii. 29; while the Jiljileh north of Lydd may be that of Josh. xii. 23. Another Gilgal, under the slightly different form of Kilkilieh, lies about two miles E. of Keft Saba.—4. A Gilgal is spoken of in Josh. xv. 7, in describing the north border of Judah.

Gil'oh, a town in the mountainous part of Judah, named in the first group, with Debir and Eshtemoah (Josh. xv. 51); it was the native place of the famous Ahithophel (2 Sam. xv. 12). The site has not yet been met with.

Gilonite, the, native of Giloh (2 Sam. xv. 12; xxiii. 34).

Gim'zo, a town which with its dependent villages was taken possession of by the Philistines in the reign of Ahaz (2 Chr. xxviii. 18). The name (Jimzu) still remains attached to a large village between two and three miles S.W. of Lydda, south of the road between Jerusalem and Jaffa.

Gin, a trap for birds or beasts: it consisted of a net (Is. viii. 14), and a stick to act as a springe (Am. iii. 5).

Gi'nath, father of Tibni (1 K. xvi. 21, 22).

Gi'netho, one of the chief of the priests and Levites who returned to Judaea with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 4). He is doubtless the same person as Gi'nethem, a priest who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 6).

Girdle, an essential article of dress in the East, and worn both by men and women. The common girdle was made of leather (2 K. i. 8; Matt. iii. 4), like that worn by the Bedouins of the present day. A finer girdle was made of linen (Jer. xiii. 1; Ez. xvi. 10), embroidered with silk, and sometimes with gold and silver thread (Dan. x. 5; Rev. i. 13, xv. 6), and frequently studded with gold and precious stones or pearls. The manufacture of these girdles formed part of the employment of women (Prov. xxxi. 24). The girdle was fastened by a clasp of gold or silver, or tied in a knot so that the ends hung down in front, as in the figures on the ruins of Persepolis. It was worn by men about the loins (Is. v. 27, xi. 5). The girdle of women was generally looser than that of the men, and was worn about the hips, except when they were actively engaged (Prov. xxxi. 17). The military girdle was worn about the waist; the sword or dagger was suspended from it (Judg. iii. 16; 2 Sam. xx. 8; Ps. xlv. 3). Hence girding up the loins denotes preparation for battle or for active exertion. In times of mourning, girdles of sackcloth were worn as marks of humiliation and sorrow (Is. iii. 24, xxii. 12). In consequence of the costly materials of which girdles were made, they were frequently given as presents (1 Sam. xviii. 4; 2 Sam. xviii. 11). They were used as pockets, as among the Arabs still, and as purses, one end of the girdle being folded back for the purpose (Matt. x. 9; Mark vi. 8). The abnet, or girdle worn by the priests about the close-fitting tunic (Ex. xxviii. 39, xxxix. 29), is described by Josephus as made of linen so fine of texture as to look like the slough of a snake, and embroidered with flowers of scarlet, purple, blue, and fine linen. It was about four fingers' broad, and was wrapped several times round the priest's body, the ends hanging down to the feet. The "curious girdle" (Ex. xxviii. 8) was made of the same materials and colours as the ephod, that is of "gold, blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen." Josephus describes it as sewn to the breastplate. After passing once round it was tied in front upon the seam, the ends hanging down.

Gi'rgashites, the, one of the nations who were in possession of Canaan before the entrance thither of the children of Israel. The name occurs in the following passages:—Gen. x. 16, xv. 21; Deut. vii. 1; Josh. iii. 10, xiv. 11; 1 Chr. i. 14; Neh. ix. 8.

Gi'rgasite, the (Gen. x. 16). See the foregoing.

Gi'spa, one of the overseers of the Nethinim, in "the Ophel," after the return from captivity (Neh. xi. 21).

Gi'tah-Hopher, Josh. xix. 13. [GATH-HEPHER.]

Gittaim, a place incidentally mentioned in 2 Sam. iv. 3. Gittaim is again mentioned in the list of places inhabited by the Benjamites after their return from the captivity. Gittaim is the dual form of the word Gath, which suggests the Philistine plain as its locality. But there is no evidence for or against this.

Gi'tites, the 600 men who followed David from Gath, under Ittai the Gittite (2 Sam. xv. 18, 19), and who probably acted as a kind of body-guard.

Obed-edom "the Gittite" may have been so named from the town of Gittaim in Benjamin (2 Sam. iv. 3; Neh. xi. 33), or from Gath-rimmon.

Gi'tith, a musical instrument, by some supposed to have been used by the people of Gath; and by others to have been employed at the festivities of the vintage (Ps. viii., lxxxi., lxxxiv.).

Gi'zonite, the. "The sons of Hashem the Gizonite" are named amongst the warriors of David's guard (1 Chr. xi. 34). Kennicott concludes that the name should be GOUNI.

Glass. The Heb. word occurs only in Job xxviii. 17, where in A. V., it is rendered "crystal." It seems that Job xxviii. 17 contains the only allusion to glass found in the O. T., and even this reference is disputed. In spite of this absence of specific allusion to glass in the sacred writings, the Hebrews must have been aware of the invention. From paintings representing the process of glass-blowing which have been discovered at Beni-Hassan, and in tombs at other places, we know that the invention is at least as remote as the age of Osirtasen the first (perhaps a contemporary of Joseph), 3500 years ago. Fragments too of wine-vases as old as the Exodus have been discovered in Egypt. The art was known to the ancient Assyrians. There is little doubt that the honour of the discovery belongs to the Egyptians. Glass was not only known to the ancients, but used by them far more extensively than in modern times. The Egyptians knew the art of cutting, grinding, and engraving it, and they could even inlay it with gold or enamel, and "permeate opaque glass with designs of various colours." Besides this they could colour it with such brilliancy as to be able to imitate precious stones in a manner which often defied detection. In the N. T. glass is alluded to as an emblem of brightness (Rev. iv. 6, xv. 2, xxi. 18).

Gleaning. The remarks under CORNER on the definite character of the rights of the poor, or rather of poor relations and dependants, to a share of the crop, are especially exemplified in the instance of Ruth gleaning in the field of Boaz. The gleaning of fruit trees, as well as of cornfields, was reserved for the poor.

Glede, the old name for the common kite (milvus ater) occurs only in Deut. xiv. 13 among the unclean birds of prey.

Gnat, mentioned only in the proverbial expression used by our Saviour in Matt. xxiii. 24.

Goat. The equivalent terms in the Hebrew are (1) malnéd (Judg. iii. 31) and (2) dàrebân (1 Sam. xiii. 21; Eccl. xii. 11). The latter may refer to anything pointed, and the context of Eccl. xii. requires rather the sense of a peg or nail, anything in short which can be fastened; while in 1 Sam. xiii. the point of the ploughshare is more probably intended. The former does probably refer to the goat, the long handle of which might be used as a formidable weapon. The instrument, as still used in the countries of southern Europe and western Asia, consists of a rod about eight feet long, brought to a sharp point and sometimes cased with iron at the head.

Goat. Of the Hebrew words which are translated goat and she-goat in A. V. the most common is éx, which denotes either a he-goat or a she-goat. All the other words, with two exceptions, denote the he-goat. These are yé'dûn, wild or mountain goats (1 Sam. xxiv. 2; Job xxxix. 1, and Ps. civ. 18); and akho, rendered the wild goat in Deut.

xv. 5. It is more properly the tragelaphus or goat-deer. There appear to be two or three varieties of the common goat (Hircus aegagrus) at present bred in Palestine and Syria, but whether they are identical with those which were reared by the ancient Hebrews it is not possible to say. The most marked varieties are the Syrian goat (Capra Mambrika, Linn.), and the Angora goat (Capra Angorensis, Linn.), with fine long hair. There is also a variety that differs but little from British specimens. As to the ye'dim ("wild goats," A. V.), it is not at all improbable that some species of ibex is denoted, perhaps the Capra Sinaitica, the Bedeu or Jaala of Egypt and Arabia.

Long-eared Syrian goat.

Goat, Scape. [ATONEMENT, DAY OF.].

Go'ath, a place apparently in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, and named, in connexion with the hill Gareb, only in Jer. xxxi. 39.

Gob, a place mentioned only in 2 Sam. xxi. 18, 19, as the scene of two encounters between David's warriors and the Philistines. In the parallel account in 1 Chr. xx. 4, the name is given as GEZER. On the other hand the LXX. and Syriac have Gath in the first case, a name which in Hebrew somewhat resembles Gob.

Goblet, a circular vessel for wine or other liquid.

Gog. 1. A Reubenite (1 Chr. v. 4), son of Shemaiah. 2. [MAGOG.]

Golan, a city of Bashan (Deut. iv. 43) allotted out of the half tribe of Manasseh to the Levites (Josh. xxi. 27), and one of the three cities of refuge east of the Jordan (xx. 8). Its very site is now unknown. The city of Golan is several times referred to by Josephus; he, however, more frequently speaks of the province which took its name from it, Gaulanitis. It seems that when the city of Golan rose to power it became the head of a large province, the extent of which is pretty accurately given by Josephus. It lay east of Galilee, and north of Gadarithis (GADARA). The river Hieromax may be regarded as the south border of Gaulanitis. The Jordan from the Sea of Galilee to its fountains at Dan and Caesarea-Philippi, formed the western boundary. It is important to observe that the boundaries of the modern province of Jaulán (which is the Arabic form of the Hebrew Golan), correspond so far with those of Gaulanitis; we may, therefore, safely assume that their northern and eastern boundaries are also identical. Jaulán is bounded on the north by Jedár (the ancient Ithuraea), and on the east by Haurán. The greater part of Gaulanitis is a flat and fertile table-land, well watered, and clothed with luxuriant grass. It is probably to this region the name Mishor is given in 1 K. xx. 23, 25—"the plain" in which the Syrians were overthrown by the Israelites, near Aphek, which perhaps stood upon the site of the modern Flt. The western side of Gaulanitis, along the Sea of Galilee, is steep, rugged, and bare. It was once densely populated, but is now almost completely deserted.

Gold, the most valuable of metals, from its colour, lustre, weight, ductility, and other useful properties (Plin. H. N. dxxiii. 19). Hence it is used as an emblem of purity (Job xxiii. 10) and nobility (Lam. iv. 1). Gold was known from the very earliest times (Gen. ii. 11). It was at first chiefly used for ornaments, &c. (Gen. xxiv. 22). Coined money was not known to the ancients till a comparatively late period; and on the Egyptian tombs gold is represented as being weighed in rings for commercial purposes. (Comp. Gen. xlii. 21). Gold was extremely abundant in ancient times (1 Chr. xxii. 14; 2 Chr. i. 15, ix. 9; Nah. ii. 9; Dan. iii. 1); but this did not depreciate its value, because of the enormous quantities consumed by the wealthy in furniture, &c. (1 K. vi. 22, x. passim; Cant. iii. 9, 10; Esth. i. 6; Jer. x. 9). The chief countries mentioned as producing gold are Arabia, Sheba, and Ophir (1 K. ix. 28, x. 1; Job xxviii. 16). Other gold-bearing countries were Uphaz (Jer. x. 9; Dan. x. 5) and Parvaim (2 Chr. iii. 6). Metallurgic processes are mentioned in Ps. lxxvi. 10; Prov. xvii. 3, xxvii. 21; and in Is. xlvi. 6, the trade of goldsmith (cf. Judg. xvii. 4) is alluded to in connexion with the overlaying of idols with gold-leaf.

Gol'gotha, the Hebrew name of the spot at which our Lord was crucified (Matt. xxvii. 33; Mark xv. 22; John xix. 17). By these three Evangelists it is interpreted to mean the "place of a skull." St. Luke's words are really as follows—"the place which is called 'a skull'"—not, as in the other Gospels, "of a skull," thus employing the Greek term exactly as they do the Hebrew one. Two explanations of the name are given: (1) that it was a spot where executions ordinarily took place, and therefore abounded in skulls. Or (2) it may come from the look or form of the spot itself, bald, round, and skull-like, and therefore a mound or hillock, in accordance with the common phrase—for which there is no direct authority—"Mount Calvary." Whichever of these is the correct explanation, Golgotha seems to have been a known spot. Its locality in regard to Jerusalem is fully examined in the description of the city.

Goli'ath, a famous giant of Gath, who "morning and evening for forty days" defied the armies of Israel (1 Sam. xvii.). He was possibly descended from the old Rephaim, of whom a scattered remnant took refuge with the Philistines after their dispersion by the Ammonites (Deut. ii. 20, 21; 2 Sam. xxi. 22). His height was "six cubits and a span," which, taking the cubit at 21 inches, would make him 10½ feet high. But the LXX. and Josephus read "four cubits and a span." The scene of his combat with David was the Valley of the Terebinth, between Shochoh and Azekah, probably among the western passes of Benjamin, although a confused modern tradition has given the name of Ain Jahlood (spring of Goliath) to the spring of Harod (Judg. vii. 1). In 2 Sam. xxi. 19, we find that another Goliath of Gath was slain by Elhanan, also a Bethlehemite. [ELHANAN.]

Gomer. 1. The eldest son of Japheth, and the father of Ashkenaz, Riphath, and Togarmah (Gen. x. 2, 3). His name is subsequently noticed but once (Ez. xxxviii. 6) as an ally or subject of the Scythian king Gog. He is generally recognised as the progenitor of the early Cimmerians, of the later Cimbri and the other branches of the Celtic family, and of the modern Gael and Cymry, the latter preserving with very slight deviation the original name.—2. The daughter of Diblaim, and concubine of Hosea (i. 3).

Gomorrah, one of the five "cities of the plain," or "vale of Siddim," that under their respective kings joined battle there with Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv. 2-8) and his allies, by whom they were discomfited till Abraham came to the rescue. Four out of the five were afterwards destroyed by the Lord with fire from heaven (Gen. xix. 23-29). One of them only, Zoar or Bela, which was its original name, was spared at the request of Lot, in order that he might take refuge there. Of these Gomorrah seems to have been only second to Sodom in importance, as well as in the wickedness that led to their overthrow. What that atrocity was may be gathered from Gen. xix. 4-8. Their geographical position is discussed under SODOM.

Gomorrah, the manner in which the name GOMORRAH is written in the A. V. of the Apocryphal books and the N. Testament.

Gopher wood. Only once in Gen. vi. 14. The Heb. word does not occur in the cognate dialects. The A. V. has made no attempt at translation. Two principal conjectures have been proposed:—1. That the "trees of Gopher" are any trees of the resinous kind, such as pine, fir, &c. 2. That Gopher is cypress.

Gorgias, a general in the service of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc. iii. 38), who was appointed by his regent Lysias to a command in the expedition against Judaea (B.C. 166), in which he was defeated by Judas Maccabaeus with great loss (1 Macc. iv. 1 ff.). At a later time (B.C. 164) he held a garrison in Jamnia, and defeated the forces of Joseph and Azarias, who attacked him contrary to the orders of Judas (1 Macc. v. 56 ff.; 2 Macc. xii. 32). The account of Gorgias in 2 Macc. is very obscure.

Gortyna, a city of Crete, and in ancient times its most important city, next to Cnossus (1 Macc. xv. 23). It was nearly half-way between the Eastern and Western extremities of the island, and seems to have been the capital under the Romans.

Goshen, a word of uncertain etymology, the name of a part of Egypt where the Israelites dwelt for the whole period of their sojourn in that country. It is usually called the "land of Goshen," but also Goshen simply. It appears to have borne another name, "the land of Rameses" (Gen. xlvii. 11), unless this be the name of a district of Goshen. It was between Joseph's residence at the time and the frontier of Palestine, and apparently the extreme province towards that frontier (Gen. xlvii. 29). |

Gen. xlvii. 33, 34 shows that Goshen was scarcely regarded as a part of Egypt Proper, and was not peopled by Egyptians—characteristics that would positively indicate a frontier-province. The next mention of Goshen confirms the previous inference that its position was between Canaan and the Delta (Gen. xlvii. 1, 5, 6, 11). Goshen was a pastoral country where some of Pharaoh's cattle were kept. The clearest indications of the exact position of Goshen are those afforded by the narrative of the Exodus. The Israelites set out from the town of Rameses in the land of Goshen, made two days' journey to "the edge of the wilderness," and in one day more reached the Red Sea. At the starting-point two routes lay before them, "the way of the land of the Philistines . . . that [was] near," and "the way of the wilderness of the Red Sea" (Ex. xiii. 17, 18). From these indications we infer that the land of Goshen must have in part been near the eastern side of the ancient Delta, Rameses lying within the valley now called the Wādī-t-Tumeylāt, about thirty miles in a direct course from the ancient western shore of the Arabian Gulf. The results of an examination of Biblical evidence are that the land of Goshen lay between the eastern part of the ancient Delta and the western border of Palestine, that it was scarcely a part of Egypt Proper, was inhabited by other foreigners besides the Israelites, and was in its geographical names rather Semitic than Egyptian; that it was a pasture-land, especially suited to a shepherd-people, and sufficient for the Israelites, who there prospered, and were separate from the main body of the Egyptians; and lastly, that one of its towns lay near the western extremity of the Wādī-t-Tumeylāt. These indications seem to us decisively to indicate the Wādī-t-Tumeylāt, the valley along which anciently flowed the canal of the Red Sea. Other identifications seem to us to be utterly untenable.—2. The "land" or the "country of Goshen," is twice named as a district in Southern Palestine (Josh. x. 41, xi. 16), apparently between the south country and the lowlands of Judah.—3. A town of the same name is once mentioned in company with Debir, Socoh, and others, as in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 51). It has not yet been identified.

Gospels. The name Gospel is applied to the four inspired histories of the life and teaching of Christ contained in the New Testament, of which separate accounts will be given in their place. They were all composed during the latter half of the first century: those of St. Matthew and St. Mark some years before the destruction of Jerusalem; that of St. Luke probably about A.D. 64; and that of St. John towards the close of the century. Before the end of the second century, there is abundant evidence that the four Gospels, as one collection, were generally used and accepted. For this we have the testimony of Irenaeus, Papias, Tertullian, Origen, Theophilus, and Tatian. The Muratorian fragment describes the Gospels of Luke and John; but time and carelessness seem to have destroyed the sentences relating to Matthew and Mark. Another source of evidence is open to us, in the citations from the Gospels found in the earliest writers. Barnabas, Clemens Romanus, and Polycarp, quote passages from them, but not with verbal exactness. The testimony of Justin Martyr (born about A.D. 99, martyred A.D. 165) is much fuller; many of his quotations are found verbatim in the Gospels of St. Matthew, St. Luke, and St. John, and possibly of St. Mark also, whose words it is more difficult to separate. Besides these, St. Matthew appears to be quoted by the author of the Epistle to Diognetus, by Hegesippus, Irenaeus, Tatian, Athenagoras, and Theophilus. Eusebius records that Pantaenus found in India (? the south of Arabia) Christians who used the Gospel of St. Matthew. All this shows that long before the end of the second century the Gospel of St. Matthew was in general use. From the fact that St. Mark's Gospel has few places peculiar to it, it is more difficult to identify citations not expressly assigned to him; but Justin Martyr and Athenagoras appear to quote his Gospel, and Irenaeus does so by name. St. Luke is quoted by Justin, Irenaeus, Tatian, Athenagoras, and Theophilus; and St. John by all of these, with the addition of Ignatius, the Epistle to Diognetus, and Polycrates. From these we may conclude that before the end of the second century the Gospel collection was well known and in general use. There is yet another line of evidence. The heretical sects, as well as the Fathers of the Church, knew the Gospels; and as there was the greatest hostility between them, if the Gospels had become known in the Church after the dissension arose, the heretics would never have accepted them as genuine from such a quarter. But the Gnostics and Marcionites arose early in the second century; and therefore it is probable that the Gospels were then accepted, and thus they are traced back almost to the times of the Apostles. As a matter of literary history, nothing can be better established than the genuineness of the Gospels. On comparing these four books one with another, a peculiar difficulty claims attention, which has had much to do with the controversy as to their genuineness. In the fourth Gospel the narrative coincides with that of the other three in a few passages only. Putting aside the account of the Passion, there are only three facts which John relates in common with the other Evangelists. Two of these are, the feeding of the five thousand, and the storm on the Sea of Galilee (ch. vi.). The third is the anointing of His feet by Mary. Whilst the others present the life of Jesus in Galilee, John follows him into Judaea; nor should we know, but for him, that our Lord had journeyed to Jerusalem at the prescribed feasts. The received explanation is the only satisfactory one, namely, that John, writing last, at the close of the first century, had seen the other Gospels, and purposely abstained from writing anew what they had sufficiently recorded. In the other three Gospels there is a great amount of agreement. If we suppose the history that they contain to be divided into sections, in 42 of these all the three narratives coincide, 12 more are given by Matthew and Mark only, 5 by Mark and Luke only, and 14 by Matthew and Luke. To these must be added 5 peculiar to Matthew, 2 to Mark, and 9 to Luke; and the enumeration is complete. But this applies only to general coincidence as to the facts narrated: the amount of verbal coincidence, that is, the passages either verbally the same, or coinciding in the use of many of the same words, is much smaller. Without going minutely into the examination of examples, which would be desirable if space permitted, the leading facts connected with the subject may be thus summed up:—The verbal and material agreement of the three first Evangelists is such as does not occur in any other authors who have written independently of one another. The verbal agreement is greater where the spoken words of others are cited than where facts are recorded; and greatest in quotations of the words of our Lord. But in some leading events, as in the call of the four first disciples, that of Matthew, and the Transfiguration, the agreement even in expression is remarkable: there are also narratives where there is no verbal harmony in the outset, but only in the crisis or emphatic part of the story (Matt. viii. 3 = Mark i. 41 = Luke v. 13, and Matt. xiv. 19, 20 = Mark vi. 41–43 = Luke ix. 16, 17). The language of all three is Greek, with Hebrew idioms: the Hebraisms are most abundant in St. Mark, and fewest in St. Luke. In quotations from the Old Testament, the Evangelists, or two of them, sometimes exhibit a verbal agreement, although they differ from the Hebrew and from the Septuagint version (Matt. iii. 3 = Mark i. 3 = Luke iii. 4. Matt. iv. 10 = Luke iv. 8. Matt. xi. 10 = Mark i. 2 = Luke vii. 27, &c.). Except as to 24 verses, the Gospel of Mark contains no principal facts which are not found in Matthew and Luke; but he often supplies details omitted by them, and these are often such as would belong to the graphic account of an eye-witness. There are no cases in which Matthew and Luke exactly harmonise, where Mark does not also coincide with them. In several places the words of Mark have something in common with each of the other narratives, so as to form a connecting link between them, where their words slightly differ. The examples of verbal agreement between Mark and Luke are not so long or so numerous as those between Matthew and Luke, and Matthew and Mark; but as to the arrangement of events Mark and Luke frequently coincide, where Matthew differs from them. These are the leading particulars; but they are very far from giving a complete notion of a phenomenon that is well worthy of that attention and reverent study of the sacred text by which alone it can be fully and fairly apprehended. The attempts at a solution are so many, that they can be more easily classified than enumerated. The first and most obvious suggestion would be, that the narrators made use of each other's work. Accordingly Grotius, Mill, Wetstein, Griesbach, and many others, have endeavoured to ascertain which Gospel is to be regarded as the first; which is copied from the first; and which is the last, and copied from the other two. But the theory in its crude form is in itself most improbable; and the wonder is that so much time and learning have been devoted to it. It assumes that an Evangelist has taken up the work of his predecessor, and, without substantial alteration, has made a few changes in form, a few additions and retrenchment, and has then allowed the whole to go forth under his name. The supposition of a common original from which the three Gospels were drawn, each with more or less modification, would naturally occur to those who rejected the notion that the Evangelists had copied from each other. It appeared to Eichhorn that the portions which are common to all the three Gospels were contained in a certain common document, from which they all drew. He considers himself entitled to assume that he can reconstruct the original document, and also that there must have been four other documents to account for the phenomena of the text. Thus he makes—1. The original document. 2. An altered copy which St. Matthew used. 3. An altered copy which St. Luke used. 4. A third copy, made from the two preceding, used by St. Mark. 5. A fourth altered copy, used by St. Matthew and St. Luke in common. As there is no external evidence worth considering that this original or any of its numerous copies ever existed, the value of this elaborate hypothesis must depend upon its furnishing the only explanation, and that a sufficient one, of the facts of the text. Bishop Marsh, however, finds it necessary, in order to complete the account of the text, to raise the number of documents to eight, still without producing any external evidence for the existence of any of them; and this, on one side, deprives Eichhorn's theory of the merit of completeness, and, on the other, presents a much broader surface to the obvious objections. He assumes the existence of—1. A Hebrew original. 2. A Greek translation. 3. A transcript of No. 1, with alterations and additions. 4. Another, with another set of alterations and additions. 5. Another, combining both the preceding, used by St. Mark, who also used No. 2. 6. Another, with the alterations and additions of No. 3, and with further additions, used by St. Matthew. 7. Another, with those of No. 4 and further additions, used by St. Luke, who also used No. 2. 8. A wholly distinct Hebrew document, in which our Lord's precepts, parables, and discourses were recorded, but not in chronological order; used both by St. Matthew and St. Luke. It will be allowed that this elaborate hypothesis, whether in the form given it by Marsh or by Eichhorn, possesses almost every fault that can be charged against an argument of that kind. For every new class of facts a new document must be assumed to have existed. The "original Gospel" is supposed to have been of such authority as to be circulated everywhere; yet so defective, as to require annotation from any hand, so little revered that no hand spared it. If all the Evangelists agreed to draw from such a work, it must have been widely if not universally accepted in the Church; and yet there is no record of its existence. The force of this dilemma has been felt by the supporters of the theory: if the work was of high authority, it would have been preserved, or at least mentioned; if of lower authority, it could not have become the basis of three canonical Gospels: and various attempts have been made to escape from it. There is another supposition to account for these facts, of which perhaps Gieseler has been the most acute expositor. It is probable that none of the Gospels was written until many years after the day of Pentecost on which the Holy Spirit descended on the assembled disciples. From that day commenced at Jerusalem the work of preaching the Gospel and converting the world. Prayer and preaching were the business of the Apostles' lives. Now their preaching must have been, from the nature of the case, in great part historical; it must have been based upon an account of the life and acts of Jesus of Nazareth. There was no written record to which the hearers might be referred for historical details, and therefore the preachers must furnish not only inferences from the life of our Lord, but the facts of the life itself. The preaching, then, must have been of such a kind as to be to the hearers what the reading of lessons from the Gospels is to us. There is no improbability in supposing that in the course of twenty or thirty years' assiduous teaching, without a written Gospel, the matter of the apostolic preaching should have taken a settled form. Not only might the Apostles think it well that their own accounts should agree, as in substance so in form; but the teachers whom they sent forth, or left behind in the churches they visited, would have to be prepared for their mission; and, so long as there was no written Gospel to put into their hands, it might be desirable that the oral instruction should be as far as possible one and the same to all. The guidance of the Holy Spirit supplied for a time such aid as made a written Gospel unnecessary; but the Apostles saw the dangers and errors which a traditional Gospel would be exposed to in the course of time; and, whilst they were still preaching the oral Gospel in the strength of the Holy Ghost, they were admonished by the same Divine Person to prepare those written records which were hereafter to be the daily spiritual food of all the Church of Christ. Nor is there anything unnatural in the supposition that the Apostles intentionally uttered their witness in the same order, and even, for the most part, in the same form of words. The language of their first preaching was the Syro-Chaldaic, which was a poor, and scanty language; and though Greek was now widely spread, and was the language even of several places in Palestine, though it prevailed in Antioch, whence the first missions to Greeks and Hellenists, or Jews who spoke Greek, proceeded (Acts xi. 20, xiii. 1-3), the Greek tongue, as used by Jews, partook of the poverty of the speech which it replaced; as, indeed, it is impossible to borrow a whole language without borrowing the habits of thought upon which it has built itself. It is supposed, then, that the preaching of the Apostles, and the teaching whereby they prepared others to preach, as they did, would tend to assume a common form, more or less fixed; and that the portions of the three Gospels which harmonise most exactly owe their agreement not to the fact that they were copied from each other, although it is impossible to say that the later writer made no use of the earlier one, nor to the existence of any original document now lost to us, but to the fact that the apostolic preaching had already clothed itself in a settled or usual form of words, to which the writers inclined to conform without feeling bound to do so; and the differences which occur, often in the closest proximity to the harmonies, arise from the feeling of independence with which each wrote what he had seen and heard, or, in the case of Mark and Luke, what apostolic witnesses had told him. The harmonies begin with the baptism of John; that is, with the consecration of the Lord to His Messianic office; and with this event probably the ordinary preaching of the Apostles would begin, for its purport was that Jesus is the Messiah, and that as Messiah He suffered, died, and rose again. They are very frequent as we approach the period of the Passion, because the sufferings of the Lord would be much in the mouth of every one who preached the Gospel, and all would become familiar with the words in which the Apostles described it. But as regards the Resurrection, which differed from the Passion in that it was a fact which the enemies of Christianity felt bound to dispute (Matt. xxviii. 15), it is possible that the divergence arose from the intention of each Evangelist to contribute something towards the weight of evidence for this central truth. Accordingly, all the four, even St. Mark (xvi. 14), who oftener throws a new light upon old ground than opens out new, mention distinct acts and appearances of the Lord to establish that He was risen indeed. The verbal agreement is greater where the words of others are recorded, and greatest of all where they are those of Jesus, because here the apostolic preaching would be especially exact; and where the historical fact is the utterance of certain words, the duty of the historian is narrowed to a bare record of them. That this opinion would explain many of the facts connected with the text is certain. Whether, besides conforming to the words and arrangement of the apostolic preaching, the Evangelists did in any case make use of each other's work or not, it would require a more careful investigation of details to discuss than space permits. How does this last theory bear upon our belief in the inspiration of the Gospels? Supposing that the portion of the three first Gospels which is common to all has been derived from the preaching of the Apostles in general, then it is drawn directly from a source which we know from our Lord Himself to have been inspired. Now the inspiration of an historical writing will consist in its truth, and in its selection of events. Everything narrated must be substantially and exactly true, and the comparison of the Gospels one with another offers us nothing that does not answer to this test. There are differences of arrangement of events; here some details of a narrative or a discourse are supplied which are wanting there; and if the writer had professed to follow a strict chronological order, or had pretended that his record was not only true but complete, then one inversion of order, or one omission of a syllable, would convict him of inaccuracy. But if it is plain—if it is all but avowed—that minute chronological data are not part of the writer's purpose—if it is also plain that nothing but a selection of the facts is intended, or, indeed, possible (John xxi. 25)—then the proper test to apply is, whether each gives us a picture of the life and ministry of Jesus of Nazareth that is self-consistent and consistent with the others, such as would be suitable to the use of those who were to believe on His Name—for this is their evident intention. About the answer there should be no doubt. We have seen that each Gospel has its own features, and that the divine element has controlled the human but not destroyed it. But the picture which they conspire to draw is one full of harmony. The histories are true according to any test that should be applied to a history; and the events that they select—though we could not presume to say that they were more important than what are omitted, except from the fact of the omission—are at least such as to have given the whole Christian Church a clear conception of the Redeemer's life, so that none has ever complained of insufficient means of knowing Him.

Gotholi'as. Josias, son of Gotholias, was one of the sons of Elam who returned from Babylon with Esdras (1 Esd. viii. 33).

Gotho'niel, father of Chabris (Jud. vi. 15).

Gourd. 1. Kiháyón, only in Jon. iv. 6-10. A difference of opinion has long existed as to the plant which is intended by this word; but there can be no reasonable doubt that the kiháyón which afforded shade to the prophet Jonah before Nineveh is the Ricinus communis, or castor-oil plant, which, formerly a native of Asia, is now naturalised in America, Africa, and the south of Europe. This plant varies considerably in size, being in India a tree, but in England seldom attaining a greater height than three or four feet. The leaves are large and palmate, with serrated lobes, and would form an excellent shelter for the sun-stricken prophet. The seeds contain the oil so well known under the name of "castor-oil," which has for ages been in high repute as a medicine. 2. Paku'óth and peká'im. (i.) In 2 K. iv. 39, a fruit used as food, disagreeable to the taste, and supposed to be poisonous. (ii.) In 1 K. vi. 18, vii. 24, as an architectural ornament, where A. V. "knops." With regard to the "wild gourds" (paku'óth) of 2 K. iv. 39, which one of "the sons of the prophets" gathered ignorantly, supposing them to be good for food, there can be no doubt that it is a species of the gourd tribe (Cucurbitaceae), which contains some plants of a very bitter and dangerous character. The leaves and tendrils of this family of plants bear some resemblance to those of the vine. Hence the expression "wild vine;" and as several kinds of Cucurbitaceae, such as melons, pumpkins, &c., are favourite articles of refreshing food amongst the Orientals, we can easily understand the cause of the mistake. The etymology of the word from péka', "to split or burst open," has been thought to favour the identification of the plant with the Ecballium elaterium or "squirting cucumber," so called from the elasticity with which the fruit, when ripe, opens and scatters the seeds when touched. Celsius, Rosenmüller, Winer, and Gesenius are in favour of this explanation, and, it must be confessed, not without some reason. The old versions, however, understand the colocynth, the fruit of which is about the size of an orange. The drastic medicine in such general use is a preparation from this plant. Since the dry gourds of the colocynth, when crushed, burst with a crashing noise, there is much reason for being satisfied with an explanation which has authority, etymology, and general suitableness in its favour.

Governor. In the Auth. Ver. this one English word is the representative of no less than ten Hebrew and four Greek words. 1. Altáph, the chief of a tribe or family (Judg. vi. 15; Is. lx. 22; Mic. v. 1), and equivalent to the "prince of a thousand" of Ex. xviii. 21, or the "head of a thousand" of Num. i. 16. It is the term applied to the "dukes" of Edom (Gen. xxiv.).—2. Chóhék (Judg. v. 9), and 3. méchóhék (Judg. v. 14), denote a ruler in his capacity of laugiver and dispenser of justice (Gen. xlix. 10; Prov. viii. 15; comp. Judg. v. 14, with Is. x. 1).—4. Móshél, a ruler considered especially as having power over the property and persons of his subjects (Josh. xii. 2; Ps. cv. 20; Gen. xiv. 2). The "governors of the people," in 2 Chr. xxiii. 20, appear to have been the king's body-guard (cf. 2 K. xi. 19).—5. Nágid denotes a prominent personage, whatever his capacity. It is applied to a king as the military and civil chief of his people (2 Sam. v. 2, vi. 21; 1 Chr. xxix. 22), to the general of an army (2 Chr. xxxii. 21), and to the head of a tribe (2 Chr. xix. 11). It denotes an officer of high rank in the palace, the lord high chamberlain (2 Chr. xxviii. 7).—6. Nási. The prevailing idea in this word is that of elevation. It is applied to the chief of the tribe (Gen. xvii. 20; Num. ii. 3, &c.), to the heads of sections of a tribe (Num. iii. 32, vii. 2), and to a powerful sheikh (Gen. xxiii. 6). In general it denotes a man of elevated rank.—7. Pecháh is a word probably of Assyrian origin. It is applied in 1 K. x. 15 to the petty chieftains who were tributary to Solomon (2 Chr. ix. 14); to the military commander of the Syrians (1 K. xx. 24), the Assyrians (2 K. xviii. 24, xxiii. 6), the Chaldeans (Jer. li. 23), and the Medes (Jer. li. 38). Under the Persian viceroys, during the Babylonian captivity, the land of the Hebrews appears to have been portioned out among "governors" (pachóth) inferior in rank to the satraps (Esr. viii. 36), like the other provinces which were under the dominion of the Persian king (Neh. ii. 7, 9). It is impossible to determine the precise limits of their authority, or the functions which they had to perform. It appears from Esr. vi. 8 that these governors were entrusted with the collection of the king's taxes; and from Neh. v. 18, xii. 26, that they were supported by a contribution levied upon the people, which was technically termed "the bread of the governor" (comp. Esr. iv. 14). They were probably assisted in discharging their official duties by a council (Esr. iv. 7, vi. 6). The "governor" beyond the river had a judgment-seat at Jerusalem, from which probably he administered justice when making a progress through his province (Neh. iii. 7).—8. Pákká denotes simply a person appointed to any office. It is used of the officers proposed to be appointed by Joseph (Gen. xli. 34); of Zebul, Abimelech's lieutenant (Judg. ix. 28); of an officer of the high-priest (2 Chr. xxiv. 11); and of a priest or Levite of high rank (Neh. xi. 14, 22).—9. Shallit, a man of authority. Applied to Joseph as Pharaoh's prime minister (Gen. xlii. 6); to Arioch, the captain of the guard; to the king of Babylon (Dan. ii. 15); and to Daniel as third in rank under Belsazzar (Dan. v. 29).—10. Sar, a chief, in any capacity. The term is used equally of the general of an army (Gen. xxi. 22), or the commander of a divisor (1 K. xvi. 9, xi. 24), as of the governor of Pharaoh's prison (Gen. xxxix. 21), and the chief of his butlers and bakers (Gen. xl. 2), or herdsmen (Gen. xlvii. 6).—11. ἑθναρχης (2 Cor. xi. 32), an officer of rank under Aretas, the Arabian king of Damascus. It has been conjectured that the ethnarch of Damascus was merely the governor of the resident Jews, but it does not seem probable that an officer of such limited jurisdiction would be styled "the ethnarch of Aretas the king;" and as the term is clearly capable of a wide range of meaning, it was most likely intended to denote one who held the city and district of Damascus as the king's vassal or representative.—12. ἡγεμὼν, the procurator of Judaea under the Romans (Matt. xxvii. 2, &c.).—13. οἰκονόμος (Gal. iv. 2), a steward, apparently entrusted with the management of a minor's property.—14. ἀρχιτερίκλινος (John ii. 9), "the governor of the feast." Lightfoot supposes him to have been a kind of chaplain, who pronounced the blessings upon the wine that was drunk during the seven days of the marriage feast. He appears to have been on intimate terms with the bridegroom, and to have presided at the banquet in his stead. The duties of the master of a feast are given at full length in Eccles. xxxv. (xxxii.).

Gózan seems in the A. V. of 1 Chr. v. 26, to be the name of a river; but in Kings (2 K. xvii. 6, and xviii. 11) it is evidently applied not to a river but a country. Gozan was the tract to which the Israelites were carried away captive by Pul, Tiglath-Pileser, and Shalmaneser, or possibly Sargon. It has been variously placed; but it is probably identical with the Ganzanitis of Ptolemy, and may be regarded as represented by the Mygdoun of other writers. It was the tract watered by the Habor, the modern Khabour, the great Mesopotamian affluent of the Euphrates.

Gra'ba, 1 Esd. v. 29. [HAGABA.]

Grave. [VINE.]

Grass. 1. This is the ordinary rendering of the Hebrew word chátér (1 K. xviii. 5; Job xl. 5, Ps. civ. 14; Is. xv. 6). As the herbage rapidly fades under the parching heat of the sun of Palestine, it has afforded to the sacred writers an image of the fleeting nature of human fortunes (Job viii. 12; Ps. xxxvii. 2), and also of the brevity of human life (Is. xl. 6, 7; Ps. xc. 5).—2. In the A. V. of Jer. i. 11, "as the heifer at grass" should be "as the heifer treading out corn" (comp. Hos. x. 11).—3. In Num. xxii. 4, where mention is made of the ox licking up the grass of the field, the Heb. word is yeraé, which elsewhere is rendered green.—

4. 'eseb signifies herbs for human food (Gen. i. 30; Ps. civ. 14), but also fodder for cattle (Deut. xi. 15; Jer. xiv. 6). It is the grass of the field (Gen. ii. 5; Ex. ix. 22) and of the mountain (Is. xlii. 15; Prov. xxvii. 25). In the N. T. wherever the word grass occurs it is the representative of the Greek χόρτος.

Grasshopper [LOCUST.]

Grave [BURIAL.]

Graves (mitschâh). This word occurs in the A. V. only in 1 Sam. xvii. 6. Its ordinary meaning is a piece of defensive armour which reached from the foot to the knee, and thus protected the shin of the wearer. But the mitschâh of the above passage can hardly have been armour of this nature. It was not worn on the legs, but on the feet of Goliath, and would therefore appear to have been a kind of shoe or boot.

Greece, Greeks, Grecians. The histories of Greece and Palestine are as little connected as those of any other two nations exercising the same influence on the destinies of mankind could well be. The Homeric Epos in its widest range does not include the Hebrews, while on the other hand the Mosaic idea of the Western world seems to have been sufficiently indefinite. It is possible that Moses may have derived some geographical outlines from the Egyptians; but he does not use them in Gen. x. 2-5, where he mentions the descendants of Javan as peopling the isles of the Gentiles. From the time of Moses to that of Joel we have no notice of the Greeks in the Hebrew writings. When indeed the Hebrews came into contact with the Ionians of Asia Minor, and recognized them as the long-lost islanders of the western migration, it was natural that they should mark the similarity of sound between Javan and Iones; and the application of that name to the Asiatic Greeks would tend to satisfy in some measure a longing to realize the Mosaic ethnography. Accordingly the O. T. word which is Grecia, in A. V. Greece, Greeks, &c., is in Hebrew Javan (Joel iii. 6; Dan. viii. 21); the Hebrew, however, is sometimes retained (Is. lxvi. 19; Ez. xxvii. 13). The Greeks and Hebrews met for the first time in the slave-market. The medium of communication seems to have been the Tyrian slave-merchants. About B.C. 800 Joel speaks of the Tyrians as selling the children of Judah to the Grecians (Joel iii. 6); and in Ez. xxvii. 13 the Greeks are mentioned as bartering their brazen vessels for slaves. Prophetic notice of Greece occurs in Dan. viii. 21, &c., where the history of Alexander and his successors is rapidly sketched.

Zechariah (ix. 13) foretells the triumphs of the Maccabees against the Graeco-Syrian empire, while Isaiah looks forward to the conversion of the Greeks, amongst other Gentiles, through the instrumentality of Jewish missionaries (lxvi. 12). In 1 Macc. xii. 5-23 we have an account of an embassy and letter sent by the Lacedaemonians to the Jews. The most remarkable feature in the transaction is the claim which the Lacedaemonians prefer to kindred with the Jews, and which Areus professes to establish by reference to a book. The notices of the Jewish people which occur in Greek writers have been collected by Josephus (c. Apion. i. 22). The chief are Pythagoras, Herodotus, Choerilus, Aristotle, Theophrastus, and Hecataeus. After the complete subjugation of the Greeks by the Romans, and the absorption into the Roman empire of the kingdoms which were formed out of the dominions of Alexander, the political connexion between the Greeks and Jews as two independent nations no longer existed. The name of the country, Greece, occurs once in N. T. (Acts xx. 2), as opposed to Macedonia.

Greyhound. The translation in the text of the A. V. (Prov. xxx. 31) of the Hebrew words zazûr mothnayin, i. e. "one girt about the loins." Various are the opinions as to what animal "comely in going" is here intended. Some think "a leopard," others "an eagle," or "a man girt with armour," or "a zebra," or "a war-horse girt with trappings." But, later, Maurer (Comment. Gram. in Vet. Test.) decides unhesitatingly in favour of a "wrestler," when girt about the loins for a contest. There is great probability that he is correct.

Grinding. [MILL.]

Grove. A word used in the A. V., with two exceptions, to translate the mysterious Hebrew term Asherah, which is not a grove, but probably an idol or image of some kind. [See ASHERAH.] It is also probable that there was a connexion between this symbol or image, whatever it was, and the sacred symbolic tree, the representation of which occurs so frequently on Assyrian sculptures, and is figured below.—2. The two exceptions noticed above are Gen. xxi. 33, and 1 Sam. xxii. 6 (margin). In the religions of the ancient heathen world groves play a prominent part. In the old times altars only were erected to the gods. It was thought wrong to shut up the gods within walls, and hence, as Pliny expressly tells us, trees were the first temples; and from the earliest times groves are mentioned in connexion with religious worship (Gen. xii. 6, 7, xiii. 18; Deut. xi. 30; A. V. "plain"). The groves were generally found connected with temples, and often had the right of affording an asylum. Some have supposed that even the Jewish Temple had an enclosure planted with palm and cedar (Ps. xcii. 12, 13) and olive (Ps. lii. 8), as the mosk which stands on its site now has. This is more than doubtful; but we know that a celebrated oak stood by the sanctuary at Shechem (Josh. xiv. 26; Judg. ix. 6). There are in Scripture many memorable trees: e.g. Alon-bachuth (Gen. xxxv. 8), the tamarisk in Gibeah (1 Sam. xxii. 6), the terebinth in Shechem (Jos. xxiv. 26) under which the law was set up, the palm-tree of Deborah (Judg. iv. 5), the terebinth of enchantments (Judg. ix. 37), the terebinth of wanderers (Judg. iv. 11), and others (1 Sam. xiv. 2, x. 3, sometimes "plain" in A. V.). This observation of particular trees was among the heathen extended to a regular worship of them.

Guard. (1.) Tabbach originally signified a "cook;" and as butchering fell to the lot of the cook in Eastern countries it gained the secondary sense of "executioner," and is applied to the body-guard of the kings of Egypt (Gen. xxxvii. 36) and Babylon (2 K. xxv. 8; Jer. xxxix. 9, xl. 1; Dan. ii. 14).—(2.) Râts properly means a "runner," and is the ordinary term employed for the attendants of the Jewish kings, whose office it was to run before the chariot (2 Sam. xv. 1; 1 K. i. 5), and to form a military guard (1 Sam. xxii. 17; 2 K. x. 25, xi. 6; 2 Chr. xii. 10).—(3.) The terms mishmereth and mishnar express properly the act of watching, but are occasionally transferred to the persons who kept watch (Neh. iv. 9, 22, vii. 3, xii. 9; Job vii. 12).

Gud'gadah, Deut. x. 7. [HOR HAGIDGAD.]

Guest. [HOSPITALITY.]

Gul'loth, a Hebrew term of infrequent occurrence in the Bible, and used only in two passages—and those identical relations of the same occurrence—to denote a natural object, viz. the springs added by the great Caleb to the south land in the neighbourhood of Debir, which formed the dowry of his daughter Achsah (Josh. xv. 19; Judg. i. 15). The springs were "upper" and "lower"—possibly one at the top and the other at the bottom of a ravine or glen; and they may have derived their unusual name from their appearance being different to that of the ordinary springs of the country. The root (gdal) has the force of rolling or tumbling over, and perhaps this may imply that they welled up in that round or mushroom form which is not uncommon here, though apparently most rare in Palestine. The rendering of the Vat. LXX. is singular. In Josh. it has τὴν βοτθῶνις, and τὴν γοναθλάν, the latter doubtless a mere corruption of the Hebrew. The Alex. MS., as usual, is faithful to the Hebrew text. In Judges both have λύτρωσις. An attempt has been lately made by Dr. Rosen to identify these springs with the Ain Nunkur near Hebron (see Zeitschrift der D. M. G. 1857); but the identification can hardly be received without fuller confirmation (Stanley, S. & P. App. §54). [DEBIR.]

Guni. 1. A son of Naphtali (Gen. xlii. 24; 1 Chr. vii. 13), the founder of the family of the Gunites (Num. xxvi. 48).—2. A descendant of Gad (1 Chr. v. 15).

Gunites, the descendants of Guni, son of Naphtali (Num. xxvi. 48).

Gur, the going up to, an ascent or rising ground, at which Ahaziah received his death-blow while flying from Jehu after the slaughter of Joram (2 K. ix. 27). It was probably some place more than usually steep on the difficult road which leads from the plain of Esdraelon to Jenin.

Gur Baal, a place or district in which dwelt Arabians, as recorded in 2 Chr. xxvi. 7. It appears from the context to have been in the country lying between Palestine and the Arabian peninsula; but this, although probable, cannot be proved. The Arab geographers mention a place called Baal, on the Syrian road, north of El-Medeneh.

H

Haahash'tari, a man, or a family, immediately descended from Ashur, "father of Tekoa" by his second wife Naarah (1 Chr. iv. 6).

Habai'ah. Bene-Habai'ah were among the sons of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zeubbabel (Ezr. ii. 61; Neh. vii. 63).

Habakkuk 1. Of the facts of the prophet's life we have no certain information, and with regard to the period of his prophecy there is great division of opinion. The Rabbinical tradition that Habakkuk was the son of the Shunammite woman whom Elisha restored to life is repeated by Abrahanel in his commentary, and has no other foundation than a fanciful etymology of the prophet's name, based on the expression in 2 K. iv. 16. In the title of the history of Bel and the Dragon, as found in the LXX. version in Origen's Tetrapla, the author is called "Habakkuk the son of Joshua, of the tribe of Levi." Pseudo-Epiphanius and Dorotheus relate that when Jerusalem was sacked by Nebuchadnezzar, Habakkuk fled to Ostracine, and remained there till after the Chaldeans had left the city, when he returned to his own country, and died at his farm two years before the return from Babylon, B.C. 538. It was during his residence in Judaea that he is said to have carried food to Daniel in the den of lions at Babylon.—2. The Rabbinical traditions agree in placing Habakkuk with Joel and Nahum in the reign of Manasseh. Davidson decides in favour of the early part of the reign of Josiah. Delitzsch concludes that Habakkuk delivered his prophecy about the 12th or 13th year of Josiah (B.C. 630 or 629). This view receives some confirmation from the position of his prophecy in the O. T. Canon. The prophet commences by announcing his office and important mission (i. 1). He bewails the corruption and social disorganization by which he is surrounded, and cries to Jehovah for help (i. 2-4). Next follows the reply of the Deity, threatening swift vengeance (i. 5-11). The prophet, transferring himself to the near future foreshadowed in the divine threatenings, sees the rapacity and boastful impiety of the Chaldean hosts, but, confident that God has only employed them as the instruments of correction, assumes (ii. 1) an attitude of hopeful expectancy, and waits to see the issue. He receives the divine command to write in an enduring form the vision of God's retributive justice, as revealed to his prophetic eye (ii. 2, 3). The doom of the Chaldeans is first foretold in general terms (ii. 4-6), and the announcement is followed by a series of denunciations pronounced upon them by the nations who had suffered from their oppression (ii. 6-20). The strophical arrangement of these "woes" is a remarkable feature of the prophecy. The whole concludes with the mag-ancient Psalm in chap. iii., "Habakkuk's Pindaric ode" (Ewald), a composition unrivalled for boldness of conception, sublimity of thought, and majesty of diction.

Habazini'ah, apparently the head of one of the families of the RECHABITES (Jer. xxv. 3).

Hab'bauc, the form in which the name of the prophet HABAKKUK is given in the Apocrypha (Bel. 38-39).

Habergeon, a coat of mail covering the neck and breast. [ARMS.]

Ha'bor, the "river of Gozan" (2 K. xvii. 6. and xviii. 11), is identified beyond all reasonable doubt with the famous affluent of the Euphrates, which is called Aborrhas by Strabo, and Chaboras by Pliny and Ptolemy. The stream in question still bears the name of the Khabour. It flows from several sources in the mountain-chain, which in about the 37th parallel closes in the valley of the Tigris upon the south—the Mons Masius of Strabo and Ptolemy, at present the Kharej Dagh.

Hachali'ah, the father of Nehemiah (Neh. i. 1; x. 1).

Hach'ilah, the Hill, a hill apparently situated in a wood in the wilderness or waste land in the neighbourhood of Ziph; in the fastnesses, or passes, of which David and his six hundred followers were lurking when the Ziphites informed Saul of his whereabouts (1 Sam. xxiii. 19; comp. 14, 15, 18). No trace of the name Hachilah has yet been discovered. By Eusebius and Jerome Echela is named as a village then standing; but the situation—seven miles from Eleutheropolis, i.e. on the the N.W. of Hebron—would be too far from Ziph and Maon.

Hach'moni, Son of, and The Hach'monite (1 Chr. xxvii. 32, xi. 11), both renderings—the former the correct one—of the same Hebrew words. Hachmon or Hachmoni was no doubt the founder of a family to which these men belonged: the actual father of Jashobeam was Zabdiel (1 Chr. xxvii. 2), and he is also said to have belonged to the Korhites (1 Chr. xii. 6), possibly the Levites descended from Korah.

Hadad was originally the indigenous appellation of the Sun among the Syrians, and was thence transferred to the king, as the highest of earthly authorities. The title appears to have been an official one, like Pharaoh. It is found occasionally in the altered form Hadar (Gen. xxv. 15, xxxv. 39, compared with 1 Chr. i. 30, 50). 1. Son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15; 1 Chr. i. 30).—2. A king of Edom who gained an important victory over the Midianites on the field of Moab (Gen. xxvi. 35; 1 Chr. i. 46).—3. Also a king of Edom, with Paul his capital (1 Chr. i. 50).—4. A member of the royal house of Edom (1 K. xi. 14 ff.). In his childhood he escaped the massacre under Joab, in which his father appears to have perished, and fled with a band of followers into Egypt. Pharaoh, the predecessor of Solomon's father-in-law, treated him kindly, and gave him his sister-in-law in marriage. After David's death Hadad resolved to attempt the recovery of his dominion: Pharaoh in vain discouraged him, and upon this he left Egypt and returned to his own country. It does not appear from the text, as it now stands, how Hadad became subsequently to this an "adversary unto Solomon" (ver. 14), still less how he gained the sovereignty over Syria (ver. 25). The LXX., however, refers ver. 25 entirely to him, and substitutes for Aram, (Syria), Edom. This reduces the whole to a consistent and intelligible narrative.

Hadade'zer (2 Sam. viii. 3-12; 1 K. xi. 23). [HADAREZER.]

Ha'dad-Bim'mon is, according to the ordinary interpretation of Zech. xii. 11, a place in the valley of Megiddo, named after two Syrian idols, where a national lamentation was held for the death of king Josiah.

Ha'dar, a son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15), written in 1 Chr. i. 30 Hadud. The mountain Hadad, belonging to Teyma on the borders of the Syrian desert, north of El-Medeenah, is perhaps the most likely to be correctly identified with the ancient dwellings of this tribe.—2. One of the kings of Edom, successor of Baal-hanan ben-Achor (Gen. xxxi. 30), and about contemporary with Saul.

Hadarezer, son of Rehob (2 Sam. viii. 3), the king of the Aramite state of Zobah, who, while on his way to "establish his dominion" at the Euphrates, was overtaken by David, and defeated with great loss both of chariots, horses, and men (1 Chr. xviii. 3, 4). After the first repulse of the Ammonites and their Syrian allies by Joab, Hadarezer sent his army to the assistance of his kindred the people of Maachah, Rehob, and Ishob (1 Chr. xix. 16; 2 Sam. x. 15, comp. 8). Under the command of Shephach, or Shobach, the captain of the host, they crossed the Euphrates, joined the other Syrians, and encamped at a place called Helam. David himself came from Jerusalem to take the command of the Israelite army. As on the former occasion, the rout was complete.

Had'ashah, one of the towns of Judah, in the maritime low country (Josh. xv. 37 only). No satisfactory reason presents itself why Hadashah should not be the ADASA of the Maccabean history. Hitherto it has eluded discovery in modern times.

Hadas'sah, a name, probably the earlier name, of Esther (Esth. ii. 7).

Hadad'tah. According to the A. V. one of the towns of Judah in the extreme south (Josh. xv. 25); but the accents of the Hebrew connect the word with that preceding it, as if it were Hazorchadattah, i.e. New Hazor, in distinction from the place of the same name in ver. 23.

Ha'did, a place named, with Lod (Lydda) and Ono, only in the later books of the history (Ezr. ii. 33; Neh. vii. 37, xi. 34). In the time of Eusebius a town called Aditha, or Adatha, existed to the east of Diospolis (Lydda). This was probably Hadid. About three miles east of Lydd stands a village called el-Hadithah, marked in Van de Velde's map.

Had'la', a man of Ephraim (2 Chr. xxviii. 12).

Had'oram, the fifth son of Joktan (Gen. x. 27; 1 Chr. i. 21). His settlements, unlike those of many of Joktan's sons, have not been identified.—2. Son of Tou or Toi king of Hamath; his father's ambassador to congratulate David on his victory over Hadarezer king of Zobah (1 Chr. xviii. 10).—3. The form assumed in Chronicles by the name of the intendant of taxes under David, Solomon, and Rehoboam (2 Chr. x. 18). In Kings the name is given in the longer form of ADONIRAM, but in Samuel (2 Sam. xx. 24) as ADORAM.

Ha'drach, a country of Syria, mentioned once only, by the prophet Zechariah (ix. 1, 2). The position of the district, with its borders, is here generally stated; but the name itself seems to have wholly disappeared. It still remains unknown.

Ha'gab. Bene-Hagab were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 46).

Hag'aba. Bene-Hagaba were among the Nethinim who came back from captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 48). The name is slightly different in form from Hag'abah, under which it is found in the parallel list of Ezr. ii. 45.

Ha'gar, an Egyptian woman, the handmaid, or slave, of Sarah (Gen. xvi. 1), whom the latter gave as a concubine to Abraham, after he had dwelt ten years in the land of Canaan and had no children by Sarah (xvi. 2 and 3). That she was a bondswoman is stated both in the O. T. and in the N. T., in the latter as part of her typical character. It is recorded that "when she saw that she had conceived, her mistress was despised in her eyes" (4), and Sarah, with the anger, we may suppose, of a free woman, rather than of a wife, reproached Abraham for the results of her own act. Hagar fled, turning her steps towards her native land through the great wilderness traversed by the Egyptian road. By the fountain in the way to Shur, the angel of the Lord found her, charged her to return and submit herself under the hands of her mistress, and delivered the remarkable prophecy respecting her unborn child, recorded in ver. 10-12. On her return, she gave birth to Ishmael, and Abraham was then eighty-six years old. Mention is not again made of Hagar in the history of Abraham until the feast at the weaning of Isaac, when "Sarah saw the son of Hagar the Egyptian, which she had born unto Abraham, mocking"; and in exact sequence with the first flight of Hagar, we now read of her expulsion. The verisimilitude, oriental exactness, and simple beauty of this story are internal evidences attesting its truth apart from all other evidence. The name of Hagar occurs elsewhere only when she takes a wife to Ishmael (xli. 21); and in the genealogy (xv. 12). St. Paul refers to her as the type of the old covenant, likening her to Mount Sinai, the Mount of the Law (Gal. iv. 22 seq.). In Mohammedan tradition Hagar is represented as the wife of Abraham.

Ha'garenes, Ha'garites, a people dwelling to the east of Palestine, with whom the tribe of Reuben made war in the time of Saul (1 Chr. v. 10, 18-20). The same people, as confederate against Israel, are mentioned in Ps. lxxxiii. Who these people were is a question that cannot readily be decided, though it is generally believed that they were named after Hagar. It is uncertain whether the important town and district of Hejer represent the ancient name and a dwelling of the Hagarenes; but it is reasonable to suppose that they do. Hejer, or Hejerà, is the capital town, and also a subdivision, of the province of north-eastern Arabia called El-Bahreyn, on the borders of the Persian Gulf.

Ha'gerite, the. Jaziz the Hagerite, i. e. the descendant of Hagar, had the charge of David's sheep (1 Chr. xxvii. 31).

Haggai, the tenth in order of the minor prophets, and first of those who prophesied after the Captivity. With regard to his tribe and parentage both history and tradition are alike silent. In the absence of any direct evidence on the point, it is more than probable that he was one of the exiles who returned with Zerubbabel and Joshua. The rebuilding of the temple, which was commenced in the reign of Cyrus (B.C. 535), was suspended during the reigns of his successors, Cambyases and Pseudo-Smerdis, in consequence of the determined hostility of the Samaritans. On the accession of Darius Hystaspis (B.C. 521), the prophets Haggai and Zechariah urged the renewal of the undertaking, and obtained the permission and assistance of the king (Ezr. v. 1, vi. 14). According to tradition, Haggai was born in Babylon, was a young man when he came to Jerusalem, and was buried with honour near the sepulchres of the priests. The names of Haggai and Zechariah are associated in the LXX. in the titles of Ps. 137, 145-148; in the Vulgate in those of Ps. 111, 145; and in the Peshito Syriac in those of Ps. 125, 126, 145, 146, 147, 148. It may be that tradition assigned to these prophets the arrangement of the above-mentioned psalms for use in the temple service. According to Pseudo-Epiphanius, Haggai was the first who chanted the Hallelujah in the second temple. The style of his writing is generally tame and prosaic, though at times it rises to the dignity of severe invective, when the prophet rebukes his countrymen for their selfish indolence and neglect of God's house. But the brevity of the prophecies is so great, and the poverty of expression which characterises them so striking, as to give rise to a conjecture, not without reason, that in their present form they are but the outline or summary of the original discourses. They were delivered in the second year of Darius Hystaspis (B.C. 520), at intervals from the 1st day of the 6th month to the 24th day of the 9th month in the same year.

Hag'geri. "MIBHAR son of Haggeri," was one of the mighty men of David's guard, according to 1 Chr. xi. 38. The parallel passage—2 Sam. xxiii. 36—has "Bani the Gadite," which is probably the correct reading.

Hag'gi, second son of Gad (Gen. xlii. 16; Num. xxvi. 15).

Hag'gi'ah, a Meravite Levite (1 Chr. vi. 30).

Haggites, the, a Gadite family sprung from Haggi (Num. xxvi. 15).

Hag'gith, one of David's wives, the mother of Adonijah (2 Sam. iii. 4; 1 K. i. 5, 11, ii. 13; 1 Chr. iii. 2).

Ha'gis, 1 Esd. v. 34. [HATHIL.]

Ha'i. The form in which the well-known place AI appears in the A. V. on its first introduction (Gen. xii. 8, xiii. 3).

Hair. The Hebrews were fully alive to the importance of the hair as an element of personal beauty, whether as seen in the "curled locks, black as a raven," of youth (Cant. v. 11), or in the "crown of glory" that encircled the head of old age (Prov. xvi. 31). The customs of ancient nations in regard to the hair varied considerably: the Egyptians allowed the women to wear it long, but kept the heads of men closely shaved from early childhood. The Greeks admired long hair whether in men or women. The Assyrians also wore it long. The Hebrews on the other hand, while they encouraged the growth of hair, observed the natural distinction between the sexes by allowing the women to wear it long (Luke vii. 38; John xi. 2; 1 Cor. xi. 6 ff.), while the men restrained theirs by frequent clipping to a moderate length. This difference between the Hebrews and the surrounding nations, especially the Egyptians, arose no doubt partly from natural taste, but partly also from legal enactments: clipping the hair in a certain manner and offering the locks, was in early times connected with religious worship: and hence the Hebrews were forbidden to "round the corners of their heads" (Lev. xix. 27), meaning the locks along the forehead and temples, and behind the ears. The prohibition against cutting off the hair on the death of a relative (Deut. xiv. 1) was probably grounded on a similar reason. In addition to these regulations, the Hebrews dreaded baldness, as it was frequently the result of leprosy (Lev. xiii. 40 ff.), and hence formed one of the disqualifications for the priesthood (Lev. xxi. 20, LXX.). Long hair was admired in the case of young men; it is especially noticed in the description of Absalom's person (2 Sam. xiv. 26). The care requisite to keep the hair in order in such cases must have been very great, and hence the practice of wearing long hair was unusual, and only resorted to as an act of religious observance. In times of affliction the hair was altogether cut off (Is. iii. 17 24, xv. 2; Jer. vii. 29). Tearing the hair (Ezr. ix. 3) and letting it go dishevelled, were similar tokens of grief. Wigs were commonly used by the Egyptians, but not by the Hebrews. The usual and favourite colour of the hair was black (Cant. v. 11), as is indicated in the comparisons to a "flock of goats" and the "tents of Kedar" (Cant. iv. 1, i. 5): a similar hue is probably intended by the purple of Cant. vii. 5. A fictitious hue was occasionally obtained by sprinkling gold-dust on the hair. It does not appear that dyes were ordinarily used. The approach of age was marked by a sprinkling (Hos. vii. 9) of gray hairs, which soon overspread the whole head (Gen. xlii. 38, xlv. 29; 1 K. ii. 6, 9; Prov. xvi. 31, xx. 29). Pure white hair was deemed characteristic of the Divine Majesty (Dan. vii. 9; Rev. i. 14). The chief beauty of the hair consisted in curls, whether of a natural or artificial character. With regard to the mode of dressing the hair, we have no very precise information; the terms used are of a general character, as of Jezebel (2 K. ix. 30), of Judith (x. 3). The terms used in the N. T. (1 Tim. ii. 9; 1 Pet. iii. 3) are also of a general character; Schleusner understands them of curling rather than plaiting. The arrangement of Samson's hair into seven locks, or more properly braids (Judg. xvi. 13, 19) involves the practice of plaiting, which was also familiar to the Egyptians and Greeks. The locks were probably kept in their place by a fillet as in Egypt.

Egyptian Wigs. (Wilkinson.)

The Hebrews, like other nations of antiquity, anointed the hair profusely with ointments, which were generally compounded of various aromatic ingredients (Ruth iii. 3; 2 Sam. xiv. 3; Ps. xxiii. 5, xlv. 7, xcii. 10; Eccl. ix. 8; Is. iii. 24); more especially on occasion of festivities or hospitality (Matt. vi. 17, xxvi. 7; Luke vii. 46). It appears to have been the custom of the Jews in our Saviour's time to swear by the hair (Matt. v. 36), much as the Egyptian women still swear by the side-lock, and the men by their beards (Lane, i. 52, 71, notes).

Hak'katan. Johanan, son of Hakkatan, was the chief of the Bene-Azgad who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 12).

Hak'koz, a priest, the chief of the seventh course in the service of the sanctuary, as appointed by David (1 Chr. xxiv. 10). In Ezr. ii. 61 and Neh. iii. 4, 21, the name occurs again as Koz in the A. V.

Haku'pha. Bene-Hakupha were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 51; Neh. vii. 53).

Ha'lah is probably a different place from the Calah of Gen. x. 11. It may with some confidence be identified with the Chalctis of Ptolemy. The name is thought to remain in the modern Gla, a large mound on the upper Khabour.

Ha'lak, the Mount, a mountain twice, and twice only, named as the southern limit of Joshua's conquests (Josh. xi. 17, xii. 7), but which has not yet been identified.

Hal'hul, a town of Judah in the mountain district (Josh. xv. 58). The name still remains unaltered, attached to a conspicuous hill a mile to the left of the road from Jerusalem to Hebron, between 3 and 4 miles from the latter.

Ha'li, a town on the boundary of Asher, named between Helkath and Beten (Josh. xix. 25). Nothing is known of its situation.

Halicarnassus in CARIA, a city of great renown, as being the birthplace of Herodotus and of the later historian Dionysius, and as embellished by the Mausoleum erected by Artemisia, but of no Biblical interest except as the residence of a Jewish population in the periods between the Old and New Testament histories (1 Macc. xv. 23). The modern name of the place is Budram.

Hall, used of the court of the high-priest's house (Luke xxii. 55). In Matt. xxvii. 27, and Mark xv. 16, "hall" is syn. with "praetorium," which in John xviii. 28 is in A. V. "judgment-hall." The hall or court of a house or palace would probably be an enclosed but uncovered space, on a lower level than the apartments of the lowest floor which looked into it.

Hallelujah. [ALLELUIA.]

Hallo'hesh, one of the "chief of the people" who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 24).

Halo'hesh. Shallum, son of Hal-joresh, was "ruler of the half part of Jerusalem" at the time of the repair of the wall by Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 12).

Ham. 1. The name of one of the three sons of Noah, apparently the second in age. It probably signifies "warm" or "hot." This meaning seems to be confirmed by that of the Egyptian word KEM (Egypt), which we believe to be the Egyptian equivalent of Ham, and which, as an adjective, signifies "black," probably implying warmth as well as blackness. Of the history of Ham nothing is related except his irreverence to his father, and the curse which that patriarch pronounced. The sons of Ham are stated to have been "Cush and Misraim and Phut and Canaan" (Gen. x. 6; comp. 1 Chr.

1. 8). The name of Ham alone, of the three sons of Noah, if our identification be correct, is known to have been given to a country (Ps. lxxvii. 51, cv. 23, cvi. 22). The settlements of the descendants of Cush have occasioned the greatest difficulty to critics. We have been led to the conclusion that settlements of Cush extended from Babylonia along the shores of the Indian Ocean to Ethiopia above Egypt, and to the supposition that there was an eastern as well as a western Cush. If, as we suppose, Mizraim in the lists of Gen. x. and 1 Chr. i. stand for Mizrim, we should take the singular Mazar to be the name of the progenitor of the Egyptian tribes. It is remarkable that Mazar appears to be identical in signification with Ham, so that it may be but another name of the patriarch. In this case the mention of Mizraim (or Mizrim) would be geographical, and not indicative of a Mazar, son of Ham. The Mizraites, like the descendants of Ham, occupy a territory wider than that bearing the name of Mizraim. We may, however, suppose that Mizraim included all the first settlements, and that in remote times other tribes besides the Philistines migrated, or extended their territories. Phut has been always placed in Africa, where we find, in the Egyptian inscriptions, a great nomadic people corresponding to it. Respecting the geographical position of the Canaanites there is no dispute, although all the names are not identified. The Hamathites alone of those identified were settled in early times wholly beyond the land of Canaan. Perhaps there was a primordial extension of the Canaanite tribes after their first establishment in the land called after their ancestor, for before the specification of its limits as those of their settlements it is stated "afterward were the families of the Canaanites spread abroad" (Gen. x. 18, 19). One of their most important extensions was to the north-east. Philologists are not agreed as to a Hamitic class of language. Recently Bunsen has applied the term "Hamitism," or as he writes it, Chamitism, to the Egyptian language, or rather family. Sir H. Rawlinson has applied the term Cushite to the primitive language of Babylonia, and the same term has been used for the ancient language of the southern coast of Arabia. The Biblical evidence seems at first sight, in favour of Hebrew being classed as a Hamitic rather than a Shemitic form of speech. It is called in the Bible "the language of Canaan" (Is. xix. 18), although those speaking it are elsewhere said to speak "Jewishly" (2 K. xviii. 26, 28; Is. xxxvi. 11, 13; Neh. xiii. 24). But the one term, as Gesenius remarks, indicates the country where the language was spoken, the other as evidently indicates a people by whom it was spoken. Elsewhere we might find evidence of the use of a so-called Shemitic language by nations either partly or wholly of Hamite origin. This evidence would favour the theory that Hebrew was Hamitic; but on the other hand we should be unable to dissociate Shemitic languages from Shemitic peoples. The Egyptian language would also offer great difficulties, unless it were held to be but partly of Hamitic origin, since it is mainly of an entirely different class to the Shemitic. It is mainly Nigritian, but it also contains Shemitic elements. We are of opinion that the groundwork is Nigritian, and that the Shemitic part is a layer added to a complete Nigritian language. An inquiry into the history of the Hamite nations presents considerable difficulties, since it cannot be determined in the cases of the most important of those commonly held to be Hamite that they were purely of that stock. It is certain that the three most illustrious Hamite nations—the Cushites, the Phoenicians, and the Egyptians—were greatly mixed with foreign peoples. There are some common characteristics, however, which appear to connect the different branches of the Hamite family, and to distinguish them from the children of Japheth and Shem. Their architecture has a solid grandeur that we look for in vain elsewhere. The early history of each of the chief Hamite nations shows great power of organising an extensive kingdom, of acquiring material greatness, and checking the inroads of neighbouring nomadic peoples.—2. According to the Masoretic text (Gen. xiv. 5), Chedorlaomer and his allies smote the Zuzim in a place called Ham. If, as seems likely, the Zuzim be the same as the Zamzummin, Ham must be placed in what was afterwards the Ammonite territory. Hence it has been conjectured by Tuch, that Ham is but another form of the name of the chief stronghold of the children of Ammon, Rabbah, now An-man.—3. In the account of a migration of the Simeonites to the valley of Gedor, and their destroying the pastoral inhabitants, the latter, or possibly their predecessors, are said to have been "of Ilam" (1 Chr. iv. 40). This may indicate that a Hamite tribe was settled here, or, more precisely, that there was an Egyptian settlement.

Ha-man, the chief minister or vizier of king Ahasuerus (Esth. iii. 1). After the failure of his attempt to cut off all the Jews in the Persian empire, he was hanged on the gallows which he had erected for Mordecai. The Targum and Josephus interpret the description of him—the Agagite—as signifying that he was of Amalekitish descent: but he is called a Macedonian by the LXX. in Esth. ix. 24.

Ha'math appears to have been the principal city of Upper Syria from the time of the Exodus to that of the prophet Amos. It was situated in the valley of the Orontes, about half way between its source near Baalbek, and the bend which it makes at Jisr-hadid. It thus naturally commanded the whole of the Orontes valley, from the low screen of hills which forms the watershed between the Orontes and the Litány—the "entrance of Hamath," as it is called in Scripture (Num. xxiv. 8; Josh. xiii. 5, &c.)—to the defile of Daphne below Antioch; and this tract appears to have formed the kingdom of Hamath, during the time of its independence. The Hamathites were a Hamitic race, and are included among the descendants of Canaan (Gen. x. 18). We must regard them as closely akin to the Hittites on whom they bordered, and with whom they were generally in alliance. Nothing appears of the power of Hamath, until the time of David (2 Sam. viii. 10). Hamath seems clearly to have been included in the dominions of Solomon (1 K. iv. 21-4). The "store-cities," which Solomon "built in Hamath" (2 Chr. viii. 4), were perhaps staples for trade. In the Assyrian inscriptions of the time of Ahab (B.C. 900) Hamath appears as a separate power, in alliance with the Syrians of Damascus, the Hittites, and the Phoenicians. About three-quarters of a century later Jeroboam the second "recovered Hamath" (2 K. xiv. 28). Soon afterwards the Assyrians took it (2 K. xviii. 34, xix. 13, &c.), and from this time it ceased to be a place of much importance.

Antiochus Epiphanes changed its name to Epiphanesia. The natives, however, called it Hamath, even in St. Jerome's time, and its present name, Hamah, is but slightly altered from the ancient form.

Ha'math-Zo'bah (2 Chr. viii. 3) has been conjectured to be the same as Hamath. But the name Hamath-Zobah would seem rather suited to another Hamath which was distinguished from the "Great Hamath" by the suffix "Zobah."

Ham'athite, the, one of the families descended from Canaan, named last in the list (Gen. x. 18; 1 Chr. i. 16).

Ham'math, one of the fortified cities in the territory allotted to Naphtali (Josh. xix. 35). It is not possible from this list to determine its position, but the notices of the Talmudists leave no doubt that it was near Tiberias, one mile distant—in fact that it had its name, Chammath, "hot baths," because it contained those of Tiberias. Josephus mentions it under the name of Emmaus as a village not far from Tiberias. The Hamudm, at present three in number, still send up their hot and sulphureous waters, at a spot rather more than a mile south of the modern town. In the list of Levitical cities given out of Naphtali (Josh. xxi. 32) the name of this place seems to be given as HAMMOTH-DOR, and in 1 Chr. vi. 76 it is further altered to HAMMON.

Hammeda'tha, father of the infamous Haman (Esth. iii. 1, 10, viii. 5, iv. 24).

Hamm'el'ech, lit. "the king," unnecessarily rendered in the A. V. as a proper name (Jer. xxxvi. 26, xxxviii. 6).

Hammer. The Hebrew language has several names for this indispensable tool. (1.) Pattish, which was used by the gold-beater (Is. xli. 7, A. V. "carpenter") as well as by the quarry-man (Jer. xxii. 29). (2.) Makkabâh, properly a tool for hollowing, hence a stonemason's mallet (1 K. vi. 7). (3.) Halmûth, used only in Judg. v. 26. (4.) A kind of hammer, named nappêts, Jer. li. 20 (A. V. "battle-axe"), or mêphits, Prov. xxv. 18 (A. V. "maul"), was used as a weapon of war.

Ham'molek'eth, daughter of Machir and sister of Gilead (1 Chr. vii. 17, 18).

Ham'mon. 1. A city in Asher (Josh. xix. 28), apparently not far from Zidon-rabbah.—2. A city allotted out of the tribe of Naphtali to the Levites (1 Chr. vi. 76), and answering to the somewhat similar names HAMMATH and HAMMOTH-DOR in Joshua.

Ham'moth-Dor, a city of Naphtali, allotted with its suburbs to the Gershonite Levites, and for a city of refuge (Josh. xxi. 32). Unless there were two places of the same or very similar name in Naphtali, this is identical with HAMMATH.

Ham'onah, the name of a city mentioned in Ezekiel (xxix. 16).

Ha'mon-Gog, the Valley of, the name to be bestowed on a ravine or glen, previously known as "the ravine of the passengers on the east of the sea," after the burial there of "Gog and all his multitude" (Ez. xxxix. 11, 15).

Ha'mor, a Hivite (or according to the Alex. LXX. a Horite), who at the time of the entrance of Jacob on Palestine was prince of the land and city of Shechem (Gen. xxxiii. 19, xxxiv. 2, 4, 6, 8, 13, 18, 20, 24, 26).

Ha'muel, a man of Simeon; son of Mishma, of the family of Shaul (1 Chr. iv. 26).

Ha'mul, the younger son of Pharez, Judah's son by Tamar (Gen. xli. 12; 1 Chr. ii. 5).

Ha'mulites, the, the family of the preceding (Num. xxvi. 21).

Ham'tal, daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah; one of the wives of king Josiah (2 K. xxiii. 31, xxiv. 18; Jer. lii. 1).

Han'ameel, son of Shallum, and cousin of Jeremiah (Jer. xxxii. 7, 8, 9, 12; and comp. 44).

Han'an. 1. One of the chief people of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chr. viii. 23).—2. The last of the six sons of Azel, a descendant of Saul (1 Chr. viii. 38, ix. 44).—3. "Son of Maachah," i. e. possibly a Syrian of Aram-Maacah, one of the heroes of David's guard (1 Chr. xi. 43).—4. The sons of Hanan were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 46; Neh. vii. 49).—5. One of the Levites who assisted Ezra in his public exposition of the law (Neh. viii. 7). The same person is probably mentioned in x. 10.—6. One of the "heads" of the "people," who also sealed the covenant (x. 22).—7. Another of the chief laymen on the same occasion (x. 26).—8. Son of Zaccur, son of Mattaniah, whom Nehemiah made one of the storekeepers of the provisions collected as tithes (Neh. xiii. 13).—9. Son of Ig'daliah (Jer. lxxv. 4).

Han'aneel, the Tower of, a tower which formed part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 1, xii. 39). From these two passages, particularly from the former, it might almost be inferred that Hananeel was but another name for the Tower of Meah: at any rate they were close together, and stood between the sheep-gate and the fish-gate. This tower is further mentioned in Jer. xxxi. 38. The remaining passage in which it is named (Zech. xiv. 10) also connects this tower with the "corner gate," which lay on the other side of the sheep-gate.

Hana'ni.—1. One of the sons of Heman, and head of the 18th course of the service (1 Chr. xxv. 4, 25).—2. A seer who rebuked (B.C. 941) Asa, king of Judah (2 Chr. xvi. 7). For this he was imprisoned (10). He (or another Hanani) was the father of Jehu the seer, who testified against Baasha (1 K. xvi. 1, 7), and Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xix. 2, xx. 34).—3. One of the priests who in the time of Ezra had taken strange wives (Ezr. x. 20).—4. A brother of Nehemiah (Neh. i. 2) was afterwards made governor of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (vii. 2).—5. A priest mentioned in Neh. xii. 36.

Hananiah. 1. One of the 14 sons of Heman, and chief of the 16th course of singers (1 Chr. xxv. 4, 5, 23).—2. A general in the army of king Uzziah (2 Chr. xxvi. 11).—3. Father of Zedekiah, in the reign of Jehoikim (Jer. xxvi. 12).—4. Son of Azur, a Benjamite of Gibeon and a false prophet in the reign of Zedekiah king of Judah. In the 4th year of his reign, B.C. 595, Hananiah withstood Jeremiah the prophet, and publicly prophesied in the temple that within two years Jeconiah and all his fellow-captives, with the vessels of the Lord's house which Nebuchadnezzar had taken away to Babylon, should be brought back to Jerusalem (Jer. xxviii.): an indication that treacherous negotiations were already secretly opened with Pharaoh-Hophra. Hananiah corroborated his prophecy by taking from off the neck of Jeremiah the yoke which he wore by Divine command (Jer. xxvii.) in token of the subjection of Judaea and the neighbouring countries to the Babylonian empire, and breaking it. But Jeremiah was bid to go and tell Hananiah that for the wooden yokes which he had broken he should make yokes of iron, so firm was the dominion of Babylon destined to be for seventy years. The prophet Jeremiah added this rebuke and prediction of Hananiah's death, the fulfilment of which closes the history of this false prophet. The history of Hananiah is of great interest, as throwing much light upon the Jewish politics of that eventful time, divided as parties were into the partisans of Babylon on one hand, and Egypt on the other.—6. Grandfather of Irijah, the captain of the ward at the gate of Benjamin who arrested Jeremiah, on the charge of deserting to the Chaldeans (Jer. xxxvii. 13).—7. Head of a Benjamite house (1 Chr. viii. 24).—8. The Hebrew name of Shadrach. He was of the house of David, according to Jewish tradition (Dan. i. 3, 6, 7, 11, 19; ii. 17).—9. Son of Zerubbabel (1 Chr. iii. 19), from whom CHRIST derived his descent. He is the same person who is by St. Luke called Joanna. The identity of the two names Hananiah and Joanna is apparent immediately we compare them in Hebrew.—10. One of the sons of Bebai, who returned with Ezra from Babylon (Ezr. x. 28).—11. A priest, one of the makers of the sacred ointments and incense, who built a portion of the wall of Jerusalem in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 8). He may be the same as is mentioned in ver. 30 as having repaired another portion. If so, he was son of Shilemiah; perhaps the same as is mentioned xii. 41.—12. Head of the priestly course of Jeremiah in the days of Joiakim, Neh. xii. 12.—13. Ruler of the palace at Jerusalem under Nehemiah. The arrangements for guarding the gates of Jerusalem were entrusted to him with Hanani, the Tirshatha's brother (Neh. vii. 2, 3).—14. An Israelite, Neh. x. 23.

Handicraft. (Acts xviii. 3, xix. 25; Rev. xviii. 22). In the present article brief notices can only be given of such handicraft trades as are mentioned in Scripture. 1. The preparation of iron for use either in war, in agriculture, or for domestic purposes, was doubtless one of the earliest applications of labour; and, together with iron, working in brass, or rather copper alloyed with tin, bronze, is mentioned in the same passage as practised in antediluvian times (Gen. iv. 22). We know that iron was used for warlike purposes by the Assyrians, and on the other hand that stone-tipped arrows, as was the case also in Mexico, were used in the earlier times by the Egyptians as well as the Persians and Greeks. In the construction of the Tabernacle, copper, but no iron, appears to have been used, though the use of iron was at the same period well known to the Jews, both from their own use of it and from their Egyptian education, whilst the Canaanite inhabitants of Palestine and Syria were in full possession of its use both for warlike and domestic purposes (Ex. xx. 25, xxv. 3, xxvii. 19; Num. xxv. 16; Deut. iii. 11, iv. 20, viii. 9; Josh. viii. 31, xvii. 16, 18). After the establishment of the Jews in Canaan, the occupation of a smith became recognised as a distinct employment (1 Sam. xiii. 19). The smith's work and its results are often mentioned in Scripture (2 Sam. xii. 31; 1 K. vi. 7; 2 Chr. xxvi. 14; Is. xlv. 12, liv. 16).

The worker in gold and silver must have found employment both among the Hebrews and the neighbouring nations in very early times, as appears from the ornaments sent by Abraham to Rebekah (Gen. xxiv. 22, 53, xxxv. 4, xxxviii. 18; Deut. vii. 25). But, whatever skill the Hebrews possessed, it is quite clear that they must have learned much from Egypt and its "iron furnaces," both in metal-work and in the arts of setting and polishing precious stones. Various processes of the goldsmith's work are illustrated by Egyptian monuments. After the conquest frequent notices are found both of moulded and wrought metal, including soldering, which last had long been known in Egypt; but the Phœnicians appear to have possessed greater skill than the Jews in these arts, at least in Solomon's time (Judg. viii. 24, 27, xvii. 4; 1 K. vii. 13, 45, 46; Is. xli. 7; Wisd. xv. 4; Ecclus. xxxviii. 28; Bar. vi. 50, 55, 57). 2. The work of the carpenter is often mentioned in Scripture (Gen. vi. 14; Ex. xxxvii. 1; Is. xlv. 13). In the palace built by David for himself the workmen employed were chiefly Phœnicians sent by Hiram (2 Sam. v. 11; 1 Chr. xiv. 1), as most probably were those, or at least the principal of those who were employed by Solomon in his works (1 K. v. 6). But in the repairs of the Temple, executed under Joash king of Judah, and also in the rebuilding under Zerubbabel, no mention is made of foreign workmen, though in the latter case the timber is expressly said to have been brought by sea to Joppa by Zidonians (2 K. xii. 11; 2 Chr. xxiv. 12; Ezra iii. 7). That the Jewish carpenters must have been able to carve with some skill is evident from Is. xli. 7, xlv. 13. In N.T. the occupation of a carpenter is mentioned in connexion with Joseph the husband of the Virgin Mary, and ascribed to our Lord himself by way of reproach (Mark vi. 3; Matt. xiii. 55). 3. The masons employed by David and Solomon, at least the chief of them, were Phœnicians (1 K. v. 18; Ez. xxvii. 9). Among their implements are mentioned the saw, the plumb-line, the measuring-reed. Some of these, and also the chisel and mallet, are represented on Egyptian monuments. The large stones used in Solomon's Temple are said by Josephus to have been fitted together exactly without either mortar or cramps, but the foundation stones to have been fastened with lead. For ordinary building, mortar was used; sometimes, perhaps, bitumen, as was the case at Babylon (Gen. xi. 3). The lime, clay, and straw of which mortar is generally composed in the East, require to be very carefully mixed and united so as to resist wet. The wall "daubed with untempered mortar" of Ezekiel (xii. 10) was perhaps a sort of cob-wall of mud or clay without lime, which would give way under heavy rain. The use of whitewash on tombs is remarked by our Lord (Matt. xxiii. 27). Houses infected with leprosy were required by the Law to be re-plastered (Lev. xiv. 40-45). 4. Akin to the craft of the carpenter is that of ship and boat-building, which must have been exercised to some extent for the fishing-vessels on the lake of Gennesaret (Matt. viii. 23, ix. 1; John xxi. 3, 8). Solomon built, at Ezion-Geber, ships for his foreign trade, which were manned by Phoenician crews, an experiment which Jehoshaphat endeavoured in vain to renew (1 K. ix. 26; 27, xxii. 48; 2 Chr. xx. 36, 37). 5. The perfumes used in the religious services, and in later times in the funeral rites of monarchs, imply knowledge and practice in the art of the "apothecaries," who appear to have formed a guild or association (Ex. xxx. 25, 35; Neh. iii. 8; 2 Chr. xvi. 14; Eccl. vii. 1, x. 1; Eccles. xxviii. 8). 6. The arts of spinning and weaving both wool and linen were carried on in early times, as they are still usually among the Bedouins, by women. One of the excellences attributed to the good house-wife is her skill and industry in these arts (Ex. xxv. 25, 26; Lev. xix. 19; Deut. xxii. 11; 2 K. xxiii. 7; Ez. xvi. 16; Prov. xxxi. 13, 24). The loom, with its beam (1 Sam. xvii. 7), pin (Judg. vi. 14), and shuttle (Job vii. 6), was, perhaps, introduced later, but as early as David's time (1 Sam. xvii. 7). Together with weaving we read also of embroidery, in which gold and silver threads were interwoven with the body of the stuff, sometimes in figure patterns, or with precious stones set in the needle-work (Ex. xxvi. 1, xxviii. 4, xxxix. 6-13). 7. Besides these arts, those of dyeing and of dressing cloth were practised in Palestine, and those also of tanning and dressing leather (Josh. ii. 15-18; 2 K. i. 8; Matt. iii. 4; Acts ix. 43). Shoemakers, barbers, and tailors are mentioned in the Mishna (Pesach, iv. 6): the barber, or his occupation, by Ezekiel (v. 1; Lev. xiv. 8; Num. vi. 5), and the tailor, plasterers, glaziers, and glass vessels, painters, and goldworkers are mentioned in the Mishna (Chel, viii. 9, xxi. 3, 4, xxi. 1). Tent-makers are noticed in the Acts (xvii. 3), and frequent allusion is made to the trade of the potters. 8. Bakers are noticed in Scripture (Jer. xxvii. 21; Hos. vii. 4); and the well-known valley Tyropoeon probably derived its name from the occupation of the cheese-makers, its inhabitants. Butchers, not Jewish, are spoken of 1 Cor. x. 25.

Handkerchief, Napkin, Apron. The two former of these terms, as used in the A. V. = συνδριον, the latter = σικκινθιον. Both words are of Latin origin: συνδριον = sudarium from sudo, "to sweat," σικκινθιον = semicinctum, i. e. "a half girdle." The sudarium is noticed in the N. T. as a wrapper to fold up money (Luke xii. 20)—as a cloth bound about the head of a corpse (John xi. 44, xx. 7), being probably brought from the crown of the head under the chin—and lastly as an article of dress that could be easily removed (Acts xix. 12), probably a handkerchief worn on the head like the keffieh of the Bedouins. According to the scholiast quoted by Schleusner, the distinction between the two terms is that the sudarium was worn on the head, and the semicinctum used as a handkerchief.

Hanes, a place in Egypt only mentioned in Isa. xxx. 4: "For his princes were at Zoan, and his messengers came to Hanes." Hanes has been supposed by Vitringa, Michaelis, Rosenmüller, and Gesenius, to be the same as Heracleopolis Magna in the Heptanomis. This identification depends wholly upon the similarity of the two names: a consideration of the sense of the passage in which Hanes occurs shows its great improbability. We are disposed to think that the Chald. Paraphr. is right in identifying it with Tahpanhes, a fortified town on the eastern frontier.

Hanging; Hangings. These terms represent both different words in the original, and different articles in the furniture of the Temple. (1.) The "hanging" was a curtain or "covering" to close an entrance; one was placed before the door of the Tabernacle (Ex. xxvi. 36, 37, xxxix. 38); another was placed before the entrance of the court (Ex. xxvii. 16, xxxviii. 18; Num. iv. 26); the term is also applied to the vail that concealed the Holy of Holies (Ex. xxxv. 12, xxxix. 34, xl. 21; Num. iv. 5). (2.) The "hangings" were used for covering the walls of the court of the Tabernacle, just as tapestry was in modern times (Ex. xxvii. 9, xxxv. 17, xxxviii. 9; Num. iii. 26, iv. 26). In 2 K. xxiii. 7, the term botim, strictly "houses," A. V. "hangings," is probably intended to describe tents used as portable sanctuaries.

Hannah, one of the wives of Elkanah, and mother of Samuel (1 Sam. i. ii.). A hymn of thanksgiving for the birth of her son is in the highest order of prophetic poetry; its resemblance to that of the Virgin Mary (comp. 1 Sam. ii. 1-10 with Luke i. 46-55; see also Ps. cxlii.) has been noticed by the commentators. More recent critics have, however, assigned its authorship to David.

Hannathon, one of the cities of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 14).

Hanniel, son of Ephod, and prince of Manasseh (Num. xxiv. 23).

Ha'noah. 1. The third in order of the children of Midian (Gen. xxv. 4).—2. Eldest son of Reuben (Gen. xli. 9; Ex. vi. 14; Num. xxvi. 5; 1 Chr. v. 3), and founder of the family of Ha'nochites, the, Num. xxvi. 5.

Ha'nun. 1. Son of Nahash (2 Sam. x. 1, 2; 1 Chr. xix. 1, 2), king of Ammon, who dishonoured the ambassadors of David (2 Sam. x. 4), and involved the Ammonites in a disastrous war (2 Sam. xii. 31; 1 Chr. xix. 6).—2. A man who, with the people of Zanoah, repaired the ravine-gate in the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 13).—3. The 6th son of Zalapah, who also assisted in the repair of the wall, apparently on the east side (Neh. iii. 30).

Haphra'im, a city of Issachar, mentioned next to Shunem (Josh. xix. 19). About 6 miles northeast of Lejjun, and 2 miles west of Solam (the ancient Shunem), stands the village of el-'Afuleh, which may possibly be the representative of Haphraim.

Ha'ra (1 Chr. v. 26 only), is either a place utterly unknown, or it must be regarded as identical with Haran or Charran.

Har'adah, a desert station of the Israelites (Num. xxxiii. 24, 25); its position is uncertain.

Ha'ran. 1. The third son of Terah, and therefore youngest brother of Abram (Gen. xi. 26). Three children are ascribed to him—Lot (27, 31), and two daughters, viz. Mileah, who married her uncle Nahor (29), and Iscah (29). Haran was born in Ur of the Chaldees, and he died there while his father was still living (28). The ancient Jewish tradition is that Haran was burnt in the furnace of Nimrod for his wavering conduct during the fiery trial of Abraham.—2. A Gershonite Levite in the time of David, one of the family of Shimei (1 Chr. xxiii. 9).

Ha'ran, a son of the great Caleb by his concubine Ephah (1 Chr. ii. 46).

Ha'ran, is the name of the place whither Abraham migrated with his family from Ur of the Chaldees, and where the descendants of his brother Nahor established themselves (comp. Gen. xiv. 10, with xxvii. 43). It is said to be in Mesopotamia (Gen. xxiv. 10), or more definitely, in Padan-Aram (xxv. 20), the cultivated district at the foot of the hills, a name well applying to the beautiful stretch of country which lies below Mount Masius between the Khabour and the Euphrates. Here, about midway in this district, is a town still called Harran, which really seems never to have changed its appellation, and beyond any reasonable doubt is the Haran or Charran of Scripture. Harran lies upon the Belikh (ancient Bilichus), a small affluent of the Euphrates, which falls into it nearly in long. 39°. It is now a small village inhabited by a few families of Arabs.

Ha'rarite, the, the designation of three of David's guard. 1. AGER, a Hararite (2 Sam. xxiii. 11).—2. SHAMMAH the Hararite (2 Sam. xxiii. 33).—3. SHARAR (2 Sam. xxiii. 33) or SACAR (1 Chr. xi. 35) the Hararite, was the father of Ahiam, another member of the guard.

Har'bana, the third of the seven chamberlains, or eunuchs, who served king Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 10).

Har'bonah (Esth. vii. 9), the same as the preceding.

Hare (Heb. arnebeth) occurs only in Lev. xi. 6 and Deut. xiv. amongst the animals disallowed as food by the Mosaic law. There is no doubt at all that arnebeth denotes a "hare;" and in all probability the species Lepus Sinaiticus, and L. Syriacus, are those which were best known to the ancient Hebrews. The hare is at this day called arneb by the Arabs in Palestine and Syria. It was erroneously thought by the ancient Jews to have chewed the cud. They were no doubt misled, as in the case of the shaphan (Hyrax) by the habit these animals have of moving the jaw about.

Har'el. In the margin of Ez. xliii. 15 the word rendered "altar" in the text is given "Harel, i. e. the mountain of God." Junius explains it of the εσχαρα or hearth of the altar of burnt-offering, covered by the network on which the sacrifices were placed over the burning wood.

Harem. [HOUSE.]

Ha'reph, a name occurring in the genealogies of Judah, as a son of Caleb, and as "father of Bethgader" (1 Chr. ii. 51, only).

Ha'reth, the Forest of, in which David took refuge, after, at the instigation of the prophet Gad, he had quitted the "hold" or fastness of the cave of Adullam—if indeed it was Adullam and not Mizpeh of Moab, which is not quite clear (1 Sam. xxi. 5).

Harhai'ah, father of Uzziel 6 (Neh. iii. 8).

Har'has, an ancestor of Shallum the husband of Huldah (2 K. xxi. 14).

Har'hur. The sons of Harhur were among the Nethuinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 51; Neh. vii. 53).

Ha'rim. 1. A priest who had charge of the third division in the house of God (1 Chr. xxiv. 8).—2. Bene-Harim, probably descendants of the above, to the number of 1017, came up from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 39; Neh. vii. 42). The name, probably as representing the family, is mentioned on two other occasions (Neh. x. 5; Ezr. x. 21).—3. It further occurs in a list of the families of priests "who went up with Zerubbabel and Jeshua," and of those who were their descendants in the next generation—in the days of Joiakim the son of Jeshua (Neh. xii. 15). In the former list (xii. 4) the name is changed to REHUM.—4. Another family of Bene-Harim, three hundred and twenty in number, came from the captivity in the same caravan (Ezr. ii. 32; Neh. vii. 35). They also appear among those who had married foreign wives (Ezr. x. 31), as well as those who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 27).

Ha'riph. A hundred and twelve of the Bene-Hariph returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 24). The name occurs again among the "heads of the people" who sealed the covenant (x. 19).

Harlot. That this class of persons existed in the earliest states of society is clear from Gen. xxxviii. 15. Rahab (Josh. ii. 1), is said by the Chaldee paraph., to have been an innkeeper, but if there were such persons, considering what we know of Canaanitish morals (Lev. xviii. 27), we may conclude that they would, if women, have been of this class. The law forbids (xix. 29) the father's compelling his daughter to sin, but does not mention it as a voluntary mode of life on her part without his complicity. The term (kedeshah "consecrated") points to one description of persons and nocturnah ("foreign woman") to another, of whom this class mostly consisted. The first term refers to the impure worship of the Syrian Astarte (Num. xxv. 1; comp. Herod. i. 199). The latter class would grow up with the growth of great cities and of foreign intercourse, and hardly could enter into the view of the Mosaic institutes. As regards the fashions involved in the practice, similar outward marks seem to have attended its earliest forms to those which we trace in the classical writers, e. g. a distinctive dress and a seat by the way side (Gen. xxxviii. 14; comp. Ez. xvi. 16, 25; Bar. vi. 43). Public singing in the streets occurs also (Is. xxiii. 16; Ecclus. ix. 4). Those who thus published their infamy were of the worst repute, others had houses of resort, and both classes seem to have been known among the Jews (Prov. vii. 8-12, xxiii. 28; Ecclus. ix. 7, 8); the two women, 1 K. iii. 16, lived as Greek hetærae sometimes did in a house together. In earlier times the price of a kid is mentioned (Gen. xxxviii.), and great wealth doubtless sometimes accrued to them (Ez. xvi. 33, 39, xxiii. 26). But lust, as distinct from gain, appears as the inducement in Prov. vii. 14, 15. The "harlots" are classed with "publicans," as those who lay under the ban of society in the N. T. (Matt. xxi. 32). The children of such persons were held in contempt, and could not exercise privileges nor inherit (John viii. 41; Deut. xxiii. 2; Judg. xi. 1, 2).

Harnepher, one of the sons of Zophah, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 36).

Harod, the Well, of a spring by which Gideon and his great army encamped on the morning of the day which ended in the rout of the Midianites (Judg. vii. 1), and where the trial of the people by their mode of drinking apparently took place. The Ain Jalud, with which Dean Stanley would identify Harod, is very suitable to the circumstances, as being at present the largest spring in the neighbourhood, and as forming a pool of considerable size, at which great numbers might drink.

Harodite, the, the designation of two of the thirty-seven warriors of David's guard, SHAMMAH and ELIKA (2 Sam. xviii. 25), doubtless derived from a place named Harod.

Har'oh, a name occurring in the genealogical lists of Judah as one of the sons of "Shobal, father of Kirjath-jearim" (1 Chr. ii. 52).

Har'orite, the, the title given to SHAMMOTH, one of the warriors of David's guard (1 Chr. xi. 27).

Harosheth, or rather "Harosheth of the Gentiles," as it was called, from the mixed races that inhabited it, a city in the north of the land of Canaan, supposed to have stood on the west coast of the lake Merom (el-Huléh), from which the Jordan issues forth in one unbroken stream, and in the portion of the tribe of Naphtali. It was the residence of Sisera, captain of Jabin, king of Canaan (Judg. iv. 2), and was the point to which the victorious Israelites under Barak pursued the discomfited host and chariots of the second potentate of that name (Judg. iv. 16). The site of Harosheth does not appear to have been identified by any modern traveller.

Harp (Heb. kinnôr). The kinnôr was the national instrument of the Hebrews, and was well known throughout Asia. The writer of the Pentateuch assigns its invention to the antediluvian period (Gen. iv. 21). Touching the shape of the kinnôr a great difference of opinion prevails. The author of Shilte Haggibborim describes it as resembling the modern harp; Pfeiffer gives it the form of a guitar; and St. Jerome declares it to have resembled in shape the Greek letter delta. Josephus records that the kinnôr had ten strings, and that it was played on with the plectrum; others assign to it twenty-four, and in the Shilte Haggibborim it is said to have had forty-seven. Josephus's statement, however, is in open contradiction to what is set forth in the 1st book of Samuel (xvi. 23, xviii. 10), that David played on the kinnôr with his hand. Probably there was a smaller and a larger kinnôr, and these may have been played in different ways (1 Sam. x. 5).

Harrow. The word so rendered 2 Sam. xii. 31, 1 Chr. xx. 3, is probably a threshing-machine, the verb rendered "to harrow" (Is. xxviii. 24; Job xxxix. 10; Hos. x. 11), expresses apparently the breaking of the clods, and is so far analogous to our harrowing, but whether done by any such machine as we call "a harrow," is very doubtful.

Har'sha. Bene-Harsha were among the families of Nethinim who came back from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 52; Neh. vii. 54).

Hart. The hart is reckoned among the clean animals (Deut. xii. 15, xiv. 5, xv. 22), and seems, from the passages quoted as well as from 1 K. iv. 23, to have been commonly killed for food. The Heb. masc. noun ayyâl denotes, there can be no doubt, some species of Cervidae (deer tribe), either the Dama vulgaris, fallow-deer, or the Cervus Barbatus, the Barbary deer, the southern representative of the European stag (C. elaphus), which occurs in Tunis and the coast of Barbary.

Harum. Father of Ahurhel, in one of the most obscure genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 8).

Har'umaph, father or ancestor of Jedaniah (Neh. iii. 10).

Har'uphite, the, the designation of Shephatiah, one of the Korhites who repaired to David at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 5).

Ha'ruz, a man of Jotbah, father of Meshullemeth, queen of Manasseh (2 K. xxi. 19).

Harvest. [AGRICULTURE.]

Hasadi'ah, one of a group of five persons among the descendants of the royal line of Judah (1 Chr. iii. 20), apparently sons of Zerubbabel.

Hasen'uah, a Benjamite, of one of the chief families in the tribe (1 Chr. ix. 7).

Hashabi'ah. 1. A Merarite Levite (1 Chr. vi. 45; heb. 30).—2. Another Merarite Levite (1 Chr. ix. 14).—3. The fourth of the six sons of Jeduthun (1 Chr. xxv. 3), who had charge of the twelfth course (19).—4. One of the descendants of Hebron the son of Kohath (1 Chr. xxvi. 30).—5. The son of Kemuel, who was prince of the tribe of Levi in the time of David (1 Chr. xxvii. 17).—6. A Levite, one of the "chiefs" of his tribe, who officiated for King Josiah at his great passover-feast (2 Chr. xxxv. 9).—7. A Merarite Levite who accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezr. viii. 19).—8. One of the chiefs of the priests who formed part of the same caravan (Ezr. viii. 24).—9. Ruler of half the circuit or environs of Keilah; he repaired a portion of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 17).—10. One of the Levites who sealed the covenant of reformation after the return from the captivity (Neh. x. 11). Probably this is the person named as one of the chiefs of the Levites in the times immediately subsequent to the return from Babylon (xii. 24; comp. 26).—11. Another Levite, son of Bunni (Neh. xi. 15).—12. A Levite, son of Mattaniah (Neh. xi. 22).—13. A priest of the family of Hilkiah in the days of Joiakim son of Jeshua (Neh. xii. 21).

Hashab'nah, one of the chief of the "people" who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 25).

Hashabni'ah. 1. Father of Hattush (Neh. iii. 10).—2. A Levite who was among those who officiated at the great fast under Ezra and Nehemiah when the covenant was sealed (Neh. ix. 5).

Hashbad'ana, one of the men (probably Levites) who stood on Ezra's left hand while he read the law to the people in Jerusalem (Neh. viii. 4).

Ha'shem. The sons of Hashem the Gizonite are named amongst the members of David's guard in 1 Chr. (xi. 34).

Hash'mannim. This word occurs only in the Hebrew of Ps. lxxviii. 31: "Hashmannim (A. V. "princes") shall come out of Egypt, Cush shall make her hands to hasten to God." The old derivation from the civil name of Hermopolis Magna in the Heptanomis seems to us reasonable. The ancient Egyptian name is Ha-shmen, or Ha-shmoon, the abode of eight. If we suppose that Hashmannim is a proper name and signifies Hermopolites, the mention might be explained by the circumstance that Hermopolis Magna was the great city of the Egyptian Hermes, Thoth, the god of wisdom.

Hash'monah, a station of the Israelites, mentioned Num. xxxiii. 29, as next before Moseroth.

Ha'shub. 1. A son of Pahath-Moab who assisted in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 11).—2. Another who assisted in the same work (Neh. iii. 23).—3. One of the heads of the people who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 23).—4. A Merarite Levite (Neh. xi. 15).

Hash'ubah, the first of a group of five men, apparently the latter half of the family of Zerubbabel (1 Chr. iii. 20).

Ha'shum. 1. Bene-Hashum, two hundred and twenty-three in number, came back from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 19; Neh. vii. 22). Seven men of them had married foreign wives from whom they had to separate (Ezr. x. 33). The chief man of the family was among those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 18).—2. One of the priests or Levites who stood on Ezra's left hand while he read the law to the congregation (Neh. viii. 4).

Hash'upha, one of the families of Nethinim who returned from captivity in the first caravan (Neh. vii. 46).

Has'rah, the form in which the name HARHAS is given in 2 Chr. xxxiv. 22 (comp. 2 K. xxii. 14).

Hasse'na'ah. The Bene-has-senaah rebuilt the fish-gate in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 3).

Has'shub, a Merarite Levite (1 Chr. ix. 14), mentioned again Neh. xi. 15.

Has'upha. Bene-Hasupha were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 43).

Hat. [HEAD-DRESS.]

Ha'tach, one of the eunuchs in the court of Ahasuerus (Esth. iv. 5, 6, 9, 10).

Ha'thath, one of the sons of Othniel the Kenazite (1 Chr. iv. 13).

Hat'ipha. Bene-Hatipha were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 54; Neh. vii. 56).

Hat'ita. Bene-Hatita were among the "porters" (i. e. the gate-keepers), who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45).

Hat'til. Bene-Hattil were among the "children of Solomon's slaves" who came back from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 57; Neh. vii. 59).

Hat'tush. 1. A descendant of the kings of Judah, apparently one of the sons of Shechaniah (1 Chr. iii. 22), in the fourth or fifth generation from Zerubbabel. A person of the same name accompanied Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezr. viii. 2). In another statement Hattush is said to have returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 2).—2. Son of Hashabni'ah; one of those who assisted Nehemiah in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 10).

Hau'ran, a province of Palestine twice mentioned by Ezekiel (xlvii. 16, 18). There can be little doubt that it is identical with the well-known Greek province of Auranitis, and the modern Haurán. Josephus frequently mentions Auranitis in connexion with Trachonitis, Batanea, and Gaulanitis, which with it constituted the ancient kingdom of Bashan.

Hav'ilah. 1. A son of Cush (Gen. x. 7); and 2. a son of Joktan (x. 29). Various theories have been advanced respecting these obscure peoples. It appears to be most probable that both stocks settled in the same country, and there intermarried; thus receiving one name, and forming one race, with a common descent. The Cushite people of this name formed the westernmost colony of Cush along the south of Arabia, and the Joktanites were an earlier colonization. It is commonly thought that the district of Khāwlán, in the Yemen, preserves the trace of this ancient people. The district of Khāwlán lies between the city of San'a and the Hijáz, i. e. in the north-western portion of the Yemen. It took its name, according to the Arabs, from Khāwlán, a descendant of Kahtán [JOKTAN], or, as some say, of Kahlán, brother of Himyer. This genealogy says little more than that the name was Joktanite. Khāwlán is a fertile territory, embracing a large part of myrrhiferous Arabia; mountainous; with plenty of water; and supporting a large population. Those who separate the Cushite and Joktanite Havilah either place them in Niebuhr's two Khāwláns, or they place 2 on the north of the peninsula, following the supposed argument derived from Gen. xxv. 18, and 1 Sam. xv. 7, and finding the name in that of the Xavoxaia. A Joktanite settlement so far north is however very improbable. They discover 1 in the Avallatæ on the African coast.

Hav'ilah (Gen. ii. 11). [EDEN.]

Ha'voth-Ja'ir, certain villages on the east of Jordan, in Gilead or Bashan, which were taken by Jair the son of Manasseh, and called after his name (Num. xxxii. 41; Deut. iii. 14). In the records of Manasseh in Josh. xii. 30, and 1 Chr. ii. 23, the Havoth-jair are reckoned with other districts as making up sixty "cities" (comp. 1 K. iv. 13). There is apparently some confusion in these different statements as to what the sixty-cities really consisted of. No less doubtful is the number of the Havoth-jair. In 1 Chr. ii. 22 they are specified as twenty-three, but in Judg. x. 4, as thirty.

Hawk (Heb. netz), the translation of the above-named Heb. term (Lev. xi. 16; Deut. xiv. 15; Job xxxix. 26). The word is doubtless generic, as appears from the expression in Deut. and Lev. "after his kind," and includes various species of the Falconidae, with more especial allusion perhaps to the small diurnal birds, such as the kestrel (Falco tinnunculus), the hobby (Hypotriorchis subbuteo), the gregarious lesser kestrel (Tinnunculus cenchris), common about the ruins in the plain districts of Palestine, all of which were probably known to the ancient Hebrews. With respect to the passage in Job (l. c.), which appears to allude to the migratory habits of hawks, it is curious to observe that of the ten or twelve lesser raptors of Palestine, nearly all are summer migrants. The kestrel remains all the year, but T. conchris, Micronisus gabar, Hyp. eleonorae, and F. melanopterus, are all migrants from the south. Besides the abovenamed smaller hawks, the two magnificent species, F. Saker and F. lanarius, are summer visitors to Palestine.

Hay (Heb. chátstr), the rendering of the A. V. in Prov. xxvii. 25, and Is. xv. 6, of the abovenamed Heb. term, which occurs frequently in the O. T., and denotes "grass" of any kind. Harmer, quoting from a MS. paper of Sir J. Chardin, states that hay is not made anywhere in the East, and that the "hay" of the A. V. is therefore an error of translation. It is quite probable that the modern Orientals do not make hay in our sense of the term; but it is certain that the ancients did mow their grass, and probably made use of the dry material. See Ps. xxxvii. 2. We may remark that there is an express Hebrew term for "dry grass" or "hay," viz. chashash, which, in the only two places where the word occurs (Is. v. 24, xxxiii. 11) is rendered "chaff" in the A. V. We do not, however, mean to assert that the chashash of the Orientals represents our modern English hay. Doubtless the "dry grass" was not stacked, but only cut in small quantities, and then consumed.

Hazael was a king of Damascus, who reigned from about B.C. 886 to B.C. 840. He appears to have been previously a person in a high position at the court of Benhadad, and was sent by his master to Elisha, to inquire if he would recover from the malady under which he was suffering. Elisha's answer led to the murder of Benhadad by his ambitious servant, who forthwith mounted the throne (2 K. viii. 7-15). He was soon engaged in hostilities with Ahaziah king of Judah, and Jehoram king of Israel, for the possession of the city of Ramoth-Gilead (ibid. viii. 28). The Assyrian inscriptions show that about this time a bloody and destructive war was being waged between the Assyrians on the one side, and the Syrians, Hittites, Hamathites, and Phoenicians on the other. Towards the close of the reign of Jehu, Hazael led them against the Israelites (about B.C. 860), whom he "smote in all their coasts" (2 K. x. 32), thus accomplishing the prophecy of Elisha (ibid. viii. 12). At the close of his life, having taken Gath (ibid. xii. 17; comp. Am. vi. 2), he proceeded to attack Jerusalem (2 Chr. xxiv. 24), and was about to assault the city, when Joash bribed him to retire (2 K. xii. 18). Hazael appears to have died about the year B.C. 840 (ibid. xiii. 24), having reigned 46 years.

Hazai'ah, a man of Judah of the family of the Shilonites, or descendants of SHELAH (Neh. xi. 5).

Ha'zar-ad'dar, &c. [HAZER.]

Hazarma'veth, the third, in order, of the sons of Joktan (Gen. x. 28). The name is preserved, almost literally, in the Arabic Hadramawt and Hadrumawt, and the appellation of a province and an ancient people of Southern Arabia. The province of Hadramawt is situate east of the modern Yemen. Its capital is Satham, a very ancient city, and its chief ports are Mirbat, Zafari, and Kisheem, from whence a great trade was carried on, in ancient times, with India and Africa.

Hazel. The Hebrew term lûz occurs only in Gen. xxx. 37. Authorities are divided between the hazel and the almond tree, as representing the lûz. The latter is most probably correct.

Hazelelponi, the sister of the sons of Etam in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 3).

Hazer, topographically, seems generally employed for the "villages" of people in a roving and unsettled life, the semi-permanent collections of dwellings which are described by travellers among the modern Arabs to consist of rough stone walls covered with the tent-cloths. As a proper name it appears in the A. V.:—1. In the plural, HAZERIM, and HAZEROTH, for which see below. 2. In the slightly different form of HAZOR. 3. In composition with other words.—1. HAZAR-ADDAR, a place named as one of the landmarks on the southern boundary of the land promised to Israel (Num. xxiv. 4; ADAR, Josh. xv. 3). Its site does not appear to have been encountered in modern times.—2. HAZAR-KNAN, the place at which the northern boundary of the land promised to the children of Israel was to terminate (Num. xxiv. 9, 10; comp. Ez. xlvii. 17, xlviii. 1). Mr. Porter would identify Hazarenan with Kuryetein, a village more than sixty miles E.N.E. of Damascus.—3. HAZAR-GADDAN, one of the towns in the southern district of Judah (Josh. xv. 27), named between Moladah and Heshmon.—4. HAZAR-HAT-TICON, a place named in Ezekiel's prophecy of the ultimate boundaries of the land (Ez. xlvii. 16), and specified as being on the boundary of Hauran. It is not yet known.—5. HAZAR-SHUAL, a town in the southern district of Judah, lying between Hazar-gaddah and Beersheba (Josh. xv. 28, xix. 3; 1 Chr. iv. 28).—6. HAZAR-SUBAH, one of the "cities" allotted to Simeon in the extreme south of the territory of Judah (Josh. xix. 5).—7. HAZAR-SUSIM, the form under which the preceding name appears in the list of the towns of Simeon in 1 Chr. iv. 31.

Ha'zerim. The AVIMS, or more accurately the Avvim, are said to have lived "in the villages (A.V. "Hazerim") as far as Gaza" (Deut. ii. 23) before their expulsion by the Caphtorim.

Ha'zeroth (Num. xi. 35, xii. 16, xxxiii. 17; Deut. i. 1), a station of the Israelites in the desert, and perhaps recognizable in the Arabic Hudhara.

Ha'sazon-Ta-mar, and Ha'sazon-Ta-mar, the ancient name of Engedi (Gen. xiv. 7). The name occurs only once again—in the records of the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chr. xx. 2).

Ha'ziel, a Levite in the time of David, of the family of Shimei or Shimi, the younger branch of the Gershonites (1 Chr. xxii. 9).

Ha'zo, a son of Nahor, by Milcah his wife (Gen. xxii. 22).

Ha'zor. 1. A fortified city, which on the occupation of the country was allotted to Naphtali (Josh. xix. 36). Its position was apparently between Ramah and Kedesh (ibid. xii. 19), on the high ground overlooking the Lake of Merom. There is no reason for supposing it a different place from that of which Jabin was king (Josh. xi. 1; Judg. iv. 2, 17; 1 Sam. xii. 9). It was the principal city of the whole of North Palestine (Josh. xi. 10). It was fortified by Solomon (1 K. iv. 15), and its inhabitants were carried captive by Tiglath-Pileser (2 K. xv. 29). We encounter it once more in 1 Macc. xi. 67 (A. V. Nasor). The most probable site of Hazer is Tell Khuraibeh.—2. One of the "cities" of Judah in the extreme south, named next in order to Kelesh (Josh. xv. 23).—3. Hazer-Hadattah, = "new Hazer," another of the southern towns of Judah (Josh. xv. 25).—4. "Hezron which is Hazer" (Josh. xv. 25).—5. A place in which the Benjamites resided after their return from the captivity (Neh. xi. 33). It would seem to have lain north of Jerusalem, but it has not yet been discovered.

Head-dress. The Hebrews do not appear to have regarded a covering for the head as an essential article of dress. The earliest notice we have of such a thing is in connexion with the sacerdotal vestments (Ex. xxviii. 40). We may infer that it was not ordinarily worn in the Mosaic age. Even in after times it seems to have been reserved especially for purposes of ornament: thus the Tséniph is noticed as being worn by nobles (Job xxix. 14), ladies (Is. iii. 23), and kings (Is. lxii. 3), while the Peér was an article of holiday dress (Is. lxi. 3, A. V. "beauty;" Ez. xxiv. 17, 23), and was worn at weddings (Is. lxi. 10). The former of these terms undoubtedly describes a kind of turban, and its form probably resembled that of the High-priest's Mitsnepheth, as described by Josephus (Ant. iii. 7, §3). The other term, Peér, primarily means an ornament, and is so rendered in the A. V. (Is. lxi. 10; see also ver. 3, "beauty"), and is specifically applied to the head-dress from its ornamental character. It is uncertain what the term properly describes, but it may have applied to the jewels and other ornaments with which the turban is frequently decorated. The ordinary head-dress of the Bedouin consists of the keffieh, a square handkerchief, generally of red and yellow cotton, or cotton and silk, folded so that three of the corners hang down over the back and shoulders, leaving the face exposed, and bound round the head by a cord. It is not improbable that a similar covering was used by the Hebrews on certain occasions. The introduction of the Greek hat by Jason, as an article of dress adapted to the gymnasium, was regarded as a national dishonour (2 Macc. iv. 12). The Assyrian head-dress is described in Ez. xlii. 15 under the terms "exceeding in dyed attire." The word rendered "hats" in Dan. iii. 21 properly applies to a cloak.

Bedouin Head-dress; the Keffiyeh.

Hearth. One way of baking much practised in the East is to place the dough on an iron plate, either laid on, or supported on legs above the vessel sunk in the ground, which forms the oven. The cakes baked "on the hearth" (Gen. xviii. 6) were probably baked in the existing Bedouin manner, on hot stones covered with ashes. The "hearth" of king Jehoiakim's winter palace (Jer. xxxvi. 23) was possibly a pan or brazier of charcoal.

Heath, Heb. 'aró'ér (Jer. xlviii. 6), and 'ar'ár. There seems no reason to doubt Celsius' conclusion that the 'ar'ár (Jer. xvii. 6) is identical with the 'arar of Arabic writers, which is some species of juniper, probably the Juniperus Sabina, or savin.

Heathen (Heb. gôí, gôým). 1. While as yet the Jewish nation had no political existence, gôým denoted generally the nations of the world, especially including the immediate descendants of Abraham (Gen. xviii. 18; comp. Gal. iii. 16). The latter, as they grew in numbers and importance, were distinguished in a most marked manner from the nations by whom they were surrounded, and were provided with a code of laws and a religious ritual which made the distinction still more peculiar. The nations from whom they were thus separated received the especial appellation of gôým. They are ever associated with the worship of false gods, and the foul practices of idolaters (Lev. xviii. xx.), and these constituted their chief distinctions, as gôým, from the worshippers of the one God, the people of Jehovah (Num. xv. 41; Deut. xxviii. 10). This distinction was maintained in its full force during the early times of the monarchy (2 Sam. vii. 23; 1 K. xi. 4-8, xiv. 24; Ps. cvi. 35).—2. But, even in early Jewish times, the term gôým received by anticipation a significance of wider range than the national experience (Lev. xxvi. 33, 38; Deut. xxx. 1); and as the latter was gradually developed during the prosperous times of the monarchy, the gôým were the surrounding nations generally, with whom the Israelites were brought into contact by the extension of their commerce. In the time of the Maccabees, following the customs of the gôým denoted the neglect or concealment of circumcision (1 Macc. i. 15), disregard of sacrifices, profanation of the Sabbath, eating of swine's flesh and meat offered to idols (2 Macc. vi. 6-9, 18, xv. 1, 2), and adoption of the Greek national games (2 Macc. iv. 12, 14). In all points Judaism and heathenism are strongly contrasted. The "barbarous multitude" in 2 Mac. ii. 21 are opposed to those who played the men for Judaism, and the distinction now becomes an ecclesiastical one (comp. Matt. xviii. 17). But, in addition to its significance as an ethnographical term, gōyim had a moral sense which must not be overlooked. In Ps. ix. 5, 15, 17 (comp. Ez. vii. 21) the word stands in parallelism with "the wicked;" and in ver. 17 the people thus designated are described as "forgetters of God," that know not Jehovah (Jer. x. 25).

Heaven. There are four Hebrew words thus rendered in the O. T., which we may briefly notice. 1. Rāḥa (A. V. firmament), a solid expanse. Through its open lattices (Gen. vii. 11; 2 K. vii. 2, 19) or doors (Ps. lxxviii. 23) the dew and snow and hail are poured upon the earth (Job xxxviii. 22, 37). This firm vault, which Job describes as being "strong as a molten looking-glass" (xxxviii. 18), is transparent, like pellucid sapphire, and splendid as crystal (Dan. xii. 3; Ex. xxiv. 10; Ez. i. 22; Rev. iv. 6), over which rests the throne of God (Is. lxvi. 1; Ez. i. 26), and which is opened for the descent of angels, or for prophetic visions (Gen. xxviii. 17; Ez. i. 1; Acts vii. 56, x. 11). In it, like gems or golden lamps, the stars are fixed to give light to the earth, and regulate the seasons (Gen. i. 14-19); and the whole magnificent, immeasurable structure (Jer. xxxi. 37) is supported by the mountains as its pillars, or strong foundations (Ps. xviii. 7; 2 Sam. xxii. 8; Job xxiv. 11).—2. Shamayim. This is the word used in the expression "the heaven and the earth," or "the upper and lower regions" (Gen. i. 1).—3. Mārōm, used for heaven in Ps. xviii. 16; Jer. xxv. 30; Is. xxiv. 18. Properly speaking it means a mountain, as in Ps. cii. 19; Ez. xvii. 23.—4. Shechāḥīm, "expanses," with reference to the extent of heaven (Deut. xxxiii. 26; Job xxxv. 5). St. Paul's expression "third heaven" (2 Cor. xii. 2) has led to much conjecture. Grotius said that the Jews divided the heaven into three parts, viz. 1. the air or atmosphere, where clouds gather; 2. the firmament, in which the sun, moon, and stars are fixed; 3. the upper heaven, the abode of God and his angels.

Heber. 1. Grandson of the patriarch Asher (Gen. xli. 17; 1 Chr. vii. 31; Num. xxvi. 45).—2. Of the tribe of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 18).—3. A Gadite (1 Chr. v. 13).—4. A Benjamite (1 Chr. viii. 17).—5. Another Benjamite (1 Chr. viii. 22).—6. Heber, the Kenite, the husband of Jael (Judg. iv. 11-17, v. 24).—7. The patriarch EBER (Luke iii. 35).

Heberites, the, descendants of Heber, a branch of the tribe of Asher (Num. xxvi. 45).

Hebrew, Hebrews. This word first occurs as applied to Abraham (Gen. xiv. 13). It was afterwards given as a name to his descendants. Four derivations have been proposed: I. From Abram.—II. From abar, = "crossed over," applied by the Canaanites to Abraham upon his crossing the Euphrates (Gen. xiv. 13).—III. From eber, "beyond, on the other side," is essentially the same with II., since both rest upon the hypothesis that Abraham and his posterity were called Hebrews in order to express a distinction between the races E. and W. of the Euphrates.—IV. From the patriarch Eber. But no special prominence is in the genealogy assigned to Eber such as might entitle him to the position of head or founder of the race. From the genealogical scheme in Gen. xi. 10-26, it does not appear that the Jews thought of Eber as a source primary, or even secondary of the national descent. There is, indeed, only one passage in which it is possible to imagine any peculiar resting-point as connected with the name of Eber. In Gen. x. 21 Shem is called "the father of all the children of Eber," i. e. father of the nations to the east of the Euphrates. The appellative derivation (from abar or eber) is strongly confirmed by the historical use of the word Hebrew. A patronymic would naturally be in use only among the people themselves, while the appellative which had been originally applied to them as strangers in a strange land would probably continue to designate them in their relations to neighbouring tribes, and would be their current name among foreign nations. This is precisely the case with the terms Israelite and Hebrew respectively. The former was used by the Jews of themselves among themselves, the latter was the name by which they were known to foreigners. Briefly, we suppose that Hebrew was originally a Cis-Euphratian word applied to Trans-Euphratian immigrants: it was accepted by these immigrants in their external relations; and after the general substitution of the word Jew, it still found a place in that marked and special feature of national centralization, the language.

Hebrewess, a Hebrew woman (Jer. xxxiv. 9).

Hebrews, Epistle to the. Canonical authority. Was it received and transmitted as canonical by the immediate successors of the apostles? The most important witness among these, Clement (A.D. 70 or 95), refers to this Epistle in the same way as, and more frequently than, to any other canonical book. Little stress can be laid upon the few possible allusions to it in Barnabas, Hermas, Polycarp, and Ignatius. It is received as canonical by Justin Martyr, and by the compilers of the Peshito version of the New Testament. Basilides and Marcion are recorded as distinctly rejecting the Epistle. But at the close of that period, in the North African church, where first the Gospel found utterance in the Latin tongue, orthodox Christianity first doubted the canonical authority of the Epistle to the Hebrews. To the old Latin version of the Scriptures, which was completed probably about A.D. 173, this Epistle seems to have been added as a composition of Barnabas, and as destitute of canonical authority. During the next two centuries the extant fathers of the Roman and North African churches regard the Epistle as a book of no canonical authority; but in the fourth century its authority began to revive. At the end of the fourth century, Jerome, the most learned and critical of the Latin fathers, reviewed the conflicting opinions as to the authority of this Epistle. He considered that the prevailing, though not universal view of the Latin churches was of less weight than the view not only of ancient writers, but also of all the Greek and all the Eastern churches, where the Epistle was received as canonical and read daily; and he pronounced a decided opinion in favour of its authority. The great contemporary light of North Africa, St. Augustine, held a similar opinion. The 3rd Council of Carthage, A.D. 397, and a Decretal of Pope Innocent, A.D. 416, gave a final confirmation to their decision. But such doubts were confined to the Latin churches from the middle of the second to the close of the fourth century. All the rest of orthodox Christendom from the beginning was agreed upon the canonical authority of this Epistle. Cardinal Cajetan, the opponent of Luther, was the first to disturb the tradition of a thousand years, and to deny its authority. Erasmus, Calvin, and Beza questioned only its authorship. Luther, when he printed his version of the Bible, separated this book from St. Paul's Epistles, and placed it with the Epistles of St. James and St. Jude, next before the Revelation; indicating by this change of order his opinion that the four relegated books are of less importance and less authority than the rest of the New Testament.—II. Who was the author of the Epistle?—The superscription, the ordinary source of information, is wanting; but there is no reason to doubt that at first, everywhere, except in North Africa, St. Paul was regarded as the author. Clement ascribed to St. Luke the translation of the Epistle into Greek from a Hebrew original of St. Paul. Origen believed that the thoughts were St. Paul's, the language and composition St. Luke's or Clement's of Rome. Tertullian names Barnabas as the reputed author according to the North African tradition. The view of the Alexandrian fathers, a middle point between the Eastern and Western traditions, won its way in the Church. Luther's conjecture that Apollos was the author has been widely adopted. Luke by Grotius. Silas by others. Neander attributes it to some apostolic man of the Pauline school, whose training and method of stating doctrinal truth differed from St. Paul's. The distinguished name of Ewald has been given recently to the hypothesis that it was written by some Jewish teacher residing at Jerusalem to a church in some important Italian town, which is supposed to have sent a deputation to Palestine. If it be asked to what extent, and by whom was St. Paul assisted in the composition of this Epistle, the reply must be in the words of Origen, "Who wrote [i. e. as in Rom. xvi. 22, wrote from the author's dictation] this Epistle, only God knows." The similarity in phraseology which exists between the acknowledged writings of St. Luke and this Epistle, his constant companionship with St. Paul, and his habit of listening to and recording the Apostle's arguments, form a strong presumption in his favour.—III. To whom was the Epistle sent?—This question was agitated as early as the time of Chrysostom, who replies,—to the Jews in Jerusalem and Palestine. The argument of the Epistle is such as could be used with most effect to a church consisting exclusively of Jews by birth, personally familiar with and attached to the Temple-service. Ebrard limits the primary circle of readers even to a section of the church at Jerusalem. Some critics have maintained that this Epistle was addressed directly to Jewish believers everywhere; others have restricted it to those who dwelt in Asia and Greece.—IV. Where and when was it written?—Eastern traditions of the fourth century, in connexion with the opinion that St. Paul is the writer, name Italy and Rome, or Athens, as the place from whence the Epistle was written. Either place would agree with, perhaps was suggested by, the mention of Timothy in the last chapter. The Epistle was evidently written before the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. The whole argument, and specially the passages viii. 4 and sq., ix. 6 and sq., and xiii. 10 and sq., imply that the Temple was standing, and that its usual course of Divine service was carried on without interruption. The date which best agrees with the traditional account of the authorship and destination of the Epistle is A.D. 63, about the end of St. Paul's imprisonment at Rome, or a year after Albinus succeeded Festus as Procurator.—V. In what language was it written?—Like St. Matthew's Gospel, the Epistle to the Hebrews has afforded ground for much unimportant controversy respecting the language in which it was originally written. The earliest statement is that of Clement of Alexandria to the effect that it was written by St. Paul in Hebrew, and translated by St. Luke into Greek. But nothing is said to lead us to regard it as a tradition, rather than a conjecture suggested by the style of the Epistle. Bleek argues in support of a Greek original, on the grounds of (1.) the purity and easy flow of the Greek; (2.) the use of Greek words which could not be adequately expressed in Hebrew without long periphrase; (3.) the use of paronomasia; and (4.) the use of the Septuagint in quotations and references.—VI. Condition of the Hebrews, and scope of the Epistle.—The numerous Christian churches scattered throughout Judaea (Acts ix. 31; Gal. i. 22) were continually exposed to persecution from the Jews (1 Thess. ii. 14); but in Jerusalem there was one additional weapon in the hands of the predominant oppressors of the Christians. The magnificent national Temple might be shut against the Hebrew Christian; and even if this affliction were not often laid upon him, yet there was a secret burden which he bore within him, the knowledge that the end of all the beauty and awfulness of Zion was rapidly approaching. What could take the place of the Temple, and that which was behind the veil, and the Levitical sacrifices, and the Holy City, when they should cease to exist? What compensation could Christianity offer him for the loss which was pressing the Hebrew Christian more and more? The writer of this Epistle meets the Hebrew Christians on their own ground. His answer is—"Your new faith gives you Christ, and, in Christ, all you seek, all your fathers sought. In Christ the Son of God you have, an all-sufficient Mediator, nearer than angels to the Father, eminent above Moses as a benefactor, more sympathising and more prevailing than the High-priest as an intercessor: His sabbath awaits you in heaven; to His covenant the old was intended to be subservient; His atonement is the eternal reality of which sacrifices are but the passing shadow; His city heavenly, not made with hands. Having Him, believe in Him with all your heart, with a faith in the unseen future, strong as that of the saints of old, patient under present, and prepared for coming woe, full of energy, and hope, and holiness, and love." Such was the teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

Hebron. 1. The third son of Kohath, who was the second son of Levi; the younger brother of Amram, father of Moses and Aaron (Ex. vi. 18; Num. iii. 19; 1 Chr. vi. 2, 18, xxiii. 12). The immediate children of Hebron are not mentioned by name (comp. Ex. vi. 21, 22), but he was the founder of a family of Hebronites (Num. iii. 27, xxvi. 58; 1 Chr. xxvi. 23, 30, 31) or Bene-Hebron (1 Chr. xv. 9, xxiii. 19).—2. In the genealogical lists of the tribe of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 42, 43), Mareshah is said to have been the "father of Hebron." It is impossible at present to say whether these names are intended to be those of the places themselves or of persons who founded them.

Hebron. 1. A city of Judah (Josh. xv. 54);

situated among the mountains (Josh. xi. 7), 20 Roman miles south of Jerusalem, and the same distance north of Beersheba. Hebron is one of the most ancient cities in the world still existing; and in this respect it is the rival of Damascus. It was built, says a sacred writer, "seven years before Zoan in Egypt" (Num. xiii. 22); and was a well-known town when Abraham entered Canaan 3780 years ago (Gen. xiii. 18). Its original name was Kirjath-Arba (Judg. i. 10), "the city of Arba;" so called from Arba, the father of Anak, and progenitor of the giant Anakim (Josh. xxi. 11, xv. 13, 14). The chief interest of this city arises from its having been the scene of some of the most striking events in the lives of the patriarchs. Sarah died at Hebron; and Abraham then bought from Ephron the Hittite the field and cave of Machpelah, to serve as a family tomb [MACHPELAH.] The cave is still there; and the massive walls of the Haram or mosque, within which it lies, form the most remarkable object in the whole city. Abraham is called by Mohammedans el-Khulî, "the Friend," i. e. of God, and this is the modern name of Hebron. Hebron now contains about 5000 inhabitants, of whom some 50 families are Jews. It is picturesquely situated in a narrow valley, surrounded by rocky hills. The valley runs from north to south; and the main quarter of the town, surmounted by the lofty walls of the venerable Haram, lies partly on the eastern slope (Gen. xxxvii. 14; comp. xxiii. 19). About a mile from the town, up the valley, is one of the largest oak-trees in Palestine. This, say some, is the very tree beneath which Abraham pitched his tent, and it still bears the name of the patriarch.—2. One of the towns in the territory of Asher (Josh. xix. 28), on the boundary of the tribe. No one in modern times has discovered its site. Besides, it is not certain whether the name should not rather be Ebdon or Abdon, since that form is found in many MSS.

Hebronites, the. A family of Kohathite Levites, descendants of Hebron the son of Kohath (Num. iii. 27, xxvi. 58; 1 Chr. xvi. 23).

Hedge. Three of the Heb. words thus rendered in the A. V. denote simply that which surrounds or encloses, whether it be a stone wall (geder, Prov. xxiv. 31; Ez. xlii. 10), or a fence of other materials. Gâdêr and gêdêrah are used of the hedge of a vineyard (Num. xxi. 24; Ps. lxxxix. 40; 1 Chr. iv. 23), and the latter is employed to describe the rude walls of stone, or fences of thorn, which served as a shelter for sheep in winter and summer (Num. xxxii. 16). The stone walls which surround the sheepfolds of modern Palestine are frequently crowned with sharp thorns. In order to protect the vineyards from the ravages of wild beasts (Ps. lxxx. 12) it was customary to surround them with a wall of loose stones or mud (Matt. xxi. 33; Mark xii. 1), which was a favourite haunt of serpents (Eccl. x. 8), and a retreat for locusts from the cold (Nah. iii. 17). A wall or fence of this kind is clearly distinguished in Is. v. 5 from the tangled hedge, mesôôdh (Mic. vii. 4), which was planted as an additional safeguard to the vineyard (cf. Eccles. xxviii. 24), and was composed of the thorny shrubs with which Palestine abounds. The prickly pear, a species of cactus, so frequently employed for this purpose in the East at present, is believed to be of comparatively modern introduction.

Hega'i, one of the eunuchs (A. V. "chamberlains") of the court of Ahasuerus (Esth. ii. 8, 15).

He'ge, another form of the preceding (Esth. ii. 3).

Heifer. The Hebrew language has no expression that exactly corresponds to our heifer; for both eglah and parah are applied to cows that have calved (1 Sam. vi. 7-12; Job xxi. 10; Is. vii. 21). The heifer or young cow was not commonly used for ploughing, but only for treading out the corn (Hos. x. 11; but see Judg. xiv. 18), when it ran about without any headstall (Deut. xiv. 4); hence the expression an "unbroken heifer" (Hos. iv. 16; A. V. "backsliding"), to which Israel is compared.

Heir. The Hebrew institutions relative to inheritance were of a very simple character. Under the Patriarchal system the property was divided among the sons of the legitimate wives (Gen. xxi. 10, xiv. 36, xxv. 5), a larger portion being assigned to one, generally the eldest, on whom devolved the duty of maintaining the females of the family. The sons of concubines were portioned off with presents (Gen. xxv. 6). At a later period the exclusion of the sons of concubines was rigidly enforced (Judg. xi. 1 ff.). Daughters had no share in the patrimony (Gen. xxxi. 14), but received a marriage portion. The Mosaic law regulated the succession to real property thus: it was to be divided among the sons, the eldest receiving a double portion (Deut. xxi. 17), the others equal shares; if there were no sons, it went to the daughters (Num. xxvii. 8), on the condition that they did not marry out of their own tribe (Num. xxxvi. 6 ff.; Tob. vi. 12, vii. 13), otherwise the patrimony was forfeited. If there were no daughters, it went to the brother of the deceased; if no brother, to the paternal uncle; and, failing these, to the next of kin (Num. xxvii. 9-11). In the case of a widow being left without children, the nearest of kin on her husband's side had the right of marrying her, and in the event of his refusal the next of kin (Ruth iii. 12, 13): with him rested the obligation of redeeming the property of the widow (Ruth iv. 1 ff.), if it had been either sold or mortgaged. If none stepped forward to marry the widow, the inheritance remained with her until her death, and then reverted to the next of kin. The land being thus so strictly tied up, the notion of heirship, as we understand it, was hardly known to the Jews. Testamentary dispositions were of course superfluous. The references to wills in St. Paul's writings are borrowed from the usages of Greece and Rome (Heb. ix. 17), whence the custom was introduced into Judea.

He'lah, one of the two wives of Ashur, father of Tekoa (1 Chr. iv. 5).

He'lam, a place east of the Jordan, but west of the Euphrates, at which the Syrians were collected by Hadarezer, and at which David met and defeated them (2 Sam. x. 16, 17). The most probable conjecture perhaps is that it is identical with Alamatha, a town named by Ptolemy, and placed by him on the west of the Euphrates near Nicophorium.

Hel'bah, a town of Asher, probably on the plain of Phœnicia, not far from Sidon (Judg. i. 31).

Hel'bon, a place only mentioned in Ezekiel xxvii. Geographers have hitherto represented Helbon as identical with the city of Aleppo, called Haleb by the Arabs; but there are strong reasons against this. A few years ago Mr. Porter directed attention to a village and district within a few miles of Damascus, still bearing the ancient name Helbon, and still celebrated as producing the finest grapes in the country. There cannot be a doubt that this village, and not Aleppo, is the Helbon of Ezekiel.

Helchi'ah, 1 Esd. viii. 1. [HILKIAH.]

Helchi'as, 2 Esd. i. 1. [HILKIAH.]

Heldai. 1. The twelfth captain of the monthly courses for the temple service (1 Chr. xxvii. 15).

2. An Israelite who seems to have returned from the Captivity (Zech. vi. 10).

Heleb, son of Baanah, the Netophathite, one of the heroes of king David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 29). In the parallel list the name is given as Heled, 1 Chr. xi. 30.

Helek, one of the descendants of Manasseh, and second son of Gilead (Num. xxvi. 30).

Helekites, the, the family descended from the foregoing (Num. xxvi. 30).

Helem. 1. A descendant of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 35).—2. A man mentioned only in Zech. vi. 14. Apparently the same as HELDAT.

Hel'eph, the place from which the boundary of the tribe of Naphtali started (Josh. xix. 33). Van de Velde proposes to identify it with Beitluf.

Heldes. 1. One of "the thirty" of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 26; 1 Chr. xi. 27), an Ephraimite, and captain of the seventh monthly course (1 Chr. xxvii. 10).—2. A man of Judah, son of Azariah (1 Chr. ii. 39).
